From this Memorial it will be seen, that the Seventh-day People do not ask, (as has been imagined by some persons,) the repeal of that law, which has frequently been denominated, one of the 'Blue Laws of Jersey,' but only ask a modification of its provisions, imposing onerous burdens upon them, so as to afford them their religious rights—religious equality with other denominations of Christians, which the Constitution of the State clearly and most unequivocally guarantees to them.

It is a right, and an act of justice, which all enlightened men cheerfully concede to them, and which has not only received the signatures of some of the most distinguished men of the State, but the names of several clergymen who observe the first day; proving that in the holy cause of religious liberty, they look beyond sectarian prejudices, and magnanimously succor the oppressed.

The Seventh-day People have moved in this matter, at this time, from the circumstance of the Code of Laws of the State being about to undergo a revision, to make them harmonize with the New Constitution, and to save conflict hereafter; as that law must indubitably be declared unconstitutional should an issue upon it ever be carried up to the Supreme Court. Indeed, so well aware are our first-day friends of this matter, that they freely confess, such a law could not possibly be passed at the present day, and who entertained strong apprehensions of its being repealed entirely. The Seventh-day People, I repeat, do not ask its repeal. They would never have invoked the Law nor the makers of the Law, to interpose and enact any law to secure to them their Sabbath, nor to impose it upon others; but legislation having already been made to bear oppressively on them, they deem it due to themselves and the cause of religious freedom, to ask, at this juncture, that redress to which they are entitled as Christian citizens of the State. They ask for no privileges to favor the Sabbath they observe, above another, although we have the express "so saith the Lord" for our practice; they ask no license for reckless and wicked persons to desecrate all days; they only ask the same privileges they accord to others—that the present laws of the State may be so modified as to secure equal rights to them, and that in passing laws hereafter, they "do unto us, as they would have others do unto them," under like circumstances.

P. S. Since having written the above, I have received the accompanying printed document which has recently been presented to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, supplemental to the Memorial of the Seventh-day Baptists of that State who suffered severe persecution "for righteousness sake," during the past summer; and who have been forced to seek redress at the hands of the Legislature.

It notices a case of persecution, in this State, immediately after the passage of the law of 1798 above referred to; and introduces the opinion of him, to whom, under God, we are indebted for all our liberties, on this deeply absorbing subject.

To the Honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met:

An extract from a German Pamphlet published at Ephrata, Pa.

"On the 2nd of October, 1797, at New Mills, Burlington County, New Jersey, a Seventh-day Baptist being indicted before a Justice of the Peace for working on Sunday, and fined, he appealed; during the trial at Court an extract of a letter from Gen. Washington was produced by the Judge in his charge to the Jury, which was in answer to a Committee of a Baptist Society in Virginia, dated August 4, 1789, as follows:—

"'If I had the least idea of any difficulty resulting from the Constitution adopted by the Convention of which I had the honor to be President, when it was formed, so as to endanger the rights of any religious denomination, than I never should have attached my name to that instrument. If I had any idea that the General Government was so administered that the liberty of conscience was endangered, I pray you be assured that no man would be more willing than myself to revise and alter that part of it, so as to avoid all religious persecution. You can, without any doubt, remember that I have often expressed as my opinion, that every man who conducts himself as a good citizen is accountable alone to God for his religious faith, and should be protected in worshiping God according to the dictates of his conscience.

Signed, GEORGE WASHINGTON.

The result was, acquittal by the Jury."

I hereby certfy that I saw the original English from which the above German Pamphlet was translated, at Ephrata, Pa., A. D. 1800.

DEATH OF ST. PAUL.

2 TIM. iv: 6, 7, 8—"I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand," &c.

PAUL is now, for the second and last time, a prisoner at Rome, and soon after writing this epistle is supposed to have died the death of a martyr. He is thought to have died in the year of our Lord 67 or 68. The language of the text seems to indicate the nature of his death: more strictly rendered, it would have read, "For I am now ready to be poured out," &c., as a libation. I am now ready, or about to be offered as a victim. To this death he had looked as that which should perfect his sufferings for Christ's sake. He wrote this epistle on the borders of eternity—the confines of heaven. It is directed to Timothy, one of his dearest brethren and companions in labor and sufferings. He seems to have had several objects in view, one of which was, to exhort and urge Timothy to great faithfulness in preaching; "I charge thee, before God, preach the gospel." Another object seems to be, to inform Timothy of the state of his own mind in view of a martyr's death; another was, if possible, to induce Timothy to visit him before he died—to be with him in that trying hour. He complains that others have left him, perhaps through fear of sharing his sufferings; under these circumstances, he desired Timothy to visit him, both for his and Timothy's sake. He knew Timothy would be confirmed and strengthened by his death; besides, he, doubtless, desired the friendship, the sympathy of some Christian friend and brother. Paul was a man, and needed, like all other men, the prayers and Christian conversation of the faithful.

'Tis not a small thing to die, even among our friends, in the bosom of our families, with those we love around us, listening to the voice of praise and prayer, strengthened by the counsels and heavenly conversation of Christian brethren; but, oh, to die alone! where we hear not the name of the Redeemer, or the sound of prayer! and worse, to die in the midst of enemies and blasphemers, who feast upon our tears and groans, and malignantly say, "Where is thy God?"—and still worse, to die by the hand of man. But even here the Christian triumphs.

"O may I triumph so,
When all my conflicts past,
And, dying, find my latest foe
Under my feet at last."

1. Let us look at the death of this apostle. His was a martyr's death. Men hated the gospel, and all who proclaimed it. Strange that one so disinterestedly benevolent, so devotedly pious, so affectingly tender and kind to all men, so destitute of ambitious views, only living to instruct the ignorant in the truths of the gospel, to diffuse a moral power which shall regenerate the stagnant moral atmosphere of the world, "to comfort those that mourn," and smooth the pillow of the dying—strange, that such a man should be hunted like a felon from the earth!

2. He died in defence of, and out of love to Christ and the gospel; but Christ had first died for him, else he never could have died for Christ. There has been much to admire in the life of Paul, but now he becomes truly great. We are almost in danger of adoring him. There is some thing so god-like, so magnanimous, in the conduct of those who, rather than swerve the breadth of a hair from duty, than yield honest convictions of truth, will meet death in any form, will endure any physical torture—the rack, the Inquisition—that we are in danger of forgetting, in our admiration of them, the source of their strength and comfort. But let us not forget to "glorify among the most illustrious here been others, and Paul, perhaps, was John Huss and Jerome, who were burnt, in the 15th century, at Constance, for their fidelity to truth.

3. My third remark is, that under all these circumstances, Paul died in peace—great peace. This the language imports, "I am ready to be offered." Not only about to be, but ready, prepared, willing.

Come, welcome death, thou end of fears,
I am prepared to go."

"The time of my departure is at hand." Mark the language these Bible saints used when speaking of death. To them it was only a journey, a change of locality and mode of being; Paul was going to depart, and be with Christ; His body might remain, the scoff of infidels and pagans; it might be burned, or thrown to wild beasts, or thrown in the fish pond to fatten the scaly inhabitants for the table of some wealthy Roman, or interred with pious care by Christian brethren—it was alike indifferent to him. He was going away; should depart; should be with Christ! Talk not of visiting the burial-place, the sepulchre of Paul. Paul was never buried! No spot of earth, no grave-yard, no tomb, no cemetery contains him. If you would visit Paul, you must go to heaven. Mark him there! I know him by the brightness of his crown. See him near the throne, "Clad in linen clean and white, which is the righteousness of saints."

"I have fought a good fight." The contest has been righteous, the weapons spiritual, the victory complete.

"I have not run as uncertainly, nor fought as one who beateth the air."

"The saints in all this glorious war Shall conquer though they die."

"I have finished my course," my race.

This is a favorite figure with Paul. He speaks of Christians as soldiers, and exhorts them "to endure hardness," &c.; to fight, "taking the whole armor of God." He addresses them as the racers, contending for the prize, and urges them to "lay aside every weight, to run with patience the race, looking unto Jesus." We have seen him on the field of battle victorious; in the race outstripping all his competitors, distancing all, leaving them far behind him—a few paces more and the race is complete—the goal is reached—the reward obtained.

"I have kept the faith"—I have maintained my fidelity. I have believed, and preached the truth—the faith once delivered to the saints. What a comfort this, especially to a dying minister. "There is laid up for me a crown." Here still the figure is kept up. The successful racer was crowned with a fading laurel, so Paul was to be crowned by the Judge, Christ, who is here called "the righteous judge." But there was this difference, which Paul could not fail to notice. 1. His crown was a crown of righteousness. "Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incrruptible." 2. In these races one only received the crown, though all ran. Here all may be crowned. Hence he adds, "Not only for me, but for all who love his appearing." Let us, brethren, thank God that we can share this crown with Paul.

CONCLUSION.

We tremble sometimes at the thoughts of death. But (says Massillon) what is there to a faithful man so terrible in death? From what does it separate him? From a world which must perish, and which is the country of the reprobate; from his riches, which torment him, of which the use is surrounded with dangers, and which he is forbid to use in the gratification of his senses, from his relations and friends, whom he precedes only by a moment, and who shall soon follow him, from his body, which has hitherto been a rock to his innocence, or a perpetual clog to his holy desires; from his offices and dignities, which by multiplying his cares augment his dangers; lastly, from life, which to him is only an exilement, and an anxious desire to be delivered from it. What does death bestow on him to compensate for what it takes away? It bestows unfading riches, of which none can ever deprive him; eternal joys, which he shall enjoy without fear or remorse;—the peaceable, and certain possession of God himself, from which he can never be degraded; deliverance from his passions, which had ever been a source of disquiet and distress; an unutterable peace, which he never could find on earth; and lastly, the society of the just and happy, in he place of that of sinners, from whom it separates him. What, then, oh, my God, has the world so delightful to attach a faithful soul! To him, it is a vale of tears, where dangers are infinite, combats daily, victories rare, and defeats certain; where every gratification must be denied to the senses, where all tempts, and all is forbidden to us; where we must fly from, and dread most, what most pleases us. In a word, where, if you suffer not, if you weep not, if you resist not to the utmost extremity, if you combat not without ceasing, if you hate not yourself you are lost.

LAW AND GOSPEL.

NUMBER ELEVEN.

The difference between the ministration of Moses and that of Christ, may be illustrated by a familiar case. A father lays down laws for the government of his children. The laws are excellent in themselves, reflecting great honor upon the wisdom and goodness of the parent. But excellent as they are, there is a rebellious spirit in the children. To enforce obedience, the father employs the rod; but though the fear of punishment produces an external conformity, their hearts are not brought to love the laws imposed upon them. Nor can the father, by his mode of discipline, succeed in changing their dispositions so as to make them keep these laws without any other constraining influence than that of love. He continues this mode of discipline until they become of age. What then does he do? He cannot acknowledge to his children, that the laws which he imposed upon them were unjust, or unreasonable, or so imperfect that they must be abandoned or altered. This would be to justify the rebellious course of his children. The laws are good in themselves, too good to be changed. Yet something must done, or his children will be ruined;—what shall it be?

He concludes to change, not the laws, but the mode of discipline. Instead of employing the rod, as heretofore, he will try the influence of love. He does this, and finds that the effect of it is a complete change in the dispositions of his children. They are no longer rebellious. They begin to see the excellence of those laws the father has given them, their hearts burn with love for them, and they keep them, because they love them.

The father's first mode of discipline was the ministration of the rod; his last mode is the ministration of love. The one represents the ministration of Moses; the other, that of Christ. Under Moses we are children in our nonage. Gal. 4: 3. Under Christ we are of full age. Rebellious children are ruled by fear; grown men are ruled by love.

To render our illustration more complete, let it be observed, that although the father's first mode of discipline is that of the rod, and is supposed to be so down to the time when the children become of age, yet it is not entirely and exclusively that mode. The discipline of love is mingled with it, according as they are able to appreciate it. When very young, they are very ignorant, and can be ruled only by fear. As their minds expand, they are capable of appreciating reason; and hence the more rational method of ruling by love is brought to bear upon them. Still the old method is not entirely laid aside, but is used as occasion requires. The older the children grow, the less it is necessary to use the rod, and at length it is abandoned altogether, and nothing but love is used to govern them.

So with God's people. Under Moses they are in their nonage, and "the fear of death" produces an external conformity to the law imposed upon them. Yet it is not the fear of death alone, which is used to excite them to obedience. The love of God, as evinced by his promise to send a Redeemer out of Zion, is employed as a motive, according as they are able to understand and appreciate it. The "excellent loving kindness" of God is displayed all through the former ministration. It appears in the types and shadows; it is displayed in the promises made concerning a Messiah, and the predictions of the prophets concerning the glory of his kingdom. Motives drawn from this source are mingled with that fear of death which characterized the Mosaic ministration, and continue to be more and more employed, according to the advancement of God's church, down to the time of the advent of Christ.

Upon the death of Christ, the church is considered to have arrived at its maturity; and the old method of enforcing the holy, and just, and good law, by "the fear of death," is entirely laid aside. The other method of governing by love is now employed altogether. Love has had its full development in the work of Christ; and from that work the motives to obedience are drawn, while through it a spiritual influence is secured to produce love for the law in the hearts of the people. It is the same law still, however; and any abandonment of it, as a thing imperfect and unadapted to the nature of man, or any modification of its requirements, would only justify sinners in all their former transgressions.

The church as a body, in its organized capacity, was under the ministration of death during all its minority, and through fear of death was in bondage. Heb. 2: 15. Rom. 8: 15. Nevertheless there were individual members of it, whose minds were enlightened to appreciate the love of God as displayed in the promises, who therefore needed not the fear of death to spur them to obedience, but were constrained by love in the same way that believers are now constrained. Under the Gospel the case is in some sense reversed. The church, as a body, is under the ministration of love. It is not the fear of death, but the love of Christ, which constrains them to obedience. Nevertheless there are individual members of Christ's church, who, by reason of their dead, unregenerate state, are incapable of appreciating the love of Christ in dying for them. With such, nothing but the fear of death avails to produce an external conformity to duty.

Under the former economy the church was national. It was made so, in order that through the forms of civil administration, God might have an opportunity to illustrate to the world his justice, as the righteous moral Governor of mankind. That purpose having been served, a national church is no longer needed. Hence under the present economy, all union between church and state is severed. The design of the church now, is to illustrate to the world God's love in pardoning and saving sinners through his Son. And though there may be individual members, who are too dead in sin to appreciate that love, and can be moved to duty only by fear of death, yet God has committed to the church no power of inflicting that death. For according to the constitution of the church, none but regenerate persons have any place in it. 1 Pet. 2: 5. Such unregenerate persons as may be nominally attached to it, are there in direct violation of its constitution. If the design of the constitution is faithfully carried out, none but those who can appreciate the love of Christ, will find a place in his church; and hence no need of a death penalty to urge them to duty.

The progress and change of the church from one dispensation to the other, illustrates the religious discipline of individuals, and their change from a state of nature to that of grace. A person is first instructed in the claims of the moral law. He is made to see himself a sinner against it; and the [illegible] presented, makes him afraid. But though the fear of the penalty drives him to some external performances, he is not thereby made to love, and admire, and keep its precepts, with his whole heart. He is then directed to the love of God as displayed in the Gospel. The instruction which he receives is attended with the quickening power of the Holy Spirit. He sees that he need not suffer the penalty of the law, Christ having suffered for him. He begins to love that holy, and just, and good law, and strives to keep it with his whole heart. He is changed, and looks to Christ, the Redeemer, for justification. He is no longer a servant—a bond-slave—a child in his minority, but one of full age, and is happy in the strong conviction that he shall reign with Christ.

CURETOU'S ANCIENT SYRIAC VERSION OF THE EPISTLES OF IGNATIUS.

During the years 1838 and 1839, the Rev. Henry Tattam visited Egypt, where he procured from a monastic library, (that of the Convent of St. Mary Deipara, in the Desert of Scete or Nitria,) several very ancient Syriac Manuscripts. Mr. Curetou having previously been engaged in researches upon the writings of Ignatius among the manuscripts of the British Museum, and hoping to derive assistance from a Syriac one stated by the two Assemanis to be in the collection of manuscripts in the Vatican, had unsuccessfully made application for access to it. His expectations were, therefore, excited when Mr. Tattam's collection was deposited in the Museum; and, having eagerly set himself to examine, his exertions were rewarded by the discovery of a copy of the Epistle to Polycarp, and extracts from other epistles contained in other Syriac writings.

The British Government, at the solicitation of the Trustees of the Museum, having made a grant to defray the expense, Mr. Tattam, in 1842, returned to the monastery in the Desert of Nitria to endeavor to secure the remainder of their collection of Syriac Manuscripts—in which he succeeded; and the manuscripts arrived in London in the beginning of the year 1843. To his great delight, Mr. Curetou found in this fresh supply three entire epistles of Ignatius—to Polycarp, to the Ephesians, and to the Romans. These he has carefully edited, giving the original text as found, together with an English translation, enriched with critical notes.

Those conversant with ecclesiastical writings are aware that deep interest has been attached to those which bear the name of Ignatius. Put to death in the very beginning of the second century, the age to which he belonged is one which it is very desirable that we had authentic documents fairly to elucidate. Such are however grievously wanting; and the corrupted copies of Ignatius have occasioned no little dissension, and brought into requisition much critical skill and ecclesiastical lore, on the part both of those who defend and of those who assail the views contained in these traditionary remnants of antiquity. The cause of this disputation has been the varying state in which different copies of epistles bearing the name of Ignatius have been found, and the support which existing systems derive from his supposed authority. The church order exhibited in both the earlier versions of Ignatius, so different from what the Scriptures exhibit, and the implicit obedience to ecclesiastical authority which they inculcate, caused these epistles to be regarded by high-church Episcopalians with especial favor; while the opponents of this system, regarding the obvious dissimilarity in many respects between these writings and the New Testament as evidence sufficient of interpolation throughout, have wholly rejected their testimony.

It required certainly no small amount of credulity or confidence in the fidelity of transmission, to receive as genuine all that claims to have come from the pen of Ignatius; and if interpolation in any degree was once admitted, what amount of discernment would be adequate to discriminate between the true and the false? The very inscription of those epistles first printed, is suspicious—one namely to the Holy Virgin, and two to the Apostle John—especially when it is remembered that they were in the language of the corrupt Roman Church. In the year 1498, being only three years later, another Latin version appeared, of eleven epistles. In 1557 and 1559, however, two Greek editions, from two different manuscripts, appeared, containing twelve epistles. But passages quoted in a preceding age, were observed by Usher not to accord with either of these editions; and being thus led to inquire, he found another Latin version, varying considerably from those previously discovered, and much shorter. Arbitrarily assuming a standard of genuineness, and availing himself of this version, Usher published an edition corresponding with none of the manuscripts extant, which, however, the venerators of a corrupt antiquity generally have been pleased to accept as the genuine epistles, with great complacency expressly designating and quoting from it as such. Two years later, Vossius published another imperfect version nearly corresponding with Usher's Latin one.

Much controversy has resulted from this confusion; the effect produced on the minds of those acquainted with its history being its rendering the whole utterly valueless as evidence for any purpose. Others, more easily satisfied, or more willing to accept even doubtful testimony which accords with the views they have adopted, cling to Ignatius, some of them receiving as of greater accuracy the longer version, and others the shorter. Among those who in the present day maintain the genuineness of the longer version, the learned Muier is mentioned.

In the midst of all this perplexity, some have cherished a hope that light might be brought from the East, and even as early as the close of the seventeenth century, unsuccessful efforts had been made to procure from Syria copies of the versions there extant. At length, however, a fragment of the martyrdom of Ignatius, containing his epistle to the Romans, was found among a valuable collection of Syriac manuscripts procured by the late Mr. Rich, British Resident at Bagdad, purchased after his decease by the British Museum; and more recently, Mr. Tattam's zeal and care, seconded by the aid of the same institution, have enabled Mr. Curetou to give to the world this ancient version of three of the epistles of Ignatius—which he supposes to be of the sixth and seventh or eighth centuries, and liable, therefore, to the corrupting influences of an earlier unscrupulous age—tending still farther to show the unsatisfactory nature of that authority on which the church has leaned for countenance when preferring the guidance of tradition to the Scriptures of truth in regard to the doctrines and ordinances of the living God.

We have said, that this Syriac version is the shortest yet found; that to Polycarp, for example, is less than a column of the ordinary large type (leaded) of the Recorder; while in the current version, it is more than double that length. Words, sentences, and long passages, are all wanting. The differences are not accidental, but made for a purpose. The leading subject on which such differences exist are in passages which respect the clergy. We cannot, however, enter into the consideration of this at present. It is not essential to the object of our notice. J. A. B.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

One feature of the present system of missionary operations, as exhibited to the view of the heathen and of the world, is their sectarian character. With many this is much deplored, on account of the confusion which it every where displays of the language of the teachers of Christianity, who ought every where to speak the same things, that the truth might appear to the conviction of the heathen and of all unbelievers.

To prove that this remarkable feature of modern missions is not over-estimated as to its prejudicial influence on the public mind, let us for a moment consider a parallel case. Suppose a suit at law be commenced by an individual, and able lawyers be employed on both sides, who, to sustain their cause, bring a host of witnesses. The parties are arrayed, and after a brief statement of the case to the court and jury, the witnesses are called, who, either from prejudice or party bias, entirely disagree as to the matter of fact, so that no two witnesses, even for the plaintiff, testify to the same thing. They agree in asserting that the cause of the plaintiff is a just cause, and the counsel might know this to be the case; but the verdict of the jury, and the decision of the court, must depend upon the evidence adduced before them as to the facts of the case, yet the witnesses entirely disagree. The lawyer plead the well-known character of his client, and asserts the justness of his cause, reasoning from the presumption that a good man would not commence legal proceedings without a full conviction of his correctness in the premises. The learned counsel would rest, perhaps, hoping this argument would have weight, although he had failed to establish a high essential fact. What more certain token of defeat could be developed, than his position would indicate? Judgment finally being rendered, and the cause lost, the plaintiff would no doubt consider his witnesses his greatest enemies, whether ill-will towards him, or negligence in arriving at the truths they were called to establish, were their crimes.

Thus the advocates of Christianity go before the heathen world, generally, it is true, asserting the goodness of their cause, but failing to impress the fact upon which a judicious mind could come to any conclusion as to the merit of the case. Is it any wonder, that centuries ago the contradictory witnesses for religion should have been expelled from China? And would it be wonderful if they should again be rejected by the sagacious heathen as unworthy of their confidence?

And what of American Missionaries? In what do they all agree which intelligent heathen themselves would not agree to? Are there not found some to contradict every doctrine that can be asserted as belonging to the Christian scheme? How then shall the heathen believe? How shall the world be disciplined in the truth of God? "Ye are my witnesses," saith the Mighty One. Take heed to yourselves, for these are the wounds inflicted in the house of my friends, saith the cause of truth. LUTHER.

VALUE OF THE CONFESSIONAL.—We have never heard the practice of confessing sins to priests advocated very strongly on the ground of its utility. But we wonder that it is not so advocated in these days when the dollar-and-cent advantages of keeping Sunday are so loudly trumpeted abroad. If any good Catholic is disposed to make an appeal in favor of the confessional from its secular advantages, we recommend him to use the following fact, which we copy from an exchange paper. Surely, if the reasoning be sound, that Sunday ought to be kept as a Sabbath because facts show that horses which rest on that day live longer than those which do not, then is the reasoning sound, that the confessional ought to be maintained because facts show that it serves to detect rogues. But here is the fact:

"A Mr. Swift was robbed the other day at Milwaukie of $690, the whole of which has since been returned to him. The story of its recovery is a little singular. The theft was committed by a person on a visit to the office of Mr. S., who, seeing an open box containing money, took advantage of the opportunity afforded by the owner's absence to abstract a quantity of bills, with which he made off. Subsequently, however, the act so worked upon his conscience, that he went to a Catholic Bishop, and confessing the crime, delivered to him the money which he had taken, and which was immediately restored to Mr. S."

WINE MAKING.—The following account of the manner of expressing the juice of the grape in the island of Madeira, is given by Commander Wilkes, in his report of the Exploring Expedition. He visited a wine factory—a sort of shed—in company with the United States Consul. His sketch of the process may interest those wine-bibbers who are so very particular in their selection of the article:—

"On our approach we heard a sort of song, with a continued stamping, and on entering saw six men stamping violently in a vat of six feet square by two feet deep, three on each side of a huge lever beam, their legs bare up to the thighs. On our entrance they redoubled their exertions till the perspiration freely poured from them; the vat had been filled with grapes, and by their exertions we were enabled to see the whole process. After the grapes had been sufficiently stamped, and the men's legs well scraped, the pulp was made into the shape of a large bee hive, a rope made of the young twigs of the vine being wound around it. The lever was then used, which has a large stone or rock attached to it by a screw. The juice flows off and is received in tubs. The produce of the press is, on an average, about fifty gallons daily. Each gallon requires about two bushels of grapes. The taste is very much like sweet cider. The general average is from one to three pipes of wine per acre annually. The south side of the island produces the finest wines. The common Madeira is made from a mixture of three kinds of grapes. After being expressed, the wine is put into casks, ferments, and is clarified with gypsum, or isinglass, after which two or three gallons of brandy are added to each pipe."

WASTE AND WANT IN ENGLAND.—Much has been said within a few months past, about the danger of a famine in England. If the following statements and calculations are true, it is a wonder that the prospect of famine does not oftener frighten the rulers of that country. Rich brewers first take the bread of the people and convert it into poison, and then take the people's money in payment for the poison, and leave them to beg or to starve. Read the following paragraph, and see if it is not so:—

"Forty-five thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine acres of land are employed in the cultivation of Hops, and one million acres of land are employed to grow Barley, to convert into strong drink. According to Fulton's calculation, if the land which is employed in growing grain for the above process of destruction, was to be appropriated to the production of grain for food, it would yield more than a four pounds loaf to each of the supposed number of human beings in the world; or it would give three loaves per week to each family in the United Kingdom! If the loaves (each measuring four inches by twelve) were placed end to end, they would extend one hundred and sixty thousand two hundred and twenty-five miles; or they would more than describe the circumference of the globe six times. Besides forty millions bushels of barley, a considerable quantity of oats, rye, carrots, and potatoes, and even wheat, has been annually destroyed in making gin, whiskey, and English rum. The corn we waste in brewing and distilling would feed three millions of persons every year; and to make up for the waste, we send two millions of money to foriegners every year to buy corn."

LEADERSHIP.—We clip the following paragraph on this subject from the Morning Star, the denominational paper of the Freewill Baptists. Its suggestions will be useful to the members of other denominations:—

"There is a strong disposition, in a large class of individuals, to be first, to take the lead; and it not unfrequently happens that religion does not bring men to those humbling views of themselves and of their importance, that would seem becoming in professed Christians. It not unfrequently happens that even ministers are dissatisfied with that measure of influence assigned them by the generality of Christians; and because they cannot succeed in the projects they have originated, or be acknowledged "lords over God's heritage," cease to do anything, or, what is worse, stir up strifes and dissensions among brethren and churches. We, as a denomination, have suffered amazingly from this source. Aspiring and ambitious men, failing in their designs of rising to popular eminence, withdraw, and join other denominations, or, what is more frequent, entice away a faction, and stand alone. They prefer to be at the head of a score of individuals, to unity on a level with hundreds in promoting the welfare of a whole denomination. Turn it and excuse it as you will, these dissensions, in nine cases out of ten grow out of disappointed ambition, or the issue of the question "who shall be the greatest." But the very fact that they aim at such superiority and distinction, proves them unworthy of it. True worth is modest and unassuming."

NEW YEAR'S IN NEW YORK.—A lady friend of the editor of the Christian Watchman, who is spending the winter in New York, gives in a private letter the following account of the manner of spending New Year's day in that city:—"It is really a most pleasant custom, these New Year's visits. Fathers and their sons, go out while mothers and daughters remain at home to receive visits. Every child, even the baby and nurse, are in the parlor to see their friends. A table is covered with refreshments, of which all are invited to partake. Those who visit at no other time call on New Year's day. If there has been any little coldness, this day it is all forgotten. All doors were thrown open. One instance was related to me of two families that had not visited for sixteen years. Their friends interceded that the gentlemen should call on New Year's—they did—no allusion was made to the past, and all their friendly intercourse is renewed."

For the Sabbath Recorder.

A SOFT WORD TO A NAVY CHAPLAIN.

REVEREND SIR:—

You profess to be a minister of Jesus Christ, and to teach that "unless a man hath the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." You probably admit, that the illustration of the vine, which the Son of God employed in his farewell address to his disciples, was not hyperbolical, but specifically expressive of the relation which every true follower of his must sustain to him. To be a Christian, you admit, the human heart must be grafted into the heart of Christ, and receive from it the vital fluid of its spiritual life. You say, while that heart sustains this vital relation, its fruits, its sentiments, and the actions which express them, will be fruits, not of the spirit of the natural heart, but of the spirit which is in Christ; and that the more Christian an act shall be, the more of the spirit of Christ will be in it. In speaking of diamonds, we express their value by saying they are of such and such water. In speaking of actions of Christian duty, jewels that are to stud the diadem of a God, we may express their quality analytically by saying they are of such and such a spirit: that is, in the ore of grosser motives, are contained as it were, so many grains of the spirit of Christ. Now, then, let me tenderly entreat you to analyze the qualities of your calling, as Chaplain in the Navy: to investigate the nature of your engagements to a human government.

Professed minister of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, were you ever present at a naval battle? If so, let me ask you, in all sober honesty, was that scene ever outdone by any spectacle ever enacted on the red, burning pavement of hell? Among the painedest fiends of the pit, fallen farthest from the presence of God and the reach of hope, were there ever the exercise and exhibition of more diabolical malignity and frensied ferocity than burn and bellow in that raging hell on the sea, a naval battle? And you, without a question or a scruple—with the sandals of the Gospel of Peace professedly bound to your feet—are to stand, in the glare of the lighted match, and, as it were, knee deep in the ready brimstone, and stayed up by butchering-irons, and with one girded to your side, you are to open the awful scene by spreading your hands towards heaven and praying that the spirit of the blessed God of of love would descend to render more intense the flames of that hell which human hearts and hands are about to kindle for mutual destruction! You are to draw near to the great white throne of God's mercy on one side, and your fellow minister, of another nation, on the other, and both laying at once your blood-invoking hands on the spotless robes of Christ's righteousness, implore his presence amid the howling tempest of fire and smoke, and the hotter torrents of fiendish malice; amid the red lava of a thousand iron volcanoes and maddened hearts; amid the steamy atmosphere of human blood, spouting in hissing currents into the sea! and now, my dear friend, let me take you by the hand and look steadfastly into your heart's eye, while I ask; What if God should take you both at your word! What if he should grant your prayer and descend into the affray, invested with all the God-head of his attributes, his LOVE! You invoked him, a spirit, to descend and cover the heads of the combatants. Suppose he should come in spirit, in the spirit of Christ; and in the fullness of that spirit, should enter every heart; so that every officer and private should be made instantaneously as near like Christ as a mortal can be: would not every murderous weapon fall from the hands of those dark-looking sailors and marines, and they fall upon their knees and upon each other's necks and give glory to God that he, in answer to your prayers, had descended, as at the attempted sacrifice of Isaac, and arrested their design and work of mutual butchery? And is this the aim and end for which you are pledged and paid beforehand to pray for the presence of God in any battle your nation may wage? Rest assured, they would drive you from the war-ship's deck, on the eve of action, if they believed there were the remotest possibility that God would hear your prayer, and be present to fill the combatants for whom you prayed, with the spirit of Christ. Be not deceived: God is not mocked, nor will he mock you. If in any of the emergencies of human life and duty, he comes at the cry of supplication, he will come as a God, and the manifestation of his spirit and presence will produce in the human heart "the same spirit which was also in Christ"—"in whom dwelt the fullness of the God-head bodily," and who imparts of that fullness, grace for grace, to every one whose heart is open for its reception. To ask the presence of God in any other spirit, is to ask him to stifle the elements of his existence, or to assume those of a demon. If, then, you do not wish to have the spirit of Christ, the spirit which breathed forth in his dying prayer on the cross, to pervade the hearts of the human butchers at the onset of battle, then I beseech you—as you would avoid a blasphemy which would make the fallenmost devil tremble—I beseech you never to raise heavenward your eyes and voice to invoke the presence of a God on the field of carnage, or the war-ship's slippery deck; but to direct your eyes downward and pray that your paid men of blood may be inspired with all the fury that burns in the bottomless pit, to fight as near like fiends as the father of all murderers can make them.

Mr. Editor, I did not intend to occupy so much space in your columns when I commenced this article, nor will I again tax to such an extent the generosity which has permitted me to say something to your readers on the subject of Peace. E. B.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The SENATE spent much of the time last week in discussing a bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs, appropriating five millions of dollars for additional war vessels, &c. Mr. Webster introduced a resolution asking the President to communicate any correspondence our Government may have had with Great Britain on Oregon since the delivery of the Message, if not incompatible with the public safety. [It is rumored that negociations have been re-opened for the settlement of the Oregon Boundary.]

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES was occupied principally in discussing the question about giving notice to Great Britain of the cessation of the Joint Occupancy of Oregon.

LATER FROM VAN DIEMAN'S LAND.—Dreadful Shipwreck—414 Lives Lost.—We are indebted to Linus W. Miller, Esq. of Chautauque County, in this State, for papers as late as September 22. Mr. Miller was taken prisoner in 1838 at Niagara, during the Canadian outbreaks, and transported to London, where he was tried and sentenced to Van Dieman's Land. Mr. Miller came here by the way of Pernambuco and Philadelphia, and is now on his way to his parents, who, no doubt, will be overwhelmed with joy in welcoming him. He intends to give the world an account of his travels and adventures, which will be read, we dare say, with avidity. He brings with him the highest testimonials for good conduct and gentlemanly bearing, and seems to have borne his misfortunes with becoming dignity and demeanor.

The Melborne Herald, of the 13th of September, gives the particulars of one of the most horrible shipwrecks on record, by which 414 lives were lost. The "Cataraqui," Captain C. W. Finlay, (emigrant ship of 800 tons,) sailed from Liverpool on the 20th of April, with 369 emigrants, including two doctors, and a crew, of forty-six souls. The emigrants were principally from Bedfordshire, Staffordshire, Yorkshire and Nottinghamshire. About 120 of the passengers were married, with families, and in all seventy-three children. Nothing occurred worthy of notice until the 4th of August, on which day the ship went ashore in a violent gale, on a reef situated on the West coast of King's Island, at the entrance of Bass's Straits. The ship filled in a few hours, and throughout the night a scene of horror was exhibited without parallel. Before morning but 30 of the company were alive, the rest having been swept into eternity by the waves. Out of the whole crew only nine were saved. [Express.

THE TRADE OF CINCINNATI.—Our correspondent, at Cincinnati, says the Farmer and Mechanic, informs us, that it is estimated by men of judgment and experience, that for the last three months, at least one million of dollars per month has been expended in that city in the purchase of grain, pork, &c., the whole of which is now embargoed by the ice, and waiting the means of conveyance to the eastern markets. He also states, that a million and a half of dollars have, since slaughtering time, been paid to the pork-growers of Kentucky for living hogs. We can hardly be aware of the increasing growth and resources of the "great West;" or the important position which it sustains in regard to the national prosperity.

N. Y. LUNATIC ASYLUM.—On the first of January, 1846, there were 356 persons in this Asylum; of whom 226 were foreigners and 180 natives of this country. During the year 1845 there were admitted into the institution 284 persons, viz: 149 males, 135 females; 176 foreigners, 108 natives; 127 married persons, 118 single, 9 widowers, 16 widows. Of those admitted, 112 were born in Ireland, 21 in England, 27 in Germany, and 38 in New-York. From the first of January to 31st December, 1845, there were 76 deaths in the institution, viz: 39 foreigners, and 37 natives; 35 males, 41 females, of whom 35 were married persons, 24 single, 4 widowers, and 6 widows. Of these 23 were born in Ireland, 3 in England, 26 in Germany, and 24 in New-York.

GUM ARABIC.—In Morocco, about the middle of November, that is, after the rainy season, which begins early in July, a gummy juice exudes spontaneously from the trunk and principal branches of the acacia tree. In about fifteen days it thickens in the furrow, down which it runs, either in a vermicular (or worm) shape, or more commonly assuming the form of round and oval tears, about the size of a pigeon's egg, of different colors, as they belong to the white or red gum tree. About the middle of December, the Moors encamp on the borders of the forest, and the harvest lasts six weeks. The gum is packed in very large sacks of tanned leather, and brought on the backs of bullocks and camels to certain ports, where it is sold to the French and English merchants. Gum is highly nutritious. During the whole time of the harvest, of the journey, and of the fair, the Moors of the desert live almost entirely upon it; and experience has proved that six ounces of gum are sufficient for the support of a man during twenty-four hours.

STEAM POWER AND HORSE POWER.—Mr. Andrews of Kirkham Lodge, said: "I calculate a horse cannot last on an average above 15 years, while an engine with moderate care will last 100 years. Horses, whether working or not, are expensive in keeping; but when an engine stands still, it is costing nothing. A four-horse engine will do more work than eight horses—I mean yoked at the same time—for they never are all of one mind for pulling together. I recollect once employing 18 horses to do some work, that is six at a time, in three sets, relieving each other as they required it; but it proved trying work. I put up a six-horse engine, and it did the same work well. Ten per cent upon the first cost, will keep an engine in repair which works every day for 20 years; but the cost of those used for farming purposes, as has been stated, may be about 7 per cent." [Gar. Chron.

PRAYER IN LEGISLATIVE HALLS.—The Legislatures of Tennessee and Ohio, have each resolved to commence their daily sessions with prayer. This practice was introduced into the Kentucky Legislature two years since, and although it met with opposition from a few members at first, before the close of the session it was the united testimony of all, that it exerted a happy, restraining and tranquilizing influence over the minds of the legislators.

SUMMARY.

Elizabeth Van Valkenburgh, who was convicted for the murder of her husband, was executed in the yard belonging to the common jail at Fonda, Fulton County, in the presence of some hundred witnesses, on Saturday, the 24th inst., at 3 o'clock P. M.

The Legislature of Alabama has confirmed the proposition for holding biennial instead of annual sessions of the Legislature.

A Mr. Chase, of Buffalo, was recently arrested and fined $50 for giving lectures on Physiology, Phrenology and Pathetism at Erie. A Buffalo paper remarks, that this is the first instance since the days of witches, that a man has been compelled to sue for liberty to discuss subjects of a literary or scientific nature.

A few days since, in the Supreme Court, sitting in Cincinnati, Ann Mary Roberts recovered of John Hough $1,700 for seducing her. On the 21st inst. another verdict of $3,750 was rendered against Mr. Hough for promising to marry Sarah Watson.

In most of the towns of Connecticut, topers are literally deprived of the means of getting drunk. The law utterly forbids the sale of wines or spirituous liquors, in either large or small quantities, except by license from the Board of Commissioners. In most of the towns they refuse to grant licenses. In New-Haven and New-London, none but apothecaries are licensed, and they are required to keep a record of all they sell.

Petitions from every part of the State are pouring in to the New-Jersey Legislature, praying that the question of granting Licenses may be submitted directly to the votes of the people. There are amongst others, two from Passaic, each somewhere about 40 feet long, and signed by about a thousand persons of both sexes. Another is signed by several hundred ladies of Rahway.

A Unitarian Church and a Theological Seminary have been established at Meadville, Pa., by a wealthy old gentleman by the name of Huidekoper. He is a native of Holland, and was for many years the agent of the Holland Land Company, and finally purchased all their interest in that region.

The Telegraph station in the Exchange at Albany was thronged all day on Saturday, to witness the working of the Magnetic Telegraph, which is now in complete order between that city and Utica, a distance of about 100 miles. Various messages were interchanged in the twinkling of an eye between the two places, which may now be said to be within conversing distance of each other, or face to face.

A gentleman lately from Natchez, Miss., says that a few days before his departure, a gang of slaves from Virgiuia, were sold in the vicinity of his boarding house. Among them was a lad, sixteen or seventeen years of age, who had a very light complexion, auburn hair and blue eyes. The opinion was freely expressed by those around the auction block, that the boy was of purely white descent. That consideration, however, did not deter the democratic republicans of Natchez from bidding for him. He was sold for about $300.

The Legislature of Michigan has adopted resolutions declaring that the title of the United States to the whole of the territory of Oregon, up to 54° 40, is clear and incontestible; and that in the offer of the President to Great Britain of the 49th degree as a boundery line, "the civilized world will see a spirit of liberal concession on the part of the United States." They also instruct their Senators, and request their Representatives, to vote in favor of giving the Notice of the abrogation of the joint occupancy, and for such measures as shall carry into effect the recommendation of the President for protecting our citizens residing in Oregon.

A person at Utica has opened a 'Dog school' and advertises to teach dogs to go on errands as correctly as any boy ten years old; to dance as well as the most accomplished dancer; waltz, cut the Pigeon Wing; to count the number of persons in the room; also to distinguish the number and color of persons present.

It is said that five hundred millions of dollars are spent annually in the United States for such articles of dress as are subject to the fluctuations of fashion. Of this sum, it is computed that 16 millions are spent for hats, probably about 20 millions for caps and bonnets, and for other articles of dress not less than 400 millions.

It is stated that the chest and cup which Selkirk had with him on the Island are in possession of a family in Nether Largo, in Fifeshire, Scotland, who reside in the house in which he was born. The former is an excellent preservation, although at least 130 years old. The cup is the shell of some kind of nut which probably grew on the Island.

Richard I., while in Normandy, made some curious laws for regulating the conduct of his soldiers in their passage by sea. Murder was to be punished by casting into the water the deceased person with the murderer tied to him. He that drew his sword in anger should lose his hand. If a man gave another a blow, he was to be thrice impierced. An ounce of silver was the penalty for using opprobious language. A thief was to have boiling pitch and feathers put upon his head, and was to be set on shore the first opportunity.

In France, during the reign of Henry III., sugar-plums were considered as requisites with which no gentleman or lady could dispense. Every one crrried his box of sugar-plums in his pocket, as he does now his snuff-box. It is related in the history of the Duke of Guise that when he was killed at Blois, he had his confit box in his hand.

The New Jersey House of Assembly, at the opening of their present session, resolved by a vote of 45 ayes to 4 noes to commence their daily sessions with prayer. The practice has not been hitherto adopted.

The First Congregational Church in Meredith, N. Y., has adopted resolutions expressing the opinion that it is inconsistent for any believer in the Christian religion to traffic in intoxicating liquors; and also, that no slaveholder is entitled to Christian fellowship.

During the eight days preceding the snow storm, there were removed from the streets of N. Y. over twenty thousand loads of manure. This manure is sold to the farmers on Long Island at from twelve to twenty cents per load, which will pay for its removal to the boats. The expense to the corporation is, therefore, merely the sweepers' wages.

The amount of revenue from salt during the past year, is $226,219 73; of expenses and bounty, $132,259 82—nett revenue, $94,055 90. The amount of salt delivered at tide-water during the past year, exceeds that of any previous year by 5,046 bushels.

Lord Brougham has had a legacy of £20,000 left him by an aged maiden lady, Miss Flaherty, out of respect and admiration for his abilities, conduct and principles.

Her Majesty also has a legacy of £6,000 left to her by an old man named Akers—but it is to be applied to the payment of the national debt.

The tax paid by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company into the State Treasury during the past year, for passengers from Philadelphia to New York, is upwards of $20,000, being an increase of $9,000 over that of the previous year.

According to the meteorological table, kept at Amherst College by Prof. Snell, the quantity of rain and melted snow which fell during the year 1845, amounted to 39.74 inches. The depth of snow was 58.5 inches.

Potatoes in Ireland, where they complain of a famine, are said to be fifty per cent. cheaper than they are here.

171,738,803 feet of lumber were surveyed at Bangor, Me., during the past season. This exceeds the survey of last year by between forty and fifty millions of feet.

Twenty-five new churches have been erected either new or by rebuilding in Brooklyn during the last five years. Averaging five every year for five years past.

The wife of a poor weaver in Clayton, Eng., lately had twins. The mother is only nineteen years of age, yet in little more than three years has presented her husband with seven children.

Application will be made to the present Legislature of New Jersey from New Brunswick, for a cotton factory charter with $250,000 capital.

Mr. Andrew Meneeley, of West Troy, has during the past year, cast 258 bells, averaging 534 lbs. each—just 113 more than in 1844. Five of these bells were for the fire department of New York city.

Pliny relates, that the sails of his vessel were dyed of different colors.

The Phœnix Shot Tower, Baltimore, Md., is the largest in the Union—220 feet high, 50 feet in diameter at the base, 21 feet at the apex. There are made here annually 300 tons of shot; and five times as many if required.

In the time of the Emperor Justinian, Silk bore so high a price, that it was sold for its weight of gold.

Wool is naturally coated with a species of fat called grease. This coating preserves it from the moths. Reaumer remarked, that it was sufficient to rub a stuff with greasy wool to preserve it from moths.

In 1842, '43, '44, and '45, there were thirty ships launched at this port, measuring in the aggregate 22,777 tons. The smallest of these ships, was the Brutus, being 433 tons; and the largest was the magnificent Queen of the West, of 1,167 tons.

Mr. Meneeley of West Troy, one of the most skillful and enterprising bell founders in the country, has made some most valuable improvements in the tone and working of church bells. Among his recent improvements is that of a cast-iron yoke, with moveable arms attached, by which the loud or soft tone is given, as may be desired. Another great improvement consists in placing springs on each side of the tongue to prevent its bounding against the side of the bell.

Mr. J. Watchman of Baltimore, Md., has invented a machine for bending iron plates for ship building, which will save $3,000 in expense of labor in building a ship of 400 tons. He has been offered $40,000 for the right of the western waters, and refused it. It is formed by a combination of screws, the head of which has a socket point so that it may be turned to suit any curve. The lower bed of screws is first arranged to suit the pattern wanted, and then the upper ones run down or up to match. The upper plate with screws is raised, and the sheet heated and laid in, and is pressed between the two until cold, when it is ready for use.

An exchange paper states, that "a new machine has been greatly improved in England by which a fancy weaver can change his pattern in a manner similar to that of changing the tune on a box or barrel organ. Fine satinetts are chiefly woven by this machine."

A Mr. Talbot, of Dublin, has taken out a patent for a new power, based on the condensation of carbonic acid gas. By chemical means, and great pressure, the carbonic acid is brought down to a temperature below the freezing point. Heat is then applied, when its expansive power far exceeds that of steam, while the enormous weight of the furnace, etc., is dispensed with.

John H. Lester, Esq. of New London, Ct., has invented an ingenious and valuable machine for the purpose of dressing staves.

The soil of Scotland now belongs to little more than 3,000 great proprietors—as many as might conveniently assemble in the West Kirk of Edinburgh, or the City Hall of Glasgow. One third of the whole lands of the country were supposed to be under strict entail, in the days of Adam Smith; and more recently all the ancient proprietors of a whole county (with one exception) have been bought out by one noble family; and by another, sixty or seventy small estates have been purchased during the minority of the heir.

A case of peculiar interest is pending in the United States Supreme Court at Washington, in which Mr. David Hoffman, of Philadelphia, is senior counsel for claimants of a very large fund; not less than $500,000, deposited in various moneyed institutions in Philadelphia. The case has been litigated since the year 1824 in England and this country, and is a contest for the large fortune of Mr. Aspden, who died about 25 years ago in London.

The Newburyport Advertiser says, that a Mr. Short lately slipped from a wagon, and it was supposed died soon afterwards; but while preparations were making for his interment, and the corpse placed in the coffin, the doctor discovered that the glass in the coffin-lid was somewhat covered with vapor, and took his handkerchief for the purpose of removing it; but finding that it proceeded from the inside of the glass, he at once pronounced the man alive, and he was taken from his "narrow house," and is now as well as ever he was in his life!

A PEACE CONVENTION was held in Providence, R. I., on Tuesday, which was attended by a number of divines and well known personages: among the latter, Elihu Burritt. The principal resolution adopted is as follows:

"We regard the custom of war as the relic of a barbarous age; as opposed to the interest, virtue and religion of the nations; as fatal to morals and humanity as to life and property; as an embodiment of sin in its most heinous aspects; and therefore deserving condemnation from all humane and Christian people, and in the present state of the world not to be resorted to under any circumstances."

An interesting decision was lately rendered in the Baltimore County Court, by Judge Legrand. It was given in the case brought by the owners of the steamboat Boston, to recover $70, the amount charged for the use of said boat whilst performing an excursion on Sunday. The Court pronounced that the contract having been made on the Sabbath, and consequently in violation of law, it was necessarily void, and that the plaintiffs could not recover.

The actual distance to be sailed from New York to the mouth of the Columbia River, by way of Cape Horn, is estimated at 15,000 miles. The distance from New York, by land, is about 3,700 miles. A ship canal cut through the Isthmus of Panama, about 37 miles, would reduce the distance to be sailed, about 8,000 miles, or more than half.

One thing, of considerable practical value, has been recently ascertained, that the oily matter of seeds exists chiefly near their outer surface, in or immediately under the skin or husk. This fact of the existence of more fat in the husk than in the inner part of the grain, explains what often seems inexplicable to the practical man—why bran, which appears to contain little or no nourishing substance, should yet fatten pigs and other animals when given to them with other food.

Two suspicious looking individuals attempted to practice the drop game upon a young sailor in the streets of Buffalo, a few days ago, but the latter had been practiced upon before, so he knocked one of the droppers down, and, after giving chase to the other, overtook and flogged him soundly.

The distinguished head Chief of the Onondaga Tribe of Indians, Capt. Frost, (whose daughter died some two weeks since, aged 19,) died, at the Castle, on Sunday the 25th ult., at the advanced age of 85 years. He was in good health and was in attendance at the Burning of the White Dog, (an annual festival,) on the 18th inst., when he took a cold, which ended his eventful life after an illness of six days.

Monsieur Decaisne, assistant Naturalist at the Garden of Plants, at Paris, has issued the History of the Potato Malady in 1845. This author contends that the diseased root may be eaten without injury by man or beast; and that from the worst a fecula, quite nutritious and palatable, can be extracted by an easy method.

The Louisville Journal says, we see it stated that Bishop Miles, of Nashville, has made or is about to make, a purchase of 15 or 20,000 acres of land, about twenty miles back of Mills Point, in this State, with a view to its settlement by a large party of foreign emigrants, who are to come out under his patronage.

Mr. Walsh, the Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer, does not agree with those who consider the Peel Ministry more favorable to American interests than that of Lord Palmerston would have been.

An auction was held at Grace Church for the sale of pews belonging to said church. There are two hundred and twelve pews, and about two thirds of them are sold. In many cases, four hundred dollars were bid for the choice above the assessed price. The bidding was quite lively and spirited. The two choicest pews were valued at $950 each.

The inhabitants of the great City of Boston were thrown into a great excitement last week, by the startling announcement that a crier had been heard ringing his bell, and proclaiming, "lots of small pox in Nassau-street." On examination, however, it was discovered that a slight error had been committed, the crier having said—"Lost, a small box in Nassau-street." This altered the complexion of things materially.

The Cincinnati Herald says, we congratulate our readers, that the kidnapped citizens of Ohio are no longer prisoners. They are released on mere nominal bail, Virginia being evidently desirous to extricate herself from a very disagreeable predicament. We trust, however, that the matter will not stop here. The scoundrels who trespassed upon our soil, and kidnapped our citizens, are indicted, and have been demanded as fugitives from justice. Let the demand be pushed, and let Virginia be taught that she will no more be permitted with impunity to commit such an aggression upon our rights.

John E. Snodgrass, Esq., Editor of the Baltimore Visiter, has sent a Memorial to the Maryland Legislature, remonstrating against the action of that body in reference to an alledged violation of the law of 1835 for the suppression of incendiary publications.

Mr. Twitchel of Worcester, who ran the Tribune and Journal of Commerce Express between Worcester and Hartford, by horse-power, with the steamer's news, performed the distance (60 miles) in three hours and twenty minutes.

Review of New-York Market,---Tuesday, Feb. 3.

FLOUR AND MEAL—For home use there is but a moderate inquiry at 5 56½@5 62½. The inquiry for shipment still continues to some extent and about 3000 bbls. have been taken at 5 53@5 56½—the lower rate for Michigan. The range for Southern, good descriptions, 5 50@5 75. Jersey Corn Meal is 3 75@4 00. Brandywine 4 12½; hhds. 18 00. Bag Meal 1 25@1 36½. Buckwheat of prime quality is scarce; bbls. 4 00@4 25; bags 1 87@2 00 per cwt.

GRAIN—The only sale we hear of was one of 6000 bushels of Barley on private terms. Northern Oats at 48@50; Jersey 40@43½ with sales during last week of some 3000 bushels prime at the higher rate. The market is perfectly nominal at 80 cts. for Rye.

HAY—The market is unsettled with but little demand. The rates range from 85 to 95 cts.

SEEDS—We notice sales of Pennsylvania Clover, for export, at 10c. and 100 do Ohio, for home use, at the same rate. Flax is inactive at $10 for Rough and 10 87½ for Clean. Last sale Timothy at 17 00.

PROVISIONS—A sale of 400 bbls. Prime Pork, one year old, was made, supposed at 9 75; Mess is dull at 11 75; Primes are heavy. Beef is firm at 5 00@5 50 and 8 00 per 8 50 with sales. Lard is 7½@8 cts. Nothing doing in Pickled Meats. Western Dairy Butter is in rather better demand at 13@15 cts; Ohio 11@12. Grease Butter, for shipment, 10@10 cts. Cheese is 7@7½ and quiet.

DIED,

In this city, on Thursday evening, the 29th ult., Mrs. CATHARINE C UTTER, wife of Elder GEORGE B. UTTER, Editor of the Sabbath Recorder, aged 21 years.

The deceased was an exemplary member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of this city, with which she became connected at the time of its organization. Her amiable spirit could not secure her from the ravages of consumption. This disease had been lurking in her constitution for some length of time, and made a decided development of itself early last fall. From that time she was for the most part confined to the house, though not entirely to her bed until within a short period of her death. Through the whole of her sickness—which was not marked by any particular pain, nothing but a wasting of strength—she was serene and happy in the enjoyment of her Saviour's presence. Constitutionally disposed to look on all subjects with calmness, she had no extatic raptures; yet she had no fears, and met her death with a firm reliance on that Saviour whose cause she had honored by her life. Her remains were taken to Plainfield, N. J., for interment, and a discourse suited to the occasion was pronounced by Elder THOMAS B. BROWN, from the text John 11: 25, on the Sabbath following her death.

EXECUTOR'S SALE.

WILL be sold at public vendue, on Tuesday, the 17th of February, at 1 o'clock P. M., on the premises, the Residence late of Jonathan R. Dunham, deceased, containing about 10 acres of excellent land, with a large and convenient Dwelling House and Barn; also a Tan Yard, Bark House, Shoemaker's and Currier's Shop, together with a Carriage House, and other out-buildings, and a good variety of fruit trees. It is situated on the main road from Plainfield to Bound Brook, about 2½ miles from the former and 3½ from the latter place, and about ¼ of a mile from the New Market Depot on the Elizabethtown and Somerville Railroad, from which place the cars make three trips to New-York daily. It would make a pleasant country residence for any gentleman wishing to live in the country and do business in the city; or an excellent Tannery, it being in the immediate vicinity of sufficient quantity of the best of bark, a stream of water runs through the premises, and the Water-Pit in said yard contains a living Spring of excellent water, which is said to make the best of Leather. Terms of payment made easy.

Also, a small Dwelling House and seven acres of good land adjoining the before described property.

Also, a small Dwelling House and Garden, adjoining the first mentioned property.

For a further description of the said premises, application may be made to Mrs. Dunham, on the premises, or to

RANDOLPH DUNHAM, Plainfield, or
DAVID DUNN, New Market, Executors.

N. B.—All the described properties are offered at private sale until the day of sale, and if any are sold notice will be given.

A FRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,

From the Oberlin Evangelist.

GOD WILL HEAR PRAYER.

Thy Church, O God, hath from thee strayed
Her tuneless harp beside her laid,
Her foes exulting bid her sing
New songs of praises to her King:
Zion shall sing and ne'er despare,
Since God will hear and answer prayer.

I walked beside the lonely tomb,
And thought upon its silent gloom;
With grief oppress'd my joys were fled,
A friend lay in the lowly bed;
Beauty and worth were mould'ring there,
O God, do hear the mourner's prayer.

The mourner's plaintive cry I hear,
With gentle hand will wipe his tear,
Send life to bless the mould'ring urn,
Its sacred dust to glory turn,
Beauty and worth shall wake from clay
For I have heard the sleeper pray.

ADDRESS

to the Voters in the State of New-York,

BY THE PEOPLE OF COLOR.

Fellow Citizens:

On the first Monday in June, 1846, there will assemble in Albany, a Convention of Delegates to be chosen by you, to make alterations and amendments in the Constitution of the State.

We hail with joy and thankfulness the approach of the time which will mark a silent and bloodless, but salutary revolution, in regard to laws and ordinances which, ample as they were twenty-five years ago, are now too narrow for the full development of our growing Republic. We hail it with the more pleasure, because we trust that the strife of party will be laid aside in order that each man, duly reflecting on his relation to the whole people, may calmly arrive at clear views of the duty to the whole people.

Proscribed though we have been, during a short time, from the free exercise of the Right of Suffrage, we firmly believe that no one will deny to us, on the approach of this Jubilee of Freemen, the exercise of Free Thought.

Our free thought tells us to solicit from you, fellow citizens, in an earnest and respectful manner, that you will wipe away from us the blot of proscription, and restore to us that equal exercise of the Elective Franchise which was awarded to our fathers under the old Constitution of this State, as an acknowledgment of their manhood, in the time when the Constitution was adopted, in the midst of the Revolutionary War.

In making this request, we repose upon the Justice of a Sovereign People, to whom the exercise of oppression cannot be pleasant nor even a tolerable thing. We approach with a full and equal trust, men of all political parties—believing that a sense of justice is not confined within the limits of any party—but dwells in the hearts of the whole whom we address.

Twenty years ago, in the time of peace, through the magnanimous effort of a Democratic Governor—Daniel D. Tompkins—we were finally emancipated from the doom of Slavery. Since that time, and during many years before we have zealously embraced the Common School privileges awarded us by the equal Law of this State, and have endeavored to obtain an average share of intelligence. During the twenty-five years that have elapsed since we were restricted to the Property Qualification, for the Suffrage, we confidently submit it that we have done no act unworthy the name of a free people.

Although we believe that in this matter they oppress, us, we have patiently abided by the laws of our State, have patiently awaited the result of our constant appeals to the Legislature to undo this oppression, and now that the question is placed in your hands, we appeal to you, the whole people, to grant us the full privileges and rights of citizenship which we have so faithfully striven to merit.

We crave the extension of the Elective Franchise as a right. We believe it to be our right, because we have enjoyed it by the laws of the land ever since the first organization of the State of New York, of which the Constitutions, both new and old, expressly declare, "that no person shall be deprived of the Right of Suffrage except by the laws of the land or a jury of his peers." Neither the laws of the land nor a jury of his peers have deprived us of this right, but both have secured it to us by the tenure of uninterrupted possession.

We claim it as a right on still higher ground. It has been agreed that the Right of Suffrage is something other than right, it has been called an expedient, a reserved right, and an imperfect right, which the State can withhold at pleasure. These statements have struck us with surprise and grief, less from any special fear of our own tenure of this right, than from a profound alarm at the blow which they aim at the fundamental principle of our Republican Liberty.

That fundamental principle is, that ours is a Government of the People. There is no State apart from the people—no people apart from, and ruled by the State. The State derives its authority from and holds it by the will and voice of the people, and has no authority apart from the will of the people. The medium through which the people exercise their will, or express it to those whom they have elected to execute the same, is the Ballot Box—that is by the exercise of the Right of Suffrage.

Thence the exercise of the Suffrage is one and the same thing with the exercise of self-government. To deny, or limit, or tamper with the exercise of the Suffrage, is the same thing as to deny or limit, or tamper with the exercise of self-government.

To call the Right of suffrage an expedient may be accurate, if by an "expedient" is meant by the means of self-government, or the mode through which the people govern themselves. But if, by an "expedient," it is meant that the Right of Suffrage may lawfully be withheld from a portion of the people, then is a foul wrong done to our Representative form of Government. For in the language of the recent message of Gov. Wright, of this State, language written with a view to this very point:

"That legislation which equalizes the benefits and burdens of Government, extends the same encouragement to the enterprize and industry of all in every situation and employment, and attempts to secure no special privileges to any, will diffuse prosperity through a community; because under such a system of laws, all will feel that the fruits of their industry are justly secured to themselves. On the contrary, attempts to confer favors by law upon classes or localities, produce a competition destructive to profitable industry; a strife, not to earn, but to gain the earnings of others."

Neither can the Right of Suffrage be called an "imperfect right" nor a "reserved right," for these terms have reference to forms of government which do "confer favors by law upon classes," and which the State is something apart from the people. But in our Republican State, where the people exercises the high functions of self-goverment, where the State and the people are one, the Right of Suffrage is a perfect right, co-extensive with the whole people, who make the right the means through which to express their will. And any limitation of the right to any, however large a majority of the people would of necessity destroy the essential character of our government, and convert it into something else than a government of the people.

We do most respectfully submit it to you, fellow citizens of the State of New-York, that from whatever point you may look at this matter, the public weal, progressive prosperity, the stability of our government, the principles on which it is founded, and above all, the sense of justice which the Almighty has planted in each human breast—all equally urge upon you the necessity of an extension of the Right of Suffrage to the basis of manhood unsustained by crime, uncursed with insanity. If the force of example be required, we appeal to the States of Maine, and Vermont, and Massachusetts, as abundant proofs, for those States have received no detriment from admitting colored citizens to a full and equal participation in the Right of Suffrage.

It is with deep solicitude, fellow citizens, that we look to the election, which will occur in April next, for delegates to the State Constitutional Convention. We appeal to men of all parties, who love our institutions and their advancement, to vote for such Delegates as are favorable to an extension of the Right of Suffrage equally to all. We appeal to all who rejoice in the progressive character of our government, we beseech all, on this eminent occasion, to cast their votes in such a manner as shall tend most effectually to secure our restoration to the rights of men and citizens.

We humbly but hopefully present ourselves to the People of the State of New-York, as candidates for the rights of citizenship—we rely upon your sense of righteousness and justice, for a full and free exercise of the Right of Suffrage, trusting that you will be guided in your determination by the spirit of Him who is the great Head of all States, and the common Father of all mankind.

In behalf of the Colored People of the State of New-York, we respectfully submit the above as their regularly organized State Central and County Committee,

[Signed by about one hundred colored citizens.]

THE MOTHER AND DAUGHTER.

"It is very lonely, mamma," murmured a fair-haired, lovely girl, as she rested upon a sofa one evening, "it is very lonely now, and the night seemed very long. Shall I never see papa any more?"

"Yes, my love, you will see him again in a far righter world than this."

"But this is a fair world," said the little girl; "I love to run and play in the warm sunshine, and pick the water-cresses from the brook; and when the weather is a little warmer, I shall go and gather the blue eyed violet, that papa said was like me."

"Too like, I fear," said the mother, as the crystal tear-drop trembled on the drooping-lid; "but, my dear child, there is a fairer world than this, where the flowers never fade; where clouds never hide the light of that glorious sky; for the glory of him, whose name is love, beams brightly and forever in those golden courts; the trees that grow on the banks of the river which waters that blessed place, never fade as they do in this world; and when friends meet there, they will be parted no more, but will sing hymns of praise to God and the Lamb forever."

"And shall I go to that happy place when I die:" said the child, "and will you go with me?"

"Yes," said the mother;" "we shall both go in God's own time; when he calls us from this life, we shall dwell forever in his presence."

It was a little while, and the mother bent over the grave of this little frail flower of intellect, withered by the untimely frosts of death; but was she alone, when in the twilight shades she sat upon the grassy mound, where the deep and yearning hopes of that fond heart were gathered in oblivious silence? Oh, no! The soft and silvery tones of buried love whispered in the breeze, that lifted the drooping flowers, overcharged with the dewy tears of night. The diamond stars that one by one came forth upon their shining watch, seemed beaming with the light of that deathless flame, which burned undimmed upon the inmost shrine of her heart; and she enjoyed, in the holy hours of solitude, that communion of pure spirits, which exalted faith alone can bestow.

VALUE OF A NEWSPAPER TO CHILDREN.

A child beginning to read becomes delighted with a newspaper, because he reads of names and things which are familiar, and he will progress accordingly. A newspaper in one year is worth a quarter's schooling to a child, and every father must consider that substantial information is connected with advancement. The mother of a family being one of its heads, and having more immediate charge of children should herself be instructed. A mind occupied becomes fortified against the ills of life, and is prepared for any emergency. Children amused by reading or study, are of course more considerate and more easily governed. How many thoughtless young men have spent their earnings in a tavern or grog-shop, who ought to have been reading. How many parents who have not spent twenty dollars for books in their families, have given thousands to reclaim a son or daughter who had ignorantly or thoughtlessly fallen into temptation.

Remarkable old Age.—William Pridson, of North Carolina, died on the 14th ult., at the extraordinary age of 124 years. He had served a full term in the war of the revolution, although then legally exempt by reason of over age. His grandchildren are old infirm people, and several of his great-grand-children are advanced of forty. He was able to walk until a few days before his death. He was probably the only man who has ever attained that age in the United States.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

METRICAL GRAMMAR.

[The following article we copy from an old manuscript, for the benefit of our juvenile readers.]

1. Three little words we often see
Are Articles, a, an and the.

2. A Noun's the name of any thing,
As school, or garden, hoop, or swing.

3. Adjectives tell the kind of noun,
As great, small, pretty, white, or brown.

4. Instead of Nouns the Pronouns stand;
John's head, his face, my arm, your hand.

5. Verbs tell of something being done;
To read, write, count, sing, jump, or run.

6. How things are done, the Adverbs tell;
As slowly, quickly, ill, or well.

7. Conjunctions join the words together;
As men and children, wind or weather.

8. A Preposition stands before
A noun; as in or through a door.

9. The Interjection shows surprise;
As oh! how pretty, ah! how wise.

The whole are called nine parts of speech,
Which Reading, Writing, Speaking teach,

THE FIRST COMMANDMENT.

Exodus xx: 3. Thou shalt have no other Gods before me.

This text is the first of the ten commandments which God gave upon Mount Sinai, and wrote upon two tables of stone. It forbids us to acknowledge, trust in, or worship any other God. God will not give up his claim, or divide his authority or the affections of our hearts with another. We must have no other Gods, that is, we must not trust in or give our affections to any other being or thing, in any degree which conflicts with the claim of our Creator, who requires us to love him with all our hearts. Let us then consider,

THE REASONABLENESS OF THIS CLAIM.

1. God is our Creator; he made us. When men make any thing, they claim it as their own, and think they have the exclusive right to its use and advantages. Now if this be right, how plain is it that God has a right to us, since he made us? We did not make ourselves; angels did not make us; the devil did not make us; but God made us, and to him we owe our existence and all we have and are, we should, therefore, have no other Gods before him.

2. God preserves us. We could not live without God. It is written, Acts 17: 25, 28, "He giveth to all, life, and breath, and all things; for in him we live and move and have our being." God did not make us and then leave us to take care of ourselves, but we "live and move in him." Was he but to withdraw his upholding influence, we should perish. If then we cannot live a moment without God, we should have no other Gods before him.

3. God supplies all our wants; he sends us "the early and latter rain," and gives fruitful seasons that we may have food to eat and clothing to wear. We might plow and sow, and watch early and late, but we could not cause a harvest to grow and ripen without the blessing of God, who is so kind as to cause his sun to shine upon the evil and upon the good, and send his rain upon the just and upon the unjust. O, how ungrateful and wicked it must be to turn away from a God that does so much for us to seek after other Gods.

4. Notwithstanding we have all sought other Gods, and sinned greatly, God is still gracious. He gave his Son to redeem us; he has sent us his word to enlighten us, and employs various means to reform and save us. The very law he has given us is for our good, since it requires nothing but what is essential to our happiness. How wonderful are all the mercies of God to this guilty world! Had not God been good, had he been our enemy, he would never have done so much for us, to save us from the ruin we are bringing upon ourselves. Where can you find a better God that you should not be satisfied to have no other Gods before him.

5. There is no other God that can do us good and make us happy. God is almighty and cannot only save, but can overcome and destroy all other Gods. He is allwise and can see every thing from the beginning to the end, and can provide for us. He is everywhere present, and can take care of us in all places. He is unchangeable, and will always remain just so good and powerful, and wise, to provide for us. He is eternal, and therefore can take care of us and make us happy forever. These are some of the reasons why we should have no other Gods before him. Are they not good and suffici entreasons?

Conclusion. 1. It appears from this subject that we are under the strongest obligation to God. To have no other Gods before him, is to acknowledge him as our God, and to love and obey him. But how few do this! How many things, children, do you love more than God, to secure and enjoy which you disobey God? These are your Gods; you have other Gods before him who is your Maker.

2. The way of duty is the way of true interest. As God is the only being in the universe that can make us happy, so if we turn away from him and seek after other Gods, we turn away from our only source of enjoyment that is pure and unfailing. Children, seek God, give your hearts to him, do it now; have no other Gods before him, and he will be your God forever and ever. Amen.

AVOID BAD-COMPANY.

A correspondent of the Temperance Banner tells the following true story, to show what we get by being in bad company. It beats the fable of poor Tray, which we used to read in our school-boy days:

"When I was a little boy about nine or ten years old, I was one day with my father in the apple-orchard, for the purpose of shooting the mischievous jays, that pecked the apples and corn. Presently, one of these birds perched in an apple-tree near, at which my father levelled his gun and fired. Something was seen to fall from the tree: whereupon I ran forward, expecting to find the jay, but was surprised to find instead of the jay, a couple of innocent young mocking-birds. The jay had escaped. I took them to my father, who surveyed them with a mournful look for several moments, and then, throwing them down, observed, "That's what you get for being in bad company."

"The incident and remark were fixed upon my mind from that moment, and they have been of much use to me many times since. And when I have seen other persons suffer for being found among wicked and mischievous persons, (and this I have seen many times,) I have said in my heart, "That's what you get for being in bad company." I have known school-boys get whipped for being in bad company. It is next to impossible, perhaps, for us to escape without injury, in some way, if we choose wicked people for our companions; for the Bible testifies that "evil communications corrupt good manners."

"Let then, little boys, and all others, avoid being found in company with wicked persons; lest they should have occasion, while covered with shame and disgrace, to say, "This is what I have gotten by being in bad company.

THE MERCHANT AND THE SAILOR BOY.

A few months since, a merchant of New York returning to the city in his carriage, overtook a sailor boy on the road. Prompted by sympathy for the sailor, and a benevolent interest in the boy, who appeared to be some thirteen or fourteen years of age, he asked him to ride, and inquired into his history. The young sailor was already a drunkard and an outcast. Yet there were drawn on his countenance the lineaments of a noble mind, and the promise of a useful man. With his characteristic promptness the merchant's purpose was soon formed. "I'll see," said he to himself, "what I can make of him." He took him at once to the Sailor's Home, where he received such kindness and advice as the homeless and dissipated boy needed.

After a few weeks the merchant found him a voyage, and sent him to sea. He returned to the Home, and was soon transferred to the merchant's family, and from the ship to the school-room. From the hour he was taken up he has manifested a growing improvement.

The other day, on packing his trunk for a return to his school, the following paper was found written by the sailor boy.—Sailor's Magazine.

ON THE SHIP, AND ITS SAILORS.

Who cares for the weather-beaten sailor? Sometimes there may be a mother, or a sister, or a younger brother, and often a wife, to pray for his speedy return. When ashore, he is seen in the lowest of houses; no one to direct him, no one to speak kindly to him. When his money is all gone, he is kicked out of doors, despised, and degraded below the brutes, by those very persons who ought to use him well.

The ship; think of the ship that is worked by the sailors. Noble vessel that ploughs the raging sea, to carry the produce from one country to others. Think of the man-o'-war ships. Who work them? Sailors. Who fought so bravely for their country, and kept off the enemy's ships of war? The sailors. You that are rich, and call yourselves gentlemen; why not engage in the sailor's cause? Give them Bibles and tracts; also give them a knowledge of the gospel. Who wants such things more than the poor, despised, and common sailor before the mast? Think of the sailor while the wind whistles around your house; think of him when tost in the raging sea. Put forth your hand and save him while there is yet hope. Give him the temperance pledge, turn him from his wicked ways and God will reward you for it. Amen.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

"There were once three little silver trouts, who lived in a stream of clear water, which ran between two high green banks. The banks protected it from the wind and storms, so that the water was always smooth; and as the sun shone there, it was a very delightful place. Besides, these little fishes had plenty to eat and drink, and nothing to trouble them; so that you would have expected them to be perfectly happy. But alas! it was not so; these little trouts were so foolish as to be discontented and unhappy, and God heard them complaining. So he told the little fishes that each of them might wish for whatever he pleased, and it should be granted. So the first little trout said, 'I am tired of moping up here in the water, and of having to stay all the time in one place: I should like to have wings, to fly in the air as the birds do, and go where I pleased.'

"The next said, 'I am a poor, ignorant little fish, and I do not know how to protect myself from danger; I should like to have a great deal of knowledge, and understand all about hooks and nets, so that I might always keep out of danger.'

"The other little trout said, "I too am a poor, ignorant little fish, and for that reason, I do not know what is best for me; my wish is that God would take care of me, and give me just what he sees best for me; I do not want anything that he does not choose to give me.'

"So God gave wings to the first, and he was very happy, and soared away into the air, and felt very proud, and despised his companions whom he had left in the river. He liked so much to fly, that he flew away off, till he came to a great desert, where there was no water, nothing but sand as far as he could see. By this time he was tired of flying, and was faint and thirsty, but he could see no water. He tried to fly farther, but could not; his wings failed, and he fell down panting on the hot sand, where he died miserably.

"And God gave the second little fish knowledge, as he had desired, and he understood all kinds of danger; but instead of being happier, he was all the time in terror. He was afraid to go into the deep water, lest the great fishes there should swallow him up; and he was afraid to go into the shallow water, lest it should dry up and leave him. If he saw a fly, or anything that he would like to eat, he did not venture to touch it, lest there should be a hook concealed under it. So he pined away and died.

"But God loved the other little trout, and took care of him, and kept him from all dangers, so that he was the happiest little trout that ever lived.

"And now, which of the three fishes was the wisest?"

"'O, the last, papa. But I am sorry for the two poor little fishes that died. They were not much to blame, papa, after all; they didn't know what would happen to them.'"

"No, certainly they did not; they were to blame for not being satisfied with what God had given them, and believing that he knew best."

THE EAGLE.

There, children, you have a picture of a great eagle with a snake in his talons. The eagle is a powerful and noble bird, yet they often commit great depredations. They will carry off lambs and other useful animals, and have been known to carry off childern. It must be a dreadful death to die, to be picked to pieces by an eagle. Some ten or twelve years ago, in this country, a boy was attacked by an eagle. The boy was sent from the harvest field to the house after a sickle. A sickle is a sharp crooked instrument with which men reap wheat and other grain. While he was returning to the field, the eagle pounced upon him, and the boy was compelled to fight for his life. He was a noble-hearted fellow, and gave noble battle. After the battle had raged for some time, the boy, ralying all his remaining strength gave the eagle a blow so powerful, that the point of the sickle entered his body and killed him on the spot. This was a noble victory, but it was a dear one, for the boy lost one of his eyes in the fight, besides being much torn in different places. He however, got well and had one eye left, and that was better than to have been killed and eaten up.

THE BOY, THE DOG AND THE WOLVES.

The children no doubt know that in some of the eastern countries, men keep large flocks of sheep, and keep men to guard them called shepherds. The children have also heard many fine stories about shepherd's dogs, how knowing and faithful they are. Now for the story. There was once a gentleman in the Eastern world, who owned a large flock, and had a shepherd to take care of them, who attended them on the hills during the day, and drove them down into the valley at night. This shepherd had a faithful dog, who always attended him, and assisted in taking care of the sheep. The gentleman also had another dog, very large and stout, which was a hunting dog, but which was always about the house when not out on a hunt with his master. The gentleman had a little son about nine years old, who was a great favorite of all the family, but especially of the shepherd, with whom he was often permitted to go upon the hills. He was a sweet tempered, lovely little boy, and was even greatly beloved by the hunting dog, with whom he spent many playful hours in the yard. The dogs name was Carlo, and the shepherd's dog's name was Seeker.

One day the little boy asked his mother if he might go up the valley, and meet the shepherd as he would be returning with the flock for the night, and she told him he might go, as this was a common thing for him to do, as the evening approached with its cooling influence. So away the boy flew up the valley, and the faithful hunting dog went with him. It was rather a narrow pass between two hills which led the way to the high pasture lands, and was skirted on both sides by thick timber, which served as a covert for wild beasts. The shepherd was rather later than usual in coming down, and of course the boy advanced farther up the valley than he had expected to do. The shadows of evening were just beginning to darken the deep passage between the hills, and he saw nothing of the shepherd coming. Suddenly he heard, near by, a dreadful howl, and in an instant two great wolves were rushing upon him with dreadful fury, but before he had time to fly or think what to do, his faithful Carlo, who had lingered a little behind, darted by him with the most dreadful courage and fury, and coming in contact with the most advanced of the two wolves, his terrible teeth were set in his neck and he was pinned to the ground. But the second wolf rushing on to the combat, forgot the boy, and fell upon the dog fastening first upon his shoulder, then upon his ham, then upon his flank. While this was going on, the boy retreated to the nearest tree and placing his back against it, stood with an uplifted stick in his hand looking upon the dreadful conflict which the faithful dog was wageing in defence of his life. The combat was long and fearful, and the odds was against the dog. The wolf beneath him struggled most violently to relieve himself, while the other wolf, being at full liberty, wounded the poor dog so that the blood was streaming from different gashes torn in his flesh. Still the faithful dog gave no signs of yielding, though the battle grew weaker on his part. The boy saw his friend must fall on the field, unless he had assistance, and was about to rush into the conflict with his stick, when he was almost astounded by the loud shouts of the well known voice of the shepherd, "Down on them, Seeker! Down on them, Seeker!" when the shepherd's dog, almost like a clap of thunder, came leaping from the cliffs above, and dashing upon the second wolf, took him clear from the other dog. In a moment more the shepherd himself came up, and with his iron-pointed staff, despatched the first wolf and relieved the dog, which was overcome with his efforts and wounds; and then, turning to the one engaged with his own dog, ended the conflict. Poor Carlo, when fully relieved, was so exhausted and weak from loss of blood, that he was unable to stand.

Now, said the shepherd to the boy, my young master, will you run home and tell papa what has happened? if you will, Seeker will take care of the sheep, for he is not much hurt, and I will stay and watch Carlo, who has saved your life. Away Tommy ran, for that was what they called him, and soon a little hand-cart was sent up by the gardener, and the poor dog was carefully conveyed home, and soon got well.

The Sabbath Recorder.

SABBATH LEGISLATION IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The readers of the Recorder will remember the persecution which a few months ago overtook our German Seventh-day Baptist brethren in Pennsylvania, when some unprincipled men whom they had offended, became informers against them for working on Sunday, and had them brought before a Justice of the Peace, who imposed fines upon them in accordance with an old and well-nigh obsolete law. While the memory of this persecution was fresh in their minds, our brethren determined to make an effort to have the objectionable law so modified as to except Sabbath-keepers from its penalties; and accordingly they prepared petitions to the State Legislature, which were signed by several hundreds of their fellow citizens, including some of the most distinguished men in the State. This movement created no small stir, and gave occasion for the friends of Sunday to get up what they called "A Remonstrance against the abolition of the Christian Sabbath." The matter did not end here; but the local newspapers also took up the subject—some of their correspondents siding with the Petitioners, and some with the Remonstrants,—and so the vicinity of Chambersburg, Pa., became the scene of a bloodless war concerning the propriety of imposing fines for working on Sunday.

Without commenting upon the facts in the case, or attempting to show—what we are sure could be shown—that the Remonstrants have taken a course exactly adapted to defeat their own design, we have thought it might interest our readers, and promote the cause of truth, to place together in the following order the Petitions, the Remonstrance, and a portion of the newspaper comments—leaving each individual to draw his own conclusions.

Form of the Petition Signed by the Seventh-day Baptists.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met:

THE PETITION of the subscribers, inhabitants of the county of FRANKLIN, respectfully represents:

That they are members of a Christian denomination in this Commonwealth, from its early settlement, and known by the name of the SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST SOCIETY. Their associations, attachments and habits, have led them to reside together—as near each other as a society as far as circumstances and convenience will allow—being chiefly occupied with agricultural pursuits; having a place for religious worship and religious and brotherly meetings, as well as an establishment for the residence and maintenance of single brethren and sisters who may be disposed to dwell together, and use industry and frugality for their support—furnishing, also, a comfortable residence and maintenance to any indigent, aged, or infirm members of the Society. Besides their establishment at Ephrata, in Lancaster, they have one at Snowhill, near Waynesboro, in Franklin county, and many of their brethren reside in the counties of Bedford and Somerset, in this State.

Your Petitioners and their ancestors have been residents of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania—attached to its institutions and laws, soil and climate—and it is their desire to spend their lives in it in the maintenance of peace, good order, and submission to the laws and constituted authorities, as well as in good will with all men.

Pennsylvania has been reputed the land of religious toleration—where every man was at liberty to worship his Creator and Redeemer according to the light of his understanding and the dictates of his conscience, and there was no one to make him afraid for so doing. Our Commonwealth has justly been entitled to that reputation. She, by her laws, protects all religious denominations in their worship. She has so far regarded the conscientious scruples of some of her citizens, as to allow the form of oath administered before Courts and Magistrates to be changed from the kissing of the Book to the uplifted hand, and also those who were conscientiously opposed to taking an oath to make their affirmation. This exemption and indulgence to conscientious citizens is a toleration that has not been attended with any injury to the administration of the law, or impaired the obligation to testify the truth.

The legislation of our State has, within our memory, been changed out of regard, we believe, to the principles, and opinions, and habits of your Petitioners and others, by making the time of Township Elections and other legal meetings on Friday instead of Saturday, as formerly. For all the legislation in regard to conscientious scruples and religious persuasion, your petitioners present their acknowledgments and thanks.

The chief difference between the religious tenets of your Petitioners and many other Christian denominations of the Commonwealth, is in the day to be observed as a Sabbath. From the best examination and reflection, it is their sincere and conscientious conviction, that the seventh day is the Sabbath, appointed by God; and no divine authority, satisfactory to their minds, can they find in the Scriptures for the change of the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week.

Whilst they conscientiously entertain this opinion, they reflect not on their Christian brethren, whom they believe as conscientiously observe the first day of the week, called Sunday or the Lord's day, as a day to be observed as the Sabbath of rest and worship, appointed by divine authority. Your Petitioners are a retiring community, not interfering with the faith or worship of their brethren of other Christian denominations. They, however, religiously observe the seventh day as the Sabbath, abstaining from worldly employment and business, keeping and spending a considerable part of it in public and private exercises of worship, and have on that day the Supper and Feasts in commemoration of the love, death, and resurrection of their Saviour.

Whilst the laws are adequate to the protection of religious societies against the disturbance of their worship, your Petitioners lament that in some places their society has been often and much disturbed in their worship, by vicious and ill-disposed persons who have come to their places of worship and communion, to disturb it by their noise, disorder, and profanity. The reluctance of the society to seek redress through prosecutions at law, subjecting the offenders to fines and other punishments, has encouraged, as they believe, often, the repetition of such offences against a society, that only treated them with submission and forbearance.

A disturbance during the last summer at Snowhill, in Franklin county, made by numbers, was of such notoriety as to induce a prosecution against the offenders, in the Courts of the County of Franklin, in which a number were convicted, and the exemplary punishment of imprisonment imposed by the Court.

The prosecution and punishment was effected without the action or influence of the Seventh-day Baptist Society at Snowhill, yet it has been the occasion of much hostility and bad feeling to the Society, exhibited by some of the relations of the offenders punished by the Court. This hostility and resentment, was commenced within one week after the judgment by the Court, by prosecutions for penalties under the Act for the violation of Sunday, against members of the Society—many of the members of the Society have been harrassed by prosecutions, convictions, fines and costs, for small matters of employment on Sunday. These prosecutions have been instituted by persons not known as particularly regardful of the observance of any Sabbath.

Your Petitioners, therefore, do acknowledge, that in observing and keeping the seventh day as the Sabbath of the Lord, they have considered themselves as fulfilling the obligation of the divine law to keep the Sabbath day—and that on their farms and in their dwellings they felt that on the first day of the week they might be engaged in some of their ordinary employment and labor, without violating the law of God.

In doing this, they believe that they have not injured the cause of religion or morals in the community in which they live, and where their habits, faith and opinions are known. For their peaceable and orderly habits, they willingly appeal to members of other Christian denominations, who have the opportunity of knowing their habits, conduct and characters. In doing any worldly employment on the first day of the week, they may be considered as violating the Act of Assembly, yet not the spirit of it, as the law was intended to enforce the observance of a Sabbath. And whilst your Petitioners and their Society, do faithfully observe one day in seven as the Sabbath, they think it unjust and oppressive, that they shall for any small act of employment on the first day of the week, called the Lord's day, be subjected to the same prosecutions, fines and costs, as the man who openly desecrates that day; regards not its obligation or worship, and treats with irreverence the Lord of the Sabbath—and yet such a man, regarding no Sabbath, may be the informer and prosecutor for a share of the penalty for his own private gain, and visit on the members of the Society the vengeance of the law, for a violation of the Lord's day.

Your Petitioners respectfully request your Honorable Bodies, to consider the premises, and afford such relief from unequal and oppressive penalties, to the acknowledged members of this Society, as you may deem proper. It will be for your wisdom to qualify the exemption by suitable provisions, so as not to encourage the desecration of the Sabbath, or afford any license to those who regard not a Sabbath.

Form of the Petition Signed by the Observers of tht First Day.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met:

THE PETITION of the undersigned, inhabitants and citizens of the county of respectfully represents, That they have learned that the denomination of Christians called Seventh-day Baptists, are about to petition your Honorable Bodies for the passage of a law to exempt them from the fine for the violation of th Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, which is imposed by the first section of the Act of the 22d of April, 1794, entitled, "An Act for the prevention of vice and immorality, and unlawful gaming," &c.; that they understand that they, the said Baptists, have recently been subjected to vexatious prosecutions, which have been instituted under the provisions of said section, and fines collected from them; that many of your Petitioners are the neighbors of said Baptists, and have long been acquainted with them, as well as with some of their ancestors; that they are a quiet, peaceable, industrious, honest, temperate, and pious people, generally content to pursue their avocations in life without molesting or harming any one; that inasmuch as the said Baptists conscientiously believe that the seventh day of the week, commonly called Saturday, is the true Sabbath, and accordingly observe and keep it as such; and inasmuch as your Petitioners are of the opinion that the cause of religion and Christianity will not suffer by permitting them to work on Sunday, they, therefore, pray your Honorable Bodies to pass an act granting the Petition of said Seventh-day Baptists, with such restrictions and such provisions as your wisdom may deem best calculated to promote the interest of true religion and the cause of religious liberty. And they will ever pray, &c.

Remonstrance against the Abolition of the Christian Sabbath.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania:—

The remonstrance of the undersigned, citizens of County, in said State, respectfully represents—

That, whereas petitions, respectably and extensively signed by citizens of Franklin and other counties, from a denomination styled Seventh-day Baptists, have been presented to your Honorable Bodies, praying for the abolition of the law requiring the observance of the Lord's day under certain penalties—and the passage of a law which would allow them to attend to their secular employments on that day, and observe Saturday as their Sabbath; and whereas, the undersigned remonstrants would most earnestly deprecate the passage of any law which would materially change existing regulations on the subject of the Lord's day;—therefore the undersigned, citizens of this Commonwealth, would most respectfully and earnestly remonstrate against your Honorable bodies granting the prayer of the petitioners, and would beg leave to urge upon your serious attention the following considerations:—

1st. Such a law would set aside the authority of God in his word, which clearly sanctions the observance of the first day of the week as the Lord's day or Christian Sabbath, and would involve an exercise of authority to which no legislative body on earth can lay claim, without assuming to themselves the prerogative of setting aside the institutions of God.

2d. Its tendency, we have fearful reason to believe, would be to inflict most serious injury upon the morals of this community, by effacing from the minds of its members those sentiments of veneration which should ever be cultivated for the sacredness of the Sabbath as an institution of God.

3d. Its effect would be to interrupt most seriously the religious exercises of the portion of our community amongst whom this people might reside.

4th. It would destroy the sacred stillness and quiet of the Sabbath, so essential to the accomplishment of the purposes for which it has been appointed.

5th. It would be an encroachment upon the uniformity so desirable as it regards the time of attendance upon religious worship.

For these and other reasons which might be suggested, the undersigned remonstrants would most earnestly entreat your Honorable bodies to decline granting the prayer of the Petitioners. And they will pray, &c.

Remarks

By the Editor of the Chambersburg Weekly Messenger.

There is, at the present time, an effort being made by a small sect in this State, to procure the passage of an act by the Legislature, exempting them from the operation of the existing laws with respect to the desecration of the Sabbath. The whole movement involves important consequences for the interests of the Christian religion, and should be carefully looked after by the friends of the Christian Sabbath. The passage of any law, which would allow a small sect or party of people to desecrate the day generally recognized by the Christian community, as well as by the laws of the country, as the Sabbath, must be most deleterious in its influence upon the interests of religion and morals. We have been surprised to learn that some professors of religion, and others who profess to cherish a high regard for the Christian Sabbath, have been lending their influence as well as their names, in favor of the movement referred to. Such have doubtless acted in most instances without giving the subject due reflection. We make these remarks without intending to reflect upon any one. No one can entertain a higher feeling of respect for the Seventh-day Baptists than we do, or more deeply sympathize with the small society of them in this county in view of the difficulties in which they are involved. But, at the same time, however much we may desire to have them relieved from their grievances, we cannot reconcile our views of propriety with any measure for that purpose, which, as we conceive, strikes directly at the very foundation upon which the sustaining and promoting of the Christian religion generally is based.

[The following was written by a gentleman who has been a Member of the National and State Legislatures, besides filling other responsible stations. We copy from the Chambersburg Repository and Whig.]

The Seventh-day Baptists.

A memorial has been presented to the Legislature of this commonwealth, by the members of the society of Seventh-day Baptists, resident in this and several other counties of this commonwealth, in relation to the penalties to which they are subjected under existing laws for any worldly employment for them on Sunday, and which by other Christian denominations is also called the Sabbath or Lord's day.

A great many in this county, who are professing members of other Christian denominations, have signed a memorial to the legislature in favor of extending relief to the Baptist Society from the persecution, prosecution and penalties, to which they have been and are subjected under our laws. The writer has given his name to this memorial, and though he has no connection with the Seventh-day Baptist Society, and is a member of a church that observes and regards the first day of the week as the Lord's day and Sabbath, he is unwilling to acknowledge that he signed the memorial without due reflection, or that he was wanting in due regard for the observance of the Sabbath.

On examining the memorial of the Seventh-day Baptist Society, he found it stated in that memorial, "Whilst your petitioners and their society "do faithfully observe one day in seven as the "Sabbath, they think it unjust and oppressive that "they shall, for any small act of employment on "the first day of the week, called the Lord's day, "be subjected to the same prosecution, fines and "costs as the man who openly desecrates that day, "regards not its obligation and worship, and treats "with irreverence the Lord of the Sabbath; and "yet such a man, regarding no Sabbath, may "be the informer and prosecutor for a share of "the penalty for his own private gain, and visit on "the members of the society the vengeance of the "law for a violation of the Lord's day."

The relief sought is expressed in these words: "Your petitioners respectfully request your hon- "orable bodies to consider the premises, and afford such relief from unequal and oppressive "penalties to the acknowledged members of this "society as you may deem proper. It will be "for your wisdom to qualify the exemption by "suitable provisions, so as not to encourage the "desecration of the Sabbath, or afford any license "to those who regard not a Sabbath."

The grievance complained of by this respectable society is not without foundation, and is at least deserving of consideration in this land of toleration, where, by our State Constitution, it is declared that "no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience."

Though I differ from the members of this society in their religious faith, and regret that they cannot see their way clear to unite with their fellow citizens of other denominations in observing the first day of the week as the Lord's day and Sabbath, yet, from my acquaintance with them, I am satisfied that they feel themselves constrained by examination, and, as they suppose, by Divine authority, to observe the seventh day as the Sabbath. When men thus conscientiously observe the seventh day as the Sabbath, abstain from worldly employment and engage statedly in public exercises of worship on that day, to visit them with the same penalty, fines and costs, for any worldly employment on their farm or in their dwelling on Sunday, that is by law provided for the man who keeps no Sabbath, reviles its author, keeps away from the sanctuary, and on our public streets and highways openly violates that law by worldly employment and business, does appear to me unequal, unjust, and oppressive. That such weekly infractions of our Sabbath and of our law should occur under the observation of magistrates and citizens, without prosecution, or any vindication of the law, or of the day set apart by that law as the Sabbath, and yet that the members of a retiring, peaceable, orderly, and religious community, should be sought out on their farms to discover whether they might be engaged there in any worldly employment, and if so employed, that they may be informed on, prosecuted, convicted, and adjudged to pay a fine and costs, under the penalty of imprisonment, is a reflection on our system of laws, on their administration, and the community, and exhibits an inconsistency of conduct unbecoming the children of the same heavenly Father, and the professed worshipers of the same Saviour.

What estimate, I would ask, would be put upon the moral and religious character of the man who, professing to be an observer of the first day of the week as his Sabbath, should engage on that day in traveling from farm to farm of the members of the Seventh-day Baptist Society, to discover whether they were privately engaged in any employment on their farm, that he might become on Monday, an informer against them, and receive, as such informer, the half of the fines imposed on such member of the Baptist Society? Would not such engagement, on Sunday, by such informer, be a violation of the law as a "worldly engagement?" and would not his offense, before High Heaven, greatly exceed that of the Seventh-day Baptist, engaged on the same Sunday in some worldly employment, so private as to be only known to the Almighty, unless sought after by an officious Sabbath-breaking spy? Under the existing law, such an informer may reap his harvest of fines, and boast of the money he was making. It may be said, that the case supposed is too extravagant and intolerant to be practiced. We have strong reason to believe that such case has occurred under the prostitution of the law in this county against some of the members of the Baptist Society of Snow Hill.

Is it strange that the sympathy of other religious denominations should be excited in behalf of the Seventh-day Baptist Society of this county, who have been subjected to the persecution of having their solemn religious worship, their communion of the Lord's Supper, disturbed from time to time, for years, by the riot, noise, and profanity of men and boys, assembled for such mischief, and also to the grievance of having many of their members brought up before a Justice to be convicted and fined for worldly employment on their farms on the first day of the week? Is it unreasonable that, under such persecution, the members of this peaceable society should ask the Legislature "to consider the premises, and afford such relief from unequal and oppressive penalties, as they may deem proper?" They also say to our Representatives, that it is for them "to qualify the exemption by suitable provisions, so as not to encourage the desecration of the Sabbath, or afford any license to those who regard not a Sabbath."

Though this Christian society is in a small minority in our Commonwealth, is not their case deserving of consideration by the majority and their legislature? What relief may be afforded them by legislation, consistent with due regard to religion and morals, is a great question, demanding dispassionate reflection. With all the feeling that I have for them as a maltreated community, I am not entirely decided, if it were left to myself to say, what should be the extent of the relief.

Their creed as to the day to be observed as the Sabbath, is one of conscience, and which, in the language of our Constitution, "no human authority can in any case whatever control or interfere with." Conscience is a matter between the individual and his God, is no more to be controled by fines and costs, than it is with bars and bolts, the prison or the stocks. They are not to be coerced to our faith, and we should respect theirs, which is a conscientious one.

Whether the total exemption of the acknowledged members of the society from the penalties of the law forbidding worldly employment or business on Sunday, would lead to any desecration of the Lord's day by others in their neighborhood or elsewhere, requires consideration, and whether it can be guarded against by suitable provisions and restrictions.

The members of the Society in this county are almost exclusively engaged in agriculturel and resident on their farms in the same neighborhood. Their engagement in any "worldly employment or business on their farms," would be observed by those who know the tenets of the society, and would likely be cognizant of their strict observance of the Seventh Day as the Sabbath; as it would not furnish to such an evidence of a disregard of a Sabbath, but only their selection of the seventh day, it would not, we conceive, be likely to lead to or encourage any desecration of the Lord's Day by others in such neighborhood. It is also deserving of inquiry, what has been the tendency in times past of such employment as exercised by the members of such society on the community around them? Has it in any manner encouraged the desecration of the Lord's Day in the neighborhood amongst the community?

On inquiry, I am assured by respectable members of other denominations, that, in their opinion, it has not; and it is well known that in their immediate neighborhood, the Lord's Day is as strictly observed by other denominations as in other parts of the county, and much better observed than it is at and about the place to which the members of the society have been dragged by the informer and the officers of the law for its violation, whilst violations of the same day, by those not connected with the society, were allowed to pass unnoticed.

I have been informed that it is a fact, that highly respectable professing Christians of other denominations, including officers of the church, and some in the ministry, living near the Seventh-day Baptist Society in this county, and knowing them well, have testified their regard for their character, morals and influence, by signing the memorial to our Legislature, asking them to afford them the relief as desired. This is strong evidence from a quarter of high character, that the example of the Seventh-day Baptists had not impaired the observance of the Lord's Day by others, or led to a desecration of that day in their community.

The exemption, if extended to the acknowledged members of this society, should be confined to the farms on which they reside—should not extend to towns or villages, or admit of any trade or traffic even on their farms. What other guards should be added to prevent abuse, will be for the Legislature to devise.

If the exemption is not granted to the members of this society, with proper restrictions, the fine ought to be reduced as to them, and the informer should not be allowed to have any share of the fine. The grant, by the existing law, to the informer one-half of the fine, has not benefited the cause of morals, religion, or the Sabbath. Where the violation of the Sabbath is most common and public, there are no informations made or prosecutions instituted for the violation. There is then required other motives for the action of the informer, than either his regard for the Sabbath or his share of the fine; and that will be found to arise from a vindictive spirit to some member of society whose offence against the law and morals is much less than that of hundreds of others. The spirit of revenge, to persecute and harass the conscientious members of the Seventh-day Baptist Society, should not be encouraged by a law, allowing to the informer the one-half of the fine he can get imposed as his reward. The amount of the fine ought not to be the same for every violation of the Sabbath, by any worldly employment, without regard to circumstances.

I find my remarks becoming too extended for the columns of your paper in these times of national and political excitement—and bring them to a close. I have been induced to offer them in vindication of my signature to the memorial in behalf of this Society, and this is done without the knowledge of any member of the Society.

Another Article.

[The following article was written by an Attorney at Law and Ex-Member of the State Legislature. It is taken from the Chambersburg Repository and Whig.]

Whenever public opinion has been led into error, upon any subject of interest, whether designedly or not, it is proper that the error should be corrected. This, with equal pain and regret, I remark, has been the case in relation to the petitions which have been presented to the Legislature of this State, for the passage of a law to relieve the Seventh-day Baptists from the penalty imposed by the first section of the act of 22d of April, 1794, for the violation of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday. I have been aware, for some time, that a report was in circulation that the design of the petitioners was to abolish the Christian Sabbath. So long as this was a mere report, it was unworthy of notice, as it was scarcely to be suspected that any person of common sense would credit it. But when it assumed a more imposing aspect, and became the caption of a remonstrance from the pen, as it is said, of a Rev'd gentleman of this place, and received the sanction of his clerical brethren, and that of the Sabbath Committee of Chambersburg, it demanded a notice.

The remonstrance is headed thus: "A REMONSTRANCE AGAINST THE ABOLITION OF THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH;" and the idea is embodied in it, that the petitions which have been presented, signed by citizens of this county, pray for this abolition. Upon what, I would ask, has the Rev'd author founded a charge which so seriously and injuriously affects the character of a large number of his fellow citizens? Whence did he derive his information? Certainly not from any thing that is contained in the petitions. Not a sentence or word in them warrants such a charge. Upon what then is it founded? I am constrained to trace it to its only source—common rumor. Without enquiry, then, for correct information, this rumor has been seized upon by the Committee, and the author of the remonstrance, and published to the world as true. Let any one look at the petition, and he will at once discover its falsity. Nothing of the kind has been asked for. The petition simply prays the Legislature to exempt the Seventh-day Baptists from the penalty of the 1st section of the Act of the 22d April, 1794, under such restrictions as they in their wisdom may deem proper. They neither seek nor ask for any interference with the provisions of the act above referred to, except so far as this sect of Christians is concerned. Yet the committee, the reverned author, and every man who signs the remonstance, boldly accuse them with petitioning the Legislature to abolish the Christian Sabbath. And who are the people thus assailed? Upwards of thirteen hundred citizens of the county of Franklin, comprising some of the most intelligent, respectable, learned, and I will add, pious men in the county. Men, too, of almost all denominations of Christians among us, of all classes and of all professions—several of them have heretofore honorably represented this county in the National and State Legislatures, and have been elevated to other high and responsible stations. In these days of libels a greater libel has not been published to the world than this remonstrance. It is most deeply to be lamented that those gentlemen did not examine the matter before they acted. Had they done so, they would have saved much unpleasant feeling in the community. But they have chosen to do otherwise, and to act without correct information. Their zeal has got ahead of their knowledge.

Now let us look at this charge: the petitioners are represented to the public, first, as entertaining the absurd and ridiculous notion that it is in the power of a State Legislature to abolish the Christian Sabbath, and secondly, that they have prayed them to do so. Is this done in the spirit of Him whom the Committee and the author profess to follow? Is it characterized by that Christian love and fellowship that ought to exist among brethren of the same faith? Let their own consciences answer. It is clear, to say the least of it, that they have misrepresented the petitions, and done great injustice to the petitioners. Their duty, then, as men and as Christians, is to apply a remedy without delay. Let them withdraw their remonstrance from circulation, and draw up another which will fairly meet the case, and in the true spirit of Christians, acknowledge their error, or I most solemnly assure them that they will give the cause of the Redeemer a more fatal stab than they are aware of in this region.

OUR POSITION.

The faithful and true Witness said, He that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God. Honestly believing this to be an accurate delineation of Christian character, we have thought that our chief duty, as a distinct denomination, was with those who profess to love God's truth. Consequently we have not labored to diffuse our sentiments among "the unholy and profane." For we were well aware, that many of them disregard the popular day of rest, not so much from an intelligent conviction of the weakness of the argument by which its observance is defended, as from libertine looseness of principle. It was no part of our object to give countenance to this looseness; for it was easy to see, that in the same spirit, the men of the world would slight the claims of the true Sabbath, when they should come to understand them. Especially would they do so, as long as they could shield themselves from rebuke behind the great mass of religionists.

At the same time we could see that the grounds, upon which the observance of Sunday is predicated, were so weak,—so wholly unsupported by Scripture,—so antagonistical to the claims of the Moral Law,—and so dependent upon tradition and far-fetched inferences,—that it was idle to expect its observance would ever oppose any effectual check to this libertinism. For not only would God refuse to honor such palpable perversions of his truth,—for He has no attribute that can side with men in a war against his law—but the growing disposition of men to think for themselves would so completely neutralize the force of the sophistry, by which this festival is commended to their regard, that any conscientiousness with regard to its claims would soon be out of the question.

But our wish has been to get access to Christians, that, they being once reformed, the ungodly should no longer find a cloak for their Sabbath-breakings. We have desired to go into their assemblies, proclaim our views, distribute our tracts, discuss the subject in the spirit of love, and do all in our power to enlighten them on the important point on which we differ from them. We have desired to place ourselves in such a relation to them, that there might be a mutual friction of minds; that if we could not enlighten them, they might enlighten us. Could we doubt, that real Christians would show a disposition to come to the light? Could we think that spirits born of God would refuse to do so, lest their deeds should be reproved? Could we think that they would shrink from the test of divine truth? Could we think that efforts to instruct them would be met with contemptuous sneers?—that a vain conceit of their own superior knowledge would repel every approach?—that raillery, and taunt, and scorn, would be the logic by which they would oppose our deep sense of the importance of this subject? Could we think that their leaders would frown upon every attempt to bring it under discussion, stigmatizing us as Judaizers, fomenters of divisions, disturbers of the peace, and, what is more preposterous still, enemies of the Sabbath?

But our eyes are opened. We are brought to the painful conviction, that for the most part the churches are closed against the discussion of every thing which does not comport with their received creeds. On the subject of the Sabbath in particular the leaders seem determined, that there shall be no investigation. We ask for the use of their pulpits, and we are told that 'controversy is unprofitable: the minds of the people ought not to be disturbed.' We endeavor to bring it before their Associations, and we are told that 'it does not come within their province to discuss such questions.' We lay it before their missionary bodies, and we are told 'that they have no constitutional power to entertain the subject.' We go to "Sabbath Conventions," where, above all places, one would think, such a question ought to be freely and fully discussed, and we find 'the meeting was not called to investigate that point.' Thus on all sides the door is closed against us, and "we are made as the filth of the world, the offscouring of all things to this day."

And not only so; but our opposers seem determined that even our rights of conscience shall not be respected. They seem resolved that the broad shield of our country's constitution shall not cast its protecting shade over us, if they can prevent it;—that we, at all events, shall be excepted from the general provision for religious liberty, which our fathers purchased with their blood:—and that our spirits shall be crushed by fines and social annoyances, until we learn to bow with more reverence at the shrine of Puritanism. But "in the name of our God we will set up our banner." We have our rights, and we mean to claim them.

The spirit with which we are met, convinces us that we have nothing to hope for from the dominant sects of the day. The Jews exercised more liberality towards the Apostles of Christ, than do the sects of the present day towards us. For the Apostles were permitted, if they had a word of exhortation for the people, to say on. Acts 13: 15. But we have no such privilege in the synagogues of the moderns. That is, we have no privilege to tell them any thing but what they believe already. It is not a month since we called on one of the ministers of this city, who had a short time before preached to his flock in defence of the claims of Sunday, with a request that we might be allowed to show also our opinion. But 'no; it would only stir up strife; controversy was unprofitable.'

What then? Must we give it up, and take for granted that we are in error, whether we are convinced of it, or not? Must we yield up our minds in slavish submission, and no longer presume to think for ourselves? Are the strong convictions of our minds to be annihilated by the vote of numbers? Shall derision take the place of proof, and ridicule suffice for argument? Indeed our opponents take a sorry method to change our views. We are not yet prepared to act as if we had no souls; and in spite of ourselves, or of them, our souls will think, and think too in accordance with the evidence placed before us.

We are therefore compelled to a course very different from what we would otherwise pursue. As the Apostles turned to the Gentiles when the Jews rejected them, so we, being rejected by Christians, turn to the world. The consequence is that men, who are not governed by any religious principles, are made acquainted with the controversy. Having no predilections for one side more than for the other, they very quickly discover where the truth lies; and being eager to seize upon every thing which will help them prove that professors of religion are but a heartless set of hypocrites, who do not conform to the Bible themselves, they lay hold of our weapons, and employ them against the dominant sects of the day with wonderful effect. Indeed it becomes a battle, in which professors of religion are sadly worsted; and they feel it with keen mortification. But their spirits soon rally again, because it is the opposition of Infidelity, which is a name so vile and unpopular, that even the truths which it sometimes speaks, find no favor with the multitude.

Who are they then that stir up the opposition of Infidels to Christianity? The effrontery which charges it upon us, can only be equalled by that spirit which charges upon religion all the bloody persecutions which have been undertaken against the saints. We cleave to the commandment of God, just as he gave it; and yet we are sometimes accused of giving encouragement to infidelity! Wicked Ahab once charged God's prophet with being the troubler of Israel. Sectarian bigots charge us with being the troublers of the church. But our reply must be like that of the prophet to Israel's king. We have not troubled the heritage of the Lord; but you, and your father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord.—1 Kings 18: 17, 18.

Let Christians cleave strictly to the Book which they profess to love; let them at all events evince a willingness to be tested by it, and the opposition of infidels would soon cease. Now it is raised, not so much against the Bible, as against the errors of professors: and those errors being real, the opposition continues. Let infidels have nothing but the Bible itself to fight against,—let them see nothing in Christians but an embodiment of Bible truth, and they will soon languish for want of something to serve as aliment to their enmity.

As for ourselves, we do not feel disposed to try the vain expedient of purchasing peace by disobedience to a plain commandment. The Lord is at hand; and in the day of his coming, the vote of the multitude will not cause him to unsay what he has said. He is not yea, and nay; and we will hold fast till he comes. *

RELIGION AND EDUCATION IN TEXAS.—The Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for Western Texas, was held at Houston about the middle of January. Its sessions continued five days, and were harmonious and interesting. Bishop Soule presided, and several new stations were decided upon. The Texas Bible Society has resolved to supply every family in the State with a copy of the Sacred Scriptures, and one thousand dollars' worth of the publication of the American Bible Society have been received for that purpose. The Conference passed a resolution approving of this enterprise, and enjoining upon each of its ministers the duty of making special efforts for the supply of every family within their respective fields of labor. A Convention was held at Houston on the 13th of January, for the promotion of education in Texas, which gave proof that the subject of educating the entire population had taken a strong hold upon the feelings of the most worthy and influential citizens of the country. A journal devoted to the cause of education is soon to be issued. A Presbyterian College is to be located in the vicinity of San Antonio; a Presbyterian minister has been stationed at that place by the American Board of Missions; and a Presbyterian Church is building at Victoria.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION ANTI-AMERICAN—NO. 6.

It were easy to show, from many historical documents, and from the whole frame-work of American society, that the policy of the Anglo-Americans has been to establish and perpetuate perfect religious liberty. The Stuart line of English monarchs, through the whole dynasty, were cruel persecutors of all their subjects who asserted the rights of conscience, in opposition to any of the religious dogmas of the Court and the hierarchy. It was this long and tedious course of religious proscription, that drove from their native land most of the master-spirits who led the early settlers of this country, and gave character to the institutions which they founded. They came for the sake of enjoying religious freedom, and hence, in every colonial charter obtained from the crown, the insertion of special articles securing full religious liberty, was an indispensable condition of its acceptance by the colonists. This was continued to the Revolution, and then the framers of our National and State Constitutions laid the basis of religious liberty upon broad and solid foundations. The Constitution of the United States guarantees to all the several States a republican form of government; they cannot be members of the Union without it; nor can they of right enact any law which shall contravene the Constitution of the United States.

How does this republican form of government, guaranteed by our national Constitution, affect the subject of religion? It guarantees perfect religious liberty. In the year 1787, a Convention, of which General Washington was President, framed and published this Constitution; it was ratified by a majority of the States in the following year. In 1789, the new government assembled under its panoply; and Washington was chosen President of the United States. During that year, a Baptist Society in Virginia addressed the President through a committee to know the relation of that Constitution to religious liberty; in answer to which President Washington declared, that if he had had the least idea of its endangering the rights of ANY RELIGIOUS DENOMINATION, he should never have attached his name to it; and that no man would be more willing than himself to revise and alter it, if need be, so as to avoid all religious persecution. All our State Legislatures seem to have understood the principles of the government in the same manner, for all the State Constitutions adopted before that time, and all after it, express or imply quite as much for the liberty of the citizens. Nothing is plainer, therefore, than that American government was designed to secure to all classes of inhabitants religious freedom to the utmost extent that conscience can dictate.

So exceedingly jealous of this right were the first republican legislators of New Jersey, that the twenty-third Article of their frame of government required each member of the Council, and of the Assembly, to declare upon oath or affirmation, that he will "not assent to any law, vote, or proceeding, which shall appear to him injurious to the public welfare, ... nor that shall annul, repeal, or alter the eighteenth and nineteenth sections"—which sections guarantee the broadest extent of religious liberty desirable. The nineteenth article says, that "there shall be no establishment of any one religious sect in preference to another." How, then, shall we account for the enactment of the Sunday laws? There have been Seventh-day Baptists in America from the year 1664; and in New Jersey from the year 1700. They were, however, few in number, and of peaceable and submissive sentiments. As they were unmolested in observing the seventh day, it appears to have been generally supposed by other citizens, that the Sunday laws did not interfere with any one's rights, although they imposed onerous restrictions respecting the first day. In the enactment of the Sunday laws, the legislators and the people were doubtless urged on by the strong religious prepossessions which were brought with them from the fatherland. There, no class of religionists have suffered more severely from proscription and contumely than the Seventh-day Baptists; hence their quiet acquiescence with the limited liberty which they enjoyed in the colonies. On the other hand, the Puritan sects, who were the most numerous and influential of the colonists, were intent upon having a Sabbath; it was natural, therefore, in adapting English law to the desires of the colonists, that they should procure the passage of the Sunday laws, with more rigid requirements even, in some respects, than had been wont to be done in the fatherland. When the colonies became independent states, there was but little change made in the laws, except such as was requisite to make them consistent with an independent government. They were in most cases the colonial laws re-affirmed with a phraseology to suit the new state of things. In this way Sunday legislation obtained a place in our republican government, without any studied design of abridging the rights of any one class of citizens, however few might be their numbers, who were thereby restricted in their rights. Like many other legislative abuses, the subject has acquired veneration in some eyes from its hoary age, and especially where it suits the party interests of religious sects. The relative positions of different religious parties have now become such, that the Sunday laws can no longer be enforced without conflicting with one of the most precious distinctions of American government. It behoves all good citizens, therefore, to examine into the character of Sunday legislation, and as they find it unauthorized by the Word of God, and conflicting with our National and State Constitutions, whatever prepossessions they may have had in favor of it, quietly to relinquish it, and apply themselves to the propagation of their respective views by a plainer exhibition of those moral considerations on which they are supposed to rest. Here every one may have full scope without let or hindrance.

A large portion of modern laws are but modifications of laws that have existed in the Roman Empire for more than a thousand years. It is so with the Sunday laws. The first state or civil law for the Christian observance of the first day of the week, was made by the Emperor Constantine, A. D. 321, and designed by him to compel uniformity in the sentiments and practice of his subjects. Eusebius, in his life of Constantine, liber 4, cap. 18, says, "He appointed as a suitable time for prayers the Dominical Day, (i. e. Lord's day.) He determined that those obeying Roman power should abstain from every work upon the days named after the Saviour; that they should venerate also the day before the Sabbath, (i. e. Friday,) in memory, as it seems to me, of the events occurring on those days to our common Saviour." Sozomen, in his Ecclesiastical History, liber 1, cap. 8, says, "He made a law that on the Dominical Day, which the Hebrews call the first day of the week, and the Greeks the day of the sun; and also on the day of Venus, (i. e. Friday,) judgment should not be given, or other business transacted, but that all should worship God with prayers and supplications." To give the more solemnity to the first day of the week, Sylvester, then Bishop of Rome, changed the name of Sunday into the more imposing title of Lord's day. Wherever Roman law has prevailed since that time, it has been common to compel some sort of Sunday observance; it is clearly, therefore, Anti-American in its origin.

It is equally Anti-American in its tendencies. It is part of that great European system of ecclesiastical polity, by which the clergy of Europe used the civil power to dragoon the unwilling people into a uniformity of faith, and a reluctant submission to the unhallowed pretence of the hierarchists, to which the kingdoms of Europe willingly lent their power for the sake of keeping the clergy and church employed in riveting the chains which they had placed around the necks of their subjects. As the Sunday laws are the last remnants of that pernicious system left to the clergy of the United States, it may not be so much a matter of wonder that they are so reluctant to part with them; yet it seems to us, that there is enough in the facts of our own history to show the impolicy of retaining them. That they are exceedingly unpopular with the mass of our citizens, is obvious from the extreme difficulty of enforcing them.

No course can be more impolitic for the State, or for the interests of true religion, than to compel the unwilling observance of religious rites upon enlightened citizens. The peace, unity, prosperity, and happiness of a State is promoted by removing unnatural and unnecessary restrictions, and allowing all classes, the weak as well as the strong, equal privileges. It removes jealousies and discontent, and promotes fellow-feeling, community of interests, and enterprise. And as it respects the cause of religion, truth never suffers by full liberty to assert its own rights. Free discussion promotes vigor of intellect, and discovers the just reasons of things. Nothing, therefore, is gained to the cause of truth by judicial compulsion.

The same is true with respect to the influence of religious sentiments upon the morals of a nation. A nation becomes righteous, and the government just, in proportion as the people and their officers become enlightened and personally interested in the doctrines and precepts of revelation.

Our own nation is a happy example of what the people can and will do for themselves, when unrestricted by State laws. It is the voluntary principle, the free and spontaneous effort of an enlightened community, that accomplishes any thing valuable for religious society, profitable to the cause of religion, or honorable to our Maker. The United States may safely challenge comparison with any other country upon the face of the globe for the number and elegance of its churches and chapels, and for the number and respectability of its worshiping assemblies, as likewise for the number and efficiency of its church ministry. In a population of twenty-one millions, we have thirty-three thousand ministers—an average of one minister to every six hundred and fifty people. It would have been utterly impossible for any government to have done for the American people by compulsory measures what they have voluntarily done for themselves. The same thing is going on in the progress of other great moral reformations in the land. What the Legislature cannot do, the people are doing for themselves. This is the working of the great American system of voluntaryism. Allow the people liberty to do, and protect them while they confine themselves to the exercise of their just rights, and the people will work a greater reformation in attendance upon public worship and regard to sacred time, than it is possible for all our State Legislatures to accomplish by compulsory measures. S. D.

SABBATH LEGISLATION.—It is instructive to read the comments of some of the newspapers upon the petitions of Sabbath-keepers to be relieved from penalties for working on Sunday. These comments show a strange inability or indisposition to look at the question in a candid and liberal spirit. The following extract from a letter of the N. Y. Tribune's Correspondent at Harrisburg, is a good illustration of this. The writer thinks, "it will be a delicate matter for the Legislature to touch the sacred institution of the Sabbath." But he ought to know, that the Legislature of Pennsylvania has already touched that sacred institution; and all which the petitioners now ask is, that it will take off its hand so as to give each person that freedom of conscience which the Constitution guarantees. Here is the extract, which we take from the Tribune of Feb. 5:

"A question involving many nice points, will be brought before the Legislature shortly. It is that of exempting Seventh-day Baptists from fine for a breach of our Sabbath. Under existing laws, this Society is compelled to keep two days of the week—the first in obedience to law, and the seventh in accordance with the dictates of conscience. They feel that they are thus legally required to violate one of the highest commands and most solemn injunctions of divine law—'Six days shalt thou labor.' They ask for the interposition of the Legislature to allow them to perform certain kinds of labor without penal liability, or rather, to remove the penalty from the first to the seventh day in their case.

"It will be a delicate matter for the Legislature to touch the sacred institution of the Sabbath. If the petitioning society is exempted—if their conscientious scruples are regarded—why not those of the Jews, and certain other sects? The first innovation may lead to consequences which the most prudent sagacity cannot now foresee; and be considered the entering wedge to Sabbath-annihilating legislation. In any light, the question is a very delicate one."

SABBATH PETITIONS IN THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW JERSEY.—We have already noticed the reception, by the Legislature of New Jersey, of a number of petitions praying for a modification of the existing laws against Sunday labor, so as to allow those who religiously observe the seventh day of the week to pursue their ordinary avocations on the first day without molestation. These petitions were referred to a special committee, who have introduced into the Legislature a bill granting the prayer of the Petitioners. The bill is entitled, "An Act granting Equal Privileges to the Citizens of this State." We see not how any liberal-minded man can oppose it. It is in the following language:—

BE IT ENACTED: Sec. 1. That every inhabitant of this State who religiously observes the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, shall be allowed to enjoy all the rights, privileges and liberty, granted by the Constitution, as fully as are, or shall be secured by law to those observing the first day of the week, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

MORNING PRAYER IN THE LEGISLATURE OF PENNSYLVANIA.—A correspondent of the New York Tribune, writing from Harrisburgh, Pa., under date of Feb. 5, says:—

"On Monday an effort was made in the House to have the daily sessions of that body opened with prayer by the clergy of Harrisburg, alternately. This motion was made by Mr. Stewart, of Franklin, in good faith, and in accordance with the precedents set by sister States, by the Convention that framed, and the Convention that amended our Constitution, and by Congress—but was not received in the spirit in which it was offered. Some made it the theme upon which to develop their hitherto undiscovered facetiousness—others for expressing their settled and determined dissent to any such innovation. Some to express their fears that legislative gravity could not be preserved while addressing the throne of the Most High, others to doubt the propriety of introducing prayer into a legislative hall, as much as if it were proposed to open our Courts by imploring divine aid. The resolution was at first passed by a vote of 44 to 26; but inasmuch as there was not a majority of the whole House voting in its favor, a re-consideration was carried, and after amendment upon amendment had been offered, some serious, some witty, some neither, and the House had been thrown into considerable confusion, the whole subject was indefinitely postponed, with a loss of a day's legislation."

FRUITS OF CHRISTIANITY.—It is quite common for designing men in Christian countries to harp upon what they call the evil fruits of Christianity, while in fact the evils they complain of result from the want of Christianity. It would be well for such persons to read the following statement of the Chinese statesman Ke-Ying, in reference to the influence of Christianity in the Chinese Empire:

"The religion of your noble empire, engages men to that which is right and just, and prevents them from doing what is wrong. It is a true religion; it inspires men with noble sentiments. I will, therefore, urge the Emperor to permit the Chinese of the interior, who choose to do so, to adopt it without being punished as criminals." He said, moreover, "For two hundred years that Christianism was permitted in China, the true Christians committed no crimes; but there were among them many persons who under the mask of that religion did much harm—they corrupted the women, deceived the sick, and did many kinds of wickedness; that was the reason Christianity was forbidden in the empire."

PRAYER.—He who lives well always prays well, and his prayers will be received by God and the good, and make good impression on the minds of the irreligious, even if his gift is small and his words few. But he who is unholy in life, although he may pray with the gift of an angel, will not prevail with God nor do good to the souls of men. The pure in heart alone shall see and enjoy God.

THE YOUTH'S CABINET for February meets the high expectations excited by the January number. The new series is just commenced, making the present a favorable time to order the work. D. A. Woodworth, Clinton Hall, N. Y.

J. K. WELLMAN, of 118 Nassau St., has sent us the February No. of the Young People's Magazine, edited by Seba Smith; also the February No. of the Literary Emporium—each ornamented with a well-chosen frontispiece, and filled with useful reading matter.

DEATH OF THE BISHOP OF JERUSALEM.—The Rev. Dr. Alexander, Episcopal Bishop of Jerusalem, died very suddenly on the 21st of November last, while on a journey from Jerusalem to Egypt. He was accompanied by his wife and daughter, but was not within reach of medical aid, when he sickened and died in his tent in the wilderness.

MISS JANE COOK, of Cheltenham, as we learn from the Baptist Guardian, has transferred to the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, the sum of £2,600 three per cent. consoles, for the purpose of enabling the Committee to complete the building of the church on Mount Zion. She has also transmitted to the Society's Episcopal Library at Jerusalem, a set of the works of the late Rev. C. Simeon.

REVIVAL.—Rev. O. B. Call has been holding a series of meetings in the town of Hartsville, Steuben Co., N. Y., where it is hoped a number have been brought to a saving knowledge of the truth, and many appear to be anxiously inquiring the way to Zion. The congregations are made up of persons attached to the First-day Baptist, Seventh-day Baptist, and Methodist Societies, all of whom seem united in this effort to promote the welfare of souls. H. P. B.

DISTRESSING ACCIDENT.—On the evening of January 28th, as the people of Hartsville, Steuben Co., N. Y., were returning from meeting, a yoke of young cattle took fright, and ran over an aged lady, dragging her under the sled for some distance, in spite of the combined efforts of the teamster and others to stop them. It is feared that the venerable old lady, who is nearly 80 years of age, can not survive. She had one limb badly broken, and her face much torn and bruised. She is the mother of Silas and Fitch Palmiter, of Hartsville. H. P. B.

FRUITS OF SLAVERY.—We are often told, that the frightful pictures which are published of the effects of southern slavery, are drawn either by northern men who are ignorant of the facts, or by southern men who design to misrepresent the facts. But we have seen nothing more frightful than the following description, which is taken from an official document of the Presbyterian Synod of Kentucky, and which ought therefore to be true:—

"This system licenses and produces great cruelty. Mangling, imprisonment, starvation, every species of torture, may be inflicted upon the slave, and he has no redress. There are now in our whole land two millions of human beings, exposed, defenceless, to every insult and every injury short of maiming or death, which their fellow men may choose to inflict. They suffer all that can be inflicted by wanton caprice, by grasping avarice, by brutal lust, by malignant spite, and by insane anger. Their happiness is the sport of every whim, and the prey of every passion that may, occasionally, or habitually, infest the master's bosom. If we could calculate the amount of woe endured by ill-treated slaves, it would overwhelm every compassionate heart—it would move even the obdurate to sympathy."

MORTALITY AMONG MISSIONARIES TO CHINA.—A letter from China gives the following account of deaths, within the last year and a half, among the female missionaries in China and the neighboring countries:—

"Mrs. Ball died in June, 1814; Mrs. Shuck, Nov. 1844; Mrs. Polham, Sept. 1845; Mrs. Fairbrother, Oct. 1845; and Mrs. Doty the same month. Mrs. Hobson returned home last September on account of illness, and Mrs. Hepburn waits the first opportunity. Three of these were at Hong Kong, three at Amoy, and one at Shanghai. Within the same time six or eight other female missionaries East of Ceylon have died, but I cannot give the exact dates. Dr. Legge leaves Hong Kong for England on account of his own ill-health, but of course takes his wife with him."

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The doings in Congress last week may be summed up in a few words.

The SENATE had under considerations, but did not dispose of, a bill for the augmentation of the Navy. The bill regulating the compensation of the principal officers of the customs was passed.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES was occupied all the week in discussing the resolutions about Oregon. It was finally determined that the debate on that subject should close on Monday, Feb. 9.

Recent Diplomatic Correspondence about Oregon.

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, the President transmitted to that body on Saturday last, the correspondence had, since the delivery of the Message, between our government and that of Great Britain relative to the Oregon question. The N. Y. Tribune's correspondent at Washington says the following is the substance of it:—

I. Mr. Buchanan writes to Mr McLane, our Minister to Great Britain, dated Dec. 13th, 1845, asking him to inquire into the object of the warlike preparations being made in England.

II. Mr. McLane replies, Jan. 3, 1846, stating that he had had an interview with Lord Aberdeen, who assured him that the warlike preparations were not made with reference to any difficulty with the United States. That England wished to be prepared for any emergency, though she cultivated the most friendly feelings toward the United States. He also stated that the preparations were exaggerated. Mr. McLane cannot but think, however, that the preparations are made with reference to the difficulties between England and the United States, to do the greatest possible harm in the shortest possible time to the United States in the event of a war.

III. Mr. Pakenham to Mr. Buchanan, Dec. 27, 1845, proposing Arbitration in the kindliest spirit towards the United States. The disputed territory was of little value to either nation, when compared with the blessings of peace.

IV. Mr. Buchanan to Mr. Pakenham, Jan. 3, 1846, declining the offer. Arbitration would concede that England had rights which he (Mr. B.) and the President had again and again denied.

V. Mr. Pakenham to Mr. Buchannan, Jan. 6, 1846, stating that he had forwarded Mr. B.'s note to his government.

VI. Mr. Pakenham to Mr. Buchanan, Jan. 16, 1846, renewing the offer for arbitration in a somewhat modified form, proposing a mixed commission with an umpire, if a Sovereign was not accepted; or a board of men distinguished for their virtues and wisdom might be appointed. He made this proposition to show how earnestly his Government desired Peace.

VII. Mr. Buchanan replies to Mr. Pakenham, Feb. 4, 1846, again declining the offer. The President feels unwilling to arbitrate about the Territorial rights of our country. This closes the correspondence.

NEW WIND POWER.—A machinist at Cabotville, Mass., has just erected a shop at that place, which is propelled by wind, in a somewhat novel manner. A large wheel, measuring 14 feet in diameter, furnished with wooden sails, or floats, is placed upon a perpendicular shaft, on each side of which, in a room below, is an invention similar to window-shutters, which when opened causes the wind to rush in, and rising sets the sails and wheel in motion, and produces a velocity equal to that of any water wheel.

NEW MODE OF FRESCO PAINTING.—A new and valuable method of fresco painting has been discovered in Germany. It is superior to all other methods of painting on plaster. It resists the effects of all changes of weather, and even of diluted acids. It is much more susceptible of beauty, richness, and power of color, and presents greater facilities for the artist. It forms with the ground on which it is laid, an impenetrable mass, resisting the force of the hammer, and of pointed instruments. The composition of this is not yet made public.

NEW MODE OF GENERATING STEAM.—A French engineer, M. Leonard, now in London, has discovered an exceedingly simple means of curtailing the quantity of coal hitherto required in the generation of steam. His principle, for which he has taken out a patent, is that of putting whale or other fish oil into the boiler, unmixed, or with more or less water. When the oil is at a temperature producing steam, water is thrown in, and steam is produced as fast as required by the machine, without the oil passing off in vapor or decomposing. Various experiments have been made, and the saving in fuel is stated at from forty to fifty per cent.

EEIGRATION TO TEXAS.—A letter from Galveston to the Union says:—"You cannot form an idea of the immense emigration to Texas. Besides the three fine sea-steamers plying weekly between Galveston and New Orleans, and the immense emigration by land from the United States, the harbor is filled with vessels from Europe, which come crowded with emigrants seeking a refuge on our hospitable shores from the grinding and unrequited labors to which they are subjected in Europe. Many of these emigrants—the great bulk of whom are Germans—bring with them a considerable supply of ready cash, and all of them from whom I have heard seem well satisfied with the change in their condition."

CANTON OF VAUD.—The French correspondent of the New York Observer, writes under date of the 4th of December last, "Important events are now transpiring in the Canton of Vaud. About 180 pastors, or ministers of the Gospel, have sent in their resignation to the Government. This secession is comparable to that which created the Free Church of Scotland, and is even more unanimous in some respects. The Canton of Vaud seems destined to act a distinguished part in the religious questions of the age."

BATTLE ON THE PARANA.—The Commercial Advertiser translates from a bulletin printed at Montevideo, a full account of the battle between the English and French forces on the one side, and the Argentine troops on the other, at the mouth of the river Parana, on the 20th of November last. It seems that the combat lasted from ten in the morning until seven in the evening, when the batteries were taken and the enemy put to flight with great loss.

The loss of the combined forces is as follows: Of the French, 18 killed, 70 wounded. Among the former is Lieut. Michaud, of the San Martin. Among the latter, Messrs. Hello, Vernex, Simoneau and Daniel. Of the English, 10 killed and 25 wounded; among the former two officers, Lieut. Brigdale of the Firebrand, and Andrews of the Dolphin.

Judging from the number of dead found in the batteries, and from the wagon-loads of wounded that were carried off during the day, the loss of the enemy must have been 600.

THE SILENT FAMILY.—The 'Journal des Debats' gives an account of a singular family residing at a mill between Beauvais and Formerie, who have made a vow never to answer the least question. If a bewildered traveler comes to inquire the way of them, he finds he had better have trusted to his own inspiration, for if he persists in his questions in the hope of obtaining an answer, they become angry, and seizing up sticks and tongs, threaten to attack him with them. It appears that this obstinacy in refusing to speak was caused by the orders of a village conjurer, who had abused their credulity with the promise of a future treasure. These unfortunate creatures have solemnly bound themselves to maintain silence for nine years. They have not yet fulfilled half their contract. The shepherd conjuror had been consulted by them respecting the annual fracture of the shaft of their mill, and he had promised, in consideration of a sum of money paid down, that the shaft should never break again. He forbade them the use of speech even in their family. This complete interdiction appearing a little rude to the wife and daughter, the conjurer allowed them, as a favor, not being able to destroy the effect of the agreement, to speak out of the bounds of the department in which they lived. Gournay being out of this department, and the nearest town in the adjoining one, every Friday a family may be seen there, who during eight days having been deprived of the use of their tongues, make active compensation for the loss, at the Gournay market.

ACCIDENT.—At North Adams, Mass., on Monday evening last, as we learn by the Pittsfield Sun, a large party of young people of both sexes, were amusing themselves in sliding down hill on a large sleigh, and several excursions were made without injury, when at the last descent, the vehicle became unmanageable—descended with great rapidity, and leaving the road came in contact with a tree, breaking in pieces the sleigh, and injuring 11 of 19 persons who were in it—7 of them severely. Two females, Miss Green and Miss McLellan, are reported to be so badly hurt as to leave little hope of recovery. The collar bone of the latter was broken, and the former sustained internal injuries. PROTESTANT MINISTERS IN ITALY.—It is stated that there are twenty-three Protestant ministers in Italy, who are earnstly engaged in the dissemination of Bible truth. Even in Rome, within the walls, there is an evangelical pastor, who, by virtue of a special treaty with the King of Prussia and the Pope, exercises the functions of the ministry in that city. All other Protestant ministers must go without the camp, and preach outside the walls.

SUMMARY.

Capt. Charles Robbins, master of the House of Correction at South Boston, Mass., has had the superintendance of that Institution since January 19, 1833, and from that time to December 31, 1844, he had under his charge seven thousand six hundred and eighty-six convicts, men, women, and boys, in a prison constructed and managed upon the Auburn plan, and during that time there was never a blow struck by himsef or any officer under his care, nor has there been from the last date to the present time.

Some cunning Yankee down East, has invented a new apparatus on which to hang out clothes to dry. On an upright post, which is made to turn, four long arms are fixed at right angles, and through there a cord is passed, at intervals of eighteen inches from the post to the extremity of the arms, much after the fashion of a spider's web. The careful housewife has nothing to do but to take her stand with her basket of wet clothes, and having filled up one of the angles, to turn the machine and repeat the process until the whole web is covered.

Mr. Samuel Fitch, the proprietor of an extensive whip manufactory, near Cooper's Point, Camden, N. J., has just shipped two large orders of riding and driving whips to England. The duty on foreign whips in England is 20 per cent, and after paying that duty, and the freight, the articles are sold considerably lower than those of English manufacture.

Smith's Paper Mill, at Greenville, Conn., where the splendid paper used by the Messrs. Harpers for their Bible is manufatcured, it is said, turns out in length about thirty miles of paper daily. It averages about twenty-four inches in width, and is of an excellent quality. Another mill of the same size is being erected near it by the same enterprising owner.

A fatal duel was fought near Washington on the 2d of February. It seems that Dr. Daniel Johnson and Thomas Jones, both of Elizabeth City, N. C., had a difficulty, the latter charging the former with dishonorable intimacy with his wife. They came on to Washington, with their seconds, to settle it, and met at Bladensburgh. Johnson, protesting his innocence, refused to fire, and was killed by his adversary. Jones and his second were taken prisoners.

Public executions—by decapitation in Canton and by hanging in Hong Kong—have attracted attention during this month; the first on account of their great numbers and frequency, and the latter from the short period, 90 1-2 hours, between the passing and the execution of the sentence, on two malefactors, one a Chinese and the other an Englishman. In Canton more than twenty persons, some of them women, were decapitated in one day. Here, on all ordinary occasions, the criminals are adjudged in the morning and then are led away to the potter's field, where they are decapitated the same day. [Chinese Repos. July.

The New-Jersey Anti-Slavery Society, at its late meeting in Trenton, passed a resolution avowing a determination to prosecute the appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court of that State, respecting the Constitutionality of Slavery in New-Jersey, in the Court of Errors. A Committee of twenty-five, from different parts of the State, was appointed to carry this determination into effect.

It is estimated that within the last six months, no less than twenty-six steamboats, all laden with valuable cargoes, have been lost in the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; and that, within the same time, the number of flatboats, laden with coal, lost between Pittsburg and this city, were ninety-eight; and the number of flatboats with stock and produce, at fifty-seven—many of them having cargoes worth $20,000. The loss of life, incident to these mishaps, who can tell!

The colored people of Boston have obtained a charter from England, and formed lately a Lodge called the "Bay State Lodge of the United Order of Odd Fellows."

Between the hours of 4 o'clock P. M. Wednesday, and 7 o'clock A. M. Thursday, there were no less than fifteen alarms of fire in Boston, most of which originated with incendiaries.

The Mayor of Boston has offered a reward of $2,000 for the detection of incendiaries in that city.

A boy has received two thousand dollars reward offered by the city of Boston for the detection of incendiaries.

The New-Haven Register says: "It is proposed to have the laws printed on India rubber paper, so that they can be stretched a bit, when a rich culprit is to be hauled over the coals."

The value of produce and merchandize passing through the Erie Canal last year, was upwards of forty-five millions of dollars.

It is important to all invalids to know that castor oil may be most easily taken mingled with orange juice, a little sugar being added to the juice, if the orange be not ripe and sweet. The difference between this and any other mode of taking this valuable medicine is surprising.

They have invented a new method of screening felons from Justice in Wisconsin Territory. A Sheriff lately started in pursuit of a person whom he was commissioned to arrest, but happening to lose his warrant by the way, he was arrested at the instance of the fugitive party, and absolutely committed. When last heard from he was about to procure a writ of habeas corpus.

The quantity of flour exported from Quebec to Great Britain during the past year, 1845, was 199,012 barrels, and of wheat about 239,804 bushels.

In the time of Augsutus, a pound of wool dyed in Tyrian purple, could not be had for less than the small sum of one hundred and forty dollars.

An interesting girl of 16, residing at St. Augustine, Florida, suddenly fell dead a short time since, while romping with some other young ladies.

A steamboat captain in New-Orleans, was fined fifty dollars for carrying a letter in violation of the Post Office law.

A professor of music was married in the jail of Lycoming county, Pa., last week. He was committed on a breach of promise, and married the lady for the purpose of getting out of jail, after which he absquatulated.

The rum and whisky party has at last achieved a victory in the Tennessee Legislature. The law of 1837, which prohibited the retail traffic in liquor, and which has stood unaltered through eight years, has at length been supplanted by an act which authorizes any person to retail who will pay a specified tax, give specified bonds, and specified oaths.

The ship Brooklyn sailed from New-York with nearly two hundred passengers, for Oregon. They are mostly farmers and mechanics, with a handsome compliment of women and children, from the New Englang States, and go out for the purpose of effecting a permanent settlement in that country.

Elder Knapp, the celebrated revivalist, has received and accepted a call to preach in the new Baptist church erected last summer in State-street, Albany.

There was a time in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when rum and brandy were sold by the ounce by apothecaries, as a medicine; and a teaspoonful was considered a dose by all the regular physicians.

Schlegel, in his "Philosophy of History," speaking of the Wall of China, says: "Such is the height and thickness of this stupendous fabric, that it has been calculated that its cubic contents exceed all the buildings in England and Scotland; or again, that the same material would serve to construct a wall of ordinary height and thickness round the whole earth.

No less than sixty-three persons died last summer in New-Orleans, from stroke of the sun.

The amount of tolls received at Albany during the season of 1845, was $340,669. The amount received at West Troy was £386,914.

The Memphis Enquirer states that the steamer "Belle Zane" had on board of her when she sunk, some weeks since, twenty-seven mail bags taken on board at Memphis, which we presume are lost for ever. How much money, what amount of drafts have been lost, and how many misfortunes and afflictions have been caused by the loss of these twenty-seven mail bags, no one can estimate.

Postscript.

On Monday, Feb. 9, the House of Representatives passed the resolutions giving notice of the cessation of the joint occupancy of Oregon, accompanied by a recommendation that the question be settled by negociations.

MARRIED,

In North Stonington, Ct., on the 29th ult., by Eld. Alexander Campbell, Mr. DAVID LANGWORTHY and Miss FANNY CLARKE, both of North Stonington.

DIED,

In Alfred, Allegany Co, N. Y., Jan. 17th, OSCAR D., son of Daniel M. and Sally A. Burdick, aged 7 years. He was not considered to be dangerously ill until about one hour previous to his death, when his suffering increased to such a degree that he thought he could not survive, and requested his mother not to weep for him.

In Hartsville, Steuben Co., N. Y., Jan. 11th, SALLY DAVIS, daughter of Samuel Davis deceased, aged 14 years. Few persons leave the world with such calmness and resignation. Her last words were, "Mother, weep not for me, but live religion." On the 3d inst. she attended public worship, and on the 12th inst. her friends were called to the same house to pay their last respects to her earthly remains.

In Preston, Chenango Co., N. Y., on the 19th of October, 1845, of typhus fever, DAVIS ROGERS, aged 68 years. Also, on the 8th of September, of typhus fever, his wife, POLLY ROGERS, aged 63 years. They both experienced religion when young, and moved from Connecticut to Preston, where they died. They were among the first settlers of this place, and became members of the Sabbath Baptist Church here at its organization, and continued so until its dissolution by the difficulties which it was called to encounter. When the present Church was organized, they united with it, and remained faithful members, devoted to the cause of Christ, until they left us to join the Church triumphant, which they did with more than humble submission, for they rejoiced at death as the door through which they were to enter into that city that hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God. As neighbors, they were respected by all; as parents, kind and affectionate; and as Christians, much beloved and esteemed. Their house was a common place of resort for old and young, and Christ was the subject of common conversation. They are missed at our meetings, as they were almost always there; and especially do we feel their loss at our prayer and conference meetings. Their experience reminds us of the language of the poet, embodying the promise of God:—

"Even down to old age, all my people shall prove,
Impartial, eternal, unchangeable love;
And when hoary hairs shall their temples adorn,
They still in my bosom like lambs shall be borne."

In Preston, Sept. 26th, of typhus fever, WILLIAM L. CLARKE, in the 43d year of his age. Brother Clarke experienced religion in early life, and was a member and valuable counselor of the Sabbath Baptist Church at Preston. As a husband, he was kind and affectionate; as a parent, indulgent. He enjoyed much of the presence of God in his last sickness, and endured his suffering with Christian fortitude and submission. A few days previous to his death, he wished to have some conversation with his son George, who was then sick of the same disease. After giving him some instructions relative to his family, he entreated him with much tenderness and affection, to seek an interest in the Saviour. On being informed by George that he had obtained a hope in Christ, he gave praise to God in the highest, and exclaimed, "Oh happy child! what a happy family we are." He has left a deeply-afflicted widow, and two children, with a large circle of relatives and friends to mourn their loss. His son GEORGE survived him only one week, and died in the 17th year of his age, much respected and beloved, giving good evidence that he was a child of God, and an heir of heaven. Truly we may say, "All flesh is as the grass that withereth, as the flower that fadeth, and as the fleeting shadow on the cloud, that passeth away."

In Preston, October 27th, at the residence of Dea. Clarke Rogers, of typhus fever, ALMIRA CLARKE, in the 18th year of her age, daughter of widow Nancy Clarke, of Friendship, Allegany Co., N. Y. This young sister possessed an amiable disposition, and many endearing qualities. At the age of eleven years, she experienced religion, and united with the Sabbath Baptist Church of Preston, where she remained an active and exemplary member until her death. Her attachment to friends was ardent and sincere, and in turn she was greatly beloved by them. She was ever a dutiful child and affectionate sister, and her death is much lamented by all who knew her. In her last sickness, though extremely painful, she was enabled by faith to hold communion with God, and sing praise to his name, giving full evidence that "precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." We deeply sympathize with her afflicted mother and mourning friends.

In Rochester, N. Y., on the 22d ult., ELIZA A. ARNOLD, wife of Wm. E. Arnold, aged 35 years.

The friends of Mrs. A. are called to mourn an irreparable loss in the circle of very dear friends—a woman whose moral worth had few equals; whose character and friendship was of such high order as never to suffer differences of opinion to prevent the reciprocation of the nobler sentiments of our being. Her life was worthy of example—her end was peace. [Rochester paper.

EXECUTOR'S SALE.

WILL be sold at public vendue, on Tuesday, the 17th of February, at 1 o'clock P. M., on the premises, the Residence late of Jonathan R. Dunham, deceased, containing about 10 acres of excellent land, with a large and convenient Dwelling House and Barn; also a Tan Yard, Bark House, Shoemaker's and Currier's Shop, together with a Carriage House, and other out-buildings, and a good variety of fruit trees. It is situated on the main road from Plainfield to Bound Brook, about 2½ miles from the former and 3½ from the latter place, and about ¼ of a mile from the New Market Depot on the Elizabethtown and Somerville Railroad, from which place the cars make three trips to New-York daily. It would make a pleasant country residence for any gentleman wishing to live in the country and do business in the city; or an excellent Tannery, it being in the immediate vicinity of sufficient quantity of the best of bark, a stream of water runs through the premises, and the Water-Pit in said yard contains a living Spring of excellent water, which is said to make the best of Leather. Terms of payment made easy.

Also, a small Dwelling House and seven acres of good land adjoining the before described property.

Also, a small Dwelling House and Garden, adjoining the first mentioned property.

For a further description of the said premises, application may be made to Mrs. Dunham, on the premises, or to
RANDOLPH DUNHAM, Plainfield, or
DAVID DUNN, New Market, Executors.

N. B.—All the described properties are offered at private sale until the day of sale, and if any are sold notice will be given.

Miscellaneous.

THE YOUNG WANDERER.

BY G. W. PATTEN, U. S. ARMY.

Thou hast pass'd from my heart like the dew from the spray,
Like the bloom from the bud—like the light from the day,
Oh! sad is the gloom which thy memories leave,
As the cloud that hangs dark on the brow of the eve:
The gleam has gone out from the depth of those eyes,
Like a star that has set never more to arise;
And the ray of fond hope which so glisten'd in mind—
It is quench'd, oh! Aleida, departed with thine.

Aleida! Aleida! stray lamb of the fold!
There's a tale of the fleece which should ne'er have been told:
There's a heart-thrilling story of passion and thee,
Which Echo, deep blushing, hath murmur'd to me.
By the snow of that hand which I've trembled to touch,
By the rose of that cheek which I've lauded so much,
By the blue of that eye, and thy lips' happy tone—
Aleida! Aleida! come back to thine own!

Come back to the home of thy innocent mirth,
Where thy mother sits sad by the desolate hearth,
And thy silver-hair'd father the winter eve long
Impatiently yearns for thy accents of song:
Return, thou estrang'd one, once more with thy smile,
And thy rosy-cheek'd brother shall greet thee the while!
Come back to thy sister—she cannot forget—
She loves her Aleida—she worships her yet.

Aleida!—thou mother—yet never a bride!
I speak not to chide thee—'t were idle to chide;
Do I weep? 'tis not weakness—I fain would refrain—
But the fountain is full with the tear-drops of pain!
And my lute, as I mingle thy name with its tone,
Breathes a sound through my chamber that's mournful and lone;
Oh God, how I lov'd thee, tongue never may tell!
Aleida! Aleida! farewell!—fare thee well!

Oswego, Jan. 12, 1846.

Conference on Christian Union,

Held in Liverpool, on Wednesday the first of October, 1845, and subsequent days.

"Fifty years have just transpired, since the day on which there assembled in London a goodly company of evangelical Christians of several denominations, to form "The Missionary Society." These brethren did not come together simply for the sake of Christian Union; but that being united, they might advance the knowledge of Christ in the world: and they did not meet in vain.

"Their united prayers and counsels, their abounding zeal, liberality, and affection, produced upon the minds of myriads the happiest results; and unquestionably that meeting may be regarded as an epoch in the history of evangelical religion in our native land, and throughout the world.

"The first session of the Conference was held at noon on Wednesday, October 1st, in the theatre of the Medical Institution, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool, and there were assembled about two hundred ministers and other gentlemen, connected with no less than seventeen different denominations.

"John Henderson, Esq., of Glasgow, moved, and Sir Culling Eardly Smith, Bart., seconded, that the Rev. John Angel James, of Birmingham, be requested to take the chair. Mr. James addressed the Conference in a very subdued and happy manner, and called upon the brethren to give themselves to united and continued devotions.

"The arrangements for this part of the proceedings were admirable. The forms of praise were selected from the old version, and the hymns of Watts and Wesley; whilst the prayers were offered up to God, by the Rev. E. Bickersteth, (Episcopalian,) Dr. Symington, (Reformed Presbyterian,) Dr. Newton, (Wesleyan Methodist,) and Dr. Smyth, (Free Church.) It was truly remarked by Dr. Leifchild, both as to these and subsequent exercises of devotion, that in no instance could it be inferred from the tone, manner, or expression, of the respective supplicants, to what particular sections of the Christian Church they belonged. Never were we present at such a season of devotion. The abundant confessions, the solemn, earnest intercessions, and the joyful thanksgivings, produced a tender, melting effect on most persons present. It was indeed a Bochim, a place of weeping, and many realized, in all its fullness, "the joy of grief."

"The Rev. John Jordan, M.A., vicar of Enstone, Oxfordshire, then moved, and the Rev. J. Blackburn of London seconded:—"That the subject of Christian union, practically considered, be taken into discussion at the evening sitting of the Conference," which was carried.

"The appointment of Secretaries was then considered, and the Rev. A. S. Thelwall, (Episcopalian,) Rev. W. Chalmers, (Presbyterian,) Rev. G. Osborn, (Wesleyan,) Rev. W. Bevan, (Independent,) and Dr. Steane, (Baptist,) were requested to act as the scribes of the assembly. This arrangement closed the first session.

"The SECOND SESSION commenced at 5 o'clock P. M., when Dr. Raffles was called to the chair, and the Rev. R. W. Kyle of Dublin, prayed.

"Before the Conference proceeded to the subject of the evening, it was felt that special prayer should be offered for Divine aid, and the Hon. and Rev. Baptist W. Noel led the devotions of the Assembly. The discussion of the subject of Christian union was then opened by Dr. Leifchild, and followed by Dr. Young, Perth; Mr. James, Birmingham; Dr. Wardlaw, Glasgow; Mr. Kirkpatrick, Dublin; Mr. Bickersteth, Watton; Mr. Blackburn, Pentonville; Mr. Thelwall, London; Mr. Russell, Greenwich; and Dr. Vaughan, Manchester.

"In the course of the evening, Mr. Bickersteth made some most Christian concessions respecting the deportment which had been manifested towards dissenting brethren by members of the Church of England. He was immediately followed by Mr. Blankburn, who fully responded to the admissions of Mr. Bickersteth, as to the conduct of Dissenters towards their brethren of the Church, and entreated that a resolution might be passed recording the judgment of the Conference respecting the temper in which religious journals ought to be conducted.

"On Thursday morning, the THIRD SESSION assembled, when the Rev. Edward Bickersteth was called to the chair, and Dr. Cox, of Hackney, led the devotions of the meeting. Mr. James Hamilton of London, renewed the discussion, and was followed by Mr. Jordan, Enstone; Dr. Cox, Hackney; Dr. John Brown, Edinburgh; Mr. Kyle, Dublin: Mr. Begg, Edinburgh; Sir C. E. Smith; Mr. A. Wells, London; Mr. James, Birmingham; Dr. Henry Letterkenny; Dr. Newton, Manchester; Dr. Candlish, Edinburgh; Mr. Sherman, London.

"This session was characterized by the manly, yet tender and Christian address of Dr. Cox, who claimed entire freedom of sentiment and action, or, in other words, union without compromise. Dr. J. Brown, of Edinburgh, having sustained this sentiment, it was met in a most generous spirit by Mr. Baptist Noel, who, in an elaborate and very eloquent speech, discussed that and other points, and succeeded in dissipating the suspicions of many minds on that delicate topic.

"A large committee was then appointed to prepare the business for the future sessions of the Conference; and, to afford it time the meeting adjourned till half-past seven, P. M.

"The FOURTH SESSION met at the appointed hour, when Dr. Newton was called to preside, and Mr. Wallace, of Londonderry, engaged in prayer.

"Dr. Candlish brought up the first report from the committee, suggesting that a future meeting shall be convened for the promotion of Christian union, and containing those doctrines which must be held and maintained by those who shall be invited thereto.

"When the resolution was put, it was carried unanimously, and Dr. Raffles proposed that an immediate thanksgiving be offered to Almighty God, for the unanimity with which the report had been received and adopted. The Doxology was then sung with unusual emotion and delight. Dr. Leifchild having congratulated the Conference upon their happy union of sentiment, some routine business was forwarded, and the meeting adjourned.

"The FIFTH SESSION commenced on Friday morning, at ten o'clock. The Rev. William Innes, of Edinburgh, was chosen to preside, and the Rev. J. Blackburn engaged in prayer.

"The farther reports of the Committee were brought up and adopted; but as we wish to present the series of the resolutions entire at the close of this narrative, those that were adopted at this sitting are deferred. Letters of apology, for unavoidable absence, were presented to the meeting from the Rev. Jacob Stanley, President of the Wesleyan Conference, Rev. Dr. Bunting, Rev. D. T. K. Drummond, Rev. Dr. Alexander Hill, Moderator of the Church of Scotland, Rev. Carr John Glynn, and Sir Andrew Agnew.

"The SIXTH AND CONCLUDING SESSION, was held on Friday evening, October, 3d, when Dr. John Brown, of Edinburgh was called to the chair, and the Rev. Dr. Massie, of Manchester, prayed. The series of general resolutions was continued, and finally adopted. On moving and seconding the resolution numbered III., Messrs. Bickersteth and Blackburn renewed the observations of a previous meeting respecting a better spirit in controversy, and on the necessity of mortifying the tendency which disputants feel to outstrip the limits of kindness and charity. This motion was sustained by the Rev. Dr. Cunningham, who frankly confessed the faults of which he too had been guilty in controversy, and expressed a similar resolution with Mr. Blackburn: and then turning to an old antagonist, who was in the chair, he added, "It gives me peculiar satisfaction to say this, sir, on the present occasion, and especially when I have the pleasure of addressing yourself, Dr. Brown, as the chairman of our assembly." The effect of this graceful allusion to former feuds was quite electrical. Dr. Brown, though in the chair, claimed permission to reply. He said, notwithstanding their differences he had always respected and loved Dr. Cunningham, but now he should respect and love him more than ever!

"Thus, in answer to prayer, were old wounds bound up, former jealousies and resentments were overcome, and the misgivings and the fears of many were acknowledged to be the offspring of unbelief. After the first day's sittings, all marks of denominational separation were obliterated, and mutual confidence and affection were displayed. Surely never did strangers so soon appear to be at home and at ease with each other; they felt their relationship as members of the "household of faith," and "perfect love cast out fear," from every bosom. We believe that this conference will never be forgotten by those who were privileged to experience its solemn, sacred influence; and we doubt not but its members received a baptism of the Spirit which will fit them to carry forward that most necessary and blessed work to which they have pledged themselves.

"The solemn and delightful meetings were then closed by singing the favorite hymn of Cennick's, "Bless'd be the dear uniting love," &c., and the venerable Dr. Brown pronounced the benediction."

RESOLUTIONS, ETC.

"'I. That the Conference now assembled on the important subject of extended Christian union, after lengthened engagements of devotion and discussion, in which the happiest tokens of the Divine favor have been sensibly experienced, offer to the brethren in Scotland, by whom they were invited to assemble, most cordial thanks and congratulations.'

"'II. That, as the Conference rejoice in the substantial agreement which exists among the people of God, so they are deeply impressed with a sense of the importance of exhibiting and carrying out that agreement; believing, as they do, that the alienation of Christians from one another on account of lesser differences, has been one of the greatest evils in the church of Christ, and one main hindrance to the progress of the Gospel; and that the aspect of affairs in a religious view, both at home and abroad, is such as to present the strongest motive to union and co-operation.'

"'III. That this meeting desires to express its humiliation before God and his church, for all the divisions of the Christian church, and especially for every thing which we ourselves may have aforetime spoken, in theological and ecclesiastical discussions, contrary to speaking the truth in love; and would earnestly and affectionately recommend to each other, in our own conduct, and particularly in our use of the press, carefully to abstain from, and to put away, all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil speaking, with all malice; and in things in which we may yet differ from each other, still to seek to be kind, tender-hearted, forbearing one another in love, forgiving one another even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven us; in every thing seeking to be followers of God as dear children, and to walk in love, as Christ also has loved us.'

"'IV. That, as the Christian union, which this Conference desires to promote, can only be attained through the blessed energy of the Holy Spirit, the Conference unanimously recommends the members present, and absent brethren, to make this matter the subject of simultaneous weekly petition at the throne of grace, in their closets and families; and suggests the forenoon of Monday as the time for that purpose.'

"'V. That the Conference records with delight, and heartfelt thanksgiving to God, that, after the most frank and unreserved expression of their sentiments, by brethren of various denominations present, there has been found, not only a general and warm desire for extended Christian union, but ample ground of common truth, on a cordial belief in which the assembled brethren could themselves unite, for many important objects, and also invite the adhesion af all evangelical Christians; so that, cheered by these auspicious commencements, the Conference would go forward with its great object, depending on continued help from the Divine Head of the church; and now determines that a more extensive meeting shall be convened in London, in the summer of next year, to which Christians from various parts of the world shall be invited.'

"'VI. That the Conference, postponing the preparation of a full and formal document on the subject, deem it sufficient for the present, to intimate that the parties who shall be invited to the future meeting, shall be such persons as hold and maintain what are usually understood to be evangelical views in regard to such important matters of doctrine as the following, namely:

"'1. The Divine inspiration, authority and sufficiency of the Holy Scripture.

"'2. The unity of the Godhead and the Trinity of persons therein.

"'3. The utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the fall.

"'4. The incarnation of the Son of God, and his work of atonement for sinners of mankind.

"'5. The justification of the sinner by faith alone.

"'6. The work of the Holy Spirit in the conversion and sanctification of the sinner.

"'7. The right and the duty of private judgment in the interpretation of Holy Scripture.

"'8. The divine institution of the Christian ministry, and the authority and perpetuity of the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.'

"'VII. That it be recommended to the future meeting, in connexion with the promotion of Christian union, that they form an institution, whose name shall be THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

"'VIII. That in the prosecution of the present attempt, the Conference are clearly and unanimously of opinion, that no compromise of their own views, or sanction of those of others, on the points on which they differ, ought to be either required or expected on the part of any one who concurs in it; but that all should be held, as free as before, to maintain and advocate their views, with all due forbearance and brotherly love. Farther, that any union or alliance to be formed, should be understood to be an alliance of individual Christians, and not of denominations or branches of the Church; and the design of this alliance shall be to exhibit, as far as practicable, the essential unity of the church of Christ, and at the same time, to cherish and manifest, in its various branches, the spirit of brotherly love—to open and maintain, by correspondence and otherwise, fraternal intercourse between all parts of the Christian world,—and, by the press, and by such scriptural means, as in the progress of this alliance may be deemed expedient, to resist not only the efforts of Popery, but every form of superstition and infidelity, and to promote our common Protestant faith in our own and other countries.

"'IX. That the practical suggestions which have been made in the course of the meeting of the Conference be remitted to the committee, with special instructions to take them into their deliberate consideration, particularly at the aggregate meetings appointed to be held in January and April, and mature them, as far as practicable, and report upon them to the meeting to be held in June.

"'X. That, in the judgment of this Conference, one of the most important objects which the contemplated alliance ought to have in view, is, the promotion of sound views on the subject of the sanctity of the Lord's day, as well as the better practical observance of that day, and the removal of hindrances and obstacles to its observance.

"'XI. That a provisional committee, in four divisions, be appointed from among the members present at this Conference. The first division to sit in London, with power to act for foreign countries, and for the Midland and Southern counties of England; second to sit in Liverpool, with power to act for the Northern counties, and Wales; the third to sit in Glasgow, and act for Scotland; the fourth in Dublin, with power to act for Ireland.

"'That this committee have power to add to its members, from among those Christian friends who may, from time to time, signify their adhesion to the objects of the present Conference, and their readiness to join the proposed alliance.

"'That it be an instruction to the committee to hold an aggregate meeting of the four divisions in Liverpool, in the month of January, and at Birmingham in the month of April, next ensuing; and that the aggregate meetings be authorized and empowered to make all necessary arrangements and intimations connected with the proposed meeting in London, in June, 1846.

"'That the London division of the committee shall have power to convene an aggregate meeting at their discretion.

"'That the several divisions of the committee shall interchange their minutes after each meeting.

"'That it shall be an instruction to the provisional committee to use their best efforts, by holding meetings, and by all other suitable means, to awaken attention to the subject of Christian union; to explain the objects, and, as far as possible, to diffuse the spirit of the present Conference in their several localities.

"'That this committee have power to originate local committees on the same principle.'

"The London section of the general committee have already assembled, and are taking vigorous preparatory steps, in order to a complete organization. An association, of which it is probable that R. C. L. Bevan, Esq., will be treasurer; Sir Culling Eardly Smith, chairman; and the Rev. Edward Bickersteth, Rev. James Hamilton, the Rev. Drs. Bunting, Leifchild, and Sterne, the secretaries, cannot fail, with the Divine blessing on its object, to succeed. Let it share in the prayers of the churches!"

THE MOTHER AT PRAYER.

She enters her chamber. All is quiet and retired. There is no eye to witness her deep emotions, but that of God; no ear to hear her earnest pleadings, but that of the Almighty. A sweet and sacred solemnity prevades her soul. She feels that she is about to commune with a Being who holds her destiny in his hands, but who, notwithstanding his power and might, encouraged her to come, and will condescend and even delight to listen to her prayer. She bows her knee before him, and lifts her imploring eyes to heaven. Oh, hallowed moment! Oh, interesting sight! Listen to the language of her heart. For what does she plead? It is for her dear children. What does she ask for them? Not the riches of earth, nor the plaudits of surrounding admirers, nor the external gracefulness and beauty of youth. These are, in her estimation, of little value. Instead of these, she asks for her dear ones the protecting care of God, and for strength to discharge her duty towards them. With what anxious solicitude is each one remembered before him, from the absent son on the boisterous ocean, to the unconscious babe of her bosom. She asks, that from the earliest lispings of infancy, the best tribute of their hearts may ascend to their Creator. With what increased earnestness does she plead, as the recollection of the many snares and temptations which they must encounter, crosses her anxious mind. It is then she feels her own weakness, and her entire dependence upon God. It is then she sees her need of Divine assistance and support, and the vast importance of maternal prayer. It is then she fervently exclaims, "Of myself I can do nothing; Oh, thou who holdest the hearts of my children in thy hand, I bless thee for this resource." I know that the mother's prayer of faith will avail much. When the season of prayer is over, she leaves her chamber with a spirit refreshed and invigorated; with a mind untroubled. She has left all in the hand of God. The serenity of her soul is visible in her countenance. It sweetens every duty, and influences all her conduct. Praying mother, surely thou art blest.

THE GOLDEN CHAIN.

A mother's love is a golden chain, which nature binds round the hearts of her children, although the enemies of God, and fastens to his throne. When, in the fury and madness of "wild nature's vigor," they strive to tear away from that throne, this chain limits their wanderings. They may hate the cross—the love of Christ may not constrain them, but a mother's love, a mother's prayers, they can never forget, can never cease to feel. It may not, it cannot, finally save them, but while in life, it holds them often from final apostacy, and keeps them within the reach of mercy. Blessed influence of a pious mother! Who, that has felt it, does not also feel that the greatest blessing here, short of sealing grace, is the presence and recollection of a mother's counsels and a mother's prayers? Would that every mother of our land were holy, and that every child of such a mother could realize the blessing and improve it!

SIGNS.

Solomon said, many centuries ago: "Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure and whether it be right."

Some people seem to think that children have no character at all. On the contrary, an observing eye sees in these young creatures the signs of what they are likely to be for life.

When I see a little boy slow to go to school and glad of every excuse to neglect his book, I think it a sign that he will be a dunce.

When I see a boy in haste to spend every penny as soon as he gets it, I think it a sign that he will be a spendthrift.

When I see a boy hoarding up his pennies, and unwilling to part with them for any good purpose, I think it a sign that he will be a miser.

When I see a boy or girl always looking out for themselves, and dislike to share good things with others, I think it a sign that the child will grow up a very selfish person.

When I see boys and girls often quarrelling, I think it a sign that they will be violent and hateful men and women.

When I see a little boy willing to take strong drink, I think it a sign that he will be a drunkard.

When I see a boy who never prays, I think it a sign that he will be a profane and profligate man.

When I see a child obedient to its parents, I think it a sign of great future blessings from Almighty God.

When I see a boy fond of the Bible, and well acquainted with it, I think it a sign that he will be a pious and happy man.

And though great changes sometimes take place in the character, yet, as a general rule, these signs do not fail.

HOW TO WRITE FOR NEWSPAPERS.

I. Have something to write about.

II. Write plain; dot your i's; cross your t's; point your sentences; begin them with capitals.

III. Write short; to the point; stop when you are done.

IV. Write only on one side of the leaf.

V. Read it over, abridge and correct it, until you get it into the smallest possible compass.

VI. Pay the postage.

These rules observed, will almost ensure the publication of an article, and what is more desirable to the writer will secure its being read.

FILIAL LOVE.

Filial love should be cherished. It has, especially, a softening and ennobling effect on the masculine heart. It has been remarked that almost all illustrious men have been distinguished by love for their mother. It is mentioned by Miss Pardoe, that a "beautiful feature in the character of the Turks, is reverence for their mother.—Their wives may advise or reprimand unheeded, but their mother is an oracle, consulted, confided in, listened to with respect and deference, honored to the latest hour, and remembered with affection even beyond the grave." "Wives may die," say they, "and we can replace them; children perish, and others may be born to us; but who shall restore the mother when she passeth away and is seen no more?"

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also, to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition. per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION THE OFFSPRING OF INTOLERANT PRINCIPLES—NO. 7.

Among the strange anomalies which are often produced by the jarring elements of this world, there is one which is but little understood, even by those who are the subjects of it. It is, that apparent virtues, when resting upon false foundations, often produce their opposites. We have frequently observed, that men the most obsequiously submissive to official dignitaries, are the most intolerant tyrants when in power. Not unfrequently, indeed, they exhibit both these characters at the same time. The man who kisses the Pope's great-toe, is the man to require his own subordinates to lick the back of his hand. The craven-souled Bashaw, who crept on his hands and knees to the foot of the Sultan's throne, when he begged the government of a petty province, seeks to extinguish every spark of independence in the subjects of his acquired domain. It is so with the pigmy officials under more liberal governments. Having crept into office by echoing the gasconade of their leaders, they have no sympathy with the manly spirit of their fellow citizens who are disposed to scan by just principles the measures of the dominant party. Let a man avow his independent sentiments, and if they are not endorsed by the pompous masters of the times, there are certain little souls who instantly set all the dogs they have within call to bark the ban of their party. These ignoble men have usually the narrowest conceptions of the just merits of all important matters, very limited ideas of the boundaries of right and wrong, and all their thoughts of truth, of men, and of things, are clouded by a selfishness that prevents their seeing the bearing of any measure beyond the shadow of their own persons. Hence they have no magnanimous principles by which to estimate their own deficiencies, or the just deserts of others. They are commonly slaves to party leaders, or to their own tempers or fears. It is barely possible that a man of this stamp may be a tolerant man, through a naturally humane disposition; but with a petulant or unkind temper, he is sure to be a tyrant where he has the power, if his prejudices are assailed.

In no department of human action is this principle more strikingly displayed than in reference to the subject of religion. For years past, we have observed that it often happens, that persons and sects the loudest in vociferating their professions of liberality, are the most intolerant in practice; and in reflecting upon the facts of history, we find the same things exhibited; so that we conclude there is some general law in the human mind by which these things are governed. We now propose to select a few illustrative facts bearing upon the subject which has called up these thoughts, and then endeavor to account for this seemingly strange anomaly.

In a former number of this series, we have mentioned Constantine the Great as the first author of Sunday laws, A. D. 321. Constantine fought his way to the throne in conjunction with Lucinus. At that time, the Christians in the empire were just escaping from a cruel heathen persecution; and to appease the heathen, and make friends of the Christian party, these co-emperors within two years published two edicts in favor of religious liberty, in which occur the following very liberal provisions:—

"As we long since perceived that religious liberty should not be denied, but that it should be granted to the opinion and wishes of each one to perform divine duties according to his determination, we have given orders, that each one, and the Christians among the rest, have liberty to observe the religion of his choice, and his peculiar mode of worship." . . . . . "I Constantine Augustus, and I Lucinus Augustus, came under favorable auspices to Milan, and took under consideration all affairs that pertain to public benefit and welfare; these things, among the rest, appeared to us to be most advantageous and profitable to all. We have resolved, among the first things, to ordain those matters by which reverence and worship to the Deity might be exhibited; that is, how we may grant likewise to the Christians, and to all, the free choice to follow that mode of worship which they may wish; that whatsoever divinity and celestial power may exist, may be propitious to us and to all that live under our government. Therefore we have decreed the following ordinance as our will, with a salutary and most correct intention that no freedom at all shall be refused to Christians to follow or to keep their observances or worship, but to each one power be granted to devote his mind to that worship which he may think best adapted to himself—that the Deity may in all things exhibit to us his accustomed favor and kindness." Eusebius, book x. chap. v.

At this time Constantine had not professed himself a Christian. The edict itself plainly enough tells the object of his ordinance establishing religious liberty. It was that "whatsoever divinity may exist may be propitious to us"—"that the Deity may in all things exhibit to us his accustomed favor and kindness"—by which they had fought their way to the throne of the empire. In 315, Lucinus, hearkening, it is said, to pagan hierarchists, attempted to take the empire to himself. The necessary consequence of this movement was to make Constantine decide for the Christian party, and thus attach the Christian party to himself. From this time onward, wherever he extended his arms, the Christians enjoyed full protection from their heathen adversaries But being once firmly seated upon the throne of the empire, the patron of the church, he who in 312 granted "to all the free choice to follow that mode of worship which they may wish," immediately "set himself to extirpate heathenism by pulling down their temples, destroying their idols, and banishing or killing their more obstinate priests." After this he set himself to compel uniformity in the faith and observances of his Christian subjects; and being an intolerant persecutor of the Jews, made a law in 321, which said that it was a shame to a Christian to hold any religious observance in common with the nation who had crucified our common Saviour, proclaimed the Sabbath abrogated, and commanded all men henceforth to observe Sunday. Thus from an apparantly liberal patron, he became a bigoted and intolerant tyrant.

The next instance to which we shall advert, is the treatment of Sabbath-keepers in England during the dynasty of the Stuarts. This line of monarchs continued from 1603 to 1714. James the First published the "Book of Sports" to assist the recreations of his subjects on Sundays; and Charles the Second ordered it to be read in the churches at the close of divine worship. Judging from these circumstances alone, one would think that they must have been the most tolerant rulers respecting Sunday-keeping that ever lived. But what are the facts? Sabbath-keepers never were more cruelly persecuted and harrassed than under the reign of these monarchs. Some were amerced of all they possessed; some imprisoned until death; and others publicly executed and quartered, and their parts indecently exposed in the most public places of the city of London. Much as they despised the puritanical notion of a holy Sunday, no man could hold office under their crowns, who did not statedly take the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England; and any citizen who absented himself from the established Church for a given period was subject to heavy fines. Verily there is a point on this rounnd earth where extremes do meet.

Every man professing liberality at this day, reprobates the bigotry and intolerance of the Stuarts. Yet, if we mistake not, something analogous to this exists among those who are called liberal men of the present day. We have been told within a few days, that the Sabbath never existed until given to Israel in the wilderness; consequently it passed away with Judaism at the introduction of the Gospel! Yet the persons who say this thing, would not even sign a petition to the Legislature to liberate Seventh-day Baptists from the restrictions of the Sunday laws; and would be very sorry if the statutes should be so amended as to allow them peaceably to pursue their lawful occupations on that day without restriction! Verily may it be said, "consistency is a jewel."

These instances are sufficient for our purpose. They show that the anomaly exists; and that so far as these instances are concerned, the Sunday laws are the offspring of intolerance. It is obvious that Constantine could have no conscientiousness upon the subject of Sunday observance; for he did not pretend to have divine law upon the subject; nay, he set himself against divine law from mere spite to the Jews. And to talk of conscientiousness in a Stuart, is like talking of pity in a crocodile. Many of our friends who observe Sunday can have no very tender consciences upon the subject of the DAY, for they tell us, that if they lived in a community where nearly all observed the seventh day, they should think it right for them to do so too. It is evident, therefore, that the DAY is not holy in their eyes. It is the custom of society that they respect. When, therefore, they say to us, "As you are the minority, and a very small minority, we think you should be willing to submit to your inconveniences in deference to the majority,"—what is it but intolerance that dictates such sage advice?

We are now to account for this seemingly strange anomaly, viz. that men of apparently liberal sentiments should indulge an intolerant spirit. Intolerance is an unwillingness to allow others to think and act for themselves. It has sometimes been the consequence of mistaken conscientiousness. This was the case with Saul of Tarsus, who verily thought he did God service by persecuting the Nazarenes. It is more commonly the consequence of a want of conscientionsness—a bigotry that supplies the place of principle. This excites our contempt; that our pity. We are not without hope that an erring mind, guided by principle, may discover the right and do it; but a mind that usually flexates to custom or carnal interest, we regard as lost to manly thought and holy independence. As men are sometimes tolerant or intolerent according to their respective tempers, so men are sometimes apparently liberal or illiberal in their sentiments according to their conscientiousness. A conscientious man is more likely to be liberal in his sentiments toward others, than one who has little or no conscientiousness upon the subject in question. When a man entertains liberal sentiments because he has little or no conscientiousness upon a given subject, he can attach but little importance to the thing itself; yet he may clearly see its relative importance to some other subject in which his interests or prepossessions are involved; and then it is that he feels little or no respect for the scruples of other people where he has none of his own. If this were not so, we should expect to find certain communities of Christians among the most tolerant in the world, who are now, and have long been, thoroughly intolerant. Claiming a right to alter, omit, make and unmake religious observances, it might be expected that they would respect the honest differences in human judgement about these things; but having no scruples about believing and practicing themselves what they have no valid authority for, they cannot see any reason why other people should not do the same; and hence, where convenience makes uniformity very desirable, they judge it right to compel people to do as they do, even if they do not believe as they do. This is the real principle on which the Seventh-day Baptists are compelled to pay an unwilling respect to Sunday. But a man whose own conscience is tender, and whose sense of religious obligation is deep-felt and sincere, will be far more disposed to respect the conscience of another, and to avoid inducements to make men insincere in their professions. His own faith being founded on genuine conviction, he will seek for the genuine conviction of others, and not their forced conformity. Doing all that he does with a single regard to His will who searches the heart and tries the reins of men, he will remember that all religious homage, to be acceptable in His sight, must come from the heart. He will, therefore, be averse to compelling men to do what they neither believe to be right, nor can respect, although they regard both God and man. A considerate, conscientious man, will remember, that the highest truth would be a lie in the lips of him who should profess it without believing it to be true; and that the holiest rite, when performed by him who does not reverence it, is but mockery to Him who trieth the heart. A man who really loves a religious ordinance for its own sake, or because it gives glory to Christ or Jehovah, will tremble at the thought of compelling another to observe it whom he knows despises it on the very account that it is forced upon him against his convictions. His is the homage of the heart, and it is such only that he values in others. How then can a good man seek to compel an unwilling and unbelieving homage to the observance of Sunday? On the same principle that a formal hierarchist compels all within his domain to conform to every other religious observance instituted by his church. He supposes there is a political convenience in uniformity, that is, in his esteem, every way superior to the rights of conscience. It is no hardship for him to conform; why should it be to other folks? He fancies himself a liberal-minded man, because he is not bound up in the same narrow creed as some other folks; and wonders at the superstition and obstinacy of those people who make so much ado about that which appears to him of so little consequence!

From facts, then, we are impelled to the conclusion, that a man may be apparently liberal from a native goodness of temper, and from a want of conscientiousness on any given subject. Such may become illiberal, according to a law of the human mind by which, when it is not under the supreme control of higher and conscientious motives, it turns upon its own selfishness. When this is called into action by affecting its apparent interests, or shocking its prejudices, a professing Christian can be as exclusive as a Mantchon, as bigoted as a Musselman, and as intolerant as the great Mogul. To legislate in favor of a cause supported by such principles, is like feeding a hyena for the public good. It may be harmless while in confinement, but it is certainly murderous when left to the natural impulses of its own instincts. The only effectual remedy for such a distempered mind, is to turn and yield a supreme regard to the law of God.

MODEL OF A COUNTRY PASTOR.—Brother Massey is exerting a good influence in this region of country. He comes up very nearly to my model of a country pastor. He cultivates no land—teaches no school—engages in no merchandize—is economical in his habits—out of debt—rents a house and lot at a moderate price, and dedicates his whole time to the ministry. His definition of a preacher is one that preaches. He has made up his mind to remain poor, and to confide in the justice of the churches to furnish him with food and raiment. If God allows him to suffer, it will be an anomaly in his kingdom. This course of conduct will give the people more and better instruction—it will give them more attachment to him, and thus augment his influence over them for good. It will make him a man of more reading and of more interest in the general cause. Already he gives evidence of a maturity of theological views which is a pledge of uniformity in his future career.

OUR COUNTRY.

There lives nor form nor feature in my soul
Unborrowed from my country. Coleridge.

"Our Country." Millions gone down to the grave have loved the theme. Millions yet to live, will doubtless dwell upon it with delight or sorrow. Land of our birth—of childhood's happy hours and youth's bright visions.—Land of our hopes, and joys, and exalted privileges. "All bonds of natural love are found within thy rocky shores." Thy lakes and mountain hills,—thy quiet dales,—thy fruits and flowers—thy atmosphere and broad expanse of heaven—all are more valuable because associated with images of home. Another might be like thee, but it could never be the same. Ask not of him who passes his days in mute indifference on almost all subjects save the chances of trade, and political schemes, who walks abroad "with soul so dead," that he has never said to himself, "this is my own, my native land." but ask the lone wanderer, who has once been the grateful recipient of all his country's blessings, (now his no more,) whether there is not a charm in these two words "our country" that thrills his inner being.

Love of country is a natural endowment, or instinct enlarged or diminished according to its culture. The voluntary and involuntary exile, the Missionary of the Cross, the soldier on the battle field, have often tested the strength of this endowment. If cherished benevolently, it becomes a virtue of high order, enlarges the mind and tends to consecrate its powers to holy ends. The father should teach it to his sons, the mother to her daughters—they should inculcate on the broad principles of the word of God, a patriotism that will embrace not only our country but the world.

But the true patriot, while he loves to speak the praises of his country, and dwell with grateful interest, on whatever is commendable within her borders, will be as keenly sensitive to her manifest defects, as a faithful and tried friend to the faults of one beloved. There have been true patriots of other days, who have freely shed their blood in her defence and there have been, and are still, moral patriots, whose desire to obliterate her moral stains, wipe off the stigma of her national sins, and rescue her sons and daughters from ignominy and woe unutterable, has led them to expose her errors, reprobate her crimes and sound an alarm note of danger, that if heard and heeded, might prove to some as a life boat to the sinking mariner. With these, and such as these, we profess a fellow-feeling, and though we may only follow at a respectful distance, yet a sense of duty to our trust, and love to our country, impels us to exhibit it in this connexion, a page or two that is unlovely in a history that is being telegraphed to future ages.

Behold the teeming thousands in this vast republic, extending from Maine to Oregon, and from Canada to Mexico, a population becoming mighty in numbers and power, and swaying an influence felt around the globe from sun to sun. How few, compared with the many are seeking for durable riches and righteousness. And who shall take the guage of the moral evils that agitate, perplex, dishonor and bring out moral plague spots of fearful hue, upon this body politic? If there is not festering corruption in the very heart of society, why does the WAR SPIRIT utter its voice and raise its hideous visage in the face of the civilization, humanity and boasted progress of the nineteenth century? Why should sordid cupidity, the love of conquest and power make the preservation of peace and even of human life matters of such inferior moment?

If the heart of society to a fearful extent is not wrong, why the continued and reckless trampling upon human rights? When "by light and by love" in season and out of season, for half a score of years, God has caused the truth, with regard to the existence and deep iniquity of the system of American Slavery, to burn on the public conscience, why has not our guilty nation been constrained to cease its legalized oppressions? Why has it not obeyed the voice, and regarded the warnings, of the Infinite Ruler—"Remember them that are in bonds as bound with them." "Rob not the poor because he is poor, neither oppress the afflicted in the gate, for the Lord will plead their cause, and spoil the soul of those that spoiled them."—"Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed." "To turn aside the needy from judgment, and to take away the right from the poor of my people."

Will any that love the cause of Moral Purity, in view of the well known fact that the person of the poor slave woman is wholly in the power of the master, that her children, often wearing his lineaments, and evincing by the blood coursing through their young veins, the unnatural and heaven-condemned alliance; dare any say that God's command is not violated? that the poor is not robbed because she is poor; robbed in a double sense—robbed to that degree that the term 'robbery' does not begin to express the wrong? If justice and mercy alike demand that the severe penalties of law should fall upon the head of the destroyer of innocence at the North, what penalty, by right, should that same justice mete out to the libertine slaveholder at the South? What language can describe his guilt? Well has Montgomery said of him,

"This is the veriest wretch on Nature's face,
Owned by no country, spurned by every race;
The tether'd tyrant of one narrow span,
The bloated vampyre of a living man.
His frame,—a fungous form, of dunghill birth,
That taints the air, and rots above the earth;
His soul;—has he a soul, whose sensual breast
Of selfish passions is a serpent's nest?
Who follows headlong, ignorant, and blind,
The vague brute instinct of an idiot mind;
Whose heart 'mid scenes of suffering senseless grown,
E'en from his mother's lap was chilled to stone;
Whose torpid pulse no social feelings move;
A stranger to the tenderness of love;
His motley harem charms his gloating eye,
Where ebon, brown, and olive beauties vie;
His children, sprung alike from sloth and vice,
Are born his slaves, and loved at market price;
Has he a soul? With his departing breath,
A form shall hail him at the gates of death,
The spectre Conscience, shrieking through the gloom,
'Man, we shall meet again beyond the tomb.'"

And here we have one phase of the moral influences countenanced by law, and suffered to surround and overshadow more than one and a half million of our fellow-beings, guilty only of 'a skin not colored like our own!' Well may each and all adopt the expression, "I tremble for my country, when I remember that God is just." Is there not reason to fear that the record found in the word of God respecting an ancient nation, will ere long become a matter of history concerning our own? See Ezek 22: 29, 30. "The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery, and have vexed the poor and needy; yea, they have oppressed the stranger wrongfully. And I sought for a man among them that should make up the hedge, and stand in the gap before me for the land, that I should not destroy it; but I found none. Therefore have I poured out my indignation upon them; I have consumed them with the fire of my wrath; their own way have I recompensed upon their heads, saith the Lord God."

Faithful Christian—how much owest thou thy country? If it is to be saved from the righteous strokes of retributive justice, through what channel must salvation come? Is it true that the prayers of a righteous man avail much? Can thy prayers avail, and shall they not ascend with renewed importunity? Art thou seeking "a better country, even an heavenly," expecting soon to depart in peace—and is not this the strongest reason why desire intense should be awakened for the well being of thy country, destined as it is to add to human weal or woe throughout earth's history? Why, except in a few green spots, is the Spirit withheld from the churches? Why this dearth of revivals? Are all the tithes "brought into the storehouse?" Is there not a work for the Christian every where to do?—a work of faith—of deep humility—in some instances, of reparation for known wrongs—done, perhaps, when not intended—a work of returning to, and seeking the Lord with the whole heart—of removing every stumbling-block—taking up every cross—searching the Scriptures daily, and yielding implicit and cheerful obedience to their every precept; being so subdued by the attractions of the Cross, that the soul will sink into its own comparative nothingness, and so apprehend the power and love of Christ, that its arms of faith shall embrace our whole country with all her moral wants, and plead with the importunity of a KNOX, for her speedy conversion to God. May this be the rich experience of the writer and of every reader. [Adv. of Moral Reform.

"Let me record
His praise,—the man of great benevolence.
Of all mankind his soul
Was most in harmony with Heaven: as one
Sole family of brothers, sisters, friends:
One in their origin, one in their rights
To all the common gifts of Providence,
And in their hopes, their joys and sorrows o'er
He viewed the universal human race,
The law of love, was in his heart alive:
What he possessed, he counted not his own.
But like a faithful steward, in a house
Of public alms, what freely he received
He freely gave. POLLOCK.

ACCOUNT OF ROSA GOVONA.

A little before the middle of last century, there resided at Mondovi, a city in Italy, a young girl called Rosa Govona. Left an orphan at an early age, she had no other apparent means of earning a livelihood than the use of her needle, in which she showed great skill, combined with the most remarkable industry. Being of a reflecting mind, she took no delight in those pleasures and frivolous amusements which too often engage the female heart. Confiding in the resources of an active and benevolent nature, she wished for no companions save those of misfortune, and for no recompense save the blessing of Heaven.

Whilst Rosa was thus living and laboring by herself, she happened to meet with a young girl who had lost both her parents, and who had no means of supporting herself in an honest way. No sooner did the good Rosa become acquainted with the sad story of the distressed girl, than she generously stretched forth her hand to help her. "Come and live with me," said she; "you shall share my bed, and drink out of my cup, and above all you shall live honestly by the work of your hands." When she had thus made a commencement, others joined her, and she soon congregated around her a society of young girls, all equally poor, and, by the most assiduous application procured the necessaries of life for them all.

But the little house in which the young girls dwelt, soon attracted the attention of all the dissolute young men of the place, who were often seeking after adventures of some kind or other. They began by following them whenever they left the house; but the young women silently repulsed all their impertinences, and even forced them, after some time, to blush at their conduct. The house incurred also the displeasure of those old people, who, considering all innovations (whether of a beneficial character or not) dangerous, wish forever to abide by the old forms and regulations which governed the actions of their ancestors. They could not divest themselves of a mean suspicion that all was not right, and many of the citizens observed Rosa with much curiosity, and began to whisper things to her prejudice. Thus the retreat of industry and virtue became the object of the most malignant calumnies, and the good Rosa saw herself the subject of impertinent inquiries, of rumors the most vexatious, of suspicions the most unjust. But the wise and courageous girl, fully assured in the purity of her actions and intentions, opposed perseverance to indiscretion, and sense to calumny. The truth could not remain long doubtful—Rosa soon gained the applause of the virtuous, and the commune granted her a larger house, in the plain of Carasone, as the number of her companions increased daily. This augmented the jealousy of her enemies, who had been hitherto unsuccessful in their endeavors to injure her character; but these new obstacles served only to redouble the ardour of Rosa, and to raise her courage. There were now about seventy young women in the house, all of whom worked in common with herself to procure an honest livelihood. As the house they inhabited was scarcely large enough to accommodate the number of work women, she solicited the commune to grant her a still larger habitation. The municipal body, to show their sense of her exertions in the cause of virtue, voluntarily made her a gift of a very large and commodious dwelling in the valley of Brao; here she established a work-shop for the manufactory of woollen articles.

The excellent Rosa, who was now about 39 years of age, had at this period, by her indomitable perseverance, triumphed over all obstacles: and by her exertions in extending the association, and her wisdom in superintending the affairs of the community, created an asylum for poor and indigent females. The more she considered the utility of her institution, the greater became her desire to extend the benefits which such an asylum presented. "How many poor and destitute beings," thought she, "must there be in a large and populous city, who are deprived of all means of procuring an honest livelihood." Filled with this idea, and relying entirely on the sanctity of her mission, she proceeded to Turin in the year 1755. Arrived in the capital of Sardinia, she asked the use of a building suitable for carrying out her intentions, and obtained from the priests of the Oratory of St. Philip several capacious rooms. Some chairs, tables, and different articles of furniture, were also provided for her use. She received the little they gave her with the greatest delight; and thus established, with some of her companions, in the capital city of the kingdom, she resolutely set about prosecuting the object of her mission.

The novelty of the idea soon engaged the attention of the citizens; they saw, and, what is more astonishing still, they applauded her design; and her shop, or rather factory became the talk of the whole city. At this period, Charles Emanuel the Third, having established on a firm footing the independence of his people, gave himself up entirely to the paternal administration of the country. As protector of labor, he accorded to the pious Rosa some houses which had formerly belonged to a religious establishment. Rosa installed herself here, increased the number of her companions, and greatly extended the branches of labor to which they applied themselves. Two years after this, by order of the same prince, the manufactures carried on by Rosa were properly organized, and registered by the magistrates of commerce; and regulations were drawn up for the government of the institution, which now received the name of Rosines (from that of the foundress), and above the principal entrance was inscribed the following words, addressed by Rosa to her first companions—"You shall live honestly by the work of your hands."

The prosperous condition of her institution filled the heart of the pious foundress with joy, but she could not divest herself of a desire to extend its blessing still farther She had left an establishment at Mondovi, and she wished now to form similar ones at other populous places. With this end in view, she visited several provinces of the kingdom, called around her all the young women who were desirous of finding a decent means of subsistence, and founded asylums at Novare, Fossano. Savigliano, Saluces, Chieri, and St. Damiano d'Asti, all of them towns of considerable note and population. These were provided with the necessary materials for work, and every other want was generously supplied by the excellent Rosa.

She lived twenty-two years after quitting her native city, during all which period she was engaged in work, laboring unceasingly for the establishment of her eight institutions, and providing asylums for the sustenance both of the bodies and souls of the unfortunate of her sex. On the 28th of February, 1776, this excellent woman expired, in the midst of her sorrowing pupils, being quite worn out, not with age, but with fatigues. Her memory was held in the greatest veneration, as well by those, many of whom she had rescued from misery and idleness, if not from the depths of sin and shame, and rendered good and useful members of society, as by all classes of Sardinian subjects who had experienced the benefits arising from her exertions, and who knew how to applaud, and take example from the virtue of a single maiden, who from the lowest condition of poverty, had raised, by her wisdom and virtue, a monument in the hearts of all well-disposed and charitable persons. LAW AND GOSPEL.

NUMBER TWELVE.

Our inquiries concerning Law and Gospel have brought out these results;—that the Law is the rule of man's duty;—Gospel is the good news of salvation through a mediator. Law is the standard of holiness;—Gospel, the power which conforms us to the standard. Law decides our duty;—Gospel, our destiny. Law regards us simply as the creatures of God;—the Gospel regards us as sinful creatures. When man was innocent, his strength to keep the law was in himself. Now that he has sinned, his strength to keep it is in the gospel. In innocency man first keeps the law, and then is justified on account of it. In his fallen state, the order is exactly reversed;—he is first justified through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, and then keeps the law. In the one case he keeps it in order to have life;—in the other, he is made alive in order to keep it. In the one case no one has borne the curse for him, and he is liable to it himself for the least failure; in the other, Christ has been made a curse for him, and though he come short of the law's demands, the blood of Jesus Christ cleanses him from all sin.

We have also considered the Law as administered by Moses, and as administered by Christ. The one enforces it by civil pains and penalties;—the other, by his own love in dying for us. The one administration is a lively picture of God's moral government exercised in that strict justice, which punishes the transgressor;—the other represents that government exercised in that spirit of love which pardons the sinner.

The whole of our investigation has shown, that the Law could not, in the nature of things, be abrogated by the Gospel. It must of necessity continue binding, as long as the relation in which it originates continues. It can no more cease to bind us, than we can cease to be the creatures of God. We see not how it is possible for a man of sense to deny this. He can hardly look at the New Testament without seeing, that a law of some kind or other is recognized as the Christian's rule of duty. He may doubt what law this is. He may not be able to tell whether it is the Decalogue, or some other code. He may cavil, and dispute, and evade; but a law of some kind is plainly recognized, which faith does not make void. Rom. 3: 31.

It has been our aim to defend the claims of the Decalogue, by analyzing its precepts, and showing that they are all founded on that relation to which the Moral Law necessarily belongs.

We took this method, that we might place the Decalogue upon incontrovertible ground, not choosing to insist upon the remarkable prominence given to this code in the system of religion revealed to the Israelites, because we were aware that to any argument built upon this fact a plausible answer might be framed. Nevertheless we conceive that this fact of prominency ought not to be wholly overlooked. Taken in connection with what has been already advanced, it adds strength to the argument.

The prominency of the Decalogue consists in the following particulars:—

1. Its precepts were spoken by God himself with audible voice from amidst the flames of Sinai; while all other precepts were given to the Israelites through Moses.

2. They were graven by God's own finger upon tablets of stone; while all the others were written by Moses upon parchment.

3. They were deposited in the ark of the covenant, so that they were covered over with the mercy seat; which was not the case with the rest of the law.

4. They were the basis of that covenant which God entered into with the Israelites, and, as such, were called the tables of the covenant; while the Levitical service was imposed after the covenant was made. Heb. 9: 4.

This prominence was certainly not without its meaning. Why were the ten commandments written upon stone, while the rest of the law was engrossed upon parchment? Shall we say that stone intimated the imperishable nature, and perpetuity of those commandments? No, says the objector, it intimated the hardness of the Jews' hearts. Very well. Then it was hardness of heart that constituted the only objection to keeping them. When that hardness is subdued by the regenerating power of the Spirit, men no longer refuse obedience to them. When their hearts are no longer stony, but made flesh, Ezek. 36: 26, then these commandments are written in them. Heb. 8: 10. Jer. 31: 33. 2 Cor. 3: 3. The objection itself therefore proves their perpetuity.

And why were these commandments deposited in the ark, and covered by the mercy seat? Was it not to intimate, that sins committed against them could be covered only by Jesus the true mercy seat? On the great day of atonement, which typified the atonement accomplished by Jesus Christ for the sins of the world, the high priest entered into the most holy place, and sprinkled blood upon the mercy seat, and upon the floor before the mercy seat, seven times. Yet notwithstanding this transaction, if any one had violated the precepts of the Decalogue, he must die without mercy when convicted by two or three witnesses; which evidently showed that the blood offered on occasion of that festival did not cleanse the people from sins against that code, but only represented the blood that could. Hence, unless the type is without meaning, the death of Christ had respect eminently to sins against the Decalogue; and if so, the Decalogue is eminently the Moral Law. *

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT AND THE SABBATH.—It is not uncommon for good men, in advocating favorite theories, to take positions which are directly at war with their own practices. If we mistake not, this is emphatically true of the advocates of capital punishment. In the discussion of their favorite subject, they generally profess great respect for the law of God, and do not hesitate to collect together all the texts in the Old Testament which favor their opinion, and present them as not only applicable to the present time, but as quite sufficient to settle every question about the propriety of capital punishment. Indeed, they not unfrequently go so far as to express doubts whether such persons as take a different view can be in any respect better than infidels. This may be very well so far; the law of God is applicable to the present time, and ought to be obeyed. But alas for the consistency of these men; for just so soon as you take them on their chosen ground, and apply their own principles to the subject of the Sabbath, they halt, and stammer, express doubts, and in the end back out entirely from the positions which they have taken. Now we do not blame them for holding that capital punishment ought to be inflicted upon the murderer at the present day, because it was written of old that "he who sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." But we do blame them for not carrying out this principle of settling disputed questions by the Scriptures to its legitimate results. We blame them for holding, that although the seventh day of the week is the Sabbath according to the Scriptures, yet the first day of the week is just as good as the seventh. They ought to know, that the positions which they take against the Sabbath, strike at the foundation of all arguments based upon the Word of God. They are exceedingly dangerous therefore.

WHY IS SUNDAY SO GENERALLY OBSERVED IF IT BE NOT RIGHT?

The above question is often urged as an objection to the claims of the seventh day, by those who look abroad for evidence to sustain an institution for which so little support can be derived from the Scriptures. That we may arrive at an answer, we will briefly consider what testimony the history of the world furnishes concerning the origin and progress of the institution now so emphatically entitled the "LORD'S DAY," or the "CHRISTIAN SABBATH."

It is well known, that the most common objects of worship among the pagans, from the earliest antiquity, were the seven planets, the SUN, the moon, and the host of heaven, and that each of these was supposed to exercise some divine influence over their respective days. The sun was regarded as the chief, and being adored especially on the first day of the week, this day was called after his name, and became the chief of days. The next day was named after the moon, and so of the other days. Nearly every nation under heaven agreed in this feature of pagan worship. Even the Jews, unto whom were committed the oracles of God, were seduced from their covenant, and became worshipers of the sun and moon. 2 Kings 22: 5.

The Greeks derived their notions from the Eastern nations, and the Romans from the Greeks. With them Sunday became a more distinguished festival, as the sun was a more conspicuous deity in their estimation. Thus, it is supposed, the great kingdoms which have successively ruled the destiny of the pagan world have in their turn maintained this festival of sun worship. Nor was it until the time of the Emperor Constantine, that any abatement of pagan regard was generally manifested. His conversion to Christianity, was no doubt the occasion of its legal transfer to the character of a Christian institution.

In the first centuries of the Christian era, the seventh day was very extensively observed even among the Romans. But the bitter animosity which pagans felt toward the Jews, from various causes, was in nowise diminished by the extension of Christianity in the Roman Empire. For as the Jews were the inflexible conservators of the Sabbath through the dark periods of the world's history, and as their zeal in favor of their own religion was only equalled by their opposition to Rome and to the Christian scheme, so enmity rose to the highest pitch against them among the Roman converts—insomuch that it was considered disgraceful to hold any thing in common with them.

Under such circumstances, it could not be surprising, that the "venerable dies solis," (Sunday,) should retain sufficient regard in the Roman Empire, to render it at least a formidable competitor for supremacy in the Church of Rome. Christianity becoming greatly corrupted soon after the death of the apostles, and its professors yielding to the weight of opposition against supposed Jewish customs, they conformed in many things to the superstitions of paganism, and says Morer, "thought fit to keep the same day and the same name of it, that they might not appear causelessly peevish, and by that means hinder the conversion of the gentiles, and bring a greater prejudice than might be otherwise taken against the Gospel."

Roger Bacon, when considering the nature of the various influences upon the human system ascribed to the seven planets, remarks, that Christians erred much in not resting on Saturday after the manner of the Jews—dullness being attributed to Saturn, on which account he considered that it might have been made to appear conclusive among them, that this day was least of all fit for business. Others questioned the propriety of adopting pagan customs, which were inconsistent with the character of the Christian religion; and St. Augustine, feeling the weight of the objection, admits that they kept the FESTIVAL of the SUN, yet denies that they were idolators; for, says he, they worship that Sun which the Scriptures call the Sun of Righteousness!!

Should we trace the history of Sunday-keeping in the church, as a means of deducing its origin, what other evidence could be desired to satisfy the most sceptical, than the exact agreement of the character of the Christian festival of Sunday, with that of the pagan festival of the same name? And when we consider that both converge to the same point, were fostered by the Roman Power, and were merged under the cover of imperial edicts, and that too amid the darkness of pagan and papal ignorance and superstition, how can our credulity be so wrought upon, as to entertain a doubt of their common origin?

Not so the Sabbath. Standing as a monument of the great work of creation—a memorial of that event which filled all space with the glorious displays of God's power—and pointing also to the end of time, when the new heaven and the new earth shall supersede the present, and unfold the incomparable luster of a heavenly paradise, the Sabbath admits of no change, can have no divine competitor to vie with its blessedness, or with it to divide the obligation of men to remember it and keep it holy.

The reason, then, why the first day came to be so much more generally observed than the seventh day, appears to be conclusively shown, from the fact, that comparatively all the world was given to the idolatry of sun-worship, and they did but continue the same pagan festival, merely changing the direction of its rites to suit the new object of their attention. The transition cost no such sacrifice of worldly interest—no such conflict with surrounding customs—as the introduction of the Sabbath would have required. Philosophy may discover the laws of nature by analogy—it may trace human institutions by their resemblance to those of like origin; but there is no analogy between the Sabbath of God's appointment, and any other object, save the holy REST of the righteous in heaven. Unlike the bow of promise in the clouds, its circle spans all TIME—its abutments include the whole scene of man's fall and redemption. Standing on the basis of a perfect paradise at first created, and of another still more glorious yet to be displayed, the streams of human corruption reach not its exalted and unrivalled character. May we not then ask, in our turn, Why is the Sabbath forgotten by so many?—and, Why is the blessing promised to those who keep it sought by so few?

"Bless'd day of God! and THEREFORE bless'd,
The type of everlasting rest;
Bless'd day! thou to the world art given,
To guide our wandering feet to heaven."

A PREDICTION FULFILLED.—It is less than two years since the friends of a stricter observance of Sunday, were making a great stir in the State of New-York, by holding Conventions, and petitioning the Legislature to close the locks on the canals. There were many persons then who doubted the wisdom of such measures, and predicted that they would either end in nothing, or lead to greater carelessness on the subject. This prediction is already fulfilled to the letter, the agitators themselves being witnesses. In a late number of one of the papers which was most noisy in advocating legal enactments in favor of Sunday, we find an article headed, "Sabbath Desecration on the Canal," which commences thus:—"Is this subject given up by the friends of religion and good order? We neither see nor hear of any movement in petitioning the Legislature to have the officers of the State relieved from their services on the Sabbath, and to have the locks closed." It would be well for the editor to look about him, and perchance he may "see or hear" the cause of the present stagnation.

BISHOPRICK OF JERUSALEM.—We have already announced the death of Dr. Alexander, the Protestant Bishop of Jerusalem. His bishoprick was established under the joint auspices of the sovereigns of England and Prussia, and his consecration took place in the latter end of the year 1841. The next appointment to this vacant office is in the hands of the King of Prussia. But it is said that there are not wanting persons who oppose the appointment of a new Bishop, and advocate the entire abandonment of the scheme. They do so on the ground of principle and expediency as well as utility. In regard to the utility of the measure, they say that after four years of effort, the entire congregation brought together is but sixty persons, who could be abundantly provided for by a simple Presbyter, with the aid of a triennial visitation of a Bishop. From this it is evident that the scheme for continuing a bishop at Jerusalem will be warmly opposed, if not defeated.

THOMAS CLARKSON.—The name of this venerable philanthropist is identified with nearly every effort which has been made in Great Britain to abolish slavery and the slave-trade. A letter written by him under date of Dec. 9, 1845, shows that although he is now suffering from the infirmities of age, yet his heart is as much devoted to the cause of human freedom as ever. Besides his other labors in that cause, he has written no less than 120 books and pamphlets designed to help it forward. The following is an extract from his letter, which appears in the Boston Liberator:

"I am yet mostly confined to my bedroom. I am seriously ill. The severe fall I had some time ago has shattered me much, and, with other disorders, at the great age of eighty-six, leaves me no hope of ultimate recovery. But I thank God that the good cause is in such good hands; that though I die, it will go on to triumph. It will be under God's providential care. I am assured that the finger of God has long been working for us; and that the days of Slavery are numbered."

THE EMPEROR OF CHINA AND CHRISTIANITY.—The Pekin Gazette says that the Emperor of China has at length consented to tolerate the Christian Religion. It seems that Ke-Ying, whose opinion of Christianity we published last week, memorialized the Emperor in favor of the Christian religion; and the sovereign, after a careful examination of its tenets, declared that it was not only a harmless but a commendable faith, and forthwith ordered the interdict laid upon it to be removed.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—We mentioned some weeks ago, that Dr. Babcock had resigned his responsible post as Secretary of this Society, and had accepted a call to the pastoral care of a church. The vacancy occasioned by his resignation has been filled by the appointment of Mr. William H. Wyckoff, late editor of the Baptist Advocate, who, it is understood, will prepare the Annual Report of the Society to be read at the next annual meeting.

A NEW TEST.—A proposal has been made to start an anti-gambling steamboat on the Ohio river, to be conducted on principles of strict morality. It is thought that such a boat will be preferred by religious men from conscientious motives. Of course there will be no difficulty in finding capitalists to engage in the enterprise if they can be insured that it will pay.

BAPTIST MISSIONS.—The Missionary Magazine for February acknowledges the receipt of $13,149,76 in donations, and $2250 in legacies, during the month of December, 1845, making a total of $15,399,77. Upwards of $7000 of this sum was for discharging the debt of the Board.

REVIVAL.—The Baptist church in Stonington, Ct., is enjoying a season of refreshing. Eleven persons have recently been added by baptism, and other additions are expected.

RELIGION IN TURKEY.—A letter from Mr. Van Lennep mentions several interesting facts which illustrate the general progress of evangelical sentiments in Turkey. He made a visit to Tocat last year, and found much to encourage himself and his brethren, in the state of things at that place. The interest constantly increased down to the time of his departure. A strong desire was expressed that a missionary might be sent to reside at Tocat. The interest awakened in this place is the more gratifying from the fact that a devoted English missionary here closed his earthly career. "When I was standing by Henry Martin's grave," says Mr. Lennep, "I could not help thinking, 'Holy man of God! the prayers uttered, doubtless with thy last dying breath, have been heard; and in this dark land, behold, fair buds are opening!'"

A BENEVOLENT ENTERPRISE.—We learn from the Greenfield Gazette, that several young men in Sunderland, a few years since, formed themselves into a benevolent society. Their plan was, to hire and cultivate several acres of land, the avails of which should be given to some benevolent object. The enterprise has succeeded beyond their most sanguine anticipations. The Society has contributed since its formation, (1838,) as the avails of its labor, $500, which has been given to the Foreign, Home Mission, Bible and Tract Societies. The crops raised the first year amounted to $100, and those of the last year $90. This is a highly commendable enterprise, and furnishes a useful lesson to all, showing how much can be done by a little determined effort.

A RUNAWAY SLAVE.—The Cleveland (O.) Plaindealer, gives an account of a lecture delivered in that city by a colored gentleman named Mason, who claims to be an illegitimate son of ex-Governor Mason, of Virginia. His theme was the horrors of slavery, and having been a slave himself for twenty-six years, he related many touching incidents connected with his own history, and of his fellow slaves. He says that he was born on the plantation of Gov. Mason, that he was kept as a house servant until a son of the Governor becoming of age, he was given to the latter as a body servant, together with $25,000, and two race horses. He accompanied young Mason to New-Orleans, taking the principal race courses in his route, and from thence to St. Louis, where it appears the "ardent young Virginian" becoming short of funds, suffered his faithful body servant to be sold at Sheriff sale, to pay his hotel expenses. He was then worked as a field slave for three years, and so inhumanly treated that he ran away, and after great suffering and perseverance, reached Canada. Of course, he is an uneducated man, but reads well and can write. He exhibits considerable "father wit," and his discourses are calculated to excite much sympathy for his brethren in bondage.

ADMISSION OF COLORED CHILDREN IN COMMON SCHOOLS.—The town of Nantucket witnessed, as we learn from the Nantucket Enquirer, an animated and earnestly contested election, on Monday, in the choice of its School Committee. The main question was, shall the colored children be admitted into the public schools on precisely the same terms as the whites? and, probably, every vote was deposited with direct reference to this question. The polls were kept open for six hours, and the number of votes cast, to the surprise of all parties, was 916—a greater number than was ever before called out upon any local question, and only exceeded by a vote of 1840, which was 1,003. The result was, that twelve out of the thirteen candidates, favorable to the admission of colored children into the Grammar Schools, were elected, by an average majority of nine or ten. A few erasures, three or four, defeated the election of the other, who was chosen at a subsequent election on Tuesday.

DREADFUL STORM WITH LOSS OF LIFE AND PROPERTY.—Our seaboard was visited by a severe northeast storm on Sunday last, which was attended with most disastrous consequences to property and life. Eight vessels are ashore on Squam Beach, N. J., many of the passengers and crews of which must have perished within sight of land. Probably not less than sixty lives were lost. The following particulars are already ascertained, and it is feared that much more remains to be learned.

The ship John Minturn, Capt. Stark, New-York and New-Orleans packet, went ashore on Sunday morning about 8 o'clock. Five of the sailors and one passenger reached the shore much exhausted. The Captain and his wife, their child and servant, and thirty-seven persons, passengers or sailors, perished in attempting to save themselves. Her cargo of cotton, sugar, and molasses, all lost.

Ship Orleans, a New-York and New-Orleans packet, was driven ashore on Saturday night soon after the storm commenced. The missing men are not ascertained. Her cargo is a total loss.

The Schooner Alabama from Philadelphia for New-York, went ashore on Saturday night during the height of the storm, and every soul on board, seven in number, perished. The vessel is lost but the cargo mostly saved.

The schooner Register, from Newbern, with corn, is ashore on Long Branch—one passenger drowned.

The schooner Pioneer, from Providence, bound to New Haven is ashore at the same place.

The pilot boat Mary Eleanor is high and dry.

The bark New Jersey, Lewis, loaded with cotton, is ashore at Squam.

The Swedish bark Lotty, from this city to Antwerp, is ashore at Squam, captain and mate perished.

Between 12 and 1 o'clock, Sunday morning, the schr. Oran, sloop Ontario, and sloop George Washington, broke adrift from the foot of Jay-st. when two citizens belonging to one of the vessels, it is supposed, were drowned—Captain James W. Johnson and his son W. G., the latter in attempting to save his father.

At Staten Island, several small craft went ashore, and wharves and bulkheads were much injured. None of the churches were opened for devine service.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

In the SENATE, the principal subject under discussion was the Oregon Resolutions, which were some time ago made the special order of the day for Tuesday, and were kept before that body through the week.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES had under consideration the Fortification Bill, the Pension Bill, and many bills of a private and unimportant character.

We gave notice last week of the passage of the Oregon Resolutions in the House. They are as follows:—

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States cause notice to be given to the Government of Great Britain, that the convention between the United States of America and Great Britain, concerning the territory on the North-West coast of America, West of the Stony Mountains, of the 6th of August, 1827, signed in London, shall be annulled and abrogated twelve months after giving said notice.

2. And be it further resolved, That nothing herein contained is intended to interfere with the right and discretion of the proper authorities of the two contracting parties to renew or pursue negotiations for an amicable settlement of the controversy respecting the Oregon territory.

FOOLISH LEGISLATION!

The following is one section of a bill which has passed the Kentucky Legislature. It will be seen that it extends the jurisdiction of Kentucky over all the free states, and how much further deponent saith not. If a man in Ohio or New York shall assist a slave, he is declared guilty of a violation of the law of Kentucky, and condemned to one of her penitentiaries for a term of years. How can the law of Kentucky condemn a man for what he does in another State? We ask how? Suppose we reverse it. New York passes a law making it a crime for any man to hold a slave within her jurisdiction; and then on the strength of this, passes another law that if any person "without the limits of" New York "and within the limits of any state where slavery is allowed by law," shall hold a slave, he shall be imprisoned in a New York prison. This is just what Kentucky has done in principle. If Kentucky legislation can make it unlawful to assist a slave in New York, New York legislation can make it unlawful to hold a slave in Kentucky. Are slaveholders getting mad. But read what the law says. [Tr. Wes.]

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That if any person shall hereafter BE FOUND, WITHOUT THE LIMITS OF THIS COMMONWEALTH, AND WITHIN THE LIMITS OF ANY STATE WHERE SLAVERY IS NOT ALLOWED BY LAW, AIDING, ABETTING, HARBORING, CONCEALING, OR ASSISTING ANY SLAVE OR SLAVES, BELONGING TO ANY CITIZEN OF THIS COMMONWEALTH, TO MAKE HIS, HER, OR THEIR ESCAPE, FROM THEIR LAWFUL OWNER OR OWNERS, SUCH PERSON OR PERSONS, SO OFFENDING, SHALL BE DEEMED GUILTY OF ENTICING AWAY SUCH SLAVE OR SLAVES FROM THE COUNTY IN WHICH SUCH SLAVE OR SLAVES, OR EITHER OF THEM, MAY HAVE RESIDED, UNLESS THE CONTRARY BE PROVEN BY AT LEAST TWO CREDITABLE WITNESSES, AND SUCH PERSON OR PERSONS SHALL, ON CONVICTION OF ANY SUCH OFFENCE, BE CONFINED IN THE JAIL AND PENITENTIARY HOUSE OF THIS COMMONWEALTH, FOR A PERIOD NOT LESS THAN ONE YEAR NOR MORE THAN FIVE YEARS.

General Intelligence.

SLAVE LAWS OF KENTUCKY.—The Louisville Journal says—"The bill punishing seditious publications, calculated to excite slaves to rebellion, &c., has passed the Kentucky Senate. The first section repeals a former act relating to the same subject, and makes an attempt to persuade any slave from his owner punishable by confinement in the Penitentiary from one to five years. The second section provides that if any person shall excite slaves to insurrection or rebellion, he shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than five nor more than twenty years. The third section makes an attempt to excite insurrection by oral discourse, or by disseminating printed or written documents among the slaves, punishable by a fine of from $500, to $1000, and confinement in jail until fine and costs are paid. The fourth section makes aiding, harboring, concealing, or assisting slaves to escape, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary from one to five years. The fifth section subjects a free negro or mulatto, guilty of any of the above mentioned offences, to confinement in the penitentiary of from five to twenty years. The sixth section makes it the duty of the circuit judges to see the law fully executed."

BUSINESS OF OYSTER-GROWING.—Grain-growing, wool-growing, and even slave-growing are familiar phrases, in our English vocabulary. We may now add that of oyster-growing to the list, as among the fruits of Yankee ingenuity and enterprise. A company has been formed in New-Haven, Ct., with a capital of $40,000, for transplanting oysters from Gaspee to St. Lawrence, near Quebec, a distance of 700 miles. The tide here rises 19 feet, sufficient to afford the oysters salt water for their nourishment. They transplanted 200,000 bushels last season, and expect to transplant a million the next. They expect the yearly crop to be equal to the original deposite. Next fall they will begin to open and despatch them West. When the present projected chain of internal improvements is completed, Chicago is to be supplied with the luxury at $1,00 a gallon.

SHOCKING.—On Tuesday morning the 27th ult. about 1 o'clock, the dwelling of the Hon. Marshall Strong, at Rachine, W. T., was consumed by fire, and Mrs. Strong, together with her son, about 4 years, and daughter about 2 years of age, perished in the flames. At the time of the occurrence the wind was blowing a gale. There was no man in the house at the time, and only a servant girl in addition to those who perished. Mr. Strong himself being a member of the Senate of Wisconsin, was absent at Madison.

On discovering the fire, Mrs. Strong and the servant, each having a child sleeping with them (in the second story of the house) escaped to the street; but Mrs. Strong, impelled by a mother's holy love, was heard by the servant to exclaim, "My children! oh! my children!" and immediately returned to the house for their rescue, but being overcome, most probably, by the rapidly spreading flame and smoke, she was unable to reach them or to escape, and all perished together.

ASSAFŒTIDA.—The plant which furnishes assafœtida is a Ferula, a perennial and native of Persia. The gum resin, as it is termed, is procured from roots of plants which are at least four years old. When the leaves begin to decay, the stalk is twisted off, and the earth removed from about their large tapering roots. The top of the root is some time afterwards cut off transversely; and for eight hours afterwards, the juice which has exuded, is scraped off, and a second transverse section is made. The operation is repeated until the root be entirely exhausted of juice. After being scraped off, the juice is exposed to the sun to harden, and is then (as gum assafœtida) brought to us in large irregular masses, composed of various little shining lumps of grains, which are partly red dish, and partly a violet hue.

COL. NATHANIEL FENTON, a soldier of the revolution, died at Jamestown, Chautauque Co., on the 25th ult. aged 83. He was born in Mansfield, Conn., in 1763, enlisted in the Continental service in 1780, when in his seventeenth year, served in two severe skirmishes near Throg's Neck, where (in the first) he saved himself from capture by shooting the horse of a British officer who had nearly overtaken him; the officer having his leg broken by the horse's fall. He was in the service near West Point when the Army was disbanded after peace, receiving his long arrears of pay in 'settlement notes," which he sold for seventeen dollars. He was married in 1790, and removed to Otsego (then Montgomery) County in 1791, where he was once lost in the woods in a severe snow-storm, and remained on his feet fifty hours, knowing that he should inevitably freeze to death if he sat down or fell asleep. He came out to a house the third morning, about seven miles from the spot where he was bewildered. He ever after suffered from rheumatic affection, and ultimately became a cripple in consequence. He made a profession of religion in 1802. He was twice elected to the Legislature from Otsego Co., and, removing to Chautauque Co. in 1823, he was in 1827 elected from that County. His last public act was the Reading of the Declaration of Independence at the Temperance Celebration in Jamestown, July 4th, 1843. [Tribune.

THE HUTCHINSON FAMILY.—A letter from Manchester to the London Non-Conformist speaks thus of this well-known Family:

"I must mention to you a family of American Vocalists—the Hutchinsons—who have made their appearance in these parts. Here, and in the neighboring towns at the various institutions, their success has surpassed any thing I remember; and they are engaged every night for this month. You must not expect a Malibran in the girl—who is only 16—nor a Duprez or a Lablanche among the brothers; but simple harmony and ballad-singing in a style which catches hold of the popular feelings to a high degree. I have seen the audiences at the Athenæum and Mechanics' Institute, consisting of Clerks and the Working-Men, with tears coursing down their noses most piteously. They are encored in almost every thing they sing, and they have considerable comic humor, which though upon local subjects principally, has caught hold of our Lancashire people most thoroughly."

The Egyptians, according to Pliny, had discovered a mode of dying analogous to that of our printed calicoes. Cloths, impregnated probably with different mordants, were plunged in a bath, in which they assumed different colors.

ST. PAUL'S CLOCK, LONDON.—A writer in the Hartford Currant thus describes the clock-works in the tower of this cathedral:

"The pendulum is 14 feet long, and the weight at the end is one cwt.; the dials on the outside are regulated by a smaller one within; the length of the minute hands on the exterior dials, is eight feet, and the weight of each 75 pounds; the length of the hour hands is 5 feet 9 inches, and the weight 44 pounds each; the diameter of the dials is 18 feet 10 inches, and the length of the hour figures 2 feet 2 inches.

The fine-toned bell, which strikes, is clearly distinguished from every other bell in the metropolis, has been heard at the distance of 20 miles. It is about 10 feet in diameter, and is said to weigh about four and a half tons. This bell is tolled on the death of any member of the royal family, or the lord mayor, bishop of London, or dean of the cathedral.

SUSPENSION CARRIAGE WHEEL.—Mr. Michael Munson, of Tompkinsville, N. Y., has invented a new wheel of rather novel construction, consisting of a metallic rim attached and screwed to a hub in the centre by a series of iron wires, each having a screw at both ends, the thread turning in opposite directions, by means of which they are screwed into the hub and rim by the same movement. The wheel can be easily constructed, is cheap, and from its peculiar construction, premises to be durable. The Scientific Mechanic premises that a wheel of this description, with iron wires one fourth of an inch in diameter, will sustain a weight of 15,000 lbs. applied to the axle. Mr. M. intends to secure his improvement by letters patent.

SUCCESSFUL INDUSTRY.—The Prague Gazette mentions a Jewish merchant named Sedekaur, who lately died in that city at the age of sixty. This person arrived at Prague, about fifty years since, on foot and without a sous, but by his industry and the simplicity of his manner of living, he acquired a fortune of nearly six millions, which he has devoted in great part to the encouragement of the arts, sciences, and trades, and for the help of the unfortunate of every condition and without any distinction of race. About two millions and a half have fallen to the share of the most noted institutions of benevolence in the principal cities of Bohemia.

SINGULAR CURE FOR HEADACHE.—I had a violent headache, which the Captain undertook to cure, and he certainly succeeded. He made me sit down, seized hold of my caput, and placing a thumb on each side of my temporal arteries, pressed them in such a way as almost to stop the whole circulation of my blood. He then directed me to heave as long a sigh as I could; and I walked in to my dinner completely cured. I have seen ladies in this country, while suffering under such a malady, appear with a wafer stuck on each temple, which, I presume, was only a milder way than my friend, the Captain, employed, of driving off this tormenter.—[My Adventures, by Col. Maxwell, K. H.

TRUTH AHEAD OF FICTION.—Imagination never came up to every day realities. An instance is in the following paragraph from a Calcutta newspaper, giving an account of the death of a young British officer and his wife:—

"The death of Lt. Lumsden and his young wife is now confirmed, and the details of their fate as now narrated are of the most melancholy and painful character. It is stated that when he fell, desperately wounded, his young wife threw herself upon his body, and implored him not to leave her to fall into the hands of the enemy—when he, with a last effort, drew his pistols from his belt, and put an end first to her sufferings and then to his own."

RESCUED FROM PERISHING.—Many singular rescues of late have occurred of persons breaking in the ice, but the most remarkable occurred in the Territory of Iowa. Mr. Hobson was crossing the river at Fort Madison, in a sleigh, when the ice gave way and precipitated him into the river. A man named Ward Ellis, who was near, humanely went to his assistance. All he could see was Hobson's cap, and fearing in his attempt to save him he would only bring up that, he reached farther down, so as to get hold of his neck, when Hobson, in his struggles, caught two of Ellis' fingers in his teeth, which he held on to, until in this way he was brought to the surface and saved. Ellis' fingers were bitten to the bone.

DARK PICTURE.—A Philadelphia letter writer says that the District of Moyamensing, with a population of 14,000 persons, has ten licensed taverns, 252 groggeries, 1,775 human beings that cannot read or write, over 75 years of age, and during the past year there has been sold in small quantities over 10,000 barrels of liquor!

Over 100 sober men have been made drunkards, over 260 families ruined, over 900 children left destitute, 100 Coroner's Inquests, and over 4000 persons sent to prison by the Committing Magistrates for various offences.

A NUT FOR GEOLOGISTS.—In the Spring of 1839, there was found in a coal mine, in Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, embedded in solid rock, 100 feet below the surface of the ground, a piece of slate ten inches square, and one thick, upon one side of which, were impressions of four bands of wood or iron, each about two inches wide, with an interval of a quarter of an inch between each. Upon each band are marks of nails, about one and a half inches distant from each other—the distances being exactly the same in all—the nails being so disposed as to form diagonal lines across the parallel bands. The heads of the nails are about an inch and a half wide, and annex about one tenth of an inch above the surface of the wood or iron, into which they are driven. This resembles wood, having the lines or longitudinal indentations observable in oak timber.

The adjacent concave impression was destroyed by the miners.

The question is, how can this formation be accounted for?

The above described specimen was exhibited in Philadelphia in 1839.

MODERN WITCHCRAFT.—The Rev. Dr. Wilson, of the First Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati, has lately preached a sermon against the sin of witchcraft, in which he not only declares his belief in the reality of the sin, but he holds that it is now practiced to an alarming extent. Under the head of witchcraft he classes the recent pretended miracles in the Catholic church, animal magnetism, Shakerism, Mormonism, &c.

SUMMARY.

Mr. Ebenezer Gorham, a staff-officer in the American army during the Revolution, died recently at Gorham, Me., aged 88. Mr. Gorham was present at the surrender of Burgoyne, the execution of the lamented Andre, the battle of Monmouth, and on other memorable occasions.

The buildings erected at great cost for Kemper College, Missouri, and belonging to the Episcopalians, have been forced by stress of debt into the market, and purchased by the county authorities for an Alms-house.

There are 15 societies of Shakers in the U. S., comprising 7,000 members.

James Gordon Bennett has sued Major Noah for a libel, very modestly laying his damages, according to the True Sun, at $10,000,000. Major Noah has been held to bail in $1,000.

The trial of a slander suit growing out of the celebrated Watch Case in Le Roy, came off in Albion, at the Circuit Court, Judge Dayton presiding, Mary N. Ladd vs. Mariett Ingham. The jury rendered a verdict against Miss Ingham of $3,000.

The Report of the Inspectors of the State Prison at Sing Sing states, that there were on the 30th September last, confined in that prison, males, 797; white, 596; colored, 201. 26 are under 17 years of age; 159 between 17 and 21; 339 between 21 and 30; 175 between 30 and 40; and 98 over 49. 583 are Americans, and 214 are foreigners.

Major Harvie, Superintendant of Indian Affairs, has succeeded in negociating a treaty with the Kansas Indians for the purchase of the territory now occupied by them. The amount purchased is stated at two millions of acres, and includes some of the most desirable territory in the valley of the Missouri. A portion of the territory is intended for the location of the Pottawatomies. The Kansas move still farther West.

A Valentine at Bramhall's is priced at $200. Beside the ordinary and extraordinary beauties of this affair, you look under a bunch of rose-leaves and behold a fine gold watch of costly make and description. This may be called the hyperbole of Valentinery, and the lover who ventures on so expensive a token should have a purse as weighty as his person.

A. W. Gray, of Middletown, has invented a machine for making wrought nails. It can be worked by one horse or any other power equal, and turn out one hundred pounds per day, as smooth as cut nails, and better than those made by the hammer. It is thought to be a very valuable invention which promises much both to himself and community. He has already applied for letters patent.

Soap, the discovery of which is ascribed to the Gauls, appears to have had no other use among the ancients than that of a pomade for cleansing the hair, or for staining it with any colors which they chose to mix with it.

Trinity Church, within 91 years, has given about $400,000 in money to new churches in the city in addition to 104 lots of ground to Columbia College, 43 lots to St. Marks, 28 lots to the Protestant Episcopal Society, 25 lots to Grace Church, 3 lots to the Church Du St. Esprit, 6 lots to St. Michael's, 4 lots to St. James', and 32 lots to St. George's. The whole estate of Trinity Church is estimated at 50 millions!

Not less than 800,000 pigs of lead were shipped from Galena last year. The weight of each pig is 70 lbs.

A subscription is open in New Orleans for the relief of a veteran by the name of Sylvester, who commenced his career in the service of the United States, under Count De Esating! He is the only person alive who was in the fleet, and he also served in 1815.

A new Cotton Plant has been raised in Henry county, Ga., growing in the form of a large spreading bush, every branch of which is largely covered with balls. An acre of ground which would not produce 400 pounds of the common kind, will, it is said, yield 1,500 pounds of this description with great ease. It is called the "Money Bush."

Twenty tons of Poultry were killed in one week by Mr. Robert Fuller, poulterer, of Boston, Lincolnshire, for the London Christmas market, viz: 2,400 geese, 1,000 ducks, and 500 turkeys, in all weighing 40,000 lbs.

The Journal of Commerce says, the $15,000 subscription for the purchase of territory in Liberia is completed; and it would have been much sooner, had not the terms of it required that the whole amount should be paid by fifteen individuals. An additional subscription of $5,000 for the same object has been made in similar sums. With this $20,000 it is proposed to purchase the whole remaining territory from Cape Mount to Cape Palmas, and thus forever banish from 300 miles of the coast the accursed slave trade.

"The Stake," is the title of a new organization of the "Latter Day Saints," recently instituted at Cincinnati. They have denounced those who are opposed to the Smith family, and condemn the abrogation of the marriage contract. They also passed resolutions to "disfellowship" the Twelve, disowning their authority, and strongly condemning their practices with regard to holy stealing, the wanton shedding of blood, &c. They disapprove likewise of the Temple at Nauvoo, as having been built by usurpers, and distressing the poor.

There is now in the Treasury of Texas over $100,000, and the Collector of Galveston estimates that a sum equal to this will be forwarded to the Treasury at the close of the present quarter. Should the United States Government liquidate all expenses incurred by Texas on account of the measure of annexation, it is estimated that there will be in the Treasury of the State, at the the expiration of the term of President Jones, about $350,000.

An instance is related where fruit trees were in bad condition from the subsoil retaining too much moisture. The planting of willow trees near them was followed by a restoration of their health. This result was attributed to the willows absorbing the superabundant moisture.

Patrick Scanlon arrived in this city from Glasgow. His wife and nine children arrived at Quebec in the ship Astrea, from Sligo, Ireland, in September, 1842—since that time he has had no information of them, and he is very desirous of being made acquainted with their place of residence, that he may extend to them support and protection. If they should see this notice, they are urgently requested to address a letter immediately to Isaac T. Hopper of this city for him.

It is stated that Livingston and Wells traveled by themselves and their agents, more than 25,000 miles in pursuit of the robbers of their express agent.

A very poor and aged man, busied in planting and grafting an apple tree, was rudely interrupted by this intrerogation: "Why do you plant trees, who cannot hope to eat the fruit of them?" He raised himself up, and leaning upon his spade, replied, "Some one planted trees for me before I was born, and I have eaten the fruit; I now plant for others, that the memorial of my gratitude may exist when I am dead and gone."

If we seize a hair by the root with one hand, and draw it through the two fingers of the other, from the root towards the point, we experience scarcely any friction or any resistance, nor do we perceive any noise; but if, on pinching it by the point, we make it slide equally between the fingers of the other hand, from the point towards the root, we experience a resistance which does not exist in the first case, and a tremulousness perceptible to the touch is produced, which is also manifested by an audible sound.

The remainder of the pews in Grace Church were sold by auction on Tuesday, 10th inst. The whole receipts from the sale of the pews was $103,412. The total valuation $81,265, and the premiums $22,147.

An Italian monk wrote a life of St. Francis Xavier, where he asserted, that by one sermon he converted ten thousand persons on a desert island!

Charcoal, it is asserted, is an antidote for mineral poisons. It neutralizes even arsenic, according to the story.

A magistrate in Utica, suffered a man charged with an assault, to go and look for bail. The man went, and the magistrate, at the last accounts, was still waiting his return.

The Post says the Hibernia, Capt. Rye, brought the largest cargo of merchandize to Boston of any steamer that has been there. The duty on her cargo was $125,000. She also had $140,000 in specie. Value of cargo about $500,000.

In washing jewelry, or any thing ornamented with gold, it is a great improvement to pour in a few drops of salvolatile into the suds prepared for that purpose.

A distinguished farmer in England, taking the hint from the habits of swine, has lately invented a valuable machine, which he terms a 'hogs-head plough,' for the purpose of turning out potatoes which are planted in drills, without injuring them. It resembles a hog's snout attached to the front part of a plough without a colter, by which the potatoes are raised and turned out of their bed.

Rev. Mr. Kennard's church in Philadelphia, had been burdened for years with a debt of $10,000. With this debt still upon them, they recently subscribed $2,500 to Foreign Missions. One consequence was that within two weeks they, by another extra effort, paid about $6,000 on the debt, and thus placed themselves beyond further fear of trouble in relation to that burden.

The Indiana Legislature appropriated $40,000 for a Lunatic Asylum, and made provisions for a Deaf and Dumb Institution. It also passed an act giving discretionary powers to jurors, in all cases of murder in the first degree, either to punish capitally or by imprisonment for life in the State Prison.

A woman in Devonshire, England, lately carried her boy to be christened, telling the minister his name was Acts—being asked the reason of so odd a name, she said her husband and herself were religious folks, that having named four other boys for the evangelists, they intended to continue with the apostles.

The New Jersey House of Assembly has passed a resolution for the very useful and necessary purpose of employing a teacher in the State Prison. The sum appropriated, $300, is very small; but private benevolence must help the State in the performance of this its imperative duty. The Senate will, no doubt, assent to this very excellent resolution.

Great excitement prevails at Geneseo, Livingston County, in regard to the death of an unmarried lady of that place, in consequence of efforts to procure an abortion. The lady in question was respectably connected.

The inmates of the N. H. Asylum for the Insane have started a monthly paper, called "The Asylum Gazette." It is afforded at a cheap rate—4 copies for $1, or 10 copies for $2—proceeds to be applied to increasing the Asylum library.

About 30,000 Valentines went through our Post Office; 10,000 at Albany, 20,000 at Brooklyn, and 7,000 at New Haven. At Philadelphia, the postage on Valentines was $6,000.

A man has been killed in Pittsburgh by the bursting of a grindstone.

The Ohio and other Western waters are in fine navigable order.

A young gentleman of respectable family was standing in front of the Western Hotel at Springfield, Mass., a few days since, when he was accosted by a blunt-spoken person, who informed him that he was Sheriff Clapp, of Worthington, and that he was commissioned to arrest him for a forgery in which he was implicated. The young man, horrified at the accusation, plead his entire innocence of the charge, but all to no purpose—the Sheriff was inexorable, as Sheriffs always are—when a ray of hope appeared. The Sheriff, on their way to the jail, offered to clear him if he would give him fifteen dollars, and say nothing about the matter. This the prisoner eagerly complied with, and was set at liberty. It is almost needless to add, that the supposed Sheriff was a humbug, and that no forgery whatever had been committed. Rogers, the perpetrator of this misdemeanor, has since been arrested.

The Editor of the Court Journal has received from Germany a musical bed which receives the weary body and immediately 'laps it in Elysium.' It is an invention of a mechanic in Bohemia, and is so constructed that by means of hidden mechanism, pressure upon the bed causes a soft and gentle air of Auber to be played, which continues long enough to lull the most wakeful to sleep. At the head is a clock, the hand of which being placed at the hour the sleeper wishes to rise, when the time arrives, the bed plays a march of Spontani, with drums and cymbals, and, in short, with noise enough to rouse the seven sleepers. This unique bed becomes, therefore, the ne plus ultra for the wakeful as well as the sluggish.

MARRIED,

At Marlboro, N. J., on fifth-day, the 5th inst., by Eld. David Clawson, Mr. AMOS S. THOMAS and Miss ABIGAIL S. AYARS, all of Shiloh.

DIED,

At her residence in Shiloh, N. J., on the 3d of January, ANNA DAVIS, widow of James Davis deceased, in the 49th year of her age.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

President of the Board of Trustees

REMEMBER THE POOR.

"Remember the Poor, on their pallets of straw,
O'er whose frames dread disease casts a withering blight;
The wind through their hovels blows chilly and raw,
Making tedious and cheerless the long winter night.

When your tables are loaded by Luxury's hand,
And lavish profusion gives limitless store,
Forget not the sick and oppressed of our land,
In your alms and your prayers, O remember the Poor.

If a soul on the earth may be counted divine;
If a hand can be found that would honor a God;
a deed on the records of heaven shall shine;
If a foot treads the ground that would hallow the sod—

'Tis the foot that oft visits the mansions of woe;
'Tis the hand that spares not of its plentiful store;
'Tis the deed that makes angels of dwellers below;
'Tis the soul that relieves the distress of the Poor!"

From the New-York Evangelist.

THE VOICE WITHIN.

The beneficent and all-wise Creator, out of his mere good pleasure, created man, and endowed him with the largest capabilities of enjoyment. Supreme among all the pleasures of the soul, and the condition of happiness in the exercise of all the other affections. He established religious devotion—entire consecration of the creature to the Creator. And having thus made man perfect, he withdrew all restraint, and left him to follow the desires of his heart, a free agent. If there had been no evil, no sin in the universe, the creature thus formed would, for aught we know, have continued as pure as the angels of heaven, and have felt no desire so pleasurable as the love of God. But the principle of evil, the origin of which it were in vain for us to attempt to discover, came in contact with the pure spirit, and disaster and ruin followed. Man was lost; he that was but now an angel, has infused unto him a principle, the action of which none but God himself can prevent from making him a devil. It was then, when man had fallen, and the triumph of malignant spirits was most complete, that our bountiful benefactor, moved with compassion at our wretched condition, provided a ransom and a way of recovery. In process of time, the ransom was to be paid; and the way of recovery was by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. An influence ulterior to the desires of the natural heart, was to reside in man, and incline him to return to the embrace of infinite love. In infancy, in youth, in maturity, and in man's declining years, with never-ceasing importunity, is heard the Voice Within.

If the eyes that glance over these lines be lit with the fires of youth, and the heart that ponders these thoughts be as light as the butterfly floating in the sunbeam, yet even from the deep recesses of that heart, tears have sprung to dim the brightness of those eyes, when in moments of seclusion and thoughtfulness, the voice has been heard—Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them. Ah! gentle youth, obey that voice. Turn not away from infinite love, from adorable goodness. Yield to the cravings of thy better nature, and start in the path that leads to immortal happiness. However bright and buoyant your hopes of happiness in this world, be assured they deceive you, unless they are founded on the principle that the love of God is the highest happiness, making the exercise of every other affection ten times more delightful. And what if every one of those hopes be consumated? At the end of all, and when you have received all, death will claim you. Nothing is more certain than the fact that you will die. Your life is like a thread, stretched at full length at your birth, and ever since been winding up. When you first enjoyed the gift, it immediately began to decrease. The wheels of time took up your thread with those of the rest of mankind, and these wheels it is impossible to stop. The end must come, and then this world will know you no more. When that hour comes, the last of your life, you will look back to the giddy enjoyments which the world calls pleasure with utter abhorrence. Oh, you will say, could I but live those hours over again, I would spend them all in prayer, all in the service of God! Stop now. Now you have time to reflect, time to resolve. It is but to will and it is done. But this is not the first time you have heard this language—over and over again you have been entreated, and even almost persuaded, by the Voice Within, "Obey, and free salvation find."

And if the reader is borne down with the weight of years, and with the cares and disappointments which have crowded those years, so much the more able is he to testify to the genuineness of the warnings which that Voice, again and again, in his early years, enforced upon him. And now he looks back and sees all fulfilled. The Voice told him that the fame he sought for would prove like the apples of the desert, golden and fair without, but ashes and dust within. And he has found it so. The Voice told him that the love of friends, unless they were also friends of God, would prove inconsistent, selfish, insincere. And so he found it. "Riches," said the Voice, "will take to themselves wings and fly away." And whereas he was once rich, he is now poor—or the pleasure which he hoped wealth would give him, he has looked for in vain. From the world, the world without God, he has received nothing but disappointment, hollowness, vexation of spirit. And now that Voice speaks again, "Obey, and free salvation find."

It speaks to all. The young man hears it, and pauses in his wild career. The maiden hears it, and retires to weep in secret. The merchant hears it, and stops his pursuit of wealth. All have heard, and all obey or disobey. May death find thee, reader, obedient to that heavenly Voice. CONSERVER.

A short time since I attended a ministerial meeting in the western part of Massachusetts.—A part of the exercises consisted in the relating of religious experience. Among other things, several ministers present stated distinctly, that they received their first religious impressions from their mothers, and that they owed a large measure of their piety and usefulness to their teaching and prayers. It cannot, in the nature of things, be otherwise, than that children, young, tender, and confiding, should hearken to a mother's counsel, and be guided by her godly instructions. Who, we earnestly ask, is there so well adapted, both by relation and circumstances, to teach the child to lisp its prayers to its keavenly Father, and to train it up 'in the nurture and admonition of the Lord,' as the mother? One well authenticated fact should be more positive and conclusive than a thousand metaphysical opinions. And what an array of facts is almost daily presented to the mind; facts so well authenticated, and of such a character, as to carry along with them the clearest convictions of duty; and in view of which, parents who fail to discover and discharge their duty to their children, are verily guilty!

THE MANDARIN AND THE ENGLISH LADY.

The degraded position of females in China is well known. Nothing astonishes the Chinamen who visits our merchants at Hongkong so much as the deference which is paid to their ladies, and the position which the latter are permitted to hold in society. The very servants express their disgust at seeing our ladies permitted to sit at table with their lords, and wonder how men can so far forget their dignity. A young English merchant recently took his youthful wife with him to Hongkong, where the couple were visited by a wealthy mandarin. The latter regarded the lady attentively, and seemed to dwell with delight on her movements. When she at length left the apartment, he said to the husband, in his imperfect English, "What you give for that wife yours?" "O," replied the husband, laughing at the singular error of his visitor, "two thousand dollars." This our merchant thought would appear to the Chinese rather a high figure, but he was mistaken. "Well, said the Mandarin, taking out his book with an air of business, "spose you give her to me, I give you five thousand dollars." It is difficult to say whether the young merchant was more amazed or amused, but the grave air of the Chinaman convinced him that he was in earnest, and he was compelled therefore, to refuse the offer with as much placidity as he could assume. The Mandarin was, however, pressing, and went as high as seven thousand dollars. The merchant, who had no previous notion of the value of the commodity which he had taken out with him, was compelled at length to declare that Englishmen never sold their wives after they once came into their possession, an assertion which the Chinaman was slow to believe. The merchant afterwards had a hearty laugh with his wife, when he said he had just discovered her full value, as the Mandarin had offered him seven thousand dollars for her. [Liverpool Albion

A GOOD ANECDOTE.

"Frederick II., after the successful termination of the seven years' war, was always pleased to see old General Von Ziethen at his table, and whenever there were no foreign princes present, his appointed place was beside the king. On one occasion he was invited for Good Friday. Ziethen excused himself as not being able, inasmuch as he made it a point to partake of the sacrament on that great church festival, and desired to spend the remainder of the day in meditation.

"The next time he appeared at Sans-Souci to dinner, the conversation, as usual, assumed an intellectual and merry course, and he jocosely turned it on his neighbor in these words: 'Well, Ziethen, how did the supper of Good Friday agree with you?' The jovial table guests set up a cheering laugh; but the ancient Ziethen, after shaking his grey head indignantly, left his chair, then bowing respectfully to his majesty, he with a loud and firm voice, thus addressed the king.

"'Your majesty well knows that in war I shun no danger, and that whenever it has been necessary I have not hesitated to risk my life for you and my country. The same sentiment animates me still, and this very day, if you command, I will suffer my hoary head to be cut off, and loyally laid at your feet. But there is one above, who is more than you, and I, and all mankind: and that one is the Saviour and Redeemer of the world, who died for all, having purchased us by his precious blood.

"'I will, therefore, not submit to have the Holy One, on whom my faith reposes—who is my consolation in life, and hope after death, to be attached and derided. In the strength of this faith, your brave army courageously fought and conquered: if it is your majesty's pleasure to undermine this faith, then does your majesty lend a hand to undermine the State's welfare. What I have said is true—receive it graciously!'

"The king was visibly agitated by this speech. He stood up—offered his right hand to the brave old Christian General—put his left hand upon his shoulder, and said with emotion—'Happy Ziethen!—would that I could believe as you do! I have respect for your faith—hold fast to it; what has occurred to-day will never happen again!'"

SINGULAR AFFECTION IN A DOG.—The Licking Valley Register, published at Covington, Ky., gives the following instance of canine attachment to an animal not of its own species:

"There is a dog which has become so attached to a cow that he follows her day after day and rests with her night after night, never leaving but constantly and bravely protecting her from all molestation. He will permit nothing to approach her in any but a friendly manner. On one occasion several dogs attacted this object of his affection, and it was really amusing to see with what resolution and boldness he defended her against the aggression of his fellows. After he had vanquished his foes, he raised himself on his posterior legs and placing his fore-legs around her neck, caressed her most fondly.

A BRIGHT SCHOLAR.—"John," said the teacher, "suppose five birds were on one tree, and I should shoot and kill three of them, how many would there be left?"

"There would be three left," replied John very promptly.

"No," said the teacher, "there would be only two left, if I killed three out of five."

"The three you shot," said John, "would be left, and the other two would be gone; they would not be left after they had flown away, would they?

"That will do John," said the teacher, "you can take your seat."

A SURE SIGN.—A man with a red face and looking rather shabby, called at a house in the country on Sunday, and asked for a drink of cider. The good lady of the house told him she would not give him any. He urged, telling her that she had better, for some persons had entertained angels unawares. "Yes," said she, "I know that, but angels don't go about drinking cider on Sunday." Here was a sure sign that he was not an angel.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

HYMN FOR CHILDREN.

God is love! can this be true?
Yes, the Bible says it is,
Children, let me ask of you,
Have you ever thought of this,
That God is love?

God it was who sent his Son,
His only Son to bleed and die
For sinners ruined and undone:
Aloud the wounds of Jesus cry
That God is love.

God delights to pardon sin,
Grace and mercy to bestow,
Little children, though unclean,
Come to Him, and you shall know
That God is love.

Every poor repenting child
His arms are open to receive;
To such He says with accents mild,
"Helpless sinner, now believe
That God is love."

THE SUNDAY SCHOLAR.

A gentleman jumping from an omnibus in the city of New-York, dropped his pocket-book, and had gone some distance before he discovered its loss; then hastily returning, inquired of every passenger whom he met, if a pocket-book had been seen: finally meeting a little girl of ten years old, of whom he made the same inquiry, she asked, "what kind of a pocket-book?" He described it—then unfolding her apron—"is this it?" "Yes, that is mine—come into this store with me." He opened the book, counted the notes and examined the papers: "they are all right," said he; "fifteen notes of $1000 each—had they fallen into other hands, I might never have seen them again; take then, my little girl, this note of $1000, as a reward for your honesty." "I cannot take it," said the little girl. "I have been taught at Sunday school not to keep what is not mine, and my parents would not be pleased if I took the note home." "Well, then, show me where your parents live." The girl took him to an humble tenement in an obscure street; he informed the parents of the case; they told him their child had acted correctly—they were poor, it was true, but their pastor had always told them not to set their hearts on rich gifts. The gentleman told them they must take it, and he was convinced they would make a good use of it, from the principle they had professed.

The pious parents then blessed the benefactor, for such he proved; they paid debts which disturbed their peace, and the benevolent giver gave the father employment as a carpenter, enabling him to rear an industrious family in comparative happiness. This little girl is now the wife of a respectable tradesman in New-York, and has reason to rejoice that she was born of pious parents, who had secured their daughter's happiness by sending her to Sunday school.

THE YOUTH THAT WAS HUNG.

The sheriff took out his watch, and said, "If you have anything to say, speak now, for you have only five minutes to live." The young man burst into tears, and said—"I have to die. I had only one little brother; he had beautiful blue eyes, and flaxen hair, and I loved him; but one day I got drunk, for the first time in my life, and coming home, I found my little brother gathering strawberries in the garden, and I became angry at him without a cause, and killed him at one blow with a rake. I did not know anything about it until the next morning, when I awoke from sleep, and found myself tied and guarded, and was told that when my little brother was found, his hair was clotted with his blood and brains, and he was dead. Whiskey had done this. It has ruined me. I never was drunk but once. I have only one more word to say, and then I am going to my final Judge. I say it to young people. Never! Never! NEVER!! touch anything that can intoxicate." As he pronounced these words, he sprang from the box, and was launched into an endless eternity.

I was melted to tears at the recital, and the awful spectacle. My little heart seemed as if it would burst, and break away from my aching bosom, so intolerable were my feelings of grief. And there, in that carriage, while on that cushioned seat, looking with streaming eyes on the body of that unfortunate young man, as it hung, dangling and writhing between heaven and earth, as unfit for either place, there it was that I took the pledge never to touch the hurtful poison!

Long years have since passed away. White hairs have thickened around these temples, then so ruddy and so young, but I have never forgotten the last words of that young man. And I have never violated that pledge. When the tempter has offered to me the sparkling goblet, the words of that young man have seemed to sound in my ear again.—Old Man's Story.

GOOD FOR EVIL.

A little boy came to his mamma one rainy afternoon, as he returned from school, and said, "Mamma may I go just down the street with a little girl that goes to our school?"

She replied, "No, my son, it rains."

He said, "Why, ma, I must go."

"Well, then," said his mother, "go if you must."

On his return, she asked if the girl was a favorite of his.

He said, "O, no; she treats me very ill, worse than any other scholar in school."

"Then why do you wish to go with her?"

He said, "You have taught me that we must do good to them that despitefully use us, and she had a chair to take home, and I did not know of any other way to do her a kindness, so I thought I would carry it for her, and that would be rewarding good for evil."

EARTHLY JOY.

'Tis a flower that withers soon,
Often fades before 'tis noon;
'Tis a star of faintest light,
Oft conceal'd by clouds of night;
'Tis a stream, whose gentle flow
Whispers oft in sounds of woe:
But there is a joy more sweet,
Never followed by regret.
Wouldst thou have it? look above,
There it grows midst scenes of love,
Always fresh, and bright, and fair,
It will ever flourish there.

THE SECOND COMMANDMENT.

Exod. xx. 4, 5, 6—Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth; thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them; for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my comwandments."

This text is the second commandment of God's law. Like the first commandment it forbids idolatry, but more specifically prohibits image worship.

1. The text forbids our making any image.—This is doubtless to be understood in a religious sense; that is, we must make no image as an object of religious worship. Heathens often make their own gods of gold and silver, wood, and stone; some of them are large, and some of them are so small that they carry them in their pockets or slung around their necks.

2. The text forbids our making any likeness of any thing. An image might be made to be worshiped as God, without being a likeness of any thing after which it should be fashioned—hence, this addition to the command, forbidding the making of likenesses. This is also to be understood in a religious sense; it only forbids religious likenesses and pictures as objects of worship, or even as helps to worship. When we come to God, we must come directly, and not come through a picture hung up between us and the God we would worship. We must not make a likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, that is, any angel or departed saint. Nor any thing that is in the earth beneath; that is, any ox, horse, fowl, beast, or serpent, of any kind. Nor any thing that is in the water under the earth, that is, any fish, or dragon, or creeping thing that is in the water. The Egyptians worshiped many of these things, and so did the nations where they were going.

3. The text forbids our bowing down unto any such image or likeness. The heathen were in the habit of bowing down, or of falling on their faces before their idols, and the Roman Catholics do now bow down before the likeness of the Cross, and various pictures.

Here you have one of their pictures, representing Mary with the child Christ Jesus. They call her "Holy Mother," &c.

4. We are forbidden to serve them. This may mean that we must not believe the system of idol and image worship, must not sacrifice to them, or perform any religious rites with reference to them, or be under their influence.

5. The text assigns a reason for these prohibitions. First, God is a jealous God, punishing all that turn away from him to idols. He will not have his rights and his honor so slighted.—He will have our worship or punish us. He will visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation.—This means that God will punish the children, if they follow in the wicked ways of their fathers. If the children repent and reform, God will not punish them for their fathers' sins. See the 18th chap. of Ezek. But if children follow the wicked ways of their fathers, God will punish them to the third and fourth generations, even not only for their own sins, but for the sins of their fathers. God is here treating of idolatry as a national sin, and when nations sin, God punishes them; and as he bears long with them, the punishment for a national crime is not always sent until the third or fourth generation has passed away, so the punishment of a nation falls upon the children of the third or fourth generation, and for the sins which their fathers introduced. We will illustrate this point. We will suppose that the slavery of this country is very wicked; our fathers introduced it, but God did not visit them with severe judgments for their sin; if we their children would repent and abolish slavery, God would forgive this great national sin of our fathers, which we have now made our own by continuing it; but if the nation does not repent, but shall continue to practice slavery, God will punish the nation, when the sins of the fathers will be visited upon the children of the third or fourth generation. Jesus Christ appears to teach the same general principle in Matt. xxiii. 31, 32, 35.

"Wherefore ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from the blood of righteous Abel, unto the blood of Zecharias, son of Barachias, whom ye slew between the temple and the altar."

So may it be in this nation; the children, by approving of the deeds of their fathers who commenced slavery, may bring upon themselves the wrongs of all the slaves.

A second reason which the text assigns why we should obey this command, is, God shows mercy unto thousands of them that love him and keep his commandments. The meaning is, that God will have mercy upon and bless all such as love and obey him.

We have now explained the text, and will close with a very few remarks.

1. It appears very strange that such a command should be necessary to prevent men and women from making gods out of wood and stone and of bowing down to them; yet such is the blindness of the human mind. Many now worship gods which they have made, and which are no better than any stick or stone our young readers can pick up in the streets.

2. The great folly of worshiping idols is described in the 115th Psalm. David is speaking of images made in the form of a man. He says,

"Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands. They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not. They have ears, but they hear not; noses have they, but they smell not. They have hands, but they handle not; feet have they, but they walk not: neither speak they through their throat. They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them."

3. How thankful should we be that God has not left us in such ignorance as to worship such senseless things.

But remember, children, that in proportion to our privileges and our knowledge will be our guilt, if we do not worship and obey the true God. [Juvenile Wesleyan.

LITTLE THOMAS,

Or the boy who gave evidence that he was a Christian, when he was only six years old.

'Mother,' said a little girl, as she seated herself beside a lady who was employed in sewing, 'I wish you would tell me some more about little Thomas.'

Little Thomas was a cousin of Emily's, for this was the little girl's name. He was a very bright and interesting child, and Emily had loved him very much, but he was now dead. He had died of the scarlet fever, just one week before Emily made this request of her mother. Mrs. Hastings (for by this name I shall call Emily's mother) had been with her little nephew almost all the time that he had been sick. For a year before he died, his Christian friends had rejoiced in the belief that he had given his heart to the Saviour, and in his last illness he had given sure evidence of his love for him.

Mrs. Hastings had already told Emily something about his patience and resignation, but she had returned home from her sister's house only the day before, so she had not had time to talk with her much about him. Now, however, she complied with her daughter's request, by saying, 'Yes, my dear, I will willingly tell you more about your dear cousin. He bore his suffering so patiently, and his death was so peaceful and happy, that I love to talk about him. When I arrived at your aunt's, the physician had just pronounced his disease to be beyond the reach of medicine. I went immediately to his chamber. He welcomed me with a sweet smile, and thanked me for coming to see him. That night I watched with him, and once or twice the dear child urged me to lie down and try to sleep. He appeared to suffer a great deal of pain, but he did not once murmur. Towards morning he grew very restless, and as I bent over him, and expressed a wish to relieve him, he said, 'Will you pray for me that I may be patient?' I offered up a short prayer, and when I had closed, he said: 'What a comfort it is to pray, it seems to bring the Saviour close to me.' When his mother came into the room soon after, he bade her good morning with a cheerful smile. Seeing tears in her eyes, he said, 'Do not weep, dear mother, I am going to heaven, where I shall see my father again, and I am going to my dear Saviour too. I wish you could go with me. But it will only be a little while, and you will come too.'

After this, he failed very fast, and when the physician came in, he said he could not live many hours. Thomas overheard him, and said, 'I shall soon be with Jesus, then.' These were the last words he spoke. He motioned afterwards to kiss his mother, and when she asked him to raise his hand a little if the Saviour was with him, he lifted it up, and smiled so sweetly. And he seemed to die with that very smile upon his lips. When he drew his last breath, I felt less like mourning his loss than like thanking God for his safe and pleasant passage to heaven.

Here Mrs. Hastings stopped speaking, and Emily's tearful eyes and quivering lips showed that her feelings had been much moved by her mother's narrative.

A CHILD'S PRAYER ANSWERED.

Prayers are often answered at the present day. A Sunday scholar in Yorkshire heard a minister say that "prayerless persons would not go to heaven." It deeply impressed her mind. When she returned home she repeated it to her mother, and added, "Mother, you never pray." "I cannot pray," was the reply. "Yes, mother, you can pray," continued the little girl. "I tell you I cannot pray," answered the mother angrily. "Then mother, I'll pray for you." She knelt down and prayed, "Lord, forgive my mother, and save her from swearing. O Lord forgive my father, and keep him from getting drunk." The father, who was then at a tavern, drinking, came home immediately, and finding his daughter in the act of praying for him and his wife, his mind was deeply impressed. This conduct of the little girl was the means of the hopeful conversion of both her parents.

AFFECTING DESTITUTION.

We see it stated in the papers, that three children, not twelve years old, were found not long since, in the city of New-York on a cold night, sleeping upon a box, because they had no parents or home to go to. Children that have kind parents to provide for them, and comfortable beds to sleep in, and to keep them warm, should be kind to their parents, thankful to God, and mindful of the poor children that are often cold and hungry.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION—NO. 8.

Our Sunday Laws are Jewish Laws Puritanized.

Writers who observe the first day for a Sabbath, frequently make such affirmations as the following:—

"The Sabbath, so far as it is ceremonial, is abolished; and therefore we are not tied or bound unto any certain times." Zuinglius on Col. 2: 15.

"The carnal ordinances of the Jewish worship came to an end to make way for the establishment of that spiritual worship which is to endure to all eternity." Edwards' History of Redemption; period 3d.

"The Sabbath of the fourth commandment, like each of the other Sabbaths peculiar to national Israel, was to continue only during the Mosaic dispensation. . . . . As a decisive proof that the Sabbath of the fourth commandment was peculiar to national Israel, none but Jews were liable to the deadly penalty for violating it. . . . . Nor is there, that I recollect, a single divine charge of Sabbath breaking upon sacred record, before or after the Mosaic dispensation. . . . . The keeping of the Sabbath is not among the necessary things, which the Holy Ghost in the apostles required of the gentiles converted to the faith of the Gospel." Parkinson's Letters—2d.

It is believed that these quotations express, as clearly as can be expressed, the sentiments of a large portion of the observers of the first day; hence the faith of those Christians who observe the seventh day is often represented as a strange mixture of Christian and Jewish sentiments. This is a grave matter, worthy of consideration; for if there be any thing peculiarly pertaining to the Mosaic laws which is done away or abolished by the gospel, it must be those penalties which were attached to the violation of the several parts of the Mosaic ritual. It is that feature of it, which the Apostle Paul calls the ministration of death, than which he says the gospel is much more glorious. In this great truth, all believers in Christianity rejoice. If it were not so, the adulteress and the adulterer, the blasphemer of Jehovah, and the reviler of his parents, must, on conviction, be put to death, with the violator of the Sabbath day.

One might naturally expect, that persons holding that the Sabbath was peculiarly Jewish, and as such was done away with the Mosaic dispensation, would permit the Lord's day to rest upon its own popular merits. But one popular sect has a great influence upon another in things which they observe in common. Hence the prevalence of Puritan notions respecting the Sabbath.

Some Presbyterians claim for the Christian church a continuation of the Jewish religion, with little change, except of religious rites, by virtue of the Abrahamic covenant. "The Jewish Society before Christ, and the Christian Society after Christ, are one and the same church in different dispensation. In fact, the Christian church is a branch of the Abrahamic." W. L. Macalla, on Baptism.

It is not surprising, that with such sentiments as these, "the Puritans, those stern defenders of the faith once delivered to the saints, ... and from whom we have received the priceless inheritance of our civil and religious privileges, should have the immortal honor of first giving to the world the (modern Christian) Sabbath." The individual who first promulgated the true doctrine of the (modern) Christian Sabbath, was the Rev. Nicholas Bound, D. D., of Norton, in the county of Suffolk, England. About the year 1595, he published a famous book, entitled, "Sabbathum veretis et Novi Testamenti; or, the true doctrine of the Sabbath." So says the Theological Review, Vol. 1, No. 3, 1844. This book met with a very general approval among the Puritan party; and among the pious and devout of those times, the observation of a first day Sabbath became a capital part of what was considered evangelical religion. But this feature of their faith was warmly opposed by the writings of Theophilus Brabourne, Dr. Peter Heylyn, and others. However, being cruelly harassed and persecuted by Elizabeth Tudor, James Stuart, and his son Charles, successively monarchs of England, after various efforts to find repose, in 1627, an association of Puritans residing in Dorchester, England, and vicinity, was formed for the purpose of planting a colony in New England, to which they and their brethren might repair, and, in seclusion and safety, worship God according to the dictates of conscience. They obtained from the Plymouth Company a grant of the territory which now comprises a part of the State of Massachusetts, and sent over, under the direction of John Endicott, a small number of people to begin a plantation. These, in September, landed at a place called by the Indians Naumkeak, and by themselves Salem. . . . . One great object of the Puritans, in retiring to the unoccupied regions of New England, was to establish a commonwealth as nearly upon the model of that of the Jews, as the difference of circumstances would admit. To accomplish this object, they deemed it necessary—and at a general court, held in 1631, they ordained—that none but those who had made a profession of religion, and had become members of some church, should be admitted members of the corporation, or enjoy the privilege of voting. See Hale's History of U. S. pp. 29, 31.

We have always entertained a high esteem for the piety and self-denial of the Puritan Fathers of New England—and do so yet. They were good men, and had strong hearts. Nobly they endured the privations incident to their religious faith.—They were, however, but men, and indulged human passions in carrying out the prepossessions of their own minds. It has often been a matter of surprise, that men leaving a land of tyranny, and making a home in the wilderness, for the sake of enjoying freedom for their faith, and liberty for their own consciences, could immediately proceed to enact laws as arbitrary in their operation upon others, as those they had escaped from had been upon themselves. Indeed, one can hardly help suspecting them of designing retribution upon the Episcopalians, for their hard usage of themselves and their forefathers; and upon other sects, for their opposition to their views of Christian institutions and ecclesiastical polity. That the reader may see that we have not indulged these suspicions without occasion, let him recollect, that it was Episcopalianism, enforced by the laws of the Tudors and the Stuarts, that drove the Puritan exiles from their native land, and then compare the laws of the New England Puritan commonwealth with the laws of the English realm at that time, and say if we have indulged a far-fetched suspicion. It was enacted by the 35th Eliz. c. 1—

"If any person refusing to repair to church, shall be present at any assembly, meeting, or conventicle, under any pretence of any exercise of religion, he shall be imprisoned till he conform; and if he shall not conform in three months, he shall abjure the relm; which, if he shall refuse to do, or after abjuration shall not go, or shall return without license, he shall be guilty of felony, without benefit of clergy. And whether he shall abjure or not, he shall forfeit his goods, and shall forfeit his lands during life."

This law was enforced with much rigor by Elizabeth, James I., Charles I., and Charles II. Of course it bore hard upon the Puritans; it drove Mr. John Robinson and his congregation to Leyden in Holland, and afterwards to Massachusetts Bay. Finding an asylum in the wilderness for their faith, and freedom for their religious opinions, others soon followed them. Why then not make it the home of the free for all sects, acknowledging one Almighty Maker, and looking to one common Redeemer for the salvation of their souls? Why enact that every man must become a member of one of the churches of their standing order, before he could be admitted a member of a civil corporation, or enjoy the privilege of voting? It may be that they considered it a necessary provision for the safety of their ecclesiastical order and civil polity; but they must have known, that this was the professed object of the arbitrary and persecuting laws of England. The conviction, therefore, still forces itself upon our minds, that with all their high professions, and undoubted self-denial, they suffered the feelings of the man to outstrip the Christian, and designed to retaliate upon their opponents. Doubtless, however, it was associated in their minds with a pious zeal for an Abrahamic Christian church; and they considered it authorized by the examples set them in the divinely instituted penalties of the Jewish commonwealth.

It was under this form of government, and amid these attendant circumstances, that the first Sunday laws were enacted in America. It was no surprising thing, therefore, that when the Quakers appeared in New England, in 1656, with their no-Sabbath sentiments, "a law was passed prohibiting Quakers from coming into the colony, imposing the penalty of banishment upon the first offence, and of death upon such as should return after banishment." Four individuals were actually executed under this law. Such, we say, was the origin of the Sunday laws now in force in these United States. To the influence, in our State Governments, of worthy successors of these Puritans who have the immortal honor of first giving to America the true doctrine of the modern Christian Sabbath, we owe the perpetuation of the Sunday laws upon our statute books at the present day. These facts make it plain, that the idea of Sunday being the Sabbath is Puritan in its origin, and that the restrictions for its observance are from the same source. They produced it by an attempt to make the Christian church one and the same with the Jewish, with new laws suited to their ideas of Christianity.

It is not our object, in this article, to discuss the theological question which this subject involves; but to prove the position, that our Sunday laws are Jewish and Puritan in their character and origin. Passages without number can be brought from the writings of the most distinguished Presbyterians to prove the same fact. No point, however, on which they treat, places the subject in a more conspicuous light than their admissions respecting the Sabbath law, a few instances of which we will now give:—

"That we have a precept or a passage of Scripture saying, in so many terms, that Christ or the apostles made the change in question, is not pretended." Rev. A. A. Phelps, p. 105.

"No law appears to have been given by Christ to his apostles, either for the abrogation of the Jewish Sabbath, or for the institution of the Lord's day, or for the substitution of the first day for the seventh day." Theological Review, Vol. 1, No. 3, 1844.

"The Sabbath, as an institution, cannot be abrogated. . . . . No change can take place in the Sabbath as an institution, or in the obligation to observe it. . . . . A selection of the day is of course of the nature of a positive institution, and is subject, like every thing else of that nature, to change or abrogation, whenever there are good and sufficient reasons for it." Rev. A. A. Phelps, p. 99.

We have it, then, from the advocates of Sunday legislation themselves, that there exists no divine law for the establishment, much less for the enforcement, of Sunday laws; but it is done by an inferential application of the Jewish Sabbath laws to the Christian Sabbath. There is absolutely nothing in the Christian code to require it. Is this, then, the strong ground for requiring all citizens of this republic to observe Sunday for a Sabbath by pains and penalties? As well may they infer the obligation to put witches to death, because it was a law of the Jewish commonwealth! And, indeed, has not this been so done? As we abjure the theology which thus perverts the Word of God, so we dispute the justice of that legislation which attempts to enforce such error and unrighteousness by a law.

THE JEWS OF RICHMOND AND THE SABBATH.

The members of the Common Hall of the city of Richmond, Va., have taken considerable trouble to write themselves down bigots. It seems that there has long been a law in Virginia imposing a small fine for working on Sunday. But public sentiment has not sanctioned the law, and hence it has remained a dead letter upon the statute books. Recently, however, the Common Hall catching the spirit which is abroad in the land, have increased the fine for Sunday labor to five or ten dollars, and have undertaken to enforce their ordinance requiring all men to rest on what they are pleased to call the "Christian Sabbath." This course has brought them in contact with the Jews, who have refused to comply with the ordinance, and have sent in a petition, stating their grievances, and asking for redress. Their petition is published in "the Occident," and contains so many suggestions which are applicable to other cases, that we venture to copy it entire, notwithstanding its great length:—

To the worshipful, the members of the Common Hall of the City of Richmond:

The petition of the subscribers, Israelites, residing within the limits of the City, humbly sheweth:

That your petitioners are members of a religious community, the object of whose constant endeavor it has always been to demean themselves as order-loving and law-obeying citizens, and they aver, that they may favorably compare with any other portion of the community, in respect to honesty, fair-dealing, and moral deportment. They ascribe this general evidence of good citizenship to the religion which it is their happiness to profess, which has descended to them from a long line of virtuous ancestors, and which, in this free State of Virginia, which knows no distinction among its children, secured to them without molestation or hindrance from any religious or political quarter, by those blessed instruments of freedom of body and of conscience, the Constitution of the United States, and the Constitution and the Bill of Rights of our venerable Commonwealth. The Israelites of Virginia have been long known for their sterling character; few indeed have been subjected to arrest and trial for any crime, and the prisons and penitentiaries, they confidently assert, will exhibit but a small portion of their inmates as belonging to their co-religionists. Your petitioners may with pride refer to the names of some of their predecessors who have descended to an honorable grave, some of them in extreme old age, rarely reached except by the pursuit of the strictest temperance and virtue; and they claim that such men as Moses Myers, of Norfolk, Israel and Jacob I. Cohen, Samuel Myers, Jacob Mordecai, Solomon Jacobs, Joseph Marx, Zalma Rehine, Baruch and Manuel Judah, and many others, have left their examples in many respects as merchants and citizens, to be safely followed by others. In times, too, when the country was in danger from invasion by a foreign foe, the Israelites of Richmond snatched up arms at the first alarm, and at the memorable attack on the frigate Chesapeake, they were found foremost amidst those who hastened forward to be ready at the call of their country. They felt themselves blessed that their limbs were free and their hands unshackled to serve the country which looked upon them as children, dear alike with all other persuasions; and they were rejoiced, that feeble as might be their aid, small though their numbers were, they could strike at least one blow against the enemy who threatened the peace of their firesides; for the country, too, was theirs—they were part of the legislative power, alike in the eye of the law, not distinguished by any disqualification because of their belief or religious conduct.

Your petitioners have for their part always entertained the highest affection for the soil of the State, which is theirs, either by birth or adoption, and they mean that should—which God in his mercy forfend—the enemy threaten again our beloved country, to be foremost among its defenders, and to lavish treasure, blood, and counsel, to insure its safety.

With these feelings animated, your petitioners have perceived, with unfeigned regret, that your honorable body, by its ordinance entitled, "An Ordinance for the more effectual suppression of Sabbath-breaking," passed August 11th, 1845, has endeavored to abridge their constitutional rights to labor, unobtrusively and within doors, on the first day of the week, called Sunday. The Israelites have no conscientious scruples, which could in any wise make labor on that day appear to them as sinful. They, however, feel bound, by the dictates of their religion, to observe sacred as a day of worship and abstinence from labor the seventh day of the week, commonly called Saturday; and hence they think that a compulsory rest on the first likewise, would materially injure them in the pursuit of happiness, which is the natural and inalienable right of every man. They are ready to submit to any municipal law which looks towards the preservation of peace, and upholding the rights of any, even the humblest individual: hence they would not, against the law of the State, though they might question its authority, compel or induce their domestics of another persuasion, to do the usual amount of day's labor on the Sunday, should they deem resting from labor a religious obligation. They do not wish to enter into an inquiry as to the necessity of any Sabbath or day of rest, on moral grounds: they are satisfied that the institution, as revealed in the Bible, is of paramount importance to man, to reinvigorate him for renewed toil by a day of calm, of rest, and of reflection;—but they contend that they are justly entitled to choose for themselves what day they wish to rest, whilst they do not interfere with any other person. The Bible speaks to your petitioners in emphatic terms of a day of rest on the seventh day of every week, and they deem themselves compelled by their understanding of the Scriptures, to hallow this day as a Sabbath, and no other. They themselves ask for no legislative enactment to require others to rest on their Sabbath, and they contend that no class of citizens has a right, on constitutional grounds, to require them to rest on the first or any other day. It is not evidently an observance without which society could not exist: hence they deem that society at large has no concern with the observance of a Sabbath, as is the case with compulsory honesty, the abstinence from homicide and incest, which infractions, if tolerated, would subvert the structure of civil government, by undermining the basis on which society rests for its security. Your petitioners are perfectly well aware, that there is a strong tide setting in favor of keeping more strictly than formerly the first day of the week as a Sabbath, and they know that the term "Lord's Day," formerly in vogue, has lately given way in most cases to the Jewish term Sabbath, which signifies rest—by which perversion of terms the heads of the dominant churches have endeavored to make it appear that their adopted day of rest and worship is indeed the biblically ordained day of rest. Now, your petitioners mean to assert, that even if this assertion be true, and that Sunday-keeping is a portion of the decalogue enactment, it would still be one of those religious observances over which, of right, the civil power of this happy republic has no controll any more than over Jewish circumcision, infant baptism of the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches, the immersion of adults of the Baptists, or the confession and extreme unction of the Roman Catholic body. The policy of the State of Virginia, was never intended to favor any religious dogmas; these were left to individuals to choose at their pleasure; and only by implication as against good morals, can any system of worship, even the absurdities of Paganism, be prevented through the legitimate enactments of Legislatures or City Councils.

If, now, it is in the power of your worshipful body to step aside out of the usual course of conservators of the public peace to enact a compulsory keeping of the Sunday, by declaring it to be Sabbath, your petitioners see no limits why next you might not deem infant or adult baptism, the confession or extreme unction, the partaking of the sacrament, or the frequenting of churches, or all of these acts combined, as legitimate subjects of your vigilance, and to enforce them or any one of them, by an imposition of fines and imprisonment. Your petitioners are well aware that no such attempt against the liberty of conscience is dreamt of; but they especially, since they are in the minority, they will admit immensely so, if compared with the Christian population, feel themselves impelled to raise their voice respectfully but solemnly against this first breach of their right by your legislating for a class, not the whole of the community, which you represent. Your petitioners would respectfully call your attention to one fact, that there are many Christians even in Virginia, who conscientiously reject the Sunday, and keep the Jewish Sabbath as a day of rest. If, therefore, many Christians observe the first day of the week, there are others who attach no sacredness to it: how then can your worshipful body attempt to fix with certainty, the proper day of the Sabbath, upon the mere clamor of those who profess to be the sole expounders of religion? Your petitioners, indeed, do not see how any one can defend, upon the broad ground of equality, under the law, the wholesale condemnation of one portion of citizens, for differing upon the propriety of resting on any given day. Suppose the Israelites and Seventh-day Baptists should be the majority in any community in this State, would not the hue and cry of persecution be raised against them, through the whole length and breadth of the land, for compelling Catholics, Episcopalians, and Methodists, to close their places of business and retire from the field and workshops at sundown of the sixth day of the week? Your petitioners admit that such an act would be an outrage upon the rights of those classes, and with their present mode of thinking, much as they honor the day ordained to them as sacred by their blessed religion, they would raise their voice against those of our fellow-Israelites, who should attempt so to outrage the rights of their Christian neighbors.

Your petitioners see with sorrow the manifestation of the sectarian spirit, which deems it paramount to bring every one to its own mode of thinking. The American United States are the bulwark of liberty, whither the oppressed of all parties have for many years been enabled to come, to be secure against the wiles and tyranny of political and religious oppressions. They see, however, with deep regret, that a new spirit is abroad: that the rulers of churches, and their adherents, are not satisfied with their equal portion of liberty, which is theirs in common with all other citizens, but must invoke the aid of civil power to enable them to propagate their doctrines and practices. They feel that this is but the beginning of a revolution backwards, to abridge the rights of individuals, which have been opened as wide as the gates of mercy, by the sages of the Revolution. They believe that your legislation is in contravention of the Constitution and Bill of Rights of this State, by assigning to Sunday-keeping Christians more legal protection than is accorded to the Jews and the Seventh-day Baptists; they therefore feel almost confident, that if an appeal were properly brought before the highest judicial authority of the State, your ordinance would be annulled. But they love peace, and wish to pursue it in the genuine spirit of their religion; they love their fellow-citizens, and are proud of the good sense of the republic; they believe that freemen, when correctly informed, are always willing to act rightly, and repair any wrong which they may have accidentally committed. Your petitioners are therefore anxious to avoid an appeal to the legal tribunal, and they come before your worshipful body as humble petitioners, who crave of your wisdom and sense of justice, not to abridge them in the enjoyment of their religious liberty. They claim to be Israelites from conviction; they claim to remain so unmolested, from the security guaranteed unto them by the fundamental laws of the State, and they appeal to each and all of you, from your own knowledge you have of them, whether they do not deserve, from their uniform good conduct, to be left in undisturbed enjoyment of all the liberties and privileges of freemen, which they have hitherto enjoyed in common with their fellow-citizens.

Your petitioners wish also to state, that it is not for the sake of any profit Sunday labor might bring them, that they ask for the revocation of the to them obnoxious ordinance; for if this were all, they would cheerfully submit. But it is because it acts as a bounty to other persuasions, as an acknowledemgnt on the part of the city of a particular system or systems of religion, that they complain; and they sincerely think that any unprejudiced person will come to the same conclusion—that the keeping of the Sunday is no subject for municipal regulation, but ought to be referred to the exclusive action of the various ministers of the gospel, who may, if they can do so by persuasion, induce every inhabitant of the land to rest on this day. It is indeed an anomaly in a free and equal country, for the ministers just mentioned to invoke the aid of the civil power to enable them to get their day of rest universally respected; and your petitioners hope that your honorable body will clearly distinguish that in granting such a request, you take away, by so much as it is granted, the rights of those who entertain different views with regard to the necessity of keeping another day, or of those who deem it immaterial to keep any day of rest at all. Virginia has always been foremost in the upholding of liberal principles. The resolutions of '98 are justly the boast of our Commonwealth. Your petitioners earnestly call upon your worshipful body to aid them in making a stand against the spirit of sectarian domination, which is now threatening, by slow degrees, to foist itself upon our country, and to restore them to the rights they would constitutionally enjoy, were it not for the late ordinance and the old State law, which is a dead letter upon the statute book.

And your petitioners, will ever pray.

ROBERT HALL.

Early in the year 1799, Mr. Hall was attacked by a violent fever, which threatened his life, so that in his own apprehension he was for some days on the borders of eternity. The state of his mind at this solemn season may be collected from a letter to the Rev. James Phillips:

"I have never before felt my mind so calm and happy. Filled with the most overwhelming sense of my unworthiness, my mind was supported merely by a faith in Christ crucified. I would not for the world have parted with that text, 'The blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin.' I had never before seen such a beauty and a grandeur in the way of salvation by the death of Christ, as on that occasion. I am fully persuaded the evangelical doctrines alone are able to support the mind in the near view of death and judgement. May you and I be more and more grounded in a conviction of their truth and acquainted with their power! It is to these doctrines the revelation of Christ is chiefly indebted for its efficacy on the hearts and lives of men."

Humility and love will do great things towards unanimity; but forced unanimity is the highest refinement of spiritual tyranny. It is being compelled to believe as the church believes, and that not only on subjects clearly revealed and of great importance, but in matters of mere opinion, in which the most upright minds may differ, and to which no standard can apply. What can he who "exalteth himself above all that is called God," do more than set up his decisions as the word of God, and require men on pain of excommunication to receive them? [Rev. Andrew Fuller.

BIBLICAL CURIOSITY.—The 21st verse of Ezra, chapter 7, contains every letter in the alphabet, and is the only one thus distinguished:

"And I, even I, Artaxerxes the King, do make a decree to all the treasurers which are beyond the river, that whatsoever Ezra the Priest, the scribe of the law of God of Heaven, shall require of you, it shall be done speedily."

PROGRESS OF THE BILL OF EQUAL RIGHTS.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Dear Sir,—I have had some difficulty in keeping you apprised of the progress of the bill before the Legislature of this State, (New Jersey,) to secure to the Seventh-day People, their religious rights; and from an evident disposition in many of the members of the Assembly, "to choke it off," I can scarcely acquaint you, now, of its present situation and prospects.

When the Bill came up for consideration, Mr. Townsend, (a Methodist preacher,) made a determined opposition to it, and endeavored "to damn it with faint praise" of our people; and he succeeded in creating prejudice against it, by insinuations and suspicions against its design; intimating, as I understand from a member, that it contained power which might hereafter be used to force the first-day people to observe the seventh day, just as they now force us to observe their day. This is not set forth so openly in his published speech; but he did not hesitate to say: "Sir, I would suspect, from the vague and indefinite character of this bill, that there is something intended that is not expressed; some acquisition of privileges and powers, of a special and exclusive kind, which, if possessed, would lead to the infringement of the rights of others, composing a large majority of our fellow citizens;" thus conveying the impression that it might or would be used to impose the observance of the seventh day upon other Christians; which all interested in the matter would peremptorily repudiate. It is a disingenuous and dishonest imputation—the language of the bill authorizes no such inference.* It is the coinage of a contracted, an unchristian-like mind, though uttered by a professed minister of the cross.

To save the bill from defeat, endangered by this insidious and invidious attack, a friend moved that it be re-committed for amendment; the mover designing to append part of the Rhode Island law, allowing the Seventh-day Baptists to enjoy their immunities within their own settlements. As this does not meet the principle involved, I determined to rally our friends in Middlesex and Essex, and have them repair to Trenton on Monday last; as the "Revised Act," which contains all the former obnoxious features of the old law, was postponed, at the instance of the same gentleman, until the following day, (Tuesday,) that our friends might come on and have it amended to meet their views. But the severe storm of the 12th inst. prevented me from venturing out from home that distance, under those circumstances. However, I wrote to Mr. Phillips, the Chairman of the Committee, stating, that in case of the failure of any of our friends being on the ground at that time, to make report, from the Select Committee, before the Revised Act on Vice and Immorality should come up on Tuesday last.—That in case there were any just apprehensions of the kind alluded to above, (but which I regarded as a disingenuous ruse to defeat the bill,) to report the same bill with the following proviso, as the amendment:—

"Provided, That, inasmuch as it is the design of this Act to declare the religious equality, rights, and privileges of all the citizens of the State, and to exonerate all persons who religiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, from being forced to keep two days of every week holy, and exempt them from the penalties imposed by the Act entitled 'An Act for the Suppression of Vice and Immorality,' passed March 16th, A. D. 1798, for pursuing their lawful occupations on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday,—this Act shall not be so construed as to impose any penalties on those persons who religiously observe the first day of the week as the Sabbath, in pursuing their lawful occupations on the seventh day, commonly called Saturday."

I further urged, that if this amendment was not adopted by the Committee, (of which I did not entertain very sanguine expectations, as you cannot fail to discover it contains a considerable sprinkling of irony,) they make report, recommending the repeal of all of the fourth section of the old law, after the word "discharged," which would remove the most obnoxious parts. It would then make this provision for the Seventh-day people—a just and righteous award to them:—

Sect. IV. If any person charged with having labored or worked on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, shall be brought before a justice of the peace to answer the information and charge thereof, and shall then and there prove, to the satisfaction of the said justice, that he or she uniformly keeps the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, and habitually abstains from all recreation, and devotes the day to the exercise of religious worship, then such defendant shall be discharged.

I also addressed a letter, under cover to Mr. Phillips, to any of our friends who might appear at Trenton, to attend to our interests; but have not had any tidings in relation to it. I have carefully examined the daily proceedings of the Assembly, as reported for the public prints, but have not seen any report from the committee, nor any notice of further action on the Revised Bill on Vice and Immorality. By the proceedings of Monday, the 9th inst., I find the consideration of this bill postponed until Thursday, 12th inst.; but I have not seen any further postponement to Tuesday, as informed, privately, by a member; neither can I find any proceedings in the matter since that time. Whether it remains in statu quo, or has been pushed through in its original state, I cannot learn. I am afraid that there is a determined purpose prevailing, to trample upon our rights.

Who are these Seventh-day Baptists, and what are they contending for? say many of the supercilious, invested with a "little brief authority," and why are they not content to enjoy, in quietness, the "undoubted privilege" of meeting together and worshiping the Almighty on the seventh day?

Are they a band of heretics and outcasts, that other Christians have to cry, Dog! dog!! and they have to entreat other denominations to tolerate them? No! They are a large body of evangelical followers of the Lord Jesus, who are "well spoken of by all people." Their standing, for piety and godliness, is not inferior to any other sect in the State. They are men, and citizens of the State, on an equality with all others—entitled to all the privileges and immunities of other men. They are freemen—independent freemen!—integral parts of the body politic—who have the same claims as others to protection, and who will maintain them.

What do they contend for? Their unalienable rights—the right to worship God Almighty according to the dictates of His law, who is the Law-Giver in Zion, and not be compelled to keep "the commandments of men." They contend, that they are entitled to the same consideration as any other class of citizens; they deny the prerogative of any secular power to enact any laws, giving exclusive privileges to any sect, or combination of sects, or of imposing penalties on others for non-conformity. They are freemen! and claim the privileges of freemen!! If the Legislature pass a partial law, in defiance of the guarantee of the Constitution, to secure the observers of the first day of the week, not only from molestation, but from having their "sensibilities pained," and restrain all others, to sanctify that day, the Seventh-day People, (although they do not set up the pretension,) have just as good a right, under the Constitution of the State—the fundamental law of the land—and with which all the statutes must be made to harmonize, or may at any moment be quashed,—to demand, that they be protected, not only from molestation, but from having their sensibilities pained. They ask not this. They would never have thought, for an instant, of asking legislation to secure to them their Sabbath, nor to impose it upon others. They leave that to men's consciences and the moral sense of the community.

Has it come to this in America—the land of freedom!—the boasted asylum for the oppressed of all nations—that a religious society of "good report" is put under ban? What has been gained by our forefathers, having left the iron glebe of despotism? Our democratic legislators say, "We may enjoy our seventh-day Sabbath." But they say more: "You must also keep holy the first day." Where do they derive any such authority from the Constitution—our Magna Charta? We deny it, and, if forced, will defy it to an issue—not by force, but by appeal to the supreme tribunal of the land, to set aside and wipe from the statute books so infamous a law. Where is the country in Europe, at the present day, that would not grant us the privilege of meeting together on the seventh day? A Romish or Moslem hierarchy would not withhold that "boon." What peculiar privileges, then, do we enjoy as American citizens—as citizens of New Jersey? Absolutely none. If the dominant party may force us to keep days holy, not enjoined by the Scriptures, what is to prevent them from forcing us to support a state or national ecclesiastical establishment? And if permitted to progress in their usurpations of authority, who knows how soon we may be placed under that yoke? O America! America! fallen art thou—fallen like Lucifer—when thou beliest thy principles, and descendest to persecute the saints for their faith. O shame! shame! where is thy blush?

The plea of "the greatest good of the greatest number," is a political axiom—applies only to civil enactments, and has no relevancy whatever to religious immunities. Men, in forming a Constitution, especially in a republic, compound natural rights, to secure civil protection; but they never compromit religious faith and religious rights. They may be wrenched from them by arbitrary power, not by voluntary concession. Our government is a government professing to be separated entirely from any ecclesiastical power or control. The rights of conscience are set apart under the elementary principles of the compact, and range not among the category of expedients, to secure the proper administration of secular affairs. There was no such traffic of religious liberty, in organizing our government—there was no such barter of allegiance to the "King of kings, to conciliate the arm of power and place a task-master over us. Might is not right; neither does the accident of being a majority give any warrant to oppress the minority, however small that minority may be. No government established by voluntary association, has ever any right to transcend the powers delegated to it, not for any purpose, nor under any assumed exigency. Therefore they have no right to legislate in matters of religious faith, nor have they any right to abridge that religious freedom secured to them by the Constitution of the commonwealth.

It would have been the part of wisdom, of true policy, for the friends of the existing law on Vice and Immorality, to have passed the act "Granting Equal Rights," or have stricken out the penalties in that law against those who religiously observe the seventh day as the Sabbath. It would, then, be left resting quietly in its place. But the flagrant injustice of denying them their indisputable rights, has roused the attention of thousands. All the Friends have been looking on with intense interest. They are becoming alarmed at the usurpations of authority by those who assume to tolerate and restrain religious freedom. And another class, whose name is Legion—who have been taught from their cradles, to lisp "freedom," and "equal rights," are becoming jealous of these approaches to union of "church and state," shadowed forth in the stringent measures, to enforce the observance of the first day of the week. They will be heard not only in the halls of legislation, but at the polls.

W. M. F.

Bordentown, February 20th, 1846.

* The following is the bill referred to. We insert it here for the purpose of showing how completely groundless is the suspicion expressed by the honorable and reverend Mr. Townsend:—

Be it Enacted: Sec. 1. That every inhabitant of this State who religiously observes the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, shall be allowed to enjoy all the rights, privileges and liberty, granted by the Constitution, as fully as are, or shall be secured by the law to those observing the first day of the week, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

THE SABBATH A CIVIL INSTITUTION.

We are often told by grave divines, that man needs a weekly rest, and hence it is the duty of government to provide for such a rest. This doctrine is repeated with a great flourish in our legislative halls, and the conclusion is thought to be irresistible, that the Sabbath is a civil institution. As a means of judging of the soundness of this doctrine, let us look at some of the consequences which have followed its adoption.

William, the Conqueror of England, thought his subjects needed every night in the week for rest, and therefore made a law, that at the tolling of the curfew bell all fires and lights should be extinguished, that all good citizens might retire to undisturbed rest at the same time. That was a civil institution! It was something pertaining to society in those times.

So likewise Queen Elizabeth thought her subjects needed mother church's parish prayers, and she and her Parliament enacted, that "Every person not having reasonable excuse, shall resort to their parish church or chapel, or upon reasonable let thereof, to some usual place where common prayer shall be used, on every Sunday and holiday, on pain of punishment by the censures of the church, or of forfeiting for every offence twelve pence." And again,—"Every person above the age of sixteen, who shall not repair to some church, or chapel, or usual place of common prayer, shall forfeit for every month twenty pounds sterling. And if he shall forbear for twelve months, he shall be bound to good behavior till he conform." And so also to preserve the morals of the youth uncorrupted it was enacted again,—"Every schoolmaster keeping any public or private school, and every person instructing or teaching any youth in any house or private family, as a tutor or schoolmaster, shall, before his admission, subscribe before the ordinary, the declaration of conformity to the liturgy of the Church of England, on pain of being disabled to hold the said school. And if any schoolmaster, or other person, be found instructing or teaching youth in any private house or family, as tutor or schoolmaster, before license obtained from the bishop or ordinary of the diocese, and before such subscription as aforesaid, he shall for the first offence be imprisoned three months, for the second and every other offence be imprisoned three months, and forfeit five pounds sterling."

These were some of the civil institutions of England. Verily, Charles the Second must have been a very religious king; and he and his Parliament very watchful over the morals of the youth. We have no such civil laws in these degenerate times! Yet that Charles ordered the "Book of Sports" to be read in the churches after divine service on Sunday. When learned divines, and gentlemen legislators, call Sunday, or the Sabbath, "a civil institution," are they ignorant of the meaning of their own language?—or do they intend to impose upon the simplicity of other people? In the common acceptation of the term, it signifies something relating to the association of men under a state or human government, in distinction from society regulated by ecclesiastical or divine rule. In the monarchies of Europe, these have been amalgamated, under specious pretences, but really to subserve despotic purposes. Having witnessed the evils which they brought upon mankind, the framers of our National and State Constitutions wisely determined that in the United States of America, they should be forever separated. While our citizens voluntarily associate themselves together, and peaceably observe such laws and institutions as they believe to be of divine requirement, the Constitution of our country assures them, that the laws which are made for the peace of State society shall protect them; but they absolutely forbid the enforcement of a single religious tenet or observance by the laws of the States. Every sect acknowledging one Amighty Creator and Ruler of the world, is entitled to the common benefit of our State laws. If they were but one in a million of the whole population, it would make no difference to the spirit and intent of the Constitutions; they forbid all infringement upon the rights of conscience in a single instance.

Why should this be so? Every good man believes, that true religion is beneficial to human society. A nation becomes happy, prosperous, and honorable, in proportion as it as a righteous nation. Why, then, may not the forms of religion be enforced by civil law? Because the forms of religion are intended to be expressions of the state of the affections toward God, and of these human laws cannot, from their nature, take any cognizance. Wherever it has been attempted it has commonly issued in the worst kind of despotism. The laws of the Jewish theocracy recognized this distinction; for in all sacred matters the high-priest was the authorized judge, and all matters of doubt in the other courts were referred to him as the ultimate judge, and he was to carry them to the Shekinah for decision in the holy of holies. Read Deut. 17: 8 to 13. Let this distinction be made apparant in all our legislatures, and the Sunday laws cannot be maintained. It has been by casting dust into the eyes of the people, that they have been led into the Puritan trap.

PERSECUTION OF ROMAN CATHOLICS IN RUSSIA.

It is said that one great object before the Russian Government at the present time, is to have the Catholics converted to the Greek Church. To bring about conversion, all means are employed—corruption, persuasion, intimidation, and brutality—of the last, perhaps more than of any of the others. Great success is the reward of the exertions of the Government—whole villages abandon the Catholic faith en masse; and within a few weeks, not less than 10,000 have conformed to the Greek Church. Whether these conversions are sincere, is another question.

This anxiety for the conversion of the Catholics has led to a cruel persecution of those who could not be brought over by persuasion, particularly the priests. A letter dated at Berlin, and published in the Cologne Gazette, says that ninety-seven of these priests have been compelled to work as day laborers in one of the towns of Russia. They were afterwards banished to Tobolsk, where they were confined in dark cells. They were threatened with still severer treatment, but were so fotunate as to effect their escape. Some them have made their way into Prussia, and others have directed their steps toward Italy and France.

But the Pope is awake to these movements, and is exerting himself for the relief of his subjects. It seems that a treaty of commerce is about to be entered into between the Papal States and Russia, the effect of which will be that there will be no more persecution of the Catholics in Russia—that a Popish ambassador will be maintained at the Russian Court—and that several concessions will be made by the Russian Government to the Catholics.

Cost of a War with England.—The venerable Albert Gallatin has published in the National Intelligencer a series of letters on the Oregon Question. At the conclusion of them, he enters at considerable length upon a calculation of the expenses of a war with England. From the best data, he thinks the expense of such a war would not be less than $65,000,000 per year. To this he adds for other expenses $12,000,000—making the cost of supporting the Government for each year of a war to amount to $77,000,000. He thinks, also, that the effect of a war would be to reduce the yearly revenue from customs at least one half, so that the revenue from all sources would not exceed $14,000,000. This sum, subtracted from the annual expenses of Government as above stated, would leave $63,000,000 to be raised each year during the war by loans and taxes. To those who are not moved by the higher moral considerations involved in a war, these estimates ought to serve as a warning.

Prayer for Peace.—The ministers of the Reform Dutch Churches in this city held a meeting some weeks ago, at which the topic of conversation was the duty of the Church of Christ to labor and pray for the preservation of peace. It was unanimously agreed by those present, that they would make this the subject of discourse on Sunday last, which day, being the 22d of the month, and the anniversary of the birth of Washington, seems peculiarly appropriate to the purpose for which it was chosen.

Puseyism Rising.—The English papers say that the celebrated Dr. Pusey, at the expiration of his three years' suspension, appeared on a recent Sunday in the pulpit of the Cathedral Church of Oxford; and, so great was the anxiety to hear him, that the struggles at the door for admission savored more of the theatre than the house of prayer. The attendance exceeded all previous experience. Great numbers came purposely from London; and the reporters of the daily press were sent down to place the sermon before the world.

A Change.—The Lowell Courier informs us, that Rev. Mr. Remington, for 20 years a Methodist preacher, formerly of Boston, and more recently of Lowell, has announced to his people his conversion to the faith of the Baptists, and his resignation of his pastoral charge.

Notice Extraordinary.—The following notice appears in an Alabama paper. It shows what means are used to prevent the escape of slaves. The reader may judge how "contented and happy" the slaves must be to induce them to run away under such circumstances:—

NEGRO DOGS.—The undersigned, having bought the entire pack of Negro Dogs, (of the Hays & Allen stock,) he now proposes to catch runaway Negroes. His charges will be Three Dollars per day for hunting, and Fifteen Dollars for catching, a runaway. He resides 3½ miles North of Livingston, near the lower Jones' Bluff road. WILLIAM GAMBREL.

Nov. 6, 1845—6m

Another.—The Paris (Ky.) Citizen recently contained an advertisement of an auction sale to take place on the 12th inst. Among the articles to be sold are enumerated, 'twenty head of horses,' 'fifty head of cattle,' 'one hundred head of hogs,' and 'twenty-two valuable negroes.' The latter are represented to be 'as likely a set of blacks as can be found in any family in Kentucky.' Among them are 'farm hands, blacksmith, carpenter, shoemaker, house-servants, gardener, cooks, washers, &c.' Comment is unnecessary.

The New Hymn-Book.—Inquiries are frequently made respecting the progress of the new Hymn-Book which Bro. Samuel Davison has proposed to publish. In answer to such inquiries, we are requested to state, that some weeks ago Mr. Davison referred the subject to a number of brethren for advice as to the course he should pursue. They unanimously recommended the preparation of a Circular to the several Associations, stating the reasons for wishing to publish a new Book, and requesting each Association to appoint one or more delegates to meet at Shiloh, N. J., in August next, (just before the sitting of the General Conference,) for the purpose of considering the matter, revising the selection which has been made or making a new selection, and deciding upon the best means to secure its publication if thought advisable.

"The Original Sabbath Unchanged."—Mr. Begg's valuable articles on this subject have been crowded out for a few weeks past, by the press of matter relating to Sunday Legislation, which it was thought important to lay before our readers at this particular juncture. We have several chapters now on hand, the publication of which we shall commence soon and continue regularly.

The Bishopric of Jerusalem.—The Augsburg Gazette publishes intelligence from Berlin, to the effect that the Prussian Government, which now has the privilege of appointing a Protestant Bishop to the See of Jerusalem, had made choice of M. Belson to fill that post. M. Belson, like Dr. Alexander, originally belonged to the Jewish persuasion, but latterly embraced Protestantism.

Discussion on Slavery.—A Mr. Howe has been delivering lectures at Rochester against Abolitionism, showing it to be directly repugnant to Scripture, and to amount, indeed, to a positive impeachment of the character and conduct of the patriarchs, of prophets, of apostles, and of our blessed Lord and Saviour himself. He is to be replied to by Mr. Porter, an Abolitionist.

Great Britain and the Catholics.—We have already noticed the recommendation of Dr. Wiseman, that prayers should be offered in the Catholic churches for the conversion of Great Britain to the Catholic faith. It appears that three French Archbishops and twenty Bishops have complied with the recommendation.

Good Example.—It is said that Rev. Samuel L. Southard has declined the call to be assistant Rector of Trinity Church. As the salary and perquisites realize about $5,000 per annum, and he is at present only in the receipt of $1,700, the circumstance has excited no little surprise.

Change of Name.—The name of the village of Andover, in the town of Westmoreland, Oneida Co., N. Y., has been changed to Lowell, by a meeting of the inhabitants of that village. The name of the Post Office has been changed from Republican to Lowell, by the Postmaster General.

Tax on the Colored Population.—A bill has been introduced into the Maryland Legislature by Mr. Hoover, of Frederick county, for levying a tax of two dollars per annum on all colored male inhabitants of the State over twenty-one years of age and under fifty-five, and of one dollar on every female over eighteen and under forty-five, to be collected by the collectors of the State taxes, and devoted to the use of the Colonization Society. In case of the refusal to pay of a property-holder or house-keeper, his or her goods are to be seized and sold; if not a property-holder, the body of the non-paying person is to be seized and hired out to the lowest bidder who will agree to pay the tax; and in case of not being able to hire said delinquents out, they are to be sold to any person who will pay the amount of tax and costs for the lowest period of service!

Holy Time—The Scriptural Time for commencing and closing the Weekly Sabbath. New York: Samuel Davison—1846. pp. 32.

The design of this little work is sufficiently indicated by its title. It is only necessary to say, that the author hasdone ample justice to his subject. By collecting together the principal texts of Scripture which relate to the time of commencing the Sabbath, and appending to them such remarks as are necessary to show their bearings, he has furnished a manual which cannot fail to be useful, and for which he deserves thanks.

A Syllogistic Defence of Believers' Baptism, by Rev. Benjamin Keach; to which is prefixed a Memoir of his Life, also Remarks, and the Commission Limited, by Joseph S. Baker, Penfield, Ga.—1846.

This is the second number of a quarterly publication called the Periodical Library. If the number before us is a fair specimen of those to be expected in future, the work can not be too highly recommended. Terms, 50 cents a year. Address, Jos. S. Baker, Penfield, Ga.

The Pulpit, No. 3, for March, contains one sermon, several sketches of sermons, and a variety of miscellaneous matter. O. Scott, No. 5 Spruce st.

The Swedenborg Library, No. 8, treats of Correspondences and Representation in Heaven. John Allen, 139 Nassau st.

The Christian Parlor Magazine for March contains a beautiful plate of the City of Thyatira, Asia Minor. Its leading article is on "The Childhood of the Great Mozart," which is followed by a variety of valuable literary and religious matter. Published by D. Mead, 141 Nassau st.

The Youth's Cabinet for March shows a good deal of labor and taste on the part of both editor and publisher. We do not know of a more appropriate work for the young. D. Austin Woodworth, 135 Nassau st.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The SENATE was occupied nearly all of last week in hearing long speeches upon the Oregon question. Messrs. Hannegan, Colquitt, and Dix, were the principal speakers.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES had under consideration, but did not pass, a bill appropriating six millions of dollars for the construction and arming of ten iron steam vessels of war. They passed a bill giving a pension to every widow of a revolutionary soldier, upon showing that her husband was receiving a pension from the United States at the time of his death. They also passed a bill in regard to the mileage of members, which allows eight dollars for every twenty miles travel between the residence of the member and the Capitol, the distance to be computed by the nearest mail route by land; and where the distance is over twelve hundred miles, the mileage to be ten dollars for every 100 miles over that distance. It also requires that each member, before drawing his mileage, shall file a certificate with the Clerk, that he has actually traveled the distance for which he claims mileage.

FOREIGN NEWS—ONE MONTH LATER.

The foreign news by the Cambria, which left Liverpool on the 4th of February, was looked for with intense interest. In order to facilitate its arrival in New-York, two rival expresses were run by horse from Halifax across Nova Scotia to the Bay of Fundy—thence to Portland by steamboat—thence by railroad to Boston—and thence to New-York by steam and horse power. The messengers reached New-York during the forenoon of Thursday.

The news is important. It shows that the feeling in England respecting Oregon is decidedly pacific, and that Sir Robert Peel has recommended an immediate modification and ultimate repeal of the Corn Laws.

Opening of Parliament—The Queen's Speech.

On Thursday, January 22d, Parliament was opened by the Queen in person. The following extract from the Queen's speech, shows in what light she regards the slave-trade and the Oregon difficulty:—

"The Convention concluded with France, in the course of last year, for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade, is about to be carried into immediate execution by the active co-operation of the two Powers on the coast of Africa. It is my desire that our present union, and the good understanding which so happily exists between us, may always be employed to promote the interests of humanity, and to secure the peace of the world. I regret that the conflicting claims of Great Britain and the United States in respect to the territory on the North Western Coast of America, although they have been made the subject of repeated negotiation, still remain unsettled. You may be assured that no effort consistent with national honor shall be wanting on my part to bring this question to an early and peaceful termination."

Sir Robert Peel on the Corn Laws.

On the 27th of January, Sir Robert Peel presented to the House of Commons his plan in relation to the Corn Laws. As there is little doubt that he will be able to carry the plan through, and as his propositions will vitally affect the agricultural interests of his country, the following extract will not be thought out of place:—

"He proposed to reduce the duty on all seeds to 5s per cwt. Indian corn or maize, which was of such importance in the fattening of cattle, he proposed in future to introduce duty free. In removing that duty he was not depriving agriculture of any protection, but absolutely conferring a benefit upon it. He also proposed that buckwheat flour, should be admitted duty free. If any gentleman would ascertain the price which had been recently paid by farmers for linseed cake and rape cake, they would agree with him that the removal of the duty on maize was not a disservice to the agricultural interest. The Right Honorable Baronet then described the reduction of duty which he intended to propose on the importation of foreign butter, cheese, hops and cured fish, stating that in each case the duty would be reduced to half its present amount. On all articles of agricultural produce which constituted mea as distinct from corn, he proposed an immediate repeal of duty. Every kind of vegetable and animal food would be admitted at once free of duty. All animals from foreign countries would also be introduced on the same terms. The bill which he should therefore introduce on this subject, would contain an enactment, that after a certain date, grain of all kinds should come in duty free. He proposed, however, that a considerable reduction should be made at once in the existing amount of duty, and that the duty so reduced should be limited to the continuance of three years. His bill would contain a provision that at that period, when the change would be least felt—namely, on the first of February, 1849—oats, barley, rye, and wheat, should be only liable to that mere nominal duty which he intended to apply to maize, for the purpose of procuring statistical returns of the quantity imported."

France—Disaster in Algiers.

Considerable has been said in the Chamber of Deputies in relation to the course of the United States about Texas and Oregon. But the chief topic of interest relates to another disaster which has befallen the French in Algeira. It seems that the French forces, during the month of December, were guilty of great cruelties, plundering and buring several villages, and putting many of the inhabitants to the sword. On the second of January, however, a check was put to their operations by a fall of snow which soon rendered the roads impassable. At this juncture, the troops entered a defile in which the snow had gathered in large quantities, where they remained for two days and nights, without shelter or food, exposed to the horror of cold and hunger.

The Marseilles Semaphore, which publishes a long narrative of the disaster, reckons but at about a hundred men the loss sustained on the occasion. Two letters, quoted by the National, state that eight hundred men have remained buried under the snow; other advices say six hundred, and that all the baggage, with provisions enough for above ten days, have been lost. The Algerie, which has also received private advices, has the following:

"Thirty officers has had their hands and feet frozen. Five men and several horses of the detachment of African Chasseures have died of cold; fifteen out of eighty men of the wagon-train have perished. A grenadier company of the 43d has almost wholly disappeared. Almost all the native muleteers lost their lives on that terrible day. This unfortunate affair, of which we do not yet know the extent, has been duly construed by the Arabs to our detriment; they have seen the hand of God in it."

Miscellaneous.

The Belfast Whig says, "We have within the last few days, received accounts from various quarters respecting the state of the potatoe crop; and we are sorry to say, that they are in complete accordance with the worst representations made, since the existence of the disease was discovered."

A letter from Germany, dated Berlin, January 23d, says, "The accounts we receive from our emigrants to the United States excite great indignation. Hundreds and thousands of them, it seems, are suffering the direst distress from relying too implicitly on the lying promises of emigration agents. The American Government really ought to take some measures for the welfare of the poor creatures who flock to their country principally on account of the representation of people who state themselves to be its authorized agents. Our Government is warmly opposed to emigration."

According to a German Journal, the number of emigrants who, in the course of the last year, have embarked at Bremen alone for the transatlantic countries, was 31,149, of whom 3,000 were bound for Texas.

The state of the county of Limerick, Ireland, is represented as most alarming; two murders had been perpetrated under circumstances of the most fearful outrage; the cause, in each instance, being connected with the letting of land. The robbery of fire arms, the posting of rockite notices, and attacks by armed parties, are rife. Colonel Mansel, commanding the garrison at Limerick, had been obliged to send out a strong force to disperse the insurgents, who had assembled armed and in great numbers, on the lands of Knocksentry, near Castleconnell.

Recent accounts brings tidings of dreadful shipwrecks. The Montreal, a trader between London and Quebec, was lost on the 14th of January near Cape Chat, and every soul perished. The Saxon, an American packet, bound to London from Boston, is believed to have foundered on the 17th, on a peer of rocks called the Ledges, near Red Head. The Laurel, of Quebec, was lost off the coast of Newfoundland, by coming in contact with a field of ice; happily, the crew were saved. The ship Cambridge, from Liverpool, took off the crew, thirty-two persons, from the Lord Lynedoch, in a sinking state. Lloyd's books record the loss of the City of Shiras, in the Mindora Sea, with forty persons; the wreck of the Eastindiaman, and other calamities.

A letter from Rome, of the 26th ultimo, says that the chestnuts, which in that country are, like the potatoes in the north of Europe, the principal food of the lower classes, have suffered from the same disease as the potatoes, and that scarcely one in ten is eatable. The grapes also have become already rotten, instead of remaining dry and fit for food until the end of February, as in ordinary times.

The capital of Great Britain has a population estimated at 2,000,000 of souls, exclusive of strangers. The population of Paris now exceeds 900,000; the population of Vienna is 330,000 souls; Berlin, 365,000; and St. Petersburgh, 476,000.

The use of diseased potatoes in Ireland by the destitute poor is becoming, as was expected, a frightful source of fever and disease. A fearful increase in the number of fever patients has taken place in the hospital of Fermoy.

A young author, Mr. J. Christian Ross, destroyed himself in a coffee-house in Aldersgate-street, London, by taking Prussic acid, in consequence of the rejection of one of his articles by "Blackwood."

One of the Ojibbeway Indians (the Bird of the Tempest) died at Brussels the other day, of the small-pox, and another (the King of the Bitterns) is dangerously ill. The former was baptized by a Roman Catholic clergyman a few hours before his death. The other Indians are still at Ghent.

THE COPPER REGION.—A letter dated Copper Harbor, Lake Superior, January 8, 1846, says: "Recent splendid discoveries have been made in the Copper Mines of this region. The Pittsburgh Company on the Eagle River Location, have during the past month opened a vein twelve feet wide from the top of the hill to the bottom—over 200 feet. It is exceedingly rich in Copper and Silver. They have taken out one large piece of Native Copper and Silver, nearly pure, weighing 2,000 pounds. Its size is 5 feet 10 inches on the edge. Also, 2,000 lbs. of the same quality in smaller pieces. They have 3,000 pounds of very rich quality in barrels ready for shipping. They have 53 1-2 tons of 10 or 12 per cent. ores, Copper and Silver, mined in December, and since I left last week, I hear that the vein has improved. The Eagle River location of Gratiot also improves: returns for December, 40 tons.

NEW BRICK MACHINE.—Messrs. Culbertson, McMillen & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, have in successful operation a new brick machine, the working of which is described as follows by the editor of the Cincinnati Atlas:—

"The clay in a crude state is thrown with a shovel into a hopper, in which a mill, or pulverizer, placed over the upper press-wheel in such a manner as to discharge the clay into the moulds on both sides of the press-wheel. The moulds being filled in this manner with pulverized clay, pass under the press-wheel twice—giving the brick a double pressure and shaving them smooth by means of a knife attached to the machine. The bricks are then thrown out of the moulds by an admirable contrivance on a table at each end of the machine, at the rate, the proprietors say, of 5000 per hour, sufficiently hard to be atacked to the kilm. As the whole works will be under cover they can work as well in rainy or foul weather as when it is dry,"

WRECK OF THE JOHN MINTURN.—Later accounts from this ill-fated vessel, show that there was no exaggeration as to the number of persons who found an untimely grave. Only 13 out of 51 were saved. The Courier and Inquirer says:—

It appears that the Pilot on board, when the ship struck, finding that his efforts to keep clear of the land were unavailing, gave orders to run her on the beach. She was put about, and struck in about fifteen minutes, and her mainmast and foremast were cut away to ease the ship, as the sea was making breaches over her. The small boat which was got over the side was swamped, but they were more successful with the long-boat, and five seamen and one passenger immediately got into her and endeavored to take a line ashore, but in consequence of the line being too short, or getting entangled in the floating spars and rigging, they were obliged to cut it in order to save themselves.

The most melancholy part of the tale remains to be told. Although the underwriters had surf-boats, and all the necessary means for saving the lives of persons in distress, the people on the shore, who had collected at the report of the wreck, and the escaped seamen, showed a most culpable disregard of all the dictates of humanity, and made no attempts to render aid to the crew. The efforts of Captain Stark, until the time of his death, were constant for the preservation of his crew, and the more precious lives of his wife and children, who called, with all the confidence and earnestness of children, for safety at the hands of a father and husband, who had no alternative but to say that all human help was in vain. Capt. Stark was dead before the ship broke apart. At this time his wife and children were forward, and when the ship separated, fell between the parts, and no sound of life was afterwards heard from them. There was on board a large number of cabin passengers, some of whom had a large amount of valuables. One man, who had on a girdle containing gold, in his distress offered $5,000 to any one who would place him ashore. Assistance was not to be obtained, and the unfortunate man and his gold perished together.

Had the unfortunate passengers kept aft they would have saved their lives, as the cabin was, in all the gale, habitable, and would have been a complete protection.

RESPONSIBILITY OF STAGE OWNERS.—Recently in Pennsylvania, a man named John R. Rowand sued certain stage proprietors for the alledged value of two trunks, lost or stolen from their stage-coach. The plaintiff and wife were permitted to testify as to the value of the contents. The whole was stated at $1,197, which was the amount claimed. Among the articles was said to have been a diamond breast pin, valued at $300. The judge decided that the defendants were liable only for traveling baggage; that jewelry as much belonged to a lady's wardrobe as any other article of dress. It was for the jury to say what was, under the circumstances, proper traveling baggage. No previous notice was necessary as to the value of the baggage, unless it was asked for. If the defendants wanted to know, they should have asked. Neither did it make any difference whether he had paid his passage money or not. Every person who takes a seat in a public vehicle is liable on an implied contract for his passage money; and the stage proprietor would be answerable in like manner as a common carrier. The verdict was for the plaintiff, damages, $670.

NOVEL APPLICATION OF PHLEBOTOMY.—The Georgetown (Ky.) Intelligencer has the following singular paragraph:—

There has been quite a stir recently in New Orleans, in consequence of the marriage of a white man named Buddington, a Teller in the Canal Bank, to the negro daughter of one of the wealthiest merchants. Buddington, before he could be married, was obliged to swear that he had negro blood in his veins, and to do this he made an incision in his arm and put some of her blood in the cut. The ceremony was performed by a Catholic Clergyman, and the bridegroom has received with his wife a fortune of fifty or sixty thousand dollars. The natives serenaded him with such abominable music, that to get rid of their discord he paid them $400, to be used for charitable purposes.

WHALE STORY.—The New Bedford Mercury states that the Sarah at Mattapoisett, from Atlantic Ocean, took a 100 bbl. sperm whale, in the blubber of which was found the head and about a foot of the shank of a harpoon marked "Lyra," "undoubtedly," says the Mercury, "belonging to the ship Lyra of this port, which vessel sailed hence July 3, 1838, and was lost in August, 1839, on a reef near Oahu." This is a strange adventure for a piece of iron, but by no means improbable.

DEATH OF PROF. GODDARD.—We are pained to find it announded in the Providence Journal, that Wm. G. Goddard, Esq., late Professor or Belles Letters in Brown University, died very suddenly a few days since, at the age of fifty-two years. While seated at the dinner table with his family, he was surprised with sensations of intense suffocation in the throat, proceeding, as is supposed, from a paralysis of the muscles of deglutition, and in a few moments his life was at an end. He was an elegant scholar, an accomplished gentleman, and a man of great moral worth. His loss will be extensively and deeply felt. [Boston Traveler.

OLIVER SMITH'S WILL.—The Northampton Gazette says, that counsel have been employed by the heirs of the late Oliver Smith, (whose property amounted to half a million dollars, the bulk of which was left to public institutions,) to contest the Will. The grounds of objection are—1st, That the attesting witnesses are not sufficient—one of the three being in a condition of mind, at the time of subscribing the instrument, to render him legally incompetent to perform the service; and 2d, That it is contrary to the Constitution and laws of the Commonwealth to devise property for accumulation, as is the case in this Will.

THE INSECT SCOURGE.—Advices from Cuba state that the orange, lime, and every other tree of the citron kind in the District of Matanzas and in other sections of the Island, are perishing under the ravages of an insect in shape like a flea, which light on their verdure by myriads, and deposit white adhesive spect on the back, which are the eggs from which the worm is hatched, which has devastated so many of the citron and orange groves. Some of the trees are wholly denuded, and it is feared that this blight will extend itself over the whole Island.

There are seven hundred miles of Railroad in operation in Massachusetts, costing $28,000,000.

SUMMARY.

Common Vinegar consists of acetic acid largely diluted with water; it contains also vegetable gluten, mucilage, sugar, extractive matter, and frequently malic, phosphoric, and tartaric acids, together with small proportions of sulphate of lime, sulphate of potash, and alcohol.

Rocks, and other earthy bodies, are composed of minerals. Sometimes a single kind of mineral forms the masses of sand, clay or rock; but more often two or more mineral substances are aggregated to form those bodies.

At Paraid, in Transylvania, there is a valley, the bottom and sides of which are pure rock salt.

Many of the ancient Athenians went bare-footed. The common people were clad in cloth which had received no dye, and which could therefore be re-whitened. The rich preferred colored cloths; they held in considerable estimation those which had been dyed scarlet, by means of small reddish grains, and in still higher esteem those of a purple dye.

It is remarkable that the barks of all the trees which furnish gum are highly astringent; that of the acacia or gum arabic tree itself is used in India for tanning; and in our country, the cherry and plum trees, which sometimes yield a little gum, have very astringent barks.

At Sodus Bay recently, a Mr. Henman hearing a strange noise in the adjoining wood, proceeded to the spot, and discovered two enormous bald eagles engaged in a fierce combat. He armed himself with a club, and so intent were they in the fight that they did not perceive his approach, and he killed them both on the spot.

A bill is before the New-Jersey Legislature to incorporate a college to be located at Burlington. It is to be under the control of trustees belonging to the Protestant Episcopal Church.

A fire lately commenced in a forest near Omask, Russia, and extended to a distance of fifty French leagues, over a breadth of fifteen. Eleven villages were attacked in its course, and one was entirely destroyed. In the ten others there were burned thirteen mills, 1850 barns, 77,000 ricks of hay, and an immense quantiy of wood for fuel, Twenty-five peasants, 565 horses, and 915 head of cattle, were burned to death.

Mr. Fletcher N. Merwin, a worthy farmer of Woodbridge, Ct., recently died of strangulation while seated at the tea table. His wife observed that he was choking, and rushed to his rescue, but he died in less than five minutes. It was found that he was choked with a pickled grape.

Mr. Samuel Hitchcock, who recently died at Hamden, Ct., left for Foreign Missions, $1,000. Home do. $700; American Bible Society, $500, American Tract Society, $300; and the remainder, about $2500, to the Congregational society of Bethany.

The Lime Rock Gazette, a paper published at Thomaston, Me., says that there are in that town 132 lime kilns, which yielded upwards of 600,000 barrels the last season, the cost of which including 42,708 cords of wood, is $391,744, and it was sold at the kilns for $411,830, or at market, adding freight, for $538,560.

A merchant who has acquired considerable of this world's gain by his attention to business, lately informed us how he decided whether a man was fit to be trusted or not. He said whenever he saw a farmer come in riding or driving a good fat horse, he knew he could be relied upon. If his horse was poor, he knew him careless and inattentive to his contracts.

It is said that a building recently burned at the corner of Pell-street and the Bowery, N. Y., is the house in which Charlotte Temple died. She was turned out of doors at the Old Walton House, in Pearl-street, which is now standing, and sought refuge in this cottage which was then out of town, on the Boweries or Farms, and soon after breathed her last.

We have before us, says an exchange, time-stained and worn indeed, a copy of the Philadelphia Pennsylvania Gazette, dated August 13th, 1741, published by "Benjamin Franklin, Postmaster, at the new printing office, near the Market." The "freshest" advices from London, are to the 13th May; three months previous! The size is about six by eight inches.

An old coat was found under a pew of the East Church, in Salem, last week, which is supposed to have belonged to one of the carpenters employed in erecting the building, one hundred and twenty-eight years ago. It is a fair specimen of old fashioned economy, having more patches on it than could be found on troops of beggars at this day. A gimblet, a piece of chalk, and cotton handkerchief, all in a good state of preservation, were found in the pockets. It must have been a mysterious loss, for which the witches of that age were no doubt held responsible.

Italy contains 500 principal towns. Its population is about 22,000,000 of inhabitants. There are about 3000 professional singers, and 2,000 delettanti singers; 39,000 professional musicians, and 100,000 delettanti musicians; 2,600 comic artists; 1000 dancers and mimics; 200 music composers, 390 dramatic and equestrian companies.

The Boston Recorder states that one of its subscribers stopped his paper because it did not report more revivals. The editor replies that he reports all he hears of, and he does not think it worth while to go beyond that even to save a subscriber.

The manufacturers of brandy in Sweden have been offered a high premium by the government, if they will abandon their business for three months in view of the anticipated famine.

The editor of the Haverhill Gazette includes the following in a humorous enumeration of the advantages of a war:—We can carry on a war of 51 or 20 years, if we are agreed to exert our utmost strength. We raise about 50,000 young men a year, which we can have killed and hold our own. We can give up our Foreign Commerce, and our Revenue, and borrow $100,000,000 a year for 20 years, and then not be so much in debt as England, and it would not take us more than two hundred years of peace and prosperity to pay it up!"

The storm on Saturday evening last, made a great commotion in the oyster beds on the Potomac as well as the Chesapeake. At the Light-House on Pliney Point, they were piled up on the shore by the storm in masses of thousands.

From Jan. 1, 1845, to Jan. 1, 1846, there were 50 fires in Rochester, causing a loss of $139,565. Insurance $93,340. In 1844, in the same city, loss 40,000. Insurance $30,250. In 1843, loss 70,000. Insurance 40,000.

WRITTEN AT MY MOTHER'S GRAVE.

BY GEO. D. PRENTICE.

The trembling dew-drops fall
Upon the shutting flowers—like souls at rest
The stars shine gloriously—and all,
Save me, is blest.

Mother! I love thy grave!
The violet, with its blossom blue and mild
Waves o'er thy head—when shall it wave
Above thy child?

'Tis a sweet flower—yet must
Its bright leaves to the coming tempest bow;
Dear mother, 'tis thine emblem—dust
Is on thy brow!

And I could love to die—
To leave untasted life's dark, bitter streams—
By thee, as erst in childhood, lie,
And share thy dreams.

And must I linger here
To stain the plumage of my sinless years,
And mourn the hopes to childhood dear,
With bitter tears?

Ay—must I linger here,
A lonely branch upon a blasted tree,
Whose last frail leaf, untimely sere,
Went down with thee!

Oft from life's withered bower,
In still communion with the past I turn,
And muse on thee, the only flower
In memory's urn.

And, when the evening pale,
Bows like a mourner on the dim blue wave,
I stray to hear the night wind's wail
Around thy grave.

Where is thy spirit flown?
I gaze above—thy look is imaged there;
I listen, and thy gentle tone
Is on the air.

O come, whilst here I press
My brow upon thy grave, and in those mild
And thrilling tones of tenderness,
Bless, bless thy child!

Yes, bless thy weeping child,
And o'er thine urn, religion's holiest shrine—
O give his spirit undefiled
To blend with thine!

For the Sabbath Recorder.

MR. EDITOR:—If you can make room among your selected articles, for the following Circular, received by the Hibernia, you will apprise your mercantile readers of a new movement in Great Britain, in which they are peculiarly interested. It certainly would seem one of the most interesting social movements of the age; and, if met with a cordial response and co-operation in this country, must give a new strength and compass to the unity and beneficent energy of the Anglo-Saxon race, which is manifestly destined to fill the world with the light of the gospel, and the blessings and silken bonds of Commerce, Civilization, and Universal Brotherhood. It is a general appeal to the Merchants of Great Britain, to address to the Merchants of America brief and earnest communications, demonstrating their dependence upon each other, as citizens of the world; the dependence of Commerce on Peace; their mutual interest and duty to do all in their power to avert the dire calamtty of War, and to induce their respective governments to adjust all questions of international controversy, by pacific negotiations or arbritration; so that peace, prosperity, and amity may reign unbroken and forever between two nations, whom God has made of one blood and brotherhood to fill the whole earth with the blessings of their unity. The following Circular has probably been sent, ere this, to most of the Merchants of Great Britain, and the next steam packet will bring out their appeals to their commercial brethren in this country. Now, Mr. Editor, if you can insert this, even on the outside of your paper, it will serve to prepare your commercial readers to receive, and respond to, the fraternal appeals of their co-partners in Commerce on the other side of the Atlantic. ELIHU BURRITT.

PEACE! OR WAR? COMMERCE! OR THE SWORD?

Appeal to the Merchants of the Realm.

FRIENDS AND FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN:—That a war with America would be a direful calamity—that it would utterly blast your prosperity—would, in fact, annihilate commerce, no one will attempt to deny. As little likely will it be not to acknowledge, that with such an awful contingency before us, "England expects every man to do his duty."

And what is your duty? In the first place to think, that is, to think seriously, what war is: and secondly, whether you have it not in your power to avert so direful a calamity. I am perfectly persuaded that you have—that it is in your power to maintain peace between us and our American brethren, without any compromise of national honor, without any sacrifice of right principle, without any loss of dignity, and without the most remote charge of pusillanimity.

Wars generally have been commenced, not for the benefit of the people, but for the supposed benefit of a class whose interests have by no means been identified with the people's interests. Happily, however, for this country and for the world at large, another aristocracy has arisen, our merchant aristocracy, who are identified with the people; whose very existence depends on the maintenance of peace; and who are destined thus to be honorably instrumental in banishing the demon war. Let them exert their influence—let the MERCHANT princes of the realm speak—let it be felt that another aristocracy has arisen which can command an audience—let them insist upon it that the dispute be adjusted in a rational manner.

If two sensible people quarrel, they agree to an arbitration. And there is no reason whatever why two sensible nations should not do the same. It involves no compromise of principle, no compromise of honor. If we arbitrate, both nations will be gainers; if we fight, (which I pray we never again may do), both nations will be losers; and the people of the two countries are so intimately related, that we must hire men to be murderers of fathers, and murderers of mothers.

At the present juncture the free traders have a grave duty to perform. Without the blessing, the unspeakable blessing of peace, free trade were but a name. Recent events clearly show that this patriotic struggle is all but terminated. A war with America would indefinitely retard the final consummation, and the peaceful battle must then be fought over again. Could the Free Traders be induced to originate a movement, the peaceful, powerful cry of arbitrate, arbitrate, would be heard throughout the land, with a strength and a clearness that would force a responsive echo even from the walls of St. James's. America could not—England would not—refuse.

Up, then, and be doing. Let the Merchants of England address the Merchants of America; and as fellow citizens of the world, mutually dependent the one upon the other, as men, and as brethren, let them deprecate so dire a calamity as war, and entreat their transctlantic friends to urge upon the American Government, that the dispute be adjusted by arbitration; and let them say that they have urged the same upon their own Government. The novelty of such a proceeding is no argument against it.

The merchants of the two nations keep too much aloof. Neither patriotism nor religion requires that they should stand still and see themselves annihilated. No, but the love of their country, the love of their common religion, require that they bestir themselves. The cementing influence of one such address as I have proposed, may be more easily imagined than described, and it would strengthen the hands of both Governments, in resorting to arbitration. What then would be the effect of a hundred such addresses? They would prevent a war.

Think of these things; banish war from your very thoughts; and let your peaceful watchword be, on all occasions, and for all offences—arbitrate, arbitrate, arbitrate. You will thus find that you will have to make

NO COMPROMISE.

P. S.—Should public meetings be unadvisable (which I cannot think), signatures might easily be obtained to such an address in any other of the customary modes. It would gladden the hearts of thousands on both sides of the Atlantic, to see friendly addresses of this kind from the Merchants of this Kingdom to the Merchants of the United States of America.

THE WALDENSES.

I. THEIR MORAL AND RELIGIOUS CONDITION.

That the Vaudois as a community are not now so eminent for piety as their ancestors were, is admitted, I believe, on all hands: but still I have no hesitation in adding my humble testimony to that borne by most travelers who have visited their valleys—that, notwithstanding their defects, they are, after all, the most moral and religious people in Europe. For amount of Bible knowledge they will stand comparison with the best of our Scottish peasantry; their honesty and simplicity are proverbial; they are ever ready to perform kind offices to one another; instances of licentiousness and impurity are so rare among them, that when they occur the entire population feel themselves disgraced; and the sin of drunkenness, so fearfully prevalent in this country, is utterly unknown in the valleys. The desecration of the sabbath is certainly the foulest blot in their character, although they are not worse in this respect than the members of other Protestant Churches on the Continent. After the services of the morning, the sabbath is converted into a day of amusement, and instead of "turning away their feet from finding pleasure on that holy day," they may be seen congregated in groups, singing, dancing, and pursuing their other favorite pastimes, as though the day were their own. The more pious clergy are setting themselves steadily, like Nehemiah of old, to prevent this horrid profanation of the sabbath; and their efforts have already been attended with considerable success. Some visitors have magnified their failings and defects on account of the exaggerated opiniuns which they had formed of them previous to their arrival, from reading their ancient history; it should be borne in mind, however, that in judging of the religion and morality of the present race of Vaudois, the comparison does not lie between them and their forefathers, but between them and the other Protestant nations of Europe at the present day.

I am warranted to state, from information obtained from those on whose spiritual discernment I can fully rely, that, notwithstanding the formalism of which they have reason to complain, there is a goodly and a growing number whose spirit and conduct furnish satisfactory evidence of the life of God in their souls. A very considerable revival was effected by a visit which Felix Neff paid to the valleys. His discourses, which were numerously attended, were blessed to the awakening and conversion of many souls. The results of this visit continue still to be felt: and numbers are instant in prayer and supplication, that the great Head of the Church would send them other seasons of refreshing from his presence, that the work of God may more and more abound among them.

It was not only in the presbyteries, and Churches, and schools, that I studied their character; but in the hut and chalet—by the side of the husbandman and the vinedresser, and of the shepherds, and herdsmen, and hunters of their Alps. The impression left upon my mind is decidedly favorable. There were lights and shadows in the picture; but the former prevailed. As, for example, if I witnessed amusements to which their ancestors strongly objected, I could not but perceive that they were conducted with a degree of decency and propriety very rare in other regions. No drunkenness, or quarrels, or loose language, disgrace their hours of hilarity. There is no open and shameless rebellion against divine or human laws; and the sins which call for admonition, are the perpetration of individuals, and not general enough to leave a stigma upon whole villages or hamlets. At their devotions, they display a seriousness which is quite exemplary; and though the Lord's day is not professedly consecrated to the same number of services as with us, yet there are few among them who are not regular attendants at church. The average congregation of every parish rarely falls short of, and generally exceeds, the amount of half the population.

II. THEIR WORLDLY CIRCUMSTANCES.

Every traveler who visits them, comes away with the impression that they are not only heart-broken, but miserably poor. Were it not for the provision that God has bountifully made for their sustenance in the fruit of the walnut and chesnut trees, which grow in such abundance throughout their territory, it would be impossible for them to sustain life. Their food is of the poorest kind—butcher meat is a dainty unknown at the peasant's board—roasted chesnuts, potatoes, and black bread of the coarsest kind, with a little sour wine, the produce of their own vineyards, and oil extracted from walnuts, is their frugal fare throughout the year. The peasant mixes his salad, and trims his lamp from the same cruse of oil. During five months in summer they reside in chalets, on the higher Alps, for the pasturage of their cattle; and here their pastors follow them during the week, to inquire into their spiritual welfare, and occasionally on sabbath, to preach to them the Word of truth. Nothing, perhaps, bespeaks their poverty more evidently than the manner in which they spend their long and dreary winter evenings. Fuel is much too dear an article to be used, except for culinary purposes; but to make up for the want of a cheerful fire, the whole family adjourn during the winter to the byre, and live among the cattle—the temperature being kept equable by their breath. The oil is also sufficiently scarce to make it needful to economise; and a saving is effected by the following contrivance;—Two, three, and sometimes four, neighboring families, unite to spend the winter evenings, week about, in each other's byre—one lamp serves the whole assembly, and the family whose byre is the rendezvous for the week, provide the oil. Sometimes one person is appointed each night to read aloud to the company, while the others are engaged at their various occupations. On these occasions, through necessity as well as choice, the Bible is most frequently the subject of study, because other books are lacking; and hence, the modern Vaudois, like their ancestors, have generally a very extensive acquaintance with the Sacred Scriptures.

LINES ON MARK X. 49.

BY MRS. DANA.

Mortal, who sittest silent, dumb with woe,
Know'st thou to whom the sorrowful should go?
Hast thou not heard of One who lived and died
To bless mankind, Jesus, the crucified?
Shake off thy lethargy, to Jesus flee;
"Be of good comfort; rise, he calleth thee."

O not in vain was the Redeemer sent,
Nor vain the years of grief and toil he spent;
It was to teach us how to bear the rod,
To suffer and to do the will of God.
Mortal, shake off thy gloom; to Jesus flee;
"Be of good comfort; rise, he calleth thee."

Our Saviour never shrank from duty's call,
He gave for sinful man his life, his all;
Mortal, he thought no pain too great for you,
And is there nothing thou canst find to do?
Ah! yield not to despair; to Jesus flee;
"Be of good comfort; rise, he calleth thee."

Thou hast been creeping slowly o'er the road
That leads to peace, to purity, to God;
And now a hand is stretched to lead thee on,
'Twill ne'er forsake thee till the goal is won;
O, thrust it not away; to Jesus flee;
"Be of good comfort; rise, he calleth thee."

Thou hast been sitting by the wayside blind,
And never any healer couldst thou find;
But hearing now that Jesus passeth by,
To him with earnest heart and voice you cry;
And he has heard thee! then to Jesus flee;
"Be of good comfort; rise, he calleth thee."

THE RUINED SON.

BY REV. H. CLARK.

The subject of moral discipline in families is too often passed by as comparatively unimportant. All, however, who reflect seriously upon it will perceive that it has a strong claim upon the attention of every parent. As families constitute little communities, it is as important that strict moral discipline be observed in them, as in large ones. If there be confusion and disorder in the parts, the same evils will pervade the whole. A stream cannot rise higher than its fountain.

A very important part of moral discipline is, restraint. Many parents seem to forget that the bent of the young mind, is not toward virtue and holiness, but towards vice, continually: and judging from their indifference to the moral welfare of their offspring, they seem to be insensible that a tide of evil is constantly flowing around them, and that the native inclination of children, is ever drawing them deeper into its current.—Yet such is the fact, and parents do not discharge their whole duty to their offspring unless they restrain them from the vices by which they are surrounded. To effect this, persuasion is better than force, but if this fail of accomplishing the desired end, coercive measures must be resorted to, and the sooner this is done the better, both for parent and child, though it may pierce parental affection with many a bitter pang.

I have now in my mind an affecting incident of the ruin of a son by his mother, who did not restrain him in his childhood and youth.

About five years since a young man, in a neighboring state, was detected in the act of committing a high crime, and committed to the county jail. He was universally known in that vicinity as a licentious and abandoned character. Such was the nature of the evidence against him, that there remained not a doubt of his guilt. Being in that place at the time, I, in company with one of the clergymen of the village, made him a visit. As we entered his cell, I was forcibly struck with his appearance. He was scarcely twenty-five years of age, and though within the walls of a prison, his dress was arranged with studied neatness. He bore evident marks of dissipation and crime; and yet there was something in his dark, piercing eye, and full intellectual forehead, indicative of ability to do right. He was standing at his grated window, apparently contemplating some object without; but, as we entered, turned, and received us with an easy politeness, which would have graced a drawing-room. As he readily engaged in conversation, we succeeded in drawing from him a portion of his history.

'You see in me,' said he, 'a degraded, guilty being; but I was not always so. Had I, in early youth, been blessed with the pious, parental example, counsel and restraint, with which many are blessed, I should never have been reduced to the wretched condition in which you now see me.'

'Are your parents living?' inquired my companion.

'My father died when I was a child. I have no recollection of him. My mother I have not seen for nearly six years, and do not know whether she is living or not.'

"'Is it your wish that your mother, if living should know where you now are?' I inquired.

'It is not. No,—rather let me perish than that she should know I am imprisoned as a felon, though it is chiefly owing to her neglect of my moral culture, that I am here.—I have already said that I was not always as you see me now. My father was a graduate of one of the first institutions of learning in New England, and, as a member of the bar, was fast outstripping his associates, and reaching an eminent position, when he was arrested in the midst of his career by death. I was left an infant of six months. Having been thus early deprived of her husband, I became the idol of my mother. I was petted and indulged, and, through excess of maternal fondness, ruined. My mother always loved me, wild and wicked as I was, and so deep was her love, that it blinded her to my faults, and led her to forget the obligations she was under to train me up to virtue and piety. My every wish was gratified. My passion, naturally strong, were never curbed by wholesome restraint. Religious instruction was never communicated to me at my 'fireside home.' My mother, apparently forgeting that I was an immortal being, sought rather to gratify my present wishes, than to mould my character for time and eternity. My Sabbaths were spent, not in the house of God, but in dissipation and vice.

'Thus I ran my headlong course, unchecked, until my evil passions, violently inflamed by the vices in which I indulged, impelled me to commit an act which rendered it unsafe for me to remain longer beneath the paternal roof, and I fled. My mother knew not where I went. Since that time, I have been wandering in different states, engaged in various scenes of dissipation and crime. Four months since, I came to this place, where my vices have rendered me notorious. Night before last I was detected in the act of commiting the crime for which you now see me in prison. My career is run. The gloomy walls of a state prison will be my abode for several years. Should I live to leave them, I must leave with the brand of infamy upon me. One consolation alone remains. I am under an assumed name, so that my mother can never know my fate. Still, I am a wretch, a villain, unworthy of the society of men, and fit only for a prison, O! my mother!——But I will not upbraid her. She meant well, though her undue fondness has led me to disgrace and ruin.'

Here he became subdued, and, bowing his face between his hands, wept tears of repentance and regret!

We left him. But never shall I forget that scene. That young man is now an inmate of a state prison. His term of punishment has now nearly expired, and he will soon leave that miserable abode, to wander, a seared and blighted spirit over the earth, seeking rest and finding none.—Perchance, in his wanderings, he may return to his native place; but he will find no mother there to soothe his troubled spirit.—She is dead!

Reader, I knew that mother. Two years ago, I heard her, with her dying breath, regret her weakness in not restraining her son. She died without a knowledge of his fate. I saw her laid beside her departed husband.

Parents, and especially mothers, ponder well the above, and remember that, to some extent, at least, you hold your children's destinies 'for weal or for woe.' Mother's Assistant.

REMEMBER THE CORK.

When Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, was unwell, King James the Second sent an Irish priest to convert him to Popery. The Duke, apprized of the visit and its object, very courteously received the priest and expressed great willingness to be instructed. But before they entered upon religious discussion, it was agreed that they should drink a glass of wine together. After they had drank awhile, the Duke took the cork out of the bottle, and stroking it with great gravity, asked the priest, "How do you like this horse?" The priest was confounded and silent. The Duke continued all the while to stroke the cork, and praise his beautiful horse. "Your grace," at length said the priest, "has chosen an unseasonable time to be merry." "Merry," cries the Duke, "merry! I was never more serious in my life. Does not your reverence see that this is a beautiful horse?" "Your grace," replies the father, "should compose yourself and consider." "Consider!" answers the Duke, smartly, "what must I consider? Don't you see that this is a very fine horse?" "Ah, my lord," rejoins the priest, "you know that only a few minutes ago you took it out of the bottle: it is nothing but a cork!" "What! would you persuade me that this fine courser is nothing but a cork?" "Nothing but a cork," says the father. "Well," replies the Duke, calmly, as if recovering from a dream, "I will not be too positive; my illness may have discomposed my mind; but, father, how do you prove that this is only a cork?" "Very easily, my lord; I look at it, and see it is but a cork; I touch it, and feel it is but a cork; I taste it, and taste it is but a cork. By the evidence of all my senses, I am convinced it is but a cork." "Your reverence," assents the Duke, "may be right; I am subject to whims; let us talk no more of the cork, but proceed to the holy business which brought you hither." The priest then entered on points controverted between Papists and Protestants, and continued until the Duke said, "If your reverence will prove to me the doctrine of transubstantiation, I can easily believe all the rest." The priest then commenced a long proof of transubstantiation, and concluded by saying, "after consecration of the bread in the mass, the bread is actually changed into the real body of Christ." "No," rejoins the Duke, "No! it continues to be mere bread still; and I can prove it, father, to be bread, and only bread, by your own argument. For I look upon it, and see it is but bread: I touch it, and feel it is but bread; I taste it, and taste it is bread. By the evidence of all my senses, I am convinced it is but bread. Remember the cork, father, remember the cork! The cork!"

CLERICAL WIT.—A Methodist preacher at a Camp-meeting held in this State, not a very long time ago, at the conclusion of his sermon took occasion to impress upon his hearers the propriety of contributing freely of their substance for the benefit of the church; and urged them to make the "collection that was then about to be taken up a good one." After the collection had been made, he arose with great solemnity, and looking into the contribution boxes, which, although they contained a great multitude of cents, yet showed a great dearth of silver, exclaimed with gravity, "I perceive that Alexander the coppersmith hath done us much harm."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON. Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday, August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trustees

THE ORIGINAL SABBATH UNCHANGED;

OR,

THE CONTINUING OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY, AND THE UNAUTHORIZED SUBSTITUTION OF THE FIRST, AS THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH.

BY JAMES A. BEGG, GLASGOW, N. B.

Institution of the Weekly Sabbath and its Design.

The great Creator, then, blessed the Sabbath to our first parents, and sanctified it for their observance, even before sin had bedimmed the glory of our pristine state, and whilst they enjoyed the most direct and immediate personal communion with their Lord. For, even then, holy purposes might have been served by it. The creature's joy in the mighty Maker of all was therein to be expressed, and his innocency was to be employed in commemorating Jehovah's excellency. Besides, even then, the Sabbath rest would come fraught with blessings to Adam in regard to the present life. For, although he was created holy as well as happy, he was nevertheless formed with a limitation of faculties, and in circumstances essential to our condition as man—a consideration which even in innocency would impress a value on the divine arrangement for Sabbatic rest. With a mind not only finite in itself, but in union also with a corporeal tenement of earthly mould, in his compound being, man was made under the influence of the conditions of both. The body, though free from the diseases, and dangers, and temptations, which sin has brought, had nevertheless all the properties of matter, and would become languid by exercise, and weary by labor, if unduly prolonged; and wide though we have every reason to believe the range of his intellect was while unvitiated by the contamination of evil, and strong the grasp it might take of any subject of inquiry to which it was directed, still, if not in the immaterial part itself, yet in the mysterious union of soul and body, there were conditions which rendered it fitting, if not absolutely necessary, that there should be recurring periods of repose. God, therefore, set limits to the occupation of both body and mind—the seventh day was sanctified and blessed from the first, and man was thereon called to rest, in memory of his Maker's finished work before, by the sinless exercise of a single week—if any he had—he needed refreshing rest for himself.

All this, we say, was most consistent with the condition of man before the fall—most consistent was it with the innocence of a holy being, that in Sabbatic rest he should witness of Him from whom all was received—thus pressing upon his own consideration and on the consideration of those around, that his holiness was derived; while that holiness would both enable him to perceive more truly, and to estimate more correctly, the glories of his God, and quicken in him the desire that all should share in the same enjoyment, and participate in his acknowledgement of its source. The Sabbath, recalling the thoughts to a period when things that now are had not yet received their being, tells of the Eternal, and the plenitude of His glory, before by the word of His power the worlds were framed, or the beauty of nature had appeared—making thus a demand upon man's faith concerning the origin of things which now exist. It thus testifies of One who is Lord and Master being also Friend and Benefactor. It tells of power which by a word called worlds into being, and invites to rest in the care of that power exercised for our good. God is therein saying, "All on which you look is my workmanship—ye yourselves are mine—your bodies are formed by me—your souls also came forth from my creating hand—every breath you draw is a gift from me," and this He says, and thus emphatically says, that we may be taught to trust in Him, that we may be very joyful in the rock of our salvation. Man, with the vigor of his unimpaired mental powers, while he retained his integrity, and could rightly distinguish and truly appreciate the beauty of holiness, would find continual delight even in that acquaintance with God which is to be derived from a contemplation of the wonders of creation. Looking up into the heavens, or casting his eye abroad upon the earth—in the consideration of all on which, in the hour of creation's new-born glories, the complacent eye of Jehovah rested—he would ever be able to discern cause of admiration and adoring gratitude. Endowed of God with nobler faculties, and designed to occupy a higher sphere, than the creatures subjected to his dominion, Adam, while yet in his purity, would be always conscious that the reasoning powers he possessed, and the soul within him, formed for eternity and for an eternal communion with the Father of spirits, with all its aspirations after what is truly good, whatever these might be, he owed entirely to the Eternal, whose gift they were. This feeling would be both quickened and expanded by the contemplation of all the varied forms of life and loveliness spread around him; and, when the yet unimpaired capacities of man specially fitted him for such contemplation, the Sabbath would be prized for the opportunities which it brought, and the calls which it made, to his pleasure and profit, through the works of God.

All this the Sabbath was and told to man in primeval innocence; and it was, therefore, perfectly adapted for his sinless state. And the sad change which has since come over our race has neither destroyed nor impaired the value of the object at which the God of the Sabbath therein aims. However extensive and injurious the influence of that change has been, in occasioning their oversight and neglect, we can, on the contrary, perceive how the fall has added force to the reasons of its original institution. The purpose of the Creator that "because he rested from all His work," a commemoration of that finished work should be maintained, is now but the more necessary as an antidote to that atheism of the human heart which excludes an abiding sense of the presence of the Eternal; and the beneficence of the design, in so far as man is concerned, is now the more obvious that the calls to adore and the opportunities for rest, authoritatively provided, are much more necessary. Viewed as an important privilege, it might, indeed, have been matter of momentous question whether the blessing of the Sabbath, bestowed on man in innocency, would be continued to the rebel and his posterity. Happily for us, the character of our God, and His desire of turning each one of us from our iniquities, decided this question in our favor. In the infinite mercy of a gracious Father, who contemplates fully his offspring's need, and who knows the value of the Sabbath as a means of sanctifying, this holy ordinance was still left to a fallen world, with the fullness of its blessing unimpaired. And accordingly, the inspired account of creation and the institution of the Sabbath, given in the beginning of God's Book, although written by Moses long after the fall, has in it no indication and no intimation of any such revocation. On the contrary, the narrative plainly implies the continuing force of the original obligation, and the continuance of the original blessing. The assigned reason remains equally valid, its force in no degree abated. The Sabbath still continues the memorial of the work and rest of the great First Cause. By it, we are, week by week, reminded that the same almighty energies, under the same gracious guidance, are still in operation in our behalf. Each recurring Sabbath testifies that it is by no fortuitous chance that the sun, and moon, and stars continue in their orbits in the heavens, or that life, health, and beauty, are on the earth below; but, that Jehovah, who at first made all things very good, and appointed to all their law, still directs their every movement, every where imparting tokens of His goodness and His grace. And we evidence our faith in this great truth, against a world of unbelievers, in faithfully observing as appointed "the Sabbaths of the Lord."

"Because that in it He had rested from all His work," God sanctified the seventh day—He distinguished it from other days, and set it apart to be used with and for Himself. He appointed its separation to sacred purposes; so that occupations enjoined, and recreations permitted, on other days, are unallowed thereupon. This sanctification relates entirely to the place which the Sabbath is to hold among men. God's sanctifying it is not to be confounded with His resting upon that day—it is consequent upon His rest. He "sanctified it because that in it He had rested from all His work." The divine rest had already taken place; the setting the Sabbath apart for man was a subsequent act. Because of the Creator's rest upon the seventh day, its sanctification by the creature is enjoined. The time of that day is to be devoted to God, and to be occupied with the things of God. He sanctified it by appointing the day to a holy use, and men are to sanctify it by applying it to the use enjoined. It is not that, naturally, there is any holiness in the day itself; but, being divinely appropiated for a special purpose, it is to be separated for that particular use; it is designed for the promotion of the glory of God and our own sanctification.

We are furnished with illustration of the import of the term sanctification by its reference to other matters. Thus it was a divine appointment in the subsequent enactments of the law given to Israel, "All the firstling males that come of thy herd and of thy flock, thou shalt sanctify unto the Lord thy God;" which sanctifying unto the Lord is thus farther explained, "Thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, nor shear the firstling of thy sheep; thou shalt eat it before the Lord thy God, year by year, in the place which the Lord shall choose, thou and thy household." Deut. 15: 19, 20. Again, "If a man shall sanctify unto the Lord some part of a field of his possession, then thy estimation shall be according to the seed thereof; an homer of barley seed shall be valued at fifty shekels of silver. If he sanctify his field from the year of Jubilee, according to thy estimation it shall stand. But if he sanctify his field after the Jubilee, then the priest shall reckon unto him the money according to the years that remain even unto the year of the Jubilee, and it shall be abated from thy estimation. And if he that sanctified the field will in any wise redeem it, then he shall add the fifth part of the money of thy estimation unto it, and it shall be assured to him. And if he will not redeem the field, or if he have sold the field to another man, it shall not be redeemed any more. But the field when it goeth out in the Jubilee shall be holy unto the Lord, as a field devoted, the possession thereof shall be the priests'. And if a man sanctify unto the Lord a field which he hath bought which is not of the fields of his possession, then the priest shall reckon unto him the worth of thy estimation, even unto the year of Jubilee; and he shall give thy estimation in that day as a holy thing unto the Lord. In the year of the Jubilee, the field shall return unto him of whom it was bought, even unto him to whom the possession of the land did belong." Lev. 27: 16—24.

The enjoined sanctification, in such cases, is evidently the setting apart by man to a sacred use, under divine authority, either for a time or altogether, a portion of that substance, the whole of which he receives from the Lord. So also, by the sanctifying of the seventh day, God is requiring man, and laying him under obligation, to give up to Him that portion of time for holy purposes. And whether the demand regards time, or cattle, or land, God thus makes proof of our faith and love, by His first giving to us all our time and substance, a boon at His hand, yet requiring that what of it is so sanctified, be regarded as exclusively His, held in trust for His purposes, and not to be employed as our own. Yet instead of withholding man's arm during time which He claims for Himself, and by an exercise of power preventing the possibility of its abuse, the God of the Sabbath gives it unto our charge, under responsibility to Him for its rightful appropriation to holy rest, that by a free and voluntary surrender, in conformity with his revealed will, our hearts should be enlarged in experience of the provision of His fatherly care and abundant bounty, in thus securing for us more undisturbed enjoyment of delightful communion with the God of our being, and providing thus the means of making more open acknowledgement of our dependence upon and joy in Him.

But as God not only Himself rested upon the seventh day but farther sanctified it, so He also "blessed" it. This farther distinction is likewise important; and it is a distinction which, however much overlooked, is not less obvious than important. The sanctifying and blessing of the Sabbath are as really distinct the one from the other, as they are distinct from the divine rest. Both are consequent on, and subsequent to, that rest; but between any of these there is no necessary connection. God might have rested on the seventh day, without either blessing or sanctifying it;—or, He might even have annexed to it His special blessing without requiring it to be sanctified or set apart to other than ordinary purposes;—or, having rested upon it, He might for that reason have required it to be so sanctified without annexing to it that special blessing. But God not only Himself rested upon the seventh day, He also, and on that account, sanctified it; and having "sanctified," He farther "blessed" it. Making a demand upon the faith of the creature, and desirous of teaching us at the same time that real loss was not to be sustained in giving back to God the required part of what He first had given, God blessed the very day He sanctified. If a memorial of God's creation and rest is to be established, it is not that man should suffer loss by the Sabbath commemoration. On the contrary, it is consecrated a jubilee day for man and beast—and amid all the changes which have since taken place—notwithstanding of the many rebillions of which our world has been the scene, and the catastrophes of which it has been the theatre—God has never yet been provoked, nor has He by any circumstance been induced to recall from this, His own chosen day, the blessing He thus early pronounced upon it. That blessing still stands unrevoked for him who lays hold upon God's covenant; and blessed still "is the man that doeth this, and the son of man that layeth hold upon it; that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and keepeth his hand from doing any evil." Isa. 56: 2.

The Creator even tn the very sanctifying of the seventh day as the Sabbath, was consulting for the good of men, making it a channel of blessing for both soul and body. This indeed he contemplates in the appointment of all the various occupations of life, on "the six working days;" but the seventh day, He has not only wholly sanctified, but also specially "blessed" for that very end. This blessing refers not expressly to the increase of worldly substance, although this is not necessarily excluded. It may form a part; for while in this respect by the sanctification of the Sabbath it might have seemed that a great loss must be incurred by our abstaining from worldly business—as ever to the eye of sense there does seem—by faith in the promise and purpose of God we are through that separation really to find a peculiar blessing. In Judah "all things went well" only when they obeyed the Lord.

THE LOCK OF HAIR.

This lock of hair, my dearest one,
Alone remains of thee;
All else of thy once beauteous form,
The grave conceals from me.

This lock of hair! this lock of hair!
Loved one—a part of thee!
How oft upon thy temples fair
I've twined it playfully.

All else is changed—thy mild dark eye,
Thine own sweet smile of love,
Have passed away—but cannot die—
They live for me above.

O I shall meet thee, when from earth
And sin released I rise,
Immortal at my second birth,
'Mid the bowers of Paradise.

In blest communion, there we'll spend
A long eternity,
Nor fear that death may ever end
Our sweet felicity.

'Till then, I'll keep this lock of hair,
Loved one—a part of thee!
And near my heart the treasure wear,
'Till comes my heart to thee.

MR. EDITOR,—You will earn the gratitude of the Universal Brotherhood of Humanity, by inserting in your paper the following Addresses from the Merchants, Manufacturers, and other inhabitants of Great Britain, to the Merchants, Manufacturers, Legislators, Citizens and Christians in America. The blessing of millions ready to perish shall be on you forever, if you will lend a column of your paper to these earnest appeals of our English brethren for everlasting peace between the two nations.

ELIHU BURRITT.

THE BOSTON ADDRESS.

"Esteemed Citizens of Boston, in New England:

"We the inhabitants of Boston, in Old England, assembled at a public meeting convened by our Mayor, in the Town Hall, 26th January, 1846, beg leave respectfully to present you this friendly address on the subject of International Peace.

"Two centuries ago, the inhabitants of your city, because they had received from this place the persecuted but truly venerable minister of the Gospel, Mr. John Cotton, honored our town by changing the name of their own, and adopting that of Boston. We trust that the respect then showed, will always continue to be deserved; and that friendship, along with commercial intercourse, will for all generations be perpetuated, never to be interrupted by national jealousies, or by the horrors and crimes of war.

"We believe war to be an evil—a pure evil, unattended by any good in its motives, actions, or results; an evil so tremendous, that no earthly consideration can justify it.

"We are convinced that war is destructive to all the interest of humanity, to happiness and liberty, to commerce and wealth, to science, arts, and civilization, to learning and intelligence, to philanthropy and religion.

"We regard war as UNREASONABLE; for even should it prove which party had the most STRENGTH, it would never show on which side was the most RIGHT: and we doubt not that any good, which may in some cases be supposed to have resulted from fighting, could have been secured in a greater degree, more rapidly, more effectually, more widely, more permanently, and far more cheaply, by negociation

We observe that any government designing an attack on the rights, liberty, happiness and commercial prosperity of any other nation, in all cases commence by assailing the rights, liberty, property, happiness and commerce of their own people.

We consider War to be condemned alike by the voice of conscience and experience; by natural and revealed religion; and to be unworthy of the nature of man, and contrary to the will of God. We therefore protest against our being called out to fight either against you or any other portion of the one family of man. We hope to see the day when it will be proved that war is as needless as it is pernicious, that it may be avoided; that the friends of reason and religion are able to awaken such a public sentiment on the subject, as will render it impossible for the selfish and the ambitious to turn the hand of man against his brother.

Citizens of Boston! permit us to exhort you to cherish and to spread these pacific principles; till all nations shall repose amid all the blessings of a universal and perpetual peace.

Signed on behalf of the Meeting.

J. NOBLE, Chairman.

A Member of the Town Council of Boston, Lincolnshire, England.

BENJAMIN FARRINGTON.

(Baptist Minister,) Secretary.

THE HUDDERSFIELD ADDRESS.

"From the Manufacturers, Merchants, and other Inhabitants of Huddersfield and its Neighborhood,

"To the Citizens of the United States of North America.

"Friends and Fellow-Christians,

"Permit us to take this mode of communicating with you in a spirit of friendship and brotherhood, on a subject which is at present agitating the public mind, both in this country and in yours—a subject of immeasurable importance, in every point of view, to our mutual interests.

"We have observed with regret, in many of the public papers, on both sides of the Atlantic, the manifestation of a warlike spirit, in reference to the disputed boundaries in the Oregon Territory. As it is not our business, so we have no inclination, to enter upon the merits of the respective claims of the two nations—our object is to induce you to unite your efforts with ours, to avert the threatened calamity.

"That war under any circumstances, and especially a war between two countries, bound together by innumerable ties, as are England and the United States, would be a terrible calamity, is a self-evident proposition, whether as regards the severance of the nearest domestic bonds, the disturbance of our ever-growing Commercial and Political relations, or the disgrace of our common Christianity.

"And shall it be, that two of the most powerful and enlightened nations of the earth, thus united by the ties of religion, consanguinity, and mutual interest, must turn out, in the face of the world, to settle a dispute by violence and bloodshed?

"Shall it be, that two nations so far advanced in civilization and refinement, must in the middle of the 19th century, adopt the brutish maxim of the most barbarous ages and countries, that "might is right."

"Shall it be that two professedly Christian countries, both engaged in instructing and evangelizing the Heathen, must set such an example to the Pagan world?—Forbid it, Humanity! Forbid it, Justice! Forbid it, Christianity!

"When private individuals adopt such a mode of settling their differences, and loss of life ensues, so great a crime is visited with the extreme penalty of the law. Happily, this manner of acting in private life is now chiefly confined to the most illiterate and depraved portion of the community, and why should we, in a national capacity, adhere to a barbarous practice, condemned by our own laws, in the relations of social life? If two intelligent and reasonable tradesmen differ, they settle the matter by arbitration—And why should not all international disputes be settled by arbitration also? It is not only more sensible, more humane and more christian, but far more likely than a resort to arms, to terminate the disagreement to mutual satisfaction, and certainly with incomparably less expense to the Exchequers of both countries.

"We therefore appeal to you, the intelligent Merchants and Citizens, in all parts of the Union, to exert to the utmost, your powerful influence with the public, and with the Federal Government, to prevent the occurrence of a war in which it would be the extreme of folly and wickedness to engage, whilst we are endeavoring to exercise a similar influence in this country. We feel confident that were the moral power thus possessed, but exercised in its full and legitimate extent on both sides of the Atlantic, it would not fail to effect the object we have in view—the preservation of Peace and Prosperity, both in your country and our own.

Ardently desiring this happy result,
We remain, &c.

16th of January, 1846.

This has received the signatures of most of the leading firms in Huddersfield.

FRIENDLY APPEAL

"From the Inhabitants of Plymouth, Great Britain, to the Citizens of the United States of America, for the purpose of averting War between the two Countries."

"To the Legislators and Citizens of the United States of America

"Friends and Brethren,—

"We are deeply concerned to perceive that there are any indications, how remote soever, of threatened hostility between your country and our own. Towards your nation we entertain, in common with the vast majority of our fellow-subjects, feelings of sincere good-will. As the friends of peace throughout the world, we desire that all those who delight in war may be scattered; but with you, to whom we are allied by community of national origin, by indentity of language, by similarity of many of our laws and institutions, we earnestly and especially deprecate hostility. Moreover, by war, our commercial intercourse would be seriously impeded, the progress of civilization and of science be obstructed, immense pecuniary loss be incurred, domestic ties be broken, humanity be outraged, life to a fearful extent be sacrificed, and dire offence committed against the laws of our beneficent Creator. By war we must both lose much; and what could the victor gain that would be worth one thousandth part of the cost of the conflict.

"Again: whatever be the value of the Oregon Territory, it would be a poor compensation to the owner, for the blood and treasure which would be spent in acquiring it: and then too, the dispute respecting it may so easily by settled by arbitration, if other and simpler means be ineffectual.

"Let us, we intreat you, agree to exert all our influence, personal and political, on each side of the Atlantic, to frustrate the devices of those ambitious and reckless spirits, in either country, who, by precipitating us into conflict, would render us the scorn of the world; while the energies and influence of two great nations, which ought to be combined for the benefit of the entire human race, would be foolishly and wickedly employed in inflicting mutnal and widely-spread injury and destruction.

"Allow us, then, to hope that your cordial response to this appeal may strengthen the bonds of amity between us, and promote the interests of universal peace."

Dated 27th Jan. 1846.

Signed by several hundreds of the Inhabitants of Plymouth, headed by the Mayor, and six borough and County Magistrates, and two Clergymen of the Establishment.

IMPERFECT IN ORIG

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 5, 1846.

CHURCH AND STATE.

Nothing more excites the sensitiveness of that large class of religionists who maintain that the observance of Sunday should be enforced by law, than to be told that their doctrine tends to a "union of Church and State." With might and main they are laboring to wake up our Legislatures to such action as will more effectually guard their favorite festival from desecration; yet they are not aiming at any union of Church and State—not they. We do not wish to disturb their feelings unnecessarily; but that such is the tendency of their measures we most sincerely believe, notwithstanding their disavowal of such intention. We admit that at present it is not one particular denomination that is concerned in the matter, but several united. Hence it is argued that though their proposition be entertained by government, there can be no danger of the union so much deprecated, since nothing is asked but that in which all sects are agreed, while their mutual jealousy of each other will forever prevent any one of them from securing that favor which is necessary, in order hat its tenets may be acknowledged as the State Religion.

There is just about plausibility enough in this argument to enable it to impose upon the ignorant and unsuspecting. It is a sheer fallacy; for divided as these Christians are into several distinct denominations, yet so far as the promotion of Sunday observance is concerned, they are united in one. The mere fact that they are divided on other points is urged without any pertinency.

Suppose some one sect should desire to have its peculiar creed enforced by law, and should urge that that creed embodied no principles except those in which the great majority of Christians were agreed, and that there could be no danger because its members were divided on other points except those formally expressed in the written formula—who does not see at a glance, that the fact of such division is urged without the least pertinency? Common sense would feel itself insulted by such an argument. Yet this is precisely the kind of argument, by which the objection to legislating in reference to the Sabbath is rebutted.

The fact is, we are presented with the alarming spectacle of several different orders amalgamated in one entire denomination, having a creed which contains but one single article, and that article declaring the sacredness of Sunday. We see this one denomination memoralizing our Legislatures, and asking them to enforce their creed by rigid enactments. And yet we are told, there is nothing in all this which tends to a union of Church and State! Who will say that there is not a possibility that the sects, of which this one denomination is composed, may yet become united on some other point besides that of Sunday sacredness? And when that is the case, what shall hinder them from requiring that the law shall support that point also? In progress of time their points of difference might become still farther reduced, until finally they should present the spectacle of one entire sect. Dare any one say that this supposition is visionary? Have we not seen within a few years a doctrine "ycleped" Millerism, spreading wide through the country, and affecting great numbers of almost all denominations? How did the leaders of that doctrine begin their operations? Did they begin by organizing a distinct sect? No; nor did they at first intend or anticipate such a thing. But what was the result? It became such an important and all-absorbing theme with them, that they were necessarily drawn together as persons of kindred spirit. They have finally been led to separate from the different persuasions to which they were respectively attached, and to form a new and distinct order, like any other. Various, multiform, and heterogeneous as were their doctrinal views before, they are now pretty much forgotten. Just so it may be with the Sunday movement. Different and opposing sects are engaged in it; nobody anticipates a final union of them; but the sacredness of the so-called Christian Sabbath is becoming an absorbing theme; and who will say that the labors of its advocates may not finally magnify its importance to such a degree, that all who are friendly to it will become embodied and known as one undivided denomination? Let no one say that it is impossible after what has been witnessed in regard to "Millerism."

Do we not know that in spite of all the differences of Christians, and amidst all their strifes, there is at this day a mighty laboring of soul after union? Indeed "for the divisions of Reuben there are great thoughts of heart." Notwithstanding the din and clash of controversy, there are moments when the mighty hunger of a Christian's soul after union gets the mastery. Why, the whole Protestant world is summoned to a Convention for Christian union to be held in London next summer. Aye, and one object—"prominent object"—of that Convention is to put another prop under the Puritan Sabbath. Whether that Convention shall prove a Utopian project, or not—which we much expect it will—still the mere calling of it proves the disposition of Christians to make great efforts towards putting an end to the breaches among them.

That the different sects of our own country, who are combining their energies for the promotion of what is called the Christian Sabbath, getting up Conventions, manufacturing public opinion, and withal aiming at invoking legislative interposition, Teucro duce, may at length become united on other points, and have their differences so far reduced that they can consistently become amalgamated in one body, is not altogether a chimerical notion. Certainly not sufficiently so to justify our legislative bodies in giving the smallest countenance to their schemes. And if they should become amalgamated, and should then apply to have their tenets enforced by law—which they might do with just as good reason as they now ask to have the Sunday enforced—would it not be a union of Church and State? That they would in that case ask such a favor, is altogether probable, judging from the spirit they now exhibit. For they could not consider those tenets of any less importance than the one which regards the festival of the "Lord's day," and they would be very apt to plead the Sunday laws as precedent for farther enactments.

We reiterate our conviction, that those laws which compel the observance of the Sabbath, Lord's day, or any other religious festival, do in reality look propitiously upon a State Religion. We protest against every thing that has a squinting towards the unholy union. We would have government so framed that Christian and Turk, Jew and Infidel, should alike enjoy freedom of opinion and action in all matters purely religious. Religion needs no aid from government. The Church is betrothed as a chaste virgin to Christ; but when she becomes married to any of the governments of this world, she commits adultery against her Lord. *

SYRIAC EPISTLES OF IGNATIUS.

In a former notice of Curetou's edition of this work, we have stated that there are great differences between it and the versions formerly published of these epistles. The dissimilarity is neither unimportant nor accidental. It consists not of words or sentences misplaced or even omitted from the recent shorter version. Whole consecutive paragraphs, or, as divided and numbered in the former short version, whole chapters, contained in it are wanting in this. Nor are these omissions the result of careless copying, or of accidental loss. The chapters are, on the contrary, the deliberate suppression by one writer, or the deliberate invention of another—and, in whatever light viewed, the alterations have been made in order to serve a purpose. Either surreptitious additions have been made in Ignatius' name, of sentiments which the corruptor desired should thus find currency; or, by unauthorized mutilations, the genuine opinions of the Father have been suppressed because disagreeable to these by whom those portions of his writings have been excluded.

Now, as respects the authority to be attached to such writings as those, it matters not which alternative we choose. Manifest corruption somewhere exists, and whether from additions or excisions, any value which might have been attached to a knowledge of the real opinions of Ignatius, is destroyed. If to a large extent the hand of an interpolater has obviously passed upon the church and the world his own, or others' views, feigning them as accredited by Ignatius' signature, the very portions to which I might attach the highest value, may be among those which stand in this predicament. Or, if an excisor has found the means of withdrawing whatever was offensive to himself in these epistles, some of the portions, so excluded, may have been those which I would most have desiderated in the writings of antiquity. It is not merely that the value of such writings is impaired—it is absolutely destroyed. Either blanks may have been created, or lacks may have been supplied, at the will of the corruptor, on the one hand, and I have no means of supplying the omissions, were I even to discover them; or, on the other hand, what is spurious may have been to any imaginable amount included, and I have no means of discerning it, so that I may reject it, without rejecting the whole, both as authority and evidence.

That I may not be suspected of unfair representations, I will hereafter, (God willing,) seek to substantiate by extracts, the necessity of this conclusion. And in doing so, I can afford to be generous to those who cling to the authority of the Fathers, giving them the utmost advantage in the comparison. I will not contrast the longest and the shortest versions, in order to exhibit the widest discrepancy, but will content myself with an exhibition of the dissimilarity existing between this new Syriac version and that which the lovers of such patristic lore have hitherto been pleased to term the genuine version of Ignatius. The discrepancies will, I think, be found such as fully to justify all I have said. J. A. B.

SOLEMN WARNING!—Under this attractive heading, which is somewhat familiar to us in these days, the editor of the Liberator discourses as follows:—"Four boys, belonging to West Springfield, recently went out on Sunday for the purpose of shooting partridges, when one of them was accidentally shot through the heart. This is gravely announced as a solemn warning to Sabbath-breakers! As it never happens that a person is shot by accident on any other day of the week, of course nothing can be more plain than that this is an indication of what is theologically styled the 'divine pleasure!' But, if one deserved to be shot for his heinous offence, the other three boys, being equally guilty, ought to have been shot likewise—by accident—on purpose to make the example more striking, or at least as a matter of impartial justice. The Springfield Republican, in recording this sad occurrence, says if the boys had been 'in the sanctuary,' or at home, this accident would not have occurred. Very sagacious, this! If nobody would venture where water is, then nobody would ever be drowned. See what it is to know something!"

THE WORLD'S CONVENTION on the subject of Christian Union, is to be held in London about the middle of August next—official notice to that effect having been published by the committee to whom the subject was referred.

RETURN OF A MISSIONARY FROM CHINA.—Rev J. L. Shuck, well known as a Baptist Missionary to China, arrived in New York on the 17th ult., accompanied by his children, and a native Chinese convert named Yong Seen Sang. Mr. Shuck returned on account of ill health, which has been greatly improved by the voyage. On Sunday the 22d ult., he addressed two or three congregations in this city concerning the history of the Baptist Mission in China since its establishment in 1836. He regards the war between Great Britain and China as a providential means of opening that country to the preaching of the gospel. There are now 30 or 40 interesting converts in Canton, for whose benefit Mr. Shuck is endeavoring to raise funds to erect a Baptist Chapel. The addresses of Mr. Shuck and the Chinaman who accompanies him, were replete with interest. A correspondent has furnished us below with some farther particulars.

BAPTIST MISSION IN CHINA.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It would afford me unfeigned pleasure if I could transfer to your readers the interest I have felt in seeing and hearing Mr. SHUCK and a Chinese Convert just arrived in this country. Mr. Shuck has been in the foreign field about ten years. He went forth weeping, bearing precious seed. He has doubtless returned rejoicing, bearing one of his sheaves with him. The Chinese convert is a literary man, about thirty-four years of age, easy and dignified in his manners, and is now a minister of the cross to his benighted countrymen. He gave prompt and appropriate answers to all the questions propounded to him except one. When he was asked what he thought of those professed disciples of Christ in this country who pray for the heathen, but do nothing to send the gospel to them, he seemed puzzled, and at first modestly declined answering. After a little pause, he remarked to the effect, that those who act as well as pray for the heathen, give proof of their sincerity. Mr. Shuck is located at Canton, and is the pastor of a Baptist Church in that great city, which he calls the commercial emporium of China. It is the largest city open to missionary effort in the empire. It has one hundred Exchanges, large neat edifices, built for purposes of business and amusement. He thinks that Canton is preferable to Pekin for missionary purposes.

The Chinese he represents as a literary people. The art of printing and stereotyping was known to them prior to their introduction among the nations of Europe. The mere catalogue of one of their royal libraries consists of 120 volumes of 140 pages each. Compared with other heathen nations, the Chinese may be said to have attained a high degree of civilization; and they have the best code of morals ever invented by man. But alas, morality, civilization, and literature, cannot make bad men good. It is the office of the glorious gospel of the blessed God to do this. And the providence of God is making a way, yea, has already opened an effectual door, for the promulgation of the gospel to the teeming millions of Chinese idolaters. Already five large cities are open to the missionaries of the cross. Mr. Shuck expects to return in a few months with means to erect a suitable house of worship in Canton. There he expects to labor until his labors on earth shall cease. A FRIEND OF MISSIONS.

AGENCY INCIDENTS.

Amusing and instructive incidents often come in the way of agents for benevolent societies. Not unfrequently they find a poor and unpretending member of the church ready to give all he possesses for the cause of Christ, while his next-door neighbor, who may be worth his thousands of dollars, and may have been notorious for his noisy talk about benevolence, will only give a paltry pittance which it is almost disgraceful to accept. A correspondent of Zion's Advocate has furnished some happy illustrations of an agent's experience, a part of which we copy for the encouragement of him who "deviseth liberal things," as well as for the admonition of him who "withholdeth more than is meet":—

"A lady having two gold pieces, which had been presented by her father as keepsakes, gave them for the Home Mission Society, saying, 'I can honor my father no better than by giving these to send the gospel to the destitute;' she added a sufficient amount to constitute herself a life-member.

"Another lady, having listened to an address which I delivered, sent me, the next morning, a sum of money which she had reserved for traveling expenses on a contemplated visit to some friends, preferring to aid so good a cause before the indulgence she had meditated.

"Another, a young lady, whose means of subsistence is her needle, made herself a life-member by the payment of thirty dollars.

"And yet another. This was a member of a church, whose property is estimated at the value of between eight and ten thousand dollars. He was present when I delivered an address, and subsequently informed me that, for four years, he had felt it his duty to withhold his contributions for any missionary purposes, on account of the co-operation of the Northern churches with those of the South, wishing to be sure that his money would not be mingled with that of slaveholders. I explained to him the present position of the North and South, when, on obtaining full satisfaction on that point, he, without any direct solicitation from me, presented me a donation, in specie of FIFTY CENTS!"

REVOLUTION IN BURMAH.—Recent letters from Burmah state that a revolution has taken place in that empire, which will undoubtedly prove favorable to the interests of Christianity. The King of Ava has been dethroned, after having put to death nearly all the officers of his court. Prince Merk'ard, the old friend of Rev. Eugenio Kincaid, has been appointed Regent. This will open a door of access to the whole of that interesting people.

A PROPHECY FULFILLED.

In the fourth chapter of the Apostle Paul's epistle to Timothy, we are told that "in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils, ... forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth." Now we beg our readers to compare this description with the following article, which we copy from the Philadelphia "Catholic Herald" of Feb. 19, and then tell us if the Apostle Paul was not a veritable prophet, whose words are being fulfilled at the present day, and before our own eyes:—

REGULATIONS FOR THE ENSUING LENT IN THIS DIOCESE.—1. All the faithful who have completed their twenty-first year are, unless legitimately dispensed, bound to observe the Fast of Lent.

2. They are only to make one meal a day, excepting Sundays.

3. The meal allowed on fast-days is not to be taken till about noon.

4. At that meal, if on any day, permission should be granted for eating flesh; both flesh and fish are not to be used at the same time.

5. A small refreshment, commonly called collation, is allowed in the evening; no general rule as to the quantity of food permitted at this time is or can be made. But the practice of the most regular Christian is never to let it exceed the fourth part of an ordinary meal.

6. The quality of food allowed at a collation is, in this diocese, bread, butter, cheese, all kinds of fruit, salads, vegetables, and fish, though not warm, but fish previously prepared and grown cold. Milk and eggs are prohibited.

7. General usage has made it lawful to drink in the morning some warm liquid; as tea, coffee, or thin chocolate, made with water, to which a few drops of milk may be added, serving rather to color the liquids, than make them substantial food.

8. Necessity and custom have authorized the use of hog's lard, instead of butter, in preparing fish, vegetables, &c., &c., &c.

9. The following persons are exempted from the obligation of fasting: young persons under twenty-one years of age, the sick, pregnant women, or those giving suck to infants, those who are obliged to hard labor, all who through weakness can not fast without great prejudice to their health.

10. By dispensation, the use of flesh-meat will be allowed at any time on Sundays, and once a day only on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, with the exception of the first four days, and all Holy Week, including Palm Sunday.

IMPROVING THE CONDITION OF THE POOR.

Several Associations have been formed in different cities within two years past, for improving the condition of the poor, and putting an end to street begging, by the appointment of visitors in each ward or district to extend relief and encouragement to every really poor person not receiving sufficient aid from other sources. This arrangement is said to have been highly beneficial in its influence upon the physical and moral condition of the poor. No doubt it might be adopted in every city, and in many of the larger villages, with great profit. The following extract from an Address of the Albany Association, refers wisely to the evils which result from the practice of indiscriminate alms-giving:—

"Those who have visited the poor with a view to a discriminating charity, are unanimous that the real destitution of the city, that which is the fruit of misfortune and not of indolence and vice, requires almost always to be sought out. The ingenuous poor man, whose destitution proceeds from sickness, or other inevitable calamity, instinctively shrinks from exposing his suffering to the public gaze, and is only brought to do it by the constraint of imperious necessity, while it is, almost in all cases, the professional pauper alone who parades his sorrows in the streets, seeking the gratification of dishonest lusts through the touching mimicry of woe. Now it needs no formal argument to show, that the whole support of this artificial pauperism is derived from the practice of indiscriminate alms-giving. The fact is too palpably clear for denial. By our unwise and inconsiderate conduct in this respect, we actually put a premium upon imposture, and force into activity, much of that vice which, if left latent, would die out of itself. And this, unfortunately, is not all the mischief we ignorantly do. We are also robbing those to whom our charity is positively due, the unfortunate destitute who righteously abhor the trade of begging, and yet see it absorbing the nourishment which properly belongs to them and their children alone."

"DISSOLVING VIEWS."—The enterprising proprietor of the American Museum has recently procured from England, and is about to bring before the citizens of New York, a series of Dissolving Views, designed to illustrate interesting scripture scenes, such as Babylon, the Holy Land, Jerusalem, &c. We are glad to learn that the taste of the times is such as to encourage their exhibition at the Museum. The following description of them is taken from a Circular just issued:—

There are twelve in number, beginning with a view of 'Edom in its early days,' in its original and native loveliness, which is gradually melted away and gives place to a brilliant representation of it in the time of the Romans; which in turn is dissolved into another view of it "as it now appears." Then follows "Babylon in prosperity," succeeded by Babylon in its present state.

Next we have a view of the "Holy Land—receiving God's blessing," and a more magnificent scene was never sketched by the pencil of the artist, or a more instructive lesson inculcated by his faithful delineations, than that which is derived from the change of this view, to one showing its desolation at the present time, when that nation is driven from the "land flowing with milk and honey," and "scattered amongst the nations of the earth."

Then follows a beautiful and brilliant representation of the City of Jerusalem in prosperity; succeeded by a view of the same, when the judgment of God rested upon it in the time of the Babylonish Captivity.

The next scene is one representing the Holy City in the time of our Saviour, in all its splendor and magnificence, which is changed to a view of it at the time of its destruction by the Romans, with the contending armies in fierce battle array; which in turn gives place to one shewing its present desolation when "Jerusalem is trodden down by the Gentiles."

The splendor and beauty of these representations cannot be imagined without being witnessed.

DEATH'S DOINGS IN NEW YORK FOR ONE YEAR.—A report on this subject shows that the whole number of deaths in the city of New York during the year 1845 was 10,983. Of these, 5,865 were under five years of age, from five to ten 410, from ten to twenty 389, from twenty to thirty 1,161, from thirty to forty 1,131, from forty to fifty 760, from fifty to sixty 417, from sixty to seventy 343, from seventy to eighty 206, from eighty to ninety 111, from ninety to one hundred 21, one hundred and over 3. The principal causes of death are as follows: Consumption 1,659, Convulsions 721, Fevers 501, Cholera Infantum 523, Apoplexy 252, Congestion of the Brain 186, violent death 165, old age 113. The increase of deaths in 1845 over 1844, is 2,023.

FATAL DUEL.—A duel took place near Richmond, Va., on the 25th ult., between John H. Pleasants, long known as editor of the Richmond Whig, and Thomas Ritchie, Jr., one of the editors of the Richmond Enquirer, which resulted in the death of the former, after two days of suffering from his wounds. The difficulty originated in a series of articles of a personal character which had appeared from time to time in their respective papers. The challenge was given by Mr. Pleasants on Tuesday of last week, and the meeting took place on Wednesday morning. The following account of it can not be read without mingled feelings of surprise, indignation, and pity:—

"Thirty feet was the distance—each to arm himself as he thought proper, and to advance or not, after the first fire. After the first fire the parties advanced toward each other, firing as they advanced. When they met, Pleasants threw his pistol into the face of Ritchie, knocking out one of his teeth, and somewhat bruising his face—meanwhile four shots from Ritchie's pistols had struck Pleasants, viz: one in the groin, one just above, one near the breast, and one on the arm. As soon as P. threw his pistol, he drew a sword from a cane which he carried under his arm, and was about to pierce it through Ritchie, but the latter parried the blow with a sabre, shattering the sword cane and cutting away three fingers from Pleasant's right hand. In the act of raising the sabre with which again to strike Pleasants, who was then, perhaps, at his mercy, Pleasants fell."

PLAIN TALK.

Our readers will doubtless all recollect the case of Mason and Madame Costello, who were recently tried and convicted for procuring abortion. The Tribune refers to this subject as follows, which we call plain talk. We should be glad if our law-makers would take the hint.

A correspondent writes us in palliation of the crime of Mason, appealing to public sympathy for his afflicted wife and children. His wife, we learn, promptly forgave her wrongs, and has throughout done her utmost to shield him from the legal penalty of his offence. Her suffering and anguish probably exceed those of either of the culprits, and she can not perceive the justice of a sentence which bears with keenest severity not only on the innocent but on those most deeply wronged by the crime.

But our correspondent has not touched the best point in his case. The elected law-makers of our State ought to be serving out the term of stone-cutting to which they have consigned Mason. By their wilful and persistent refusal to brand Seduction and Adultery as crimes, they have strongly aided to pervert or destroy the moral sense of thousands, to their own fearful injury as well as that of the public. Our youth are taught by the laws under which they live to regard the offences against Female Purity as no crimes at all, or at the worst very trifling and venial offences against morality, which Law disregards. Thus misled, they are early trained to lewdness, and live to practice it. The Law tells them that not merely lewdness but the deliberate violation and contempt of marriage-vows is undeserving of its censures. Thus tutored and tempted to crime by Law, Mason committed the original and greatest wrong in the case. The Law never raised a warning finger until he had been driven, by the necessity of shielding himself and his victim from popular odium, to commit a second crime which any one in his predicament would have done, and most would have reasoned themselves into believing excusable if not laudable. An illegitimate offspring (so reasons a man in his condition) will be a shame and curse to its parents evermore, a scandal to the public, an offence to morality, a burden to itself—Why not prevent such consequences of the crime already committed and bury the secret in the breasts of the offenders? So reasons Guilt; so it acts. But now the tempter Law—which licenses the rumseller and hangs the raving homicide whom his poisons have bereft of sense—darts forward to hurl its thunders at the guilty head; and the unreflecting Public, who smile at triumphant Libertinism and crowd the Theatres to see it represented as alluringly as possible, swell the fierce cry for vengeance on the criminal. The many-headed multitude love Licentiousness and loathe only the practices sometimes necessary to hide it from the public gaze and prevent its evil consequences, which practices and consequences they do not expect to be driven to or at the worst to be detected in, whatever their secret vices. Such is the explanation of the feeling against Costello and Mason, when viewed in connection with the general indifference to the legal defencelessness of Female Innocence from the ravages of the prowling Libertine.

REV. CHARLES TORREY.—A petition has been presented to Gov. Pratt, of Maryland, for the pardon of Rev. Charles Torrey, (now confined in the Penitentiary for abducting slaves,) predicated on his increasing ill health. It is proposed that he shall pay for the slaves, be pardoned, and leave the State. He admits that he has acted wrong, and desires to be forgiven. His wife has also petitioned in his behalf, with numerous other applicants.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

On Monday of last week, neither House of Congress was in session, the day having been devoted to a celebration of the anniversary of the birth of Washington. What was done during the remainder of the week, can be summed up in few words. The time of the SENATE was mostly occupied with the consideration of the Reslution of the Committee on Foreign Relations, proposing to give notice to Great Britain of the intention of this government to annul the treaty for the joint occupancy of the Oregon Territory. The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES did little else than to pass several private bills, and talk about the river and harbor appropriation bill.

SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF 45 LIVES.—The British bark Ida, 550 tons burthen, Wm. C. Chambers, master, sailed from London, where she was owned, Dec. 18, 1845, with 38 passengers and a crew of 18 souls, bound to Portsmouth, Eng., to take in Government stores for Canada. Thence sailed about 4th or 5th January last, for St. John, N. B. On the 26th, being in lat. 44 N. lon. 52 30 W., the bark broached-to while scudding before a severe gale from S. S. E. and was thrown on her beam ends. Orders were given to cut away the foremast; but before they had time to do so, the bark righted, full of water. The Captain then ordered the long-boat to be got under the lee, the other boats having been lost. The passengers immediately rushed into her promiscuously, followed by the Captain and crew, to the number of 45. The painter parted, and the boat dropped astern. The land bore N. N. E., distance about 30 leagues by observation. The boat got about two cables' length from the vessel, when she shipped a sea, filled, and all in her perished. The mate, nine men, and one young woman, remained on the wreck, in the tops, from Monday morning until Friday, when they were taken off by the schooner Three Sisters, of Eden, where they were landed, much frozen, and in destitute circumstances—the mate being the only one able to travel.

SNOWING WORMS.—The following statement is contributed to the Congregational Journal, of Concord, N. H., by Rev. I. S. Davis, brother of the late Mayor of Boston:—

As I was returning from Piermont on Monday, the 1st of December, I saw on the snow, which had fallen during the night, what I supposed to be oats, spread broad-cast; but not seeing any track in the snow—for I was the first that traveled the road after the snow fell—my curiosity led me to descend from my carriage and examine; when, to my great surprise, I found that the objects I saw were living worms, about an inch long, lying on the top of the snow by hundreds; and these were scattered along the road I traveled for a distance of not less than five miles. I would say, farther, that there were no trees near, from which the worms might have been shaken; and if there had been, and the worms had been on them, they would all have been frozen, for it had been very cold, and the ground was frozen hard before the snow fell. The worms were alive, for they immediately coiled up when I took them in my hand. They were of a brown color, with about 12 or 16 legs.

ANECDOTE OF J. Q. ADAMS.—The correspondent of the Baltimore Patriot thus writes:—

An incident occurred in the House of Representatives a few days ago, well worth reading. Mr. Charles J. Ingersoll and Mr. John Quincy Adams, as is generally known, have been anything but warm personal friends for years past. The other day, however, Mr. Ingersoll was seen at Mr. Adams' desk, and the two venerable gentlemen were conversing together in the most courteous and friendly manner. After Mr. Ingersoll had repaired to his own seat, a member observed to Mr. Adams that he had been pleased in witnessing the meeting between Pilate and Herod! Mr. Adams thanked the gentleman for the remark, and then observed that, just before the downfall of Mark Anthony, Cicero made friends with several of the Roman tribunes with whom he had been on terms of bitter enmity for years. His friends charged him with inconsistency! Whereupon Cicero replied, "I desire that my enmities may be temporary; my friendships eternal."

TIT FOR TAT.—The following novel story of a robbery is richly worth a place in our columns. We quote from the Montreal Times:

About three weeks since the son of a habitant living at St. Augustin, Riviere de Chene, having sold a pair of oxen in town, was returning home in the evening with his money, when, in a lonely part of the road, he was passed by a gentleman, as he supposed, in a fine sleigh, with a good horse, who immediately drew up and induced the boy to fasten his horse behind the sleigh, and to get in with him to enliven the tediousness of the road by conversation. Shortly afterwards the gentlem in asked the boy if he had not sold a pair of oxen that day in town, to which the boy, becoming somewhat suspicious, answered "No" whereupon the gentleman said he had sold them about sunset, and had got the money, and that if he did not give it to him he would blow his brains out, at the same time pulling from his pocket a pistol. The boy becoming alarmed pulled from his pocket a purse containing the money, which fortunately dropped on the road. The robber immediately jumped out of his sleigh, which was some yards in advance of the purse, and ran back for his longed-for treasure, when the boy, with great presence of mind, took hold of the reins and drove off as fast as he could with both horses and sleigh. The robber then fired his pistol, the contents of which passed through the back of the sleigh and between the boy's legs. The boy reached home in safety, and after examining the sleigh, found in the box of it, which was locked, the sum of three thousand francs—£125 currency. No one, as might be expected, has applied for the sleigh and horse.

SINGULAR AFFAIR.—A man who had just come to Dixboro, Mich., with a view of taking up his residence there, has made a statement to the Magistrate of that place that his house has been haunted by a female apparition, who said that she had once lived in that house, had been murdered for her money, &c. &c. The earnest manner of the deponent induced an examination of the corpse of the person indicated as having formerly dwelt in the house; and the Coroner's jury, after a careful scrutiny, returned a verdict of death by poisoning. Were it not for this circumstance, the statement of Van Wart might have been attributed to the wanderings of a diseased brain.

SINGULAR.—On Thursday, 5th ult. as Samuel Harding, Esq. was driving a team before a sleigh in this borough, by a sudden lurch of the sleigh upon the ice, he was thrown backward, and struck upon his head. He was picked up apparently lifeless, but speedily seemed to recover, and insisted upon going home alone, which he did, turning a corner, driving by several persons, over the river—then quite a job—a mile through the narrows, and finally to his farm in Eaton, three or four miles distant. Arrived there, he left his team, went to the barn, then to his house, where his family were surprised at some oddities in his conduct, and asked him what the matwas. "O, nothing at all," was the reply. A physician was sent for—Mr. H. was bled, and has recovered from the severe shock. But from the moment he fell—with all the conversation and driving that ensued until bled by the physician—Mr. H. had no mental consciousness, nor can he since recall a fact that transpired in the interval! CONSULTING A DOCTOR BY TELEGRAPH.—We do not remember to have heard of a patient consulting a physician by Telegraph before yesterday. Early in the ferenoon yesterday, a gentleman stepped into the Telegraph office at Buffalo and desired to have Dr. Stevens, who resides and practices in this village, called into the office here, as he wished to have a conversation with him. Mr. Boughton immediately called in the Doctor. The gentleman at Buffalo said his wife was ill, and desired that the Dr. should prescribe for her. The Dr. did not exactly feel his patient's pulse or look at her tongue, as is usually the way with physicians, but obtained a full and accurate statement of her symptoms, condition, &c., and immediately made the proper prescriptions. It is to be presumed the patient is doing well, as the Doctor was to have been consulted again in the afternoon did not the prescriptions made in the morning have the desired effect.

"Mr. Colquitt is not only an able legislator, but a sound lawyer and a good preacher. He is a man of decided talent, energetic, persevering, and industrious. He is said to have made in one day, two stump speeches, preached two sermons, argued a case in court, and joined a couple in the holy bonds of wedlock! He also possesses, according to his friends, another very eminent qualification for a Senator of the United States. To use the language of the authority referred to, 'he can thrash any other man wrapped up in the same quantity of skin.'"

DREADFUL STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.—Capt. Perry, of the steamboat Brunette, which arrived at New Orleans on the 17th ult., from St. Louis, reports that the steamboat Saladin, from Nashville, in passing down the river, came into collision on the evening of the 12th with the steamboat Congress, going up, near Pilcher's Point. Fifteen persons were killed by the collision, or subsequently drowned, but their names are not given. The cabin of the Congress separated from the hull, and was towed down to Lake Providence by the Saladin. The hull of the Congress immediately sunk. It is farther stated that in consequence of the collision, the connecting pipes of the engine of the Congress burst, and severely scalded several of her passengers.

"ROSE AND BLANCHE."—Mrs. Niles, a French lady, wife of Dr. Niles, of Massachusetts, and mother-in-law to the celebrated French author, Eugene Sue, is at present in Washington. She has two daughters, twins, young and pleasing girls, of most amiable characters, and resembling each other in appearance most remarkably. These girls are the originals from which Sue drew his celebrated characters Rose and Blanche in the Wandering Jew. This circumstance renders these little girls, scarcely twelve years old, objects of great admiration.

EXPERIMENTS WITH THE BROCCHIRI WATER.—We stated on Saturday that this wonderful styptic was for sale in this city by Mr. J. M. Laroque, druggist. Yesterday we witnessed an experiment to test its properties, conducted by Dr. Ninian Pickney of the U. S. Navy, assisted by Dr. Joseph B. Coskery of the U. S. Navy. Hargrove Hinckley, Chas. S. Arcambal, Edward Jamet, Alfred Laroque and E. Laroque, students of medicine in the Washington University. A sheep was placed on a table, and at half past four the carotid artery was entirely severed. The arterial blood immediately gushed forth in a large volume and with great rapidity. The Styptic was instantly applied, and three small pledgets of wool saturated with it were introduced into the wound, and in immediate contact with the wounded artery. In about a minute the blood entirely ceased to flow, and in passing through, the wound coagulated quickly and firmly, showing conclusively that it had been acted upon by the water. The pressure was kept up for half an hour, and a portion of the wool removed and freshly saturated pieces re-applied. The wound was then bandaged, and in an hour and a half after the operation the sheep stood upon his legs and walked about. At 7 o'clock we saw the animal, and found it eating.

THE NEW STATE PRISON.—From a Report recentlp published, it appears that the new prison of the State of New York in Clinton County is going forward with a good degree of rapidity. The buildings are so far advanced as to furnish accommodations for 184 convicts, the number confined there on the first of January last. Of these, 59 were removed from Sing-Sing and 44 from Auburn. The plan of the body of the Prison contemplates the erection of a building 500 feet long and 55 feet wide, to contain 504 cells. One half of the prison proper will be completed on the opening of spring. The whole sum expended thus far is $80,000, and a farther appropriation of $75,000 is asked of the present Legislature.

SINGULAR COINCIDENCE.—Two females called upon one of our physicians, a few days since, for medical advice. While there another female came in for the same purpose, both parties entire strangers to each other. They sat some time, and we believe conversed. After they left, the physician ascertained that one of the two females was a sister of Osborn, lately murdered in this city, while the other was the sister of Potter, the murderer, now condemned to death for the crime.

SUMMARY.

The Utica Gazette says, "Hurlburt & Johnson, of New-York, received lately the princely fee of $20,000 from one of their clients." The magnitude of this fee for a single suit, is perhaps unexampled in this State.

A Mr. Miles Ivey, of Alabama, conceiving that he had a cause of quarrel with the member of the Legislature from Harbour county, challenged him to fight, for which he was sentenced to the penitentiary. This will, we think, curb the "honorable" spirit of some of the chivalry of that State.

There are 6,320 female operatives at Lowell. Of these, 2,714 are connected with some Sunday school, either as teachers or scholars; 2,276 are church members; 527 have been teachers in common schools. The sums earned range from 75cts. to $4 85 per week. They have $1,000,000 in the Savings Bank at Lowell.

The Government has entered into a contract for the construction of a line of steamships to ply between New-Orleans and Galveston, the constructor, Mr. Morgan of this city, to receive two-thirds of the postage. The vessels are to be of such strength as will fit them for war purposes, in case of need.

In England and Wales the value of household furniture is £130,000,000, of wearing apparel £16,000,000, and of plate, jewels, &c., £131,000,000.

Improvements at and around Niagara Falls are in progress for the ensuing season. On the American side, where the precipice is 250 feet, the circular road is completed, and to make the descent easy and safe, its various windings extend to three-fourths of a mile. It will be both carriage and foot path. To guard against accidents on the one side, it is protected by a stone railing. The whole cost of the road will be $6,000.

Two young mechanics of Russia, have recently exhibited before the Polytechnic Society of Berlin, a carriage with inherent rails, of their own invention, for which they have obtained a patent in Prussia and Saxe-Weimar. This carriage is provided with two series of rails, one on each side, and which by some mechanism, move so that one of them is always under the wheels, and it can be made to proceed twice as fast as carriages can on common roads, although not with railway speed. It may be attached to an engine, or drawn by horses.

One day last week, a merchant in Milk-street, Boston, ordered a clerk, 17 or 18 years of age, whom he had just received into his counting-room, to take off an account from the books with all dispatch. Soon after, hearing him scratching out something from the Ledger, the merchant inquired what he was doing; to which he replied that he was "taking off the account, but his knife was so dull that it would take all the afternoon to get it off!"

The Arab ladies dress in loose gowns with veiled faces except the eyes. In a hamlet on the Nile, the fashion varied. She wore a light jacket, and loose skirt, and one corner of the dark handkerchief which enveloped her head hung down her back, with six silver whistles suspended from it. A crescent of gold in her nose, bracelets and rings on her wrists and fingers, and some coins suspended from her forehead, completed her ornaments.

Ophthalmia is a common disease in Egypt, and is ascribed partly to the fine dust of the desert, which pervades the air in the dry season, and partly to the bad food and filthy habits of the people. Russegger ascribes the disease, with more probability, to the saline particles deposited by the mud of the Nile, with which the air is impregnated constantly after the inundation.

As I passed through the cemetery towards the city, I observed many women mourning over the graves of their friends, and watering also, shrubs, planted in small square pits made in the tops of the raised sepulchres. There is something touching in the flowers thus springing out of the whitened tombs, and blooming over the cold graves. I observed it, says Dr. Durbin, only at Alexandria and Sidon.

Dr. Durbin says of the pillar erected in honor of Dioclesian, by the Perfect Publius, "as one gazes on this wonderful shaft, he involuntarily asks himself, by what means did the ancients raise it to a perpendicular position, then elevate it twelve feet, the height of the base, and bringing it exactly over the inverted pyramid on which it rests, set accurately down upon its resting place? Nothing compared with this has been achieved by modern mechanics."

The Sun announces a very important invention, being a new mode of propelling steamboats, by which a speed of from twenty-five to thirty miles an hour may be obtained in navigating rivers or oceans! It entirely supersedes paddle-wheels, screw propellers, &c. &c., and has the merit of operating altogether under water, beyond the reach of an enemy's fire.

A carman of this city, who has been rescued from the way of all moderate drinkers, takes an excellent method of uniting preaching and practice, as his business card exemplifies:

GEORGE T. HALL,
CART NO. 3012,
Residence 45 Elizabeth-Street.

Old Alcohol I will not cart,
But all things else with all my heart;
Old Dick and I have now good dinners,
Come sign the pledge, ye drunken sinners.

The Lodge of Odd Fellows in Bridgewater, Mass., have passed a resolution: "That profane swearing is a wanton and unprovoked vice, not induced by any temptation of honor or gain, a breach of common decency and courtesy in the common intercourse of man with man, and recommend that a brother who is habituated to the disgraceful practice, be brought to trial therefor."

The cotton mill of John Olney & Co., at Brand's Iron Works, was totally destroyed by fire on Thursday morning at about 2 o'clock, together with a store on the opposite side of the street, owned by Edward Barber, and occupied by Olney and Richmond.

The Fitchville factory, owned by Asa Fitch, was burned down on the morning of the 17th ult. Nothing was saved but two pickers. Its value from 50 to $75,000, and was insured in Boston and in this city.

The Northampton (Mass.) Courier states, that the late Isaac C. Pray, of Boston, is said to have left an estate of $500,000, one third of which will go to a recreant son of the same name now in England.

The donations received by the General Committee for the relief of the sufferers by the distressing fires in Quebec, amount to the very liberal sum of £149,249. Of this sum £103,083 were received from Great Britain, £12,398 from the citizens of Quebec, £13,060 from those of Montreal, £7,000 from the Provincial Government of Canada.

It is announced that the Naval Department at Washington have under consideration the adoption of a substitute for the paddle and propeller, which will give to steamboats a speed of thirty miles an hour.

The rumors set afloat of the death of Henry Clay and that Cassius M. Clay had fought a duel with Tom Marshall and been mortally wounded, are utter fabrications.

The St. Louis Reporter says, that about 2,000 Mormons, mostly young men, have crossed the Mississippi on their way to California. They are to form the avant guard of the Mormon expedition. They have started early for the purpose of providing the necessary assistance to those who are to follow.

We learn from the Indiana State Sentinel that Rev. Nelson R. Ellis, of Marion Co., committed suicide by shooting himself with a rifle on the 29th ult.

There is on exhibition at the stall of the Messrs. Robbins, at Fulton Market, a turkey weighing twenty-eight pounds, probably the largest tame turkey ever sold at Fulton Market.

The Newcastle, Ia. Courier describes a baby three years old, weighing over one hundred pounds, and measuring three feet around the chest.

The people of Portland, Me., have had eighty-eight days of sleighing, with the prospect of half as many more.

Review of New-York Market,—Monday, Feb. 2.

MARRIED,

In Westerly, R. I., on the 25th ult., by Eld. George B. Utter, Mr. SANFORD P. STILLMAN, of Stonington, Ct., and Miss CATHARINE YORK, of Oxford, N. Y.

In Westerly, R. I., on the 26th ult., by Eld. Alexander Campbell, Mr. GEORGE W. WEEDEN and Miss SARAH T. CONGDON, both of Jamestown, R. I.

In Genesee, N. Y., on the 15th ult., by Eld. Z. Campbell, Mr. EDWIN M. CRANDALL and Miss FRANCES G. GREENE, all of the above place.

On the 20th of February, by Eld. Lucius Crandall, Mr. JOHN WALWORTH and Miss MARY BURDICK, all of Alfred, N. Y.

DIED,

In North Stonington, Ct., on the 13th ult., of consumption, Mrs. EUNICE WHEELER, aged 72 years. She had been blind for nearly sixteen years, and had suffered for a long time from the disease of which she died. In all her affliction, however, she was sustained by the Christian hope, and enabled to endure with cheerfulness and resignation the will of the Lord. Death was a welcome messenger to call her to the bosom of her Saviour.

In De Ruyter, N. Y., on the 19th ult., Mrs. RUTH CRUMB, wife of Sylvester Crumb, in the 75th year of her age. Her disease was on the heart, and her sufferings for about four weeks were very severe. She expressed an anxiety to depart and be with Christ, and her friends have no doubt but that for her to die was gain. She embraced Christ in early life, and became a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I. She has since been successively a member of the churches of 1st Brookfield, De Ruyter, and Otselic. Of the last, she was a member till death closed her pilgrimage. She is now without doubt a member of the Church in Heaven.

J. B.

In Elbridge, N. Y., on the 24th day of January, of pulmonary consumption, from which he suffered much for one year, SOLOMON C. BURDICK, son of Ebenezer and Rachel Burdick, formerly of Brookfield, aged 21 years.

At Adams Centre, N. Y., on the 16th of February, MARY ORSELIA, only daughter of Rev. Giles M. and Phebe Langworthy, aged 7 months and 8 days.

"Thou bright and star-like spirit!
That, in my visions wild,
I see 'mid heaven's seraphic host—
O! canst thou be my child?
* * * * * * *
Our hopes of thee were lofty,
But have we cause to grieve?
O! could our fondest, proudest wish,
A nobler fate conceive?

The little weeper, tearless,
The sinner, snatch'd from sin;
The babe" to womanhood full grown,
"Ere childhood did begin.

Thy brain, so uninstructed
While in this lowly state,
Now threads the mazy track of spheres,
Or reads the book of fate.

Thine eyes, so curb'd in vision,
Now range the realms of space—
Look down upon the rolling stars,
Look up to God's own face.

Thy little hand, so helpless,
That scarce its toys could hold,
Now clasps its mate in holy prayer,
Or twangs a harp of gold.

Thy feeble feet, unsteady,
That tottered as they trod,
With angels walk the heavenly paths,
Or stand before their God.
* * * * * *
Our God, to call us homeward,
His only Son sent down;
And now still more to tempt our hearts,"
Has taken our only child.

ERRATUM.—In the obituary notice of Wm. Clarke, which we published some weeks ago, he is spoken of as a "valuable counsellor," of the church. It should have read, "leading chorister."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French. Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institntion. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition. per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trustees

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE BLIND BOY.

It is said that a slave buyer, who had purchased a mother with her little blind boy, before starting for the South with his gang of slaves, sold the child from its mother for one dollar. This wicked transaction gave rice to the following touching verses.

Come back to me, mother! why linger away,
From thy poor little blind boy, the long weary day?
I mark every footstep, I list to each tone,
And wonder my mother should leave me alone.

There are voices of sorrow and voices of glee,
But there's no one to joy or to sorrow with me;
For each hath of pleasures and trouble his share,
And none for the poor little blind boy will care.

My mother, come back to me! close to thy breast
Once more let thy poor little blind one be press'd;
Once more let me feel thy warm breath on my cheek,
And hear thee in accents of tenderness speak.

O, mother! I've no one to love me—no heart
Can bear like thine own in my sorrows a part;
No hand is so gentle, no voice is so kind,
Oh! none like a mother can cherish the blind.

Come back to me, mother! why linger away,
From thy poor little blind boy the long weary day?
I mark every footstep, I list to each tone,
And wonder my mother hath left me alone.

Poor blind one! No mother thy wailing can hear,
No mother can hasten to banish thy fear;
For the slave-owner drives her o'er mountain and wild
And for one paltry dollar hath sold thee, poor child.

Ah! who can in language of mortal reveal
The anguish that none but a mother can feel,
When man in his vile lust of mammon hath trod
On her child who is stricken and smitten of God!

Blind, helpless, forsaken, with strangers alone,
She hears in her anguish the piteous moan;
As he eagerly listens—but listens in vain,
To catch the lov'd tones of his mother again.

The curse of the broken in spirit shall fall [gall
On the wretch who hath mingled this wormwood and
And his gain like a mildew shall blight and destroy,
Who hath torn from his mother the little blind boy.

THE THIRD COMMANDMENT.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain. Ex. xx. vii.

This text, which is the third commandment of the law of God, forbids what is commonly called profane swearing. It forbids any improper, useless, and trifling mention of the name of our Creator. We ought to use or mention the name of God only with profound reverence; even in our prayers, we ought not to use the name of God too frequently, or without solemnity of feeling. The text, however, principally forbids profane swearing, and all vain and irreligious use of the name of the Supreme Being.—Let us examine the great guilt of the sin of profanity.

1. Like every other sin, it is a violation of the law of God. God forbids it, and this is reason enough why we should refrain. When we consider that God made us, that he upholds us, feeds and clothes us; that he is infinitely wise, good and powerful, and will judge us, it is a fearful thing to do what he says we shall not do.

2. The wicked state of the heart, from which alone profanity can proceed, renders the crime more fearful. The profane man cannot fear God; he cannot love God, nor can he regard the rightful authority of God. What a fearful picture does this present of the heart of the profane! He outrages right and justice, and is destitute of love and gratitude, for a grateful heart could not profane the name of the Author of his blessings.

3. The sin of profanity may be considered greater, from the fact that there cannot be such strong temptations to induce men to swear, as there are to induce them to do wrong in other respects. If a man tells a lie, it is to hide some shame, or to secure some advantage; if he cheats or steals, it is to gain something,—and sometimes hunger and great want may prompt men to commit these crimes, but it is not so with profanity. No person can hope to benefit himself by swearing, and hence there is much less temptation to commit the crime. It is foolish. When men catch fish, they put bait upon the hook, and the fish bite for the sake of the bait, and are taken on the hook which is concealed within it. So the devil, when he would catch men, bates with different objects of desire. To catch misers, he bates with gold; to catch the ambitious, he bates with honor and office; to catch the vain, he bates with various trifling pleasures and gratifications; but the profane swearer is baited with nothing—he is as foolish as a fish that should bite at the naked hook.

CONCLUSION.

1. The sin of profanity appears to be very great, and yet it is fearfully common. How many men swear, and even how many little boys are heard swearing in our streets every day!—We hope none of our readers swear, and if they do, we hope they will swear no more.

2. To restrain us from profane thoughts and words, we should constantly recollect that God sees and hears every thought and word we utter. Let our little readers think themselves about to go to heaven, and stand in the presence of God to be judged—would they wish to go taking his name in vain? Surely not. Let them then know that they are in the presence of God all the time, and that God sees them though they do not see God; and will they dare take his name in vain? We hope not. [Juvenile Wes.

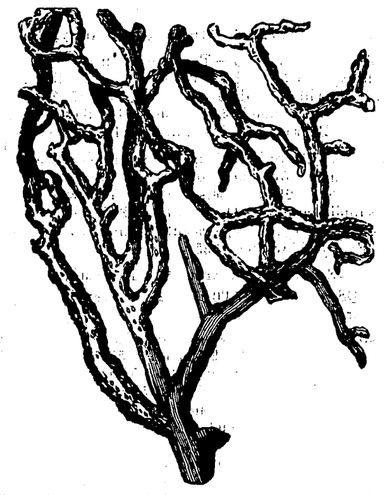
A House and Family Saved by a Dog.—Mr. S. E. Bettes, of Sandisfield, Mass., being about to go out for an evening visit on New Year's Night, directed his oldest boy, a lad of some ten years of age, to put wood into the stove, and leave a good fire when he and the other children went to bed, and to have the kindlings ready for the morning fire. The boy did so, but put the kindlings under the baker, so that the fire communicated to them from the stove. When the fire communicated to the kindlings, the children had all gone to bed in the chamber, but there was a faithful watchman below. Mr. B. had an intelligent spaniel dog, which, seeing the fire communicate to the wood, and from that to the floor, mounted up stairs to give the alarm—but finding that he could not make the boys understand him, he laid himself down on one of their beds for a few moments.

As if aware of the increasing danger, he soon returned to the fire again, and on his third visit to the chamber he succeeded by his barking and howling in awakening the boys, all of whom had fallen asleep in the mean time. The smoke soon convinced them that the house was on fire, and when they entered the room below, where the fire was spreading, they found the faithful sentinel at his duty, striving to arrest the progress of the flames with all his energies, and scattering the burning brands with his teeth and paws in every direction about the floor, thinking, no doubt, that if he could not procure water, this was his last resort to save the house. It seemed that he had been doing the same before he succeeded in arousing the boys. The fire burnt a large hole through the floor before the boys succeeded in extinguishing it.

CORAL.

What is coral? some young reader will ask. Coral is an insect or animal which lives in the ocean; it is also the shell in which the animal lives. We commonly call the shell coral. It is generally said that coral is made by insects, but this is not strictly true, as it is more correctly supposed that the coral is only the shell in which the animal or insect lives, and that it grows as all animal shells grow, and is not formed as the bee forms the honey-comb. Coral is formed in the ocean, and becomes rocks, reefs, and even vast islands.

There are different kinds of coral, of which the reader has one specimen represented in the following cut.



It looks as though it were a species of plant or tree, but it really belongs to the animal kingdom. We have not room, of course, to tell the children all that is known about coral, and will only say a few words concerning one of the most remarkable coral seas.

Between the western coast of America and New Holland, the whole sea is full of coral rocks, reefs, and islands. There is one coral reef which extends 350 miles, with several islands of the same, the whole forming a continuous line of one thousand miles, varying from twenty to sixty miles in breadth. These are constantly growing larger, and we think it probable they will finally become covered with vegetation, and be inhabited by men and beasts. New continents may in this way be formed. How vast is the work of such islands, when we consider that the water in that sea is from 1000 to 1500 feet deep. O, children, how wonderful are the works of God, who can rear great islands and continents through the instrumentality of such little insects. [Juvenile Wesleyan.

A VICIOUS BOY NOW A MURDERER.

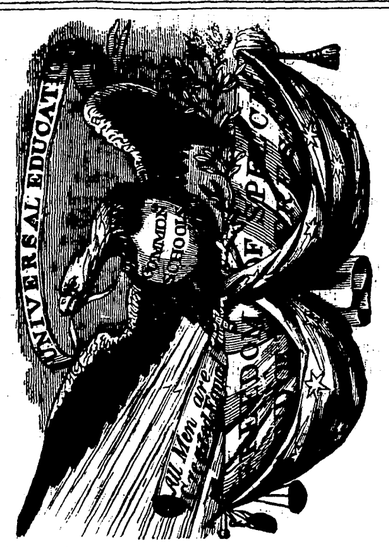
We have a short history of Abner Rogers, jr. now about to be tried in Boston for murdering the keeper of the prison, from which we learn that while a boy his parents neglected his education, and permitted him to roam about with a number of idle boys who infested the town of Newbury, Mass. He commenced his career with idleness; next he left the school and despised the instruction it afforded; then he scoffed at the admonitions of those who tried to guide him in the path to future happiness and honor, as a man and a citizen; he despised all their counsels, spent his time with lazy boys like himself, who swore, smoked, chewed, drank rum, congregated in idle squads; and laughed at the wise boys of the village as they passed to school or to industrious employments. At the age of nineteen he was sent to prison for passing bad money, and, from one step to another, he soon ascended the ladder of crime to where he now stands, on the topmost round, about to step off on the gallows, there to end his career at the early age of thirty. This is only one among a thousand instances of the danger of commencing to do wrong. When a boy once begins, no matter how small the beginning may be, he steps, into a rail-car on the top of a steep hill, down which he will run with fearful rapidity, and be dashed into destruction in an abyss of crime below.—Salem Gaz.

CHARLES AND HIS MOTHER.

A devoted Christian mother some years since related what had recently passed between herself and her little boy, then not far from four years old, as we remember.

In conversing with the child, occasion was offered her to ask him this question, "Charles, do you wish to go to heaven?" With much thoughtful solemnity and modest deliberation he answered, "No, mother!" She of course was not a little surprised, and after assuring herself that she had not misunderstood him, she asked for his reason. "Why do you not wish to go to heaven?" The little fellow, his breast heaving with emotion, and his eyes filling with tears, replied, "I have been such a wicked boy that I am afraid to see God!"

Now let not the little reader infer that this child was wicked in the sense of using bad language, or being quarrelsome, or otherwise outwardly faulty; for the reverse was true. All but himself would have pronounced him a lovely and excellent child. But his conscience had been enlightened; he had been taught that God's "law is exceeding broad"—that "the thought of foolishness is sin;" that great sin may be committed by the indulgence of wrong feelings, even when not made known to others by words and actions. This truth is entitled to the serious reflection, not of children only, but those of larger growth.



The above picture needs but little explanation, as it carries its own explanation upon its face. It is a liberty picture. It represents what our country will be after slavery shall be abolished. The eagle represents the United States. At the top is seen the words 'Universal Education,' denoting that real freedom and happiness can be maintained only by general education. In the centre, you read—'Common Schools,' denoting that general education must have its foundation in common schools. Under the eagle is read, 'Freedom of speech and of the press,' denoting that these are the great guaranties of human rights. At the left hand, you see the words, 'All men are created equal,' showing that all the blessings of universal education, the freedom of speech and of the press, and all other blessings connected with them, belong equally to all men, the right to acquire and enjoy them being the gift of a common Creator.

RESPECT DUE TO PARENTS.

Not only the young are apt to forget the respect due to parents, but oftentimes we see children of older growth forgetting those who have reared them from infancy, and by their waywardness causing their parents to shed tears, when it should be their duty to give them reason for smiles.

There is no sight which is so revolting to an upright man, as to see youth disrespecting gray hairs; but when we find a man, arrived at the age of discretion, neglecting his silver-haired parents, and treating them with contempt, no word is forcible enough to express the feeling which naturally arises in every honest breast.—The very idea that the babe, whose care has caused them so many sleepless nights, should in later years prove a curse instead of a blessing, and repay its parents for all their love by unthankfulness, makes one almost wish that the parent's malediction might be upon him. Yet how often do we see cases in which the child forgets the respect due to his mother, and is regardless of his father's wishes?

Children! learn in early age to respect your parents, and obey them in all things; struggle not against their authority, but by yielding while young, you will derive honor when older, and never forget that commandment which says,—"Honor thy father and mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." THE GIRLS AND THE RAZORS.

Two little girls were once at play,
In harmless pastime romping round,
When on the table near them lay
A box, with razors finely ground.

Then Susan said to little Jane,
"If you the box of soap procure,
I'll shave you when you come again—
That I can do it nice, I'm sure."

So Jane sat down upon a chair,
While Susan lather'd o'er her face,
And then—how could she ever dare!—
She took a razor from its place.

But as she knew not how to shave—
What little girl has ever known?—
By one unlucky stroke she gave
Poor Jane a cut which reached the bone!

And long the bandage then she wore,
Before it grew entirely well,
And both their folly now deplore,
Whenever they the story tell.

A Gentle Hint.—I was amused the last morning watch that I kept. We were stowing the hammocks in the deck nettings, when one of the boys came with his hammock on his shoulder, and as he passed, the first lieutenant perceived that he had a quid of tobacco in his cheek.

'What have you got there, my good lad—a gumbile? your cheek is much swelled.'

'No, sir,' replied the boy, 'there's nothing at all the matter.'

'O, there must be; is it a bad tooth, then?—open your mouth and let me see.'

Very reluctantly the boy opened his mouth, and discovered a large roll of tobacco.

'I see, I see,' said the first lieutenant, 'your mouth wants overhauling, and your teeth cleaning. I wish we had a dentist on board, but as we have not, I will operate as well as I can.—Send the armorer up here with his tongs.'

When the armorer made his appearance, the boy was made to open his mouth while the chew of tobacco was extracted with this rough instrument.

'There now,' said the first lieutenant, 'I'm sure that you must feel better already, you never could have any appetite. Now, captain of the after guard, bring a piece of old canvas and some sand here, and clean his teeth nicely.'

The captain of the after guard came forward, and, putting the boy's head between his knees, scrubbed his teeth well with the sand and canvas for two or three minutes.

'There, that will do,' said the first lieutenant. 'Now, my little fellow, your mouth is nice and clean, and you'll enjoy your breakfast. It was impossible for you to have eaten any thing with your mouth in such a nasty state. When it's dirty again, come to me, and I'll be your dentist.' [Peter Simple.

The Last Question.—A little boy on his death-bed, urging his father to repentance, said, "Father, I am going to heaven: what shall I tell Jesus is the reason why you won't love him?" Before the weeping father could answer, the child had fallen asleep in Jesus.

THE MANIAC.

OR, ONCE ONE IS TWO.

A gentleman traveling in Europe, relates that he one day visited the Hospital of Berlin, where he saw a man whose exterior was very striking. His figure, tall and commanding, was bending with age, but more with sorrow; the few scattered hairs which remained on his temples, were white, almost as the driven snow, and the deepest melancholy was depicted in his countenance. On enquiring who he was, and what brought him there, he startled, as if from sleep, and after looking round him, began with slow and measured steps, to stride the hall, repeating in a low but audible voice, "Once one is two—once one is two." Now and then he would stop and remain with his arms folded on his breast, as if in contemplation, for some minutes, then again resuming his walk, he continued to repeat, "once one is two—once one is two." His story, as our traveler understood it, is as follows:

Conrad Lange, collector of the revenues of the city of Berlin, had long been known as a man whom nothing could divert from the paths of honesty. Scrupulously exact in all his dealings, and assiduous in the discharge of his official duties, he had acquired the good will and esteem of all who knew him, and the confidence of the minister of finance, whose duty it is to inspect the accounts of all officers connected with the revenue. On casting up his accounts at the close of a particular year, he found a deficit of 10,000 ducats. Alarmed at this discovery, he went to the minister, presented his accounts, and informed him that he did not know how it had arisen, and that he had been robbed by some person bent on his ruin. The minister received his accounts, but thinking it a duty to secure a person who might probably be a defaulter, he caused him to be arrested, and put his accounts into the hands of one of his secretaries, for inspection, who returned them the day after, with the information that the deficiency arose from a miscalculation; that in multiplying, Mr. Lange had said once one is two, instead of once one is one. The poor man was immediately released from confinement, his accounts returned, and the mistake pointed out. During his imprisonment, which lasted but two days, he had neither eaten, drank, nor taken any repose—and when he appeared, his countenance was pale as death. On receiving his accounts, he was a long time silent, then suddenly awaking, as if from a trance, he repeated, "once one is two." He appeared to be insensible of his situation; would neither eat nor drink, unless solicited, and took notice of nothing that passed around him. Whilst repeating his accustomed phrase, if any one corrected him by saying "once one is one," he was recalled for a moment, and said, "ah, right; once one is one," and then resuming his walk, he continued to repeat, "once one is two." He died shortly after the traveller left Berlin.

This affecting story abounds with lessons of instruction. Alas! how easily is the human mind thrown off its "balance," especially when it is stayed on this world only, and has no experimental knowledge of the meaning of the injunction of scripture, to cast all our cares on Him who careth for us, and who heareth even the young ravens cry.

MORAL REFORM IN PRISONS.

The following extracts from the Second Annual Report of the Prison Association of New-York, give an awful picture of the state of things at the Penitentiary on Blackwell's Island, near this city. Speaking of the number under confinement, and the causes of their confinement, the report states:

"The second subject of investigation, was the manner of commitment, and in this seems to be the first great source of most of the evils and abuses which we shall notice. Out of the 1146, now inmates of the Penitentiary, 809 are Police convicts, and of these, nearly three-quarters of the females, and half the males, were committed on their own confession, principally because they were infected with a loathsome disease, thus perverting the Penitentiary from its legitimate objects, and making it the great Venereal Hospital of the city. The attention of the Committee was particularly directed to this subject, by the printed forms of commitment, many of which were as follows:

'A. B. being a vagrant, viz. being without means of support, and having contracted an infectious disease, viz. the venereal disease, requiring charitable aid to restore her to health, whereof she was convicted on her own confession,' &c.

But whatever may be the opinion in reference to those who, by their own confessions, are committed for profligacy and dissoluteness of character, there can, we think, be but one opinion in regard to a great number of cases of individuals, free from other contamination than that of poverty, who, in the hurry of business at our Police Offices, are made to swell the calendar of crime, and increase the evils of our overloaded Penitentiary. These cases seem to be attended with peculiar hardships in the first instance, from the moral effect of a commitment of a purely unfortunate human being, to a receptacle of crime, and secondly, from the contamination which unrestrained intercourse with the profligate and abandoned, is too sure to produce. The intelligent Deputy Superintendent assured the Committee that it was his deliberate conviction, that many inmates who had previously led comparatively pure lives, had gone out corrupted, and become prostitutes and thieves afterwards.

* * * It is the conviction of the Committee, that the evils of the system depend generally on the over crowded state of the prison—the conversion, in part, of a criminal establishment into a venereal hospital—the custom of sending to the Penitentiary as vagrants, many who would seem to be fitter objects for our Alms House—the method of appointing the keepers—the impossibility, under existing circumstances, of classification and separation, and the habit of detaching certain portions of the prisoners to attend in the hopital and Alms House, where they are left in unrestrained intercourse with one another. These abuses seem to attach solely to the system; and the undersigned, while they bear testimony to the urbanity of the officers, are willing to believe that they do all that men can do, in their position, to remedy the abuses complained of.

Of the large number of females now in confinement, 519 are committed for vagrancy, but are in fact either diseased, destitute, or abandoned; only 28 females being committed for other crimes, or about one in sixteen of all the convictions for crimes, a proportion which justly compares with the relative number of female offenders in the state at large.

Very many of the females are sent to the Penitentiary at their own request. 'Being sick,' as they call it, they 'give themselves up.' By means of this, the prison is, to the extent of nearly one-fourth of its inmates, converted into a hospital for the reception of dissolute persons, suffering under loathsome disease.

Years have now passed since philanthropists, in all parts of the civilized world, have united in condemning the practice of imprisonment in common, and there is scarcely a government, either in this country or Europe, that has not adopted measures to correct its manifold evils. Yet this city, distinguished as it is for its enterprise, and its many noble charities, presents the extraordinary spectacle of a prison, the largest on this continent, almost in the world, conducted upon principles which the wise and good of all countries have united in condemning; which must promote, rather than punish, crime; which must increase, rather than diminish, the number of offenders; which is utterly destructive of all hopes of reformation; which involves the young and hardened offenders, the criminal and the destitute, in a common fate; and which renders the whole matter a continually increasing burden upon the honest portion of the community. . . .

The Committee also visited the Child's Hospital on Blackwell's Island, and the schools on the Farms at Long Island. Almost 500 children are cared for in these institutions, 70 of whom are in the hospital. . . .

With a few exceptions, all the persons in charge of these poor children, are either paupers from the Alms House, or convicts from the Penitentiary.

At the children's hospital, ten male and twenty female convicts are employed. But we did not ascertain how many paupers were egaged there and at the Farms. It seemed to us, however, exceedingly unfortunate, that these little children should receive their earliest and most enduring impressions from persons selected for the task, not because of their fitness, but because they had been either criminal or dissolute.

We were not, therefore, surprised to find the persons in charge of these little children, wholly unsuited to the task; and among the children themselves, a general air of depression, unhappiness, and fear.

In the hospital, we saw an attendant handle a weak and dying child, with no more regard for its sufferings, than if it had been a stone as hard as her own heart; and we heard some of the other attendants scolding the children with loud and angry voices, and in language exceedingly vulgar and offensive.

At the Farms, we saw a crowd of little ones, nearly one hundred in number, and scarcely any of them over eight years of age, under the charge of a young girl of about eighteen, whose countenance was repulsive, and whose manner towards the children was very harsh. She carried a rattan in her hand, and drove the children about as she would sheep. Though narrowly watched, she was not observed once to smile, or speak a kind word.

Another gang was under the charge of a coarse and vulger woman, in the uniform of the Alms House, who with loud scolding, and in a harsh manner, was driving her flock to play. They obeyed her, yet, while their hands and feet moved in the game, their faces showed too plainly that their hearts were filled with fear rather than gladness.

It is evidently impracticable for the Superintendent or Matron to correct these evils. They must have assistance; and as long as they are compelled by the city authorities to seek for their help in the Poor House and the Prison, they can witness, but cannot correct the abuse.

Until it shall be corrected, it appears to be inevitable, that these children, drawing thus their first impressions from such contaminated sources, are being educated rather to tenant our prisons, than to become useful members of society. . . .

The Female Penitentiary Hospital is a wooden building situated at the south end of the Island, its different parts apparently erected at various times, and most awkwardly arranged for its purposes. It contained about 130 patients, nearly all afflicted with the most loathsome scourge of humanity.

The ceilings are low, and the rooms very fully occupied with no apparent means of vetilation, except in warm weather by the windows and doors. Every thing appeared clean and well conducted, and the medical attendance judicious, as far as we could observe. We could discover no particular attention given to attempts at reforming this most degraded of all classes of humanity, though many little evidences were afforded that gentle and refined feelings had not wholly forsaken the frail daughters of vice, and leading us to believe that well-directed efforts, faithfully persevered in, might succeed in drawing some from longer treading the paths of ruin.

To many persons it is a subject of surprise, that so large a number of abandoned females should constantly be found on the Island, and especially in the hospital department of it. The committee have taken some pains to look into the matter, with a view if possible, to discover the mode in which an exhibition, so terrible and extensive, of human degradation, is maintained; and how it is that the great expense of supporting and curing these miserable creatures, is thrown wholly upon the city; for it is well known that they are generally committed as vagrants only, assuming that appearance either voluntarily, or on compulsion of the brothel-keeper, solely for the purpose of being relieved of the disease with which they are afflicted. Our inquiries have resulted in the following communication from a gentleman of veracity and philanthropy, whose vocation, that of druggist, brings him into communication with many of this wretched class, who have freely informed him of the vile schemes used to detain them in the employ of those worst pests of society, the keepers of brothels.

New-York, August 1st, 1845.

Dear Sir:—In reply to your inquiries, why the Penitentiary and Houses of Correction, at Blackwell's Island, contain so great a number of prostitutes, the following facts may afford some explanation. It is a constant and well known practice of the keepers of the houses of prostitution, in various parts of our city, particularly of the most abandoned and degraded portion of them, to look to Blackwell's Island as a place of refuge and last resort for the inmates of their establishment, in case of sickness and disease. Whenever any of their boarders, (as they are termed,) become diseased, or unfit to do their part towards supporting the house, they are made to turn out into the streets after the night watch is set, and give themselves up as vagrants, when they are lodged in the watch-house, and next morning sent to Blackwell's Island for thirty or sixty days. Or if this plan does not succeed, they are plied with liquor, (which they are more or less addicted to,) and when intoxicated they become noisy and quarrelsome, and the poor wretches are soon arrested by the watch or police, as disturbers of the public peace, and thus the object of the keeper of the establishment is attained. When taken to the Island, they are examined, and being found diseased, are placed in the hospital. The attention and care they receive there, suffice, in most cases, to cure them by the time the period for which they were committed expires, and they are then ready to return to their former haunts, and pursue the same course over again; and the same individual will be found in the hospital, at Blackwell's Island, again, in the course of three or four months.

It is easy to perceive that such a system, well followed up by the keepers of brothels, (as it undoubtedly is,) will supply a very large number of wretched females to be supported at public expense, and that our Penitentiaries are absolutely made, indirectly, to support and encourage crime.

Respectfully, yours, &c.,

The Committee offer no comment upon this remarkable exposition:—it is needless. Nor will they attempt to propose any means for suppressing the evil. One suggestion, however, they feel it imperative to make, viz. that in every instance of a female of this character being sent to the island the keeper, or, in his default, the owner of the house from which she came, should be compelled to support her there, and her own declaration taken as prima facie evidence against said keeper. This is due both to public justice, and to the fact, well ascertained that all the earnings of these poor creatures go into the pockets of their keepers, who board and poorly clothe them, at high charges, keeping them thus always in debt, and with no resources in sickness.

In the Male Penitentiary Hospital the heart sickens at the exhibition of the utter and disgusting abandonment of men to the control of the worst passions of the animal.—The task of reformation would indeed seem hopeless, for every good feeling appears expunged from the heart.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.

Among the "lofty deeds and daring high," which stamped the early years of our country as its heroic age, I well remember reading a thrilling incident that occurred in the State of Vermont,—an incident which I have often called to mind, as an admirable illustration of the gigantic power of a mother's love, when summoned to meet a terrible emergency. A family consisting of the parents and eleven children, whose place of residence was a distant outpost, were one day surprised by the fierce war-whoop of a party of Indians; and ere escape could be effected, the murderous tomahawk was brandished over the heads of the defenceless household, and cruelly bathed in the blood of the father. The children were then secured as captives, and the victorious band were then on their way to their forest homes, leaving the afflicted mother behind as not worth the trouble of taking. But her affections were too closely twined around all that was dear to her, to suffer them to be thus snapped in a moment; and though somewhat advanced in years, she determined to rescue her children from the cruel fate awaiting them, or share herself their tortures and their death. She followed the Indian trail as they disappeared in the woods; and when at length they encamped on the banks of a river, she breasted its troubled waves, and standing before her enemies, begged that one little child might be spared her.—The Indians gave it to her in derision, for the sake of witnessing her struggles in conveying the burden over the wide and rapid stream. Joyfully the mother took the recovered child, and buffetted the waves, till her precious burden was safely placed on the opposite shore. But the yearnings of her mother's heart was not thus easily to be satisfied. Again she crossed the stream, and again sued for a little one; and for the same reason her prayer was granted. And thus this heroic mother struggled and buffetted with the waves time after time, till she had borne away the last of her precious charge, and placed him safe on the opposite shore.

And what will not a mother's love accomplish? What task is so severe—what suffering so intense—what risk so daring, as to defy her invincible ardor to repress the gushing springs of her affection, when a beloved child is to be saved from disgrace, or rescued from suffering? Well did one, who knew what was in the heart of woman, exclaim,

There is none,
In all this cold and hollow world, no fount
Of deep, strong, deathless love, save that within A mother's heart.

Institution of the Weekly Sabbath and its Design.

When viewed with respect solely to the advantages it secures of a regular return of rest for the body and the mind, the Sabbath is felt to be a blessing worthy of its Author, and, in some form, is acknowledged by all to be necessary.* As regards those who are engaged in occupations of bodily toil, this assertion of its value will not be considered as requiring proof;* while to those incessantly employed in the exercise of the mental powers, the advantages of the Sabbath, in suspending their exertions, may be still greater, as these interruptions for recruiting their exhausted energies are perhaps the more necessary that the present stimulus, in such cases, often prevents the waste of bodily energy it occasions from being at the time equally perceptible.

While legislating for His own glory, the great Creator was thus seeking the promotion of our good. God, who is Himself the fountain of all blessing, has chosen the Sabbath more specially as a time for nourishing spiritual life, and hope, and joy. As we are not only privileged with the assurance of God's hearing all prayer, but there is also a special promise to united prayer, that if two shall agree as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of our Father; so, while our God is ever giving to us opportunity of blessing, at all times and under all circumstances, He has also annexed a special blessing to His own day, which those, who, obedient to His authority and with filial affection serve Him, shall enjoy. All the exercises of the Sabbath are in themselves blessings, when duly engaged in, and God's favor is to be found in the way of obedience. It is blessed of Him, as an appointment of His own for working in us the first fruit of holiness. To the obedient in heart, He is able to cause this blessing to be enjoyed in the nourishment of our spiritual life through many channels, even as the health of the body may be most effectually maintained and promoted through the combined operation of different aliments, where there is a due submission to the laws of health.

But while it is true that God's blessing maketh rich and addeth no sorrow, men may be willing to dispense with His declared blessing in the fancied enjoyment of an equivalent advantage. All is not really good that passes under that name; and real good may be received that is more than counterbalanced by the expense at which it is procured, or the evils which necessarily flow from that which ministers it. The opium victim has a delirious enjoyment from his poison; but the moral, mental, and physical injury which he receives, immeasurably outweighs the short-lived bliss. In like manner, and in varying degree, injury is sustained by every departure from the principles under which we are placed. But ignorance, or prejudice, often prevents men from perceiving the true cause of the weakness which thus ensues, or the diseases which are engendered. So, in regard to spiritual health, it is no evidence that the church sustains but little injury from her rejection of the day which God has blessed, that she traces none of her disorders to that cause. Her stinted growth, her lack of faith, her loss of love, her abounding carnality, may all have a closer connection with her disobedience to the divine command, than she chooses to admit, or is prepared to believe. The trampling under foot the blessing of the Eternal cannot but occasion serious loss, if it do not also entail providential displays of divine displeasure. In reference to the perversion of another ordinance, where the consequences were probably not apprehended, we know the Apostle says, "for this cause, many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep." 1 Cor. 11: 30. God is willing to be found of all who truly seek him, on Sunday, or Monday, or on any other day; but who can tell how much even those who profit most on Sunday, weekly lose from lightly esteeming the blessing of the Sabbath!

"The seventh day is the Sabbath," which God has sanctified and blessed. This it has been, from creation—and, therefore, before there was the opportunity of distinction between ordinances for Jews and for Gentiles. The appointment rests wholly on the authority, and owes its origin entirely to the wisdom and goodness of God. He it is alone that can bless, and He alone, therefore, has the right to determine to which day that blessing shall be annexed, and to tell the purpose contemplated by it—as to Him also belongs the wisdom best to fix the particular day to be so allotted to Sabbatic rest.

We could not have determined for ourselves the extent to which the relaxation from secular pursuits, occupying either the body or the mind, should be carried; or the precise portion of time to be exclusively devoted to holy uses. For, although it is obviously enough the duty of an intelligent creature to honor and serve his God, it requires more than human wisdom to determine that it is necessary that this should be done by separating any given portion to be occupied more exclusively with religious exercises, or in any way markedly different from the rest. And even when this has been divinely declared as best, man could not have fixed on the due proportion so to be necessarily allotted. We read not of the holy angels serving God with Sabbatisms, or that thus it shall be with men in the glorified state; and had it so pleased Him, the Creator might possibly have fixed for us another way now as well as for the redeemed in the world to come. And if there be nothing in the nature of things suggesting to us that one entire day at one time should be devoted to the things of God, still less could mere reason have decided that this would best be weekly, however much we may be able to perceive its "expediency," when God has fixed. Even when this has been ascertained as what shall meet the mind of God, still without divine instruction man could not determine which day of the seven is that which should be so appropriated. But all doubts are set at rest, and all difficulties of this nature are removed, by the information which revelation has thus supplied. The Sabbath is not merely to be one day in seven; it is also "the seventh" in order.

The right of God to demand for Himself and to bless for His creatures what portion as well as what proportion of time He pleased, is never indeed denied. It is universally conceded that He might have required one day of four, or one day of six, or one day of ten, or of any other number, to be so consecrated to His service, and which might have been so blessed by Him, rather than one day of seven. It will also be acknowledged that He had a sovereign right to name the first, or the fourth, or the sixth day of the seven, rather than the seventh, had it so pleased Him—but He "blessed the seventh day and sanctified it."

The great Creator, in sanctifying and blessing the seventh day, has, as we have seen, also revealed unto us the reason, "Because that in it he rested from all His work." Now this will apply to no other day than the one on which He did so rest. It is not that God having rested on the seventh day, that He would therefore have us to sanctify some one of the seven; but He sanctified and blessed the very day on which He Himself had rested. We may refuse, indeed, to sanctify the day of divine appointment, and reject the divine blessing, and we may choose for ourselves another and an unblest day, and we may say it is of no importance which day we keep, if we only keep a day at all—but, however heady and high-minded we may sinfully be in this respect, we never can make a Sabbath at our bidding, nor transfer the blessing of God at our will, or to suit our own convenience.

"One day in seven," and "the seventh part of time," however common in the mouths of those who seek to justify the evil which men have committed in changing the ordinance of God, is therefore language no where used in the divine Word, as any other than the seventh day would inadequately serve Jehovah's purpose of commemorating His rest; and if, in reasoning concerning God's requirements in other matters, we were to adopt a similar principle, it would lead us far astray. One application of such a principle will suffice for illustration. Nearly coeval with God's giving the Sabbath to Adam, "the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it, for in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." Gen. 2: 16, 17. Now would Adam have been justified in reasoning thus concerning the divine prohibition: 'God has indeed commanded us to abstain from taking of the fiuit of one of the trees of the garden—and He has also named the particular tree to which His prohibition is attached—yet all the trees are God's, equally created by Him, and equally good; and the import of what He requires is our abstaining from taking of the fruit of some one of the many trees in the garden; if, therefore, we refrain from eating of the fruit of any one of the other trees, although we do eat of this tree of the knowledge of good and evil, we shall have acted in the spirit of God's commandment, and that is enough—this will serve the divine purpose equally well.' Would Adam have been justified in making the supposed substitution? Or, would we, in such a case, have regarded either his logic or his feelings to be right? Surely not.

Have I, then, put the comparison unfairly, that Adam, so justifying his own act, should have been condemned in regard to the eating of the forbidden fruit, and yet Christians be justified in regard to their secularizing the Sabbath of the Lord, and substituting a day which God has not enjoined? Do you say it was a certain specified tree, to which the prohibition in Adam's case applied?—and that, also, for a particular reason? This I admit; and it is solely because of the similarity, in both respects, of the Sabbath appointment, that I have made choice of the particular illustration—for, in regard to it, God has also named the seventh rather than any other day, and He has farther assigned the reason; and as that reason can apply only to the specified seventh day, so also does the blessing.

If, then, such an imagination on Adam's part would manifestly have polluted the holiness of his better state, what are we to think of the argument which, when God names the seventh day as the Sabbath, substitutes "one day in seven," or "a seventh part of time," without the least authority from Him? Can we regard it as the feeling of sonship by which those are actuated in this matter, who say of God's commandment concerning the seventh day, they obey it in spirit by the observance of the first?—as if the spirit of a child could be compatible with disobedience, or even unconcern about the Father's will? If so, surely the very principle I have supposed as manifestly sin in Adam, had been righteousness!—and it had been quite in the spirit of God's requirement that he should have taken of the forbidden fruit, if he only withheld his hand from that of any one of the other trees of Eden's garden.

We have, then, reason to adore the goodness of our God, that He has not only appointed the proportion of time for His worship and to service be one day in the week, but that He has also selected the particular day that is to be sanctified or set apart from labor to hallowed purposes, and that He has farther blessed it—that He has not left this to be regulated according to our own imaginations, but in His infinite wisdom, has determined that to which our understandings are inadequate, and intimated His choice for our guidance—and that even in so doing He has not, in the exercise of His prerogative, arbitrarily demanded a burdensome portion of time that was ours, but that He has most lovingly appointed the proportion of His own time which should best be solely devoted to our spiritual profit, and for His glory therein. It is the miserable deceiving of unbelief, which, in any case, would lead us to seek or expect the enjoyment of true or higher blessedness in another than the path which God has chosen for us, and which He reveals that we should continually walk in it.

* Mr. Biaconi, an extensive Irish stage-coach proprietor, having at one time as many as 110 vehicles, including mail-coaches and different descriptions of cars, after 28 years of this extensive dealing with horses, said in the British Association, (Aug 19, 1843,) that "experience teaches me that I can work a horse eight miles per day for six days in the week, much better than I can six miles for seven days." Athenæum, Sept. 2, 1843.

"THE PEOPLE'S RIGHTS RE-CLAIMED."

We hold that infidels have rights as well as Christians. It savors but little of the humility of the gospel when this is called in question. For let it be granted that infidels have placed themselves in such a state of hostility to God's government, that they deserve nothing at his hands; it becomes us to consider that we deserve nothing either. Whatever we enjoy is altogether a gratuity bestowed on us by our heavenly Father, which we no more deserve than the most violent infidel on the face of the earth. When, therefore, we undertake to withhold from them any civil privileges on account of their principles, under the idea that such privileges are a boon bestowed exclusively on the righteous, we act upon a principle, which, if carried out to its legitimate results, would banish infidels beyond the reach and protection of all government whatever. They must needs go out of the world. It is astonishing, that in this advanced age, this need to be a matter of disscussion. One would have thought, that the fathers of our government had settled this matter long ago.

Among the rights which infidels have, is that of thinking and acting for themselves in all matters of religion. This clearly implies a right to reject the whole Book of Revelation, if they see proper. For the same argument that would prove that they have no right to reject it, would also prove that they have no right to interpret it for themselves. That is, if the simple fact of the Book of Revelation being true, proves that they have no right to reject it, the same thing proves that they have no right to collect out of it any thing but that particular form of religion which it clearly and truly teaches; so that here is a blow at the right of private interpretation. We speak merely of civil rights. For the moral abuse of such rights they are responsible, not to us—not to government—but to God, who will judge them in his own way, and in his own time.

Now since infidels have a right to reject the whole system of Revealed Religion, it is clearly and palpably unjust to compel them by law to observe one of its institutions. On the supposition that Sunday were the true Bible Sabbath,—which it is not,—it were unjust to compel any one to the observance of it. God Almighty wants no such compelled obedience; and as for civil society, it may as well be pretended that the whole system of Revealed Religion is necessary to its welfare, as that one of its ordinances is.

We therefore do—and our "Blue Law" inquisitors may scowl at us like Pharisees for so doing, and like the crippled giant that Bunyan's Pilgrim saw in the cave cry out, "You will never mend till more of you be burnt"—sympathize, not only with infidels, but with all others, who are legally compelled to observe a religious institution. The moral principle which makes them unwilling to receive the statutes of Revealed Religion, we deplore. But far be it from us to coerce them into a reception of them by civil enactments. God tolerates them; and why should not we?

The following article is the production of an unbeliever, who writes under the title which we have placed as our heading. We give it a place in our columns, not for the purpose of showing any approval of the spirit of hostility to Christianity, which may have dictated it, but for the two fold purpose of showing our sympathy with those who plead for religious freedom, and the strength of argument by which an unscriptural dogma is combatted. The sentiment expressed in the closing paragraph—"that Jesus and the primitive Christians disclaimed any moral or religious obligation to observe the Sabbath, as soon as they acquired physical strength enough to become fearless of the Jews"—we do not of course endorse.

He is considering the objection, often urged by religious people, that to follow business or recreation on the Sabbath, is disturbing others in their religious worship. The fallacy of the objection is most clearly shown. He observes—

"To pretend as some have done, that the carrying on of business, pursuing ordinary avocations, or the taking innocent recreation by a part of the community is a disturbance of others in their religious exercise and worship, is taking a ground which every week's, nay, almost every day's experience proves fallacious. Meetings are held and religious worship performed on other days (and nights) than Sunday, during the bustle of every kind of business and amusement; yet none were ever found so weak as to call it a disturbance of them in 'the free exercise and enjoyment of their religious profession and worship.' No one ever thought that the usual avocations of some ought to be suspended, because others choose to shut up shop and go to church. It would be a libel on the intellect of common sense to contend that useful labor, innocent in itself and necessary to the support and preservation of helpless human offspring, can be transformed to immorality or licentiousness, by the (immaterial) circumstance of its being performed by some at a time when others choose to lay aside their work, and go to prayer, sing a psalm, or hear a sermon. Yet as absurd as this position is, it must be admitted, before the labor of some on Sunday, can with any color of consistency be called a disturbance of others in the 'exercise and enjoyment of their religious profession and worship.' And were it admitted to be tenable, who then could deny the right of our legislature to prohibit business and amusement on Christmas or other high Mass day, Good Friday, Fast, or Thanksgiving, or any other day on which a part of the community are bound by their particular sectarian tenets to offer prayer and praise to God? This conceded, what but the want of political power could then prevent our Methodist brethren, who are as honest and sincere as other people, from interdicting useful labor and innocent recreation throughout the State, as being immoral or a disturbance of them in their devotions during the days of their camp-meeting exercises? And who then could have the heart to deny good Saint Niclaus his equal right to claim for Paus and Pinxter like respect? And so we might go on, till, instead of 'six days' in the week, there would scarcely be left to man one day in all the year on which to do his work!!

"I am aware of the ground taken on this subject by the advocates of the first day Sabbath, viz., that 'the work of salvation was greater than the work of creation,' and therefore 'the first was substituted for the seventh as the Sabbath day.' This may be the reason assigned for the change, but it does not follow that this reason is true. But who made this change? Certainly the Bible contains no evidence that Infinite Wisdom and Power was under any necessity to change their measures. We are told in substance that after six days' labor in creating the world, &c., 'God rested on the seventh, and therefore appointed it as a Sabbath, on which man should rest from his labor.' We do not see in the Bible, or any where else, any such account of the 'labors of salvation.' Besides, according to the creed of many, it appears that God has not yet rested from the work of salvation—that he is 'adding to the church daily such as are to be saved.' And according to the belief of others, this work never will be completed, if a living soul shall be eventually and eternally lost. But I must drop this part of my subject; to pursue it farther would not comport with my present object. In truth, every intelligent person acquainted with the subject, knows that the first was substituted for the seventh day as a Sabbath, by the dominant part of the Christian sect or church, for even to this day all Christians do not hold to it; and that the change was made by man, not because God rested from any labor on that day, or appointed it a Sabbath, but because Jesus, the founder of their faith, is said to have risen from the dead on Sunday. And Constantine, the Roman Emperor, (and not God,) three hundred years after the birth of Jesus, influenced by the Christian priesthood, and by his pagan custom of worshiping the sun on that day, first made Christianity a State Religion, and then interdicted labor on that 'venerable day of the sun,' so called because it was the day of pagan worship. And now permit me to ask the first day Sabbatteans who profess to believe the fourth commandment recorded in the 20th chapter of Exodus to be derived from divine authority, who authorized Constantine, our Legislature, or any dominant religious sect or church, to repeal, alter, relax, or suspend the decree of God? Who empowered either Church or State to appoint another Sabbath than that appointed by the Lord? Who gave them the right to authorize mankind to labor on the day on which God forbid any labor to be done? On what authority do they presume to absolve mankind from the 'immorality of profaning by labor the seventh day,' the Sabbath of the Lord? Whence does man derive the right to interdict labor on the first day of the week, one of the six which God appointed and set apart for man to do 'all his work?'

"The truth is, that the keeping of the seventh day, is a religious sectarian tenet of the Jews, and was so regarded by Jesus and the primitive Christians, who disclaimed any moral or religious obligation to observe it, and as soon as they acquired physical strength enough to become fearless of the Jews, they renounced it altogether, and had a natural and moral right to do so, on the same principal that all others have an equal right, to renounce the first day Sabbath established by the Christian sect and statute law, and not by God's appointment, any more than the Jewish Sabbath, which the first day Christians have renounced. The keeping of either of those two days as a Sabbath, being but a sectarian religious tenet, is only binding on those who conscientiously believe in them respectively as such. The conscientious disbelief of either or both of them as a Sabbath by divine authority, can never amount to moral depravity. The guilt or moral turpitude, if any can arise from the belief or disbelief of those religious tenets, is in hypocritically acting against conscientious convictions on the subject. Such deceit being undeniably immoral, the law which compels that dishonest course of conduct partakes of the character of the unrighteous action which commands it to be done. So it is with the statute under consideration. By compelling those to keep the first or the seventh day, who disbelieve in the divine appointment of either of them as a religious Sabbath day, it commits a real act of immorality in attempting to suppress an imaginary one, and on that account contains no righteous binding power."

LUTHER IN HIS CLOSET.

I cannot say, (says Vitus Theodorus, one of the German Reformers,) enough to admire the cheerfulness, constancy, faith, and hope of Luther, even in these trying times. He constantly feeds these good affections by a very diligent study of the word of God. Then not a day passes in which he does not employ in prayer at least three of his best hours. Once I happened to hear him at prayer. Oh! what faith was there in his expressions! He petitioned God with as much reverence as if he were in divine presence, and yet with as firm a hope and confidence as he would address a friend. "I know," said he, "that thou art our Father and our God, therefore I am sure that thou wilt bring to nought the persecution of thy children, for shouldest thou fail to do this, thine own cause, being connected with ours, would be endangered. It is entirely thine own concern; we, by thy providence, have been compelled to take a part; thou, therefore, wilt be our defence." Whilst I was listening to Luther praying, in this manner, at a distance, my soul seemed to burn within me, to hear a man address God so like a friend, and yet with so much gravity and reverence; and also to hear him in the course of his prayer, insisting on the promises contained in the Psalms, as if he were sure his petitions would be granted.

HINDOO FABLE.—There is a fable among the Hindoos, that a thief having been detected and condemned to die, thought upon an expedient by which he might be rescued from death. He sent for the jailer, and he told him he had an important secret to disclose to the King, and when he had done so he would be ready to die. The King sent for him to know what this secret was. He told him that he knew the art of producing trees that should bear gold. The King, accompanied by his prime minister, courtiers, and priests, came with the thief to a certain spot, where they began their incantations. The thief then produced a piece of gold, declaring, that if sown it would produce a tree, every branch of which should bear gold; "but," added he, "this must be put into the ground by a person perfectly honest. I am not so, and therefore pass it to your Majesty." The King replied, "When I was a boy I remember taking something from my father, which, although a trifle, prevents my being a proper person. I pass it, therefore, to my prime minister." The latter said, "I receive the taxes from the people, and as I am exposed to many temptations, how can I be perfectly honest? I therefore give it to the priest." The priest pleaded the same as to his conduct in receiving the sacrifices. At length the thief exclaimed, "I know not why we should not all four be hanged, since not one of us is honest." The King was so pleased at the ingenuity of the thief that he granted him a pardon.

PRIVATE HABITS OF MILTON.—He rose at four in the morning; had some one to read the Bible to him for about half an hour; contemplated till seven; read and wrote until dinner; walked or swung, or played music three or four hours; entertained visiters until eight; took a light supper; smoked his pipe; drank a glass of water, and went to bed. He never drank strong liquors, and seldom drank any at all between meals. He seems always to have looked with contempt upon females, and he did not belong to any particular church. Some say he was a Presbyterian, others a Brownist, and others a Quaker.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 12, 1846.

☞ We have been exceedingly desirous to make the Recorder a faithful chronicle of the principal civil and religious movements of the day, and particularly of those movements which have a bearing upon the true doctrine of the Sabbath. Hence we have given a large place in our columns to the subject of Sabbath Legislation, and to those narratives of facts which serve to show the spirit and feelings of legislators. Some of our readers may think this course unwise, and that it were better to confine ourselves to a bare statement of the results, without giving the steps by which those results were reached. We think differently, and we are confident that they will think differently if ever they are called upon to write a religious history of the present time. There can be little doubt, that a disposition to give religion a popular form, and secure for its institutions the support of civil enactments, is a peculiar and striking characteristic of this age. Perhaps there is no place in which this is more distinctly seen than in the efforts to enforce the observation of Sabbaths by civil penalties. Just at this time, therefore, when religious zealots are moving heaven and earth to secure legal enactments in favor of Sunday, it becomes our duty to protest long and loud against all attempts on the part of government to legalize a "tradition of men," or to throw obstacles in the way of observing "the Sabbath of the Lord." In this way we may most effectually rebuke error, witness for the truth, and promote vital godliness among men. The world needs, and so do we, "line upon line, and precept upon precept, here a little and there a little." And though it may appear to some needless often to "speak the same things," we are sure that in the end it will be found "profitable." This is our apology, if any is needed, for giving such prominence in the Recorder to the subject of the Sabbath, and particularly of Sabbath Legislation. We trust it will be deemed satisfactory by all right-minded and sound-hearted Sabbath-keepers. We are sure, at any rate, that such will deem it sufficient for making room in our editorial columns for the following lengthy article.

THE BILL OF EQUAL RIGHTS IN NEW JERSEY.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It is generally known, that the Seventh-day Baptists of New Jersey have petitioned the Legislature for the free exercise of the civil and religious rights guaranteed to them by the Old and also by the New Constitution, but from the exercise of which they have been prohibited by an act of the Legislature passed in March, 1798, entitled, "An Act for the suppression of Vice and Immorality,"—which act, together with other statutes of the State, was by the Legislature of 1845 referred to four Commissioners, to collate and revise, and to make them consistent with the New Constitution, and when so revised and arranged, to lay them before the Legislature for their sanction. On the 27th of January, A. D., Titsworth, Esq., and myself, called on Gov. Vroom, one of the Commissioners, to ascertain what alteration had been made in said act, or what amendment had been proposed to it. Finding that it remained in its original form, we stated our objections to it, as being unconstitutional and oppressive to those citizens of the State who observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. We then proposed the amendment which, in our opinion, would render the act constitutional, and which would remove its objectionable features. The Governor stated that it would be impracticable for the Commissioners now to amend the act, as they were about to report it to the Legislature; but that he would refer our proposition to amend to the Legislature for their action, not objecting in the least to the amendment. On the day following, the Commissioners reported the aforesaid act to the Legislature, and by that body it was referred to their Standing Committee on judiciary, and by them again reported to the House. While it was under consideration, there was a proposition to amend it by striking out the proviso in the 4th section, when a motion to postpone prevailed, and at the last advices it remained still in this position. Should the amendment receive the sanction of the House, it will not meet our case. The law will still be oppressive, unjust, and unconstitutional. Many citizens of high standing, both in church and state, who observe the first day of the week, consider it as unjustly bearing upon those who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, and have united with the petitioners for the repeal or amendment of such portions of the act as conflict with the civil and religious liberty of the Seventh-day People, or for a special act for their relief. As many of your readers are anxious to know how the case has been disposed of by the Legislature, I will furnish you with the action of the House on the question, as given by the reporters.

House of Assembly, January 14th, 1846.—Mr. Phillips presented a petition from a number of the inhabitants of the county of Middlesex, for a modification of the laws relating to Vice and Immorality, stating that they conflicted with the civil and religious rights of those who observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. Referred to a select committee consisting of Messrs. Phillips, Cory, Caskey, Garrison, and Simpson.

January 22d—Mr. Cory presented a petition from the citizens of the county of Essex who observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, praying for such an alteration of the laws for the observance of the first day of the week as will protect their rights of conscience from infringment. Read and referred as above.

January 27th—Petitions were presented by the following members: Mr. Cannon one from Burlington, Mr. Cory one from Somerset, Mr. Garrison one from Salem and Cumberland, from Seventh-day Baptists and others for an alteration in the laws respecting the Sabbath; which were severally read, and referred to the select committee already appointed on that subject.

Mr. PHILLIPS, from the Select Committee, reported the following bill for the relief of those persons who observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, which was read and ordered to a second reading.

An Act entitled An Act granting equal privileges to the inhabitants of this State.

Be it enacted, Sec. 1—That every inhabitant of this State who religiously observes the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, shall be allowed to enjoy all the rights, privileges, and liberty, granted by the Constitution, as fully as are or shall be secured by law to those observing the first day of the week, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

February 4th—The bill granting equal rights to those who religiously observe the seventh day with those who observe the first, was taken up on its second reading.

Mr. RITCHIE rose in opposition to the passage of the bill, and said, the bill in its provisions will unhinge and uproot long-established usages in our State. The law is asked by but a small minority of the people of this State, and it would be infinitely better to adhere to the fundamental law of the State under which we have lived for so many years. He regretted that he was compelled to say a single word on this subject, but there was an unwillingness on the part of the members of this House to meet this question as it ought to be met. It would, in his opinion, be an act of great injustice to the great majority of the people of this State to allow these petitioners the right to violate the law in existence for so many years. They have the right already to worship on any day they may think proper, and if they want to work on what is called the Sabbath day, they have the right to do so already by statute in their own shops.

Mr. PHILLIPS remarked, that the Seventh-day Baptists were a conscientious, moral, and religious people, and he hoped the bill would be sustained.

Mr. CORY said, the petitioners were only asking for the same privileges enjoyed by others; it was not to break the Sabbath, but that they might do business among themselves. They did not wish to be considered Sabbath-breakers in their first-day transactions, nor be subject to the penalty under the act concerning Vice and Immorality.—Many of the clergy of other denominations, and justices of the peace, united in these petitions. They had not annoyed us with lobbying, and he hoped the petition would be granted.

Mr. BILDERBACK said that a number of these people resided in the county of Salem, and were as conscientious, sedate, and orderly people, as could be found on the face of the earth; but he was not aware that they suffered any infringment of their rights. They were guaranteed the same rights on the seventh day, as were enjoyed by others on the first. He could not fully comprehend the real objects of the bill, and until he learned more on the subject, he should ask to be excused from voting.

Mr. TOWNSEND said—I confess I do not understand the import of this bill. I cannot apprehend its meaning. Its features (if features it have) are undefined, undeveloped, at least to my understanding; yet it assumes by its positions and reference to constitutional principles, an importance and magnitude, which entitle it to serious consideration. Sir, that equal rights and privileges are intended to be secured to every citizen of this State by the Constitution, none will dispute. That equal rights are not extended to all by a just and equitable construction placed upon that instrument, remains yet to be demonstrated. Sir, I would suspect, from the vague and indefinite character of this bill, that there was something intended that is not expressed, some acquisition of privileges and powers of a special and exclusive kind, which, if possessed, would lead to the infringement of the rights of others, composing a large majority of our fellow citizens; and thereby, on the other hand, resulting in those consequences which the bill ostensibly assumes to avert. No man, by the Constitution or laws of this State, is prohibited the enjoyment of any religious opinion, nor the observance of any religious rite or duty. I do not know—indeed, under our Constitution it cannot be, that that respectable and exemplary portion of our community, who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, are denied the enjoyment of that privilege. Who would deny them that sacred boon? I would be the last man that would favor the prohibition. I believe the good feeling, the good sense of community, would arrest any effort to throw obstacles in their path wickedly designed, purposely made. It is my opinion, sir, that if the prayer of these petitioners is granted, if this bill should pass, the civil institution of the Sabbath would be endangered, as well as its moral character much defaced. The Sabbath was made for man, instituted for his benefit. "The greatest good of the greatest number" should be the maxim that should control us in legislating upon this subject. The Sabbath now authorized and recognized by law, is of great antiquitity, of almost universal extent, acknowledged by every nation in Christendom, and at the same time dispensing with a liberal hand civil, political, social and domestic, moral and religious benefits, upon a great part of our race. Sir, I hope no effort will be made, no action taken by this body, to endanger the stability of this institution. Should men, by conscientious principles, be led religiously to observe another day as the consecrated Sabbath, they must have the right. They have the right. And no just complaint, as I know, has been made that that right has been invaded. Collisions will happen from the very circumstance of two days being kept as the Sabbath, and it may be unfortunate for the dissenting, the petitioners before you, that they cannot conscientiously conform to the long-established and generally received Sabbath of the land.

Mr. SCUDDER would have preferred that the bill should have presented a specific form. It was rather indefinite.

Mr. TOWNSEND moved the postponement of the bill to the next session of the Legislature, which was not agreed to.

Mr. MCLEAN asked if, in the event of the passage of the bill, we were to have two Sabbaths.

Mr. PHILLIPS replied that every person would be entitled to as many Sabbaths as he chose to keep.

Mr. CANNON moved to re-commit the bill, which was agreed to.

On the 6th of February, Mr. PHILLIPS reported the bill which had been re committed, granting certain privileges to the Seventh-day Believers, without amendment. From this date to the 26th, the bill has been passed by, and no farther action of the House taken upon it, although it has been frequently urged upon the attention of the members of the House to call it up and test it on its merits. As the session is drawing to a close, a week or two will determine its fate, information of which shall be given to the readers of the Recorder.

—There are many who seem very much surprised at the course pursued by some of the members of the Legislature in regard to the passage of the bill. In their remarks they manifest such a disposition to evade its force, and to mistify its language, as also to impugn the motives of the petitioners, that a stranger would be led to look upon the Seventh-day People as a factious, unruly, and dangerous people, endeavoring to disturb, break up and destroy the wholesome restraints of constitutional law.

Let us review some of the arguments offered against the passage of the bill. We are told that it is "indefinite, undefined, and featureless." The first sentence of the bill reads, "That every inhabitant of this State who religiously observes the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath." Is there any thing indefinite in this part of it? On the other hand, is it not as definite as it could be made to express the character of the persons about whom the bill treats? Let us take the next sentence of the bill—"Shall be allowed to enjoy all the rights, privileges, and liberty, granted by the Constitution." Is this clause undefined? Is it dark and mysterious? Certainly not to Legislators, who ought to be conversant with the Constitution—their principal guide in law-making. Look now at the next clause of the bill, and see how that stands connected with the clause last read—"As fully as are or shall be secured by law to those who observe the first day." This third clause then explains and defines the second. Is there any member of the Legislature who does not fully comprehend it? I will not suppose that one, however warped by prejudice, tradition, or education, is at all at a loss to know what rights are secured to himself by the laws of the State. Yet gentlemen seem to be quite ignorant—yes, grossly ignorant—of these laws, when they quote them as the "fundamental laws of the State." It is acknowledged by almost all the legal profession, that the law above referred to for the suppression of vice and immorality, is unconstitutional. Yet gentlemen who consider themselves capable of making laws for the government of the State, quote this same law as a fundamental law of the State.

Let us now notice the remarks of the Rev. Mr. Townsend—"Sir, I should suspect, from the vague and indefinite character of this bill, that there was something intended that is not expressed, some acquisition of privileges and powers of a special and exclusive kind." With the aid of the same discernment and penetration with which the gentleman discovers that the bill is "featureless, undefined, undeveloped, vague, and indefinite," we should suppose that he could have discovered something of its true character. His remarks show very well how much he possesses of the spirit of that gospel which he professes to propagate in the world, which "envieth not, is kind, thinketh no evil, rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth." He seems, however, to have attained to a high degree of perfection, for he can blow hot and cold with the same breath in order to "prevent any action of this body that may endanger the stability of this institution," (Sunday.) But he apparantly gives no more credit to the veracity of the honorable gentlemen who explained and defended the bill than he does to the petitioners themselves.

Having thus gone through with the bill in connection with a few of the remarks, we do not discover that it is so dark and mysterious as the gentlemen endeavor to make it appear. What then is the difficulty? Is it the title of the bill—"An Act granting equal privileges to the inhabitants of this State?" The title appears correct, and is a true index of the bill. The bill claims equality, and it provides for equal rights for the "inhabitants of this State who religiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, as fully as are or shall be secured by law to those observing the first day of the week." There seems to be no difficulty here. Shall this "very small minority of the citizens of this State" presume to ask for "equal rights with the majority?" Who are they—what is their character? Let Mr. Bilderback speak—"They are as conscientious, sedate, and orderly people, as could be found on the face of the earth." Hear Mr. Townsend—"That respectable and exemplary portion of our community, who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath." On what ground do they claim equal rights with their fellow citizens? 1st. Because they are prompt to meet the demands of their country upon them. 2d. Because they support the officers and representatives of the State by paying their proportion of the taxes. 3d. Because they are as active and efficient as any portion of the citizens of the State, of equal numbers, in the election of its officers and representatives. 4th. Because they have always sustained the Constitution and laws of the State. 5th. Because their forefathers hazarded their lives and pledged their fortunes to obtain this "sacred boon." 6th. Because the Constitution gives it to them. 7th. Because the Legislature took it from them by an act passed March 1798. 8th. Because it is their natural and inalienable right. Now, would it be "an act of great injustice to the great majority of the people of this State to allow these petitioners" equal rights? Would it not be an act of justice? And is it not an act of injustice to withhold it from them? We refer this question to the members of the Legislature of 1846, to decide it now or meet the consequences in the judgment day.

New Market, N. J., March 2, 1846.

☞ The following article was sent us for publication, and we therefore give it an insertion. We are not without hope, however, that the "different counsels" which it represents as having prevailed with our brethren in Essex and Middlesex in relation to visiting Trenton, will prove in the end less disastrous than our correspondent apprehends.

THE BILL OF EQUAL RIGHTS.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

As I apprised you of my intention, by my note of the 22d inst., I proceeded with all haste to Essex and Middlesex. Elder Davison and Bro. Dunham set out immediately for New Market to recruit a deputation from that Church, and thence go to Trenton, to have another hearing before the Committee, in the presence of the whole General Assembly; thus giving one of our own people an opportunity of discussing the subject, and advocating the passage of the Act to restore (not "grant") equal rights to our denomination; but different counsels prevailed, and the brethren from Essex returned to their homes. Therefore nothing farther can be expected upon this subject. It is abandoned by its projectors, and laid aside sine die.

I think that our friends have made a mistake—a great mistake. We have lost an advantage—a great advantage. When the bill was in imminent danger, and it was only saved from defeat by a friend moving to re-commit it for amendment, it was the duty of the friends of the bill, to wait upon the Committee, or communicate with them, (and which I promised should be done,) to enable them to make report agreeably to our wishes, and at the same time, shape the bill so as to remove all just apprehensions. This it was the duty of the friends of the bill to do. If they failed to do it, the Committee are exonerated from any blame, and the bill goes by default. The bill is not now before the Legislature for action. It is before the Committee, awaiting the suggestions of its friends—the Legislature having nothing to do with it until the Committee report. If the friends fail to attend to their own business, no one else will. It is their own fault, and no censure attaches either to the Committee or the Legislature. We are worsted much by this movement, or rather want of activity. Had a deputation gone on, and had an interview with the Committee, they would have reported the same bill, if desired, with or without a declarative section. Then we could have had a test vote. Now, in common parlance, we are "sewed up"—all our labor in the matter is lost—and we have no where to lay the blame but to our own supineness. Now it dies a natural death, without any one having the trouble to kick it out of existence; nor any one, but its friends, to be blamed for its failure.

THE DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Please allow me, in behalf of those interested in the matter of the DeRuyter Institute, to lay before your readers some farther considerations relating to that subject, pursuant to a pledge I gave some weeks ago.

When it was first proposed to our people, about eleven years since, through the Protestant Sentinel, that they should establish an Institution of Learning, it was looked upon abroad as indicating that we as a people were in the ascending series. And when the DeRuyter Institution was erected, it was understood that a demonstration had been given by the Seventh-day Baptists, that they were earnestly intent on promoting Literature and Science. Said Institution having been furnished with a competent Faculty, was opened with fair prospects of meeting the expectations of those interested. But a number of causes even then existed, which, in the end, embarrassed the Institution, and so disaffected the friends of the establishment, and weaned them from its support, that a year ago last July it was sold at Sheriff's sale, for several hundred dollars less than its debts.

Time passed on, and no signs of a disposition to redeem the property discovered itself in the Corporation, and the Institution was considered lost. Thus waned, and finally were extinguished, the high hopes which the erection of the establishment had created; and we, as a people, were expected to fall back into our former state of insignificance and supineness.

The loss of so much property, and the failure to render permanent aid or encouragement to the cause of education, was very disheartening. But that we should so proclaim our inability or indisposition to carry out so good an undertaking, was more depressing still. Yet more, that the DeRuyter Institute, situated in the central part of our denomination, should stand like a reef of rocks in the ocean, to remind us of the night of our perils, and by its aspect grim forbid us to turn our prow that way—I say, that the DeRuyter Institute, reared by our own hands, should stand an everlasting argument of stone against any future attempts of ours to do any thing as a people to educate our sons and daughters under our guardianship, was an aspect of things in the contemplation of which some parental hearts would not be still. And lastly, so to abandon at once the cause of the education of the rising ministry among us, just when the demand for learning waxed louder and louder, and the scholastic arts were becoming more and more industriously and craftily employed, to associate us and the truth for which we were contending and suffering, with all that is meager in knowledge, and preposterous in purpose, was verily insufferable, and seemed to crown with intense and superlative aggravation, the predicament into which we were instantly to be thrown.

The prospect of such a climax of loss, embarrassment, and disgrace, appeared (at least to a few) to furnish a twofold motive for the redemption of the DeRuyter Institute. First, that it might not be an obstacle in the way of education. Secondly, that it might be a help to that cause; or, that instead of its lying as a ponderous pile of rocks, with its crushing weight, upon the interests of learning, it might, as it should descend the scale of time, serve as a weight or power to rouse and sustain the knowledge of letters, science, and religion. With such views, and under the impelling influence of such motives, was the redemption of the DeRuyter Institute (on a judgment) projected, and accomplished entirely by Seventh-day Baptists; not with the expectation that there would be any money made by taking stock in the establishment, for the subscribers for its redemption were not ignorant of the misfortunes of the original owners of it, the majority of them being members of that Incorporation from its foundation. But they resolved to make one more, and a desperate effort, to attain the object for which they had so long labored, before they would sit down in despair. And having so far succeeded, they wait to see what the result will be.

It has been already made public, that brethren JAMES R. IRISH and GURDON EVANS are to go into the Institution; but probably it is not known, that these brethren are making great sacrifices for the purpose of aiding the cause of education just at this juncture. Such is the fact, however. That is, they leave large fields of usefulness, which they could have continued to occupy, where they might have added to their worldly possessions. Bro. Irish, before he concluded to take charge of the DeRuyter Institute, was situated in a church, which was very anxious for him to continue with them; and though they were not able to pay him a large salary, yet the situation afforded certain business advantages by which he could have been well sustained; having at the same time a prospect that the church might be enlarged through his ministrations. Bro. Evans, up to this time, is discharging the duties of a teacher in the Alfred Academy, where he might still have had profitable employment, if he had not supposed it to be his duty to go to DeRuyter. Now, though we hope these brethren may not lose what they now have, by the step they are about to take, but on the contrary, that they will in the end be rewarded for all their self-denial, yet it is but just that the embarrassment under which they engage in this enterprise should be understood, that others may know with what spirit they too should take hold. These two brethren are aware of the risk which they run, for the worst of the case has been held up to them; and yet they will go to DeRuyter with a fixed and settled determination to do what they can to consummate the design of the redeemers of the Institution, and the hopes of its friends, namely, to make it useful to the cause of education.

But a word to the body of our people at large. Brethren, Guardians, and Parents, will you do what the circumstances demand of you? Will you concentrate your aid for the support of the higher branches of education, subject to your own supervision? Will you do this, and secure to yourselves the comfort, and to your sons and daughters the security, of an education at the hands of those who will impress upon them at the same time the obligations they are under to honor you by maintianing those principles and truths which have cost you so much to exemplify before them and to teach them to respect and believe? If you will do these things, remember that the DeRuyter Institute is soon to be opened for the express purpose of giving you an opportunity to do so.—Please to remember, too, the great sacrifice which has been offered by a few of your covenant brethren for the sake of giving you this opportunity, and act accordingly. We know you can do as you please, but remember that you live under responsibilities which you cannot shake off or evade, but which you must meet, and to which you must answer.

Another word to the Ministers of the denomination. Dear Brethren and Seniors, we know that you are not ignorant of or indifferent to the exigencies of the present time. You have often urged the necessity of elevating the standard of ministerial education in your ranks. But what have you accomplished in this respect? Are not young men entering the ministry continually with no advantages for study beyond what have been commonly enjoyed by candidates for a place among you in years past? And is it not likely to be so still, unless the difficulties in the way of the education of our young men are removed? Nay, more, ought not means to be furnished to aid the indigent candidate for the ministry? Do we not want, in the first place, an Institution of Learning under the control of our people, where the requisite education can be acquired; and, in the second place, an Education Society vigorously conducted, to aid those who may need and deserve it? But can we expect that such a society will flourish when we have no such institution of our own, and what little means we have must be expended abroad, where our beneficiaries must be ever exposed to numberless temptations to leave their principles and their people? Believe it not. But if we have an institution where we can expend our means, and at the same time shield the minds of our beneficiaries from defection, may we not then sustain an Education Society? Believe it, we can. And we appeal to the ministers of the denomination, to consider whether for them to exert their influence to sustain a school in the DeRuyter Institute is not the only feasible plan by which they can in all probability do any thing effectually while they remain in the field to raise the standard of ministerial education in the denomination. It is hoped, that every stinted consideration may be put aside, while the vast and urgent demands of this subject shall be enforced upon the naked judgment and conscience of every minister and member of our fraternity by the spirit of the living God, and each be made to partake of his native and efficient wisdom.

LUCIUS CRANDALL, Agent.

THE JEWISH FAST OF ESTHER, AND THE FEAST OF PURIM, occur the present year on the 12th and 13th days of March, being the 14th and 15th days of their month Adar. They are both observed by the Jews with much strictness in commemoration of the wonderful events recorded in the Book of Esther. The evening before the Feast of Purim is kept as a solemn fast, like the fast of Esther before going in to the king in behalf of her nation. The Jews assemble in their synagogues, where the whole Book of Esther is read in their hearing. The next morning they assemble again, when the book is re-read, and prayers with hymns of thanksgiving and praise are added to the service. After this exercise is over, the remainder of the day is spent according to the injunction of Mordecai, in "sending portions one to another and to the poor." The affluent distribute their alms, presents are interchanged, and joy and happiness are every where expressed. Great, truly, is the veneration of the Jews for Esther, who showed a readiness to sacrifice herself rather than that her people should suffer. May the time speedily come when the memory of Messiah, who was not only ready to suffer, but did actually suffer on their behalf, shall be regarded with equal or still higher veneration.

NEW MISSION IN WEST AFRICA.—We learn from the Christian Observer, that a mission ship, the Warree, sailed from Liverpool a few weeks since for Old Calebar, on the west coast of Africa, provided with every thing that human forethought can suggest for establishing and prosecuting missionary operations there under the auspices of the United Secession Church of Scotland. The Liverpool Albion says that the idea of the mission originated with the emancipated negroes in the Island of Jamaica, who having embraced Christianity, now long for the evangelization of their father-land. This desire was communicated to the kings and chiefs of Old Calebar, and by these a formal invitation was given for missionaries to take up their residence with them. Four of the missionaries who have sailed for Old Calebar, are colored persons, two of them negroes, the other two descendants of the African race. To engage in this work, they have cheerfully relinquished comfortable situations and favorably worldly prospects in Jamaica, and accompanied their minister, the Rev. Mr. Waddel, on his errand of mercy. The use of the ship Warree is the spontaneous gift of an opulent merchant of Liverpool, who has done much for the civilization of Africa.

REV. DR. JUDSON, having received many letters of invitation to visit the Baptist churches in the Southern States during the winter, proceeded as far South as Richmond, Va. From that point, however, he has written to some of his southern correspondents, that the approach of the time of his sailing for Burmah, and the amount of business he has to do at the North before sailing, compell him to relinquish his first intention.

Rev. Mr. DEAN, after a long tour through the Western States, returned to Boston in time to sail for England by the Cambria of March 1st. He is to return to this country before the meeting of the Convention in May next.

Rev. Mr. SHUCK, accompanied by the Chinaman, Yong Seen Sang, has gone on a visit to Virginia, but expects to return before the meeting of the Convention.

"SABBATH CONVENTION."—A convention assuming this title was held in Washington City on Wednesday of week before last, over which John Quincy Adams presided. Speeches of the usual character were made by the Hon. Mr. Yancey, and by Rev. Messrs. Edwards, Smith, and Danforth.

RIGHT.—It is stated in some of the papers, that the Supreme Court of the State of New-Jersey recently adjourned over from Friday to Monday, because one of the jurors, who was a Seventh-day Baptist, refused to serve on the seventh day. This shows commendable decision on the part of the Sabbath-keeper, and commendable liberality on the part of the Court.

LIBERAL BEQUESTS.—The Hartford Courant says, that Mr. Samuel Hitchcock, who recently died at Hamden, Ct., not having any family relations, left his property as follows: to Foreign Missions, $1,000; Home do., $700; American Tract Society $300; and the remainder, about $2,500, to the Congregational Society of Bethany.

THE JEWS OF CONSTANTINOPLE.—The "Voice, of Jacob" says that a fire which broke out at Constantinople on the 25th of October last, consumed the greater part of the Jewish quarter, and destroyed several Synagogues. Distress, stagnation and misery of all kinds, prevail among the unfortunate Jewish population.

REVIVALS.—Rev. Jacob Knapp, writing from Albany, N. Y., under date of Feb. 18, mentions the opening of a new Baptist meeting-house, and says:—

"A Christian Church was organized on the day the house was opened, called, 'The State Street Baptist Church of the city of Albany,' consisting, at the time, of 12 members. Religious services have been continued from that time to this, day and night; the Lord is in our midst. We have received 16 by letter, and I have baptized 43—making our present number 71. Converts are being multiplied daily, and the work is extending through the city."

The New York Recorder of Feb. 19 says:—

"Some of the churches in this city and vicinity are enjoying a season of special revival. We learn that Rev. Mr. Hodge's church at Brooklyn, is particularly favored with manifestations of divine mercy. It would seem that the time to favor Zion, yea 'the set time' had come."

Several churches in New Jersey, and Philadelphia, are also enjoying the influences of the Holy Spirit at this time.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The SENATE did nothing of general interest last week, except to hear speeches about Oregon. The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES decided the New-Jersey contested election case, between Messrs. Runk and Tarlee, in favor of the former gentleman's retaining his seat. The House also passed a vote excluding from the privilege of seats at the desks all the reporters and letter-writers of the New-York Tribune, on the ground that one of the letter-writers of that paper had abused his privilege by making certain unpalatable remarks upon the habits of one of the members.

SEVERE GALES ON THE ATLANTIC.—Considerable anxiety has been felt for a time past on account of the non-arrival of several of the Liverpool packets which were due weeks ago. Four of them reached New-York on Saturday last, bringing accounts of the most terrific tempests that ever swept over the Atlantic—commencing about the middle of January and continuing without intermission for forty-five days. Icebergs, snow-storms, and fierce hurricanes, have beset these vessels on every side, and the sea every now and then swept over their decks, dashed in their bulwarks, carried away their boats, and left the crew helpless and freezing. Masts, rigging, and sails, were carried away daily and nightly, and the sailors, officers, and passengers, have been exposed to indescribable hardships, for a dreary period, which cannot be contemplated without shrinking. It is feared that awful disasters are yet to be heard of.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the packet ship Toronto, which reached New-York on the 4th inst., London advices were received to Feb. 7th—four days later.

By this arrival, says the Commercial Advertiser, we have the important intelligence that the Anglo-Indian project for the "annexation" of the Punjaub, long meditated and prepared for, has been put in train of execution; annexation, not by the consent of both parties, but by means of superior force on the part of one, and the cost of dreadful bloodshed and suffering on the other. The result can hardly be doubtful, though the struggle may not be brief.

The failure of the potatoe crop continued to be the subject of general interest and remark.

There is nothing new from Ireland. The country continues to be a scene of excitement and agitation.

NEW STEAMER FOR CHARLESTON.—A steamer is building at the ship-yard of Wm. H. Brown, and is in such forwardness that she is expected to be ready for the work in July. She will have the strength at least of the Great Western and Cambria, burthen of between 800 and 900 tons, and will carry 3,000 bbls. frieght, after accommodating two hundred passengers. Her deck will be 190 feet in length, and her keel 180 feet. Messrs. Spofford & Tileston are at the head of the enterprise here, and are connected with merchants in Charleston. The steamer is named 'The Southerner,' and a companion is to be put on the stocks directly after she is finished, to be named 'The Northerner.' Together, it is believed, they will form a line to leave New-York and Charleston each week the year round. The engines are to be built by Stillman, Allen & Co., and the unusual expense in building them of wrought iron.

ANTIQUITIES.—The brig Ganges, just arrived at New-York from Alexandria, Egypt, brought a number of antique articles, well worth the inspection of the curious. Among them are an elephant with a dog sitting on his back, sculptured in marble, weighing about 200 lbs.; some lamps made of clay, and images in the human form, made of bronze and clay; also some specimens of glass, proving beyond a doubt that the manufacture of this article was known to the ancients. These articles were dug up some 30 feet below the surface, in the vicinity of the city of Alexandria, and bear evident marks of great antiquity.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.—It is said that Thomas Auld, who inherited Frederick Douglass, has transferred all his right and title in the said Frederick to his brother, Hugh Auld. This Hugh very foolishly permits himself to be angry at the aspersions cast upon his family by Douglass in his narrative, notwithstanding the defender of the family, Thompson, declares that the book is all a lie, and Douglass could never have written it. The present owner, Hugh, avows his intention to spare no expense or pains to recover his wandering chattel should he ever return from his tour in Europe, that he may be placed on a cotton plantation at the South. We have two notions on this matter; the first is, that Frederick will be hard to catch, and the second, that if he is caught his captors will catch a "Tartar." [Nat. A. S. Standard.

CALIFORNIA.—A large number of hardy American adventurers have made arrangements for removing to California as soon as the opening of Spring will permit. We see in the Western papers notices of two expeditions, one under Mr. Leavitt, and the other under Mr. Gayson. It is supposed that from 500 to 1000 in all will start from Fort Smith on the first of April, for the purpose of establishing a colony at San Diego Bay. This Bay is South of San Francisco, and situated due West of the Gulf of California. It is said to possess the greatest advantages for commerce, and to be the most favorable place of California for a new colony. Mr. Gayson, with his party, will leave Independence on the 15th of April next. The tide of emigration to that beautiful country will increase yearly with just such hardy and courageous individuals as know how to subdue the wilderness and make it bloom like the rose.

GOOD.—The new Constitution of Missouri disqualifies any man from holdig any military or civil office or appointment in that State, who shall after the ratification of the Constitution, be engaged as principal, second, surgeon, accessor or abettor, in a duel, and his estate shall be rendered responsible to, and he charged with, a compensation for the wife and children of the deceased whom he has slain.

SUMMARY.

The proprietor of a large hotel in Broadway derives a large income from his dish-water. In the cellar under his kitchen, there is built a vat of large diameter, into which, by means of a pipe, the dish-water is conveyed during the day. Here it stands all night, and, as the water cools, the grease rises to the surface. This is carefully skimmed off in the morning, and the water suffered to escape. The grease saved in one year by this simple practice, produces the handsome sum of $600.

Horace King, a negro slave, has been emancipated by the Legislature of Alabama, by special enactment. King was a very intelligent man, and constructed a suspension bridge over the Wetumpka, for which, with other services, his master had realized over $85,000. No inducements could persuade his owner to sell him, although he had been offered $15,000 for him. He was one of the most urgent advocates for the passage of the act by which his servant was emancipated.

Surveys are now being made with the view of determining the feasibility and probable cost of constructing a railroad between Newport, R. I., and Fall River, Mass., a distance of eighteen miles, from which latter place to Boston, there is now a railroad completed, and in operation; and another by a more direct route in course of construction, to be finished during the coming summer.

The Tyrians are chiefly known to us in commercial history for their skill in dyeing; the Tyrian purple formed one of the most general and principal articles of luxury in antiquity; they must have been familiar with weaving, since without it dyeing could scarcely have existed.

Samual S. Randall, Deputy State Superintendent of Common Schools, has been selected to conduct the District School Journal, in place of the lamented Francis Dwight. This is an admirable choice. Mr. R. has been for many years devoted to the cause of Popular Education, and few men are better qualified, either by nature or acquirement, to render it effective service.

There are now in operation in this State a fraction less than seven hundred and eight miles of railroad, which have been constructed at a cost of $17,710,580; the expenses of running cars on them during the last year have been $1,116,269; the total income has been $2,097,514, and no less than 2,894,285 passengers have been transported over them.

We learn from the St. Louis papers that Gov. Edwards, of Missouri, has granted a pardon to Burr, one of the persons who was sentenced to the Penitentiary five or six years ago for aiding slaves to escape from the service of their masters. Burr was from the State of Illinois.

In the annual statement of the Lowell Factories, the number on the 1st of January last was 33 besides print works, and the number of spindles 228,858; the capital was $10,550,000 and the average wages of male operatives 80 cents per diem, and those of females $2 per week, both clear of board.

Mr. Spencer, a Senator in the New-York Legislature, a few days since, in a speech before the Senate of that State, referred to the abolition of slavery in Massachusetts. He said there was no specific record of its abolition. John Quincy Adams had informed him of the probable manner in which slavery was abolished in Massachusetts. It was in this wise: A note had been given for the price of a slave, in 1787. This note was sued; and the court ruled, that the maker had received no consideration, as a man could not be sold. From that time forward slavery died in the old Bay State.

The auctions are to be held in fifteen different places on as many different days.

Speaking of the recent melancholy duel, the Richmond Compiler says, that Coroner Robert T. Wicker held an inquest on the body of Mr. Pleasants, on the 27th ult., the examination before the jury lasting nearly the whole day. The verdict they rendered was, "that Thomas Ritchie, Jr., was guilty of the murder of Pleasants in a mutual combat had between them on the 25th inst., and that Peter Jefferson Archer, Washington Greenhow, and William Scott, were present, aiding and abetting in said combat and in said murder." The Coroner has issued his warrant to arrest said parties found guilty by the inquisition.

The Vermont Galaxy states that a curious discovery has recently been made of a deposit in Peacham, several feet thick, which consists almost entirely of the flinty shells of animalcules, so minute that a piece of the earth as large as a pea contains millions of these little shells, which, being composed of flint, have perfectly retained their, beautiful forms. A similar deposit exists in Londonderry, and others will doubtless be discovered. The earth resembles marl in color and fineness, but the particles being of flint, it is very useful as a polishing powder. Although a different nature from marl, it has been used on land with much success.

Hon. Dudley Chase died at his residence in Randolph, Vermont, on the 23d of February, aged 74 years. He was the Speaker of the House of Representatives, from the year 1808 to, and including the session of 1812, when he was elected a Senator in Congress for six years. In 1817 he was made Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. He held that office for four years, and resigned it in 1821. At the session of 1824, he was again elected to the U. S. Senate, and having served out his time, he declined a re-election, and retired from public life in 1830. He was the brother of Bishop Chase.

REMARKABLE ESCAPE.—The Express relates the following case of almost miraculous preservation from death: On Sunday afternoon a soldier took a small skiff, with his wife, and pulled across to Whitehall. He then undertook to pull back—the tide being strong, the river full of floating ice, the wind northwest, and the weather exceedingly cold, the thermometer down nearly to zero—his boat drifted down with the current, and night set in. With a hope to reach the shore, he left his boat and undertook to cross from cake to cake. He unfortunately fell in between the cakes, but succeeded in regaining his position on a pretty large cake of ice, on which he drifted about the harbor all night, and was rescued the next morning by a boy, at the Narrows, on the Staten Island side. He was taken on shore with his limbs badly frozen, and after being warmed and comfortably protected, he was sufficiently recovered to come to the city.

Miscellaneous.

C. M. CLAY'S WIFE AND MOTHER.

"All but my wife and mother advised me to yield."
Appeal of C. M. Clay.

Worthy to be a hero's bride!—
Thou who, in Peril's hour,
Stood calmly by the sufferer's side,
With heart that could not cower.
True-hearted woman! thou hast won
A bright, immortal wreath—
Thou who couldst nerve thy loved one on
To Victory or Death!

When fierce Oppression's wildest storm
Was pelting on his head—
When Slavery raised her murderous arm
Above that fevered bed—
When foes were rushing like a flood,
And friends were quailing there,
'Twas helpless Woman's heart that stood,
Alone, unbowed by fear.

Yes, Manhood's soul of iron could fail
Before that raging power,
And Friendship's flashing zeal could quail
In that decisive hour.
Two voices bade him never shrink
Beneath the deadly strife;
They who to him were closest linked—
That mother and that wife!

The fragile form whose all of hope
Upon his life was hung—
That mother who had cherished up
That head since life was young;
The gentle-hearted wife, whose hand
To his had trusting clung—
These bade the victim proudly stand
Where perils swept along!

Aye, trusting woman—fearless wife!
Thine was the noblest part!—
Thine was the bitterest, wildest strife
Of loving woman's heart.
To watch by that lone couch of pain,
In Love's strong agony—
To cool that wildly-throbbing brain,
Still—still—unceasingly!

And then!—to seat thee calmly then
By that faint victim's side,
And trace, with thine own fearless pen,
His words of dauntless pride;
Rather with him to bravely sink,
Than bend to Slavery's power!
O Love! thou only canst not sink
In danger's darkest hour!

We crown the names of Spartan dames
With an immortal life;
And hers who sunk 'mid Africs flames—
Asdrubal's peerless wife.
Bring forth for her a noble wreath,
Who, not for deathless Fame,
Looked calmly in the face of Death
For Freedom's sacred name!

Worthy to be a hero's wife,
Thou heroine tried and true!
Worthy to give that hero life,
Thou patriot mother, too!
For you we pluck no laurel tree—
We twine no fading lay;
Columbia's crown is yours—to be
The mother—wife—of CLAY! MARIE.

THE YOUNG CAPTIVES.

It was in the fall of 1689, or about that time, during some of the earliest settlements in New-England, that the event transpired, described in the following story. In those early times the children were wont to gather large quantities of nuts, which grew in great abundance in the unbroken forests that surrounded their little plantations.

In one of these nut-gatherings, a little boy and girl, of eight and four years old, the only children of a settler, whose wife had died on the voyage hither, accidentally separated from their companions. They had discovered on their way home, profuse clusters of the purple frost-grape, and entering a rocky recess to gain the new treasure, did not perceive that the last rays of the setting sun were fading away.

Suddenly, they were seized by two Indians. The boy struggled violently, and his little sister cried to him for protection, but in vain. The long strides of their captors, soon bore them far beyond the bounds of the settlement. Night was far advanced, ere they halted. Then they kindled a fire and offered the children some food.

The heart of the boy swelled high with grief and anger, and he refused to partake. But the poor little girl, took some parched corn from the hand of the Indian, who held her on his knee. He smiled as he saw her eat the kernels, and look up in his face with a wondering, yet reproachful eye. Then they lay down to sleep in the dark forest, each with an arm over his captive.

Great was the alarm in the colony, when those children returned not. Every spot was searched, where it was thought possible they might have lost their way. But when at length, their little baskets was found, over-turned in a tangled thicket, one terrible conclusion burst upon every mind, that they must have been captured by Indians.

It was decided, that ere any warlike measures were adopted, the father should go peacefully to the Indian king, and demand his children. At the earliest dawn of morning, he departed with his companions. They met a friendly Indian, pursuing the chase, who had occasionally shared their hospitality and consented to be their guide.

They traveled through rude paths, until the day drew near a close. Then, approaching a circle of native dwellings, in the midst of which was a tent, they saw a man of lofty form, with a cornet of feathers upon his brow, and surrounded by warriors. The guide saluted him as his monarch, and the bereaved father, bowing down, addressed him.

"King of the red men, thou seest a father in pursuit of his lost babes. He has heard that your people will not harm the stranger in distress. So he trusts himself fearlessly among you. The king of our own native land, who should have protected us, became our foe. We fled from our dear homes, from the graves of our fathers.

"The ocean-wave brought us to this New-World. We are a peaceful race, pure from the blood of all men. We seek to take the hand of our red brethren. Of my own kindred, none inhabit this wilderness save two little buds from a broken, buried stem.

"Last night, sorrow entered into my soul, because I found them not. Knoweth thou, O King, if thy people have taken my babes? Knowest thou where they have concealed them? Cause them, I pray thee, to be restored to my arms. So shall the Great Spirit bless thine own tender plants, and lift up thy heart, when it weigheth heavily on thy bosom."

The Indian monarch, bending on him a piercing glance, said, "Knowest thou me? Look in my eyes! Look! Answer me! Are they those of a stranger?" The Huguenot replied that he had no recollection of having ever before seen his countenance.

"Thus it is with the white man. He is dim-eyed. He looketh on the garments more than on the soul. Where your ploughs wound the the earth, oft have I stood watching your toil. There was no coronet on my brow. But I was king. And you knew it not.

"I looked upon your people. I saw neither pride, nor violence. I went an enemy, but returned a friend. I said to my warriors, do these men no harm. They do not hate Indians. Then our white-haired Prophet of the Great Spirit rebuked me. He bade me make no league with the pale faces, lest angry words should be spoken of me, among the shades of our buried kings.

"Yet again I went where thy brethren have reared their dwellings. Yes, I entered thy house. And thou knowest not this brow? I could tell thine at midnight, if but a single star trembled through the clouds. My ear would know thy voice, though the storm were abroad with all its thunders.

"I have said that I was king. Yet I came to thee an hungered. And thou gavest me bread My head was wet with the tempest. Thou badest me lie down on thy earth, and thy son for whom thou mournest, covered me.

"I was sad in spirit. And thy little daughter, whom thou seeketh with tears, sat on my knee. She smiled when I told her how the beaver buildeth his house in the forest. My heart was comforted, for I saw that she did not hate Indians.

"Turn not on me such a terrible eye. I am no stealer of babes. I have reproved the people who took the children. I have sheltered them for thee. Not a hair of their head is hurt. Thinkest thou that the red man can forget kindness? They are sleeping in my tent. Had I but a single blanket, it should have been their bed. Take them, and return unto thy people."

He waved his hand to an attendant, and in a moment, the two children were in the arms of their father. The white men were hospitably sheltered for that night, and the twilight of the next day, bore upward from the rejoicing colony, a prayer for the heathen of the forest, and that pure praise which mingles with the music around the Throne.

SPEECH OF FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

At Belfast, Ireland, on the 5th of January last, a Public Breakfast was given to Frederick Douglass, whose name is already quite familiar to our readers. Among those who were foremost in conferring this honor upon a Self-Emancipated Slave were Members of Parliament, distinguished Clergymen of various denominations, and a large number of the most eminent citizens of Belfast and its vicinity. Wm. S. Crawford, M. P., occupied the chair; a blessing was asked by Rev. Mr. Nelson, and thanks were returned by Rev. Mr. Hodgens. After a speech by the Chairman, Rev. Mr. Nelson read an address to Mr. Douglass, and presented him with a beautiful gilt Bible, in rich binding, bearing an appropriate inscription. It was intended as a testimony of admiration for his lectures delivered in Belfast, and also as a tribute of respect for his personal character. Mr. Douglass responded as follows: [N. Y. Tribune.

It would be useless for me to attempt to conceal my embarrasment, in rising to respond to the eloquent and highly complimentary address together with the golden gift with which I have just been presented. I am unequal to the work; my feelings are too deep, too strong, for easy utterance. I have often, in the course of my short, though not uneventful life, been called on to respond, in accents of warm and heartfelt gratitude, for noble deeds and generous favors conferred upon me, by the magnamimous friends of my long-enslaved and deeply-outraged fellow-countrymen, but never have I been more at a loss for language to fulfil that duty, than on the present thrilling and interesting occasion. The incidents of this morning will form a period in my humble history—a period to which, with all my hopes and aspirations, I never looked forward; but one to which, while memory holds its place, I shall ever look back with the most grateful emotion. I accept, thankfully, this Bible; and, while it shall have the best place in my house, I trust, also, to give its precepts the best place in my heart. The happy incidents of this morning have called into remembrance some of my early struggles after knowledge, and the difficulties that then lay in the way of its attainment.—I remember the first time I ever heard the Bible read; and I tell you the truth, when I tell you that from that time I trace my first desire to learn to read. I was over 7 years old; my master had gone out one Sunday night, the children had gone to bed, I had crawled under the centre table, and had fallen asleep, when my mistress commenced to read the Bible so loud that she waked me—she waked me to sleep no more! I learned that the chapter which she then read was the 1st chapter of Job. I remember my sympathy for the good old man; and my great anxiety to know more about him led me to ask my mistress—who was, at this time, a kind lady—to teach me to read. She commenced, and would have, but for the opposition of her husband, taught me to read.—She ceased to instruct me; but my desire to read continued, and, instead of decreasing, increased: and, by the aid of little boys, obtained at different times, I finally succeeded in learning to read. After learning to read, my desire for books was equal to my early desire to learn how to read. I have frequently, with my fingers, from the mud and the filth of the gutter, raked leaves of the sacred volume. These I have washed and dried, and read the words of heavenly wisdom which they contained with a glad heart, considering myself fortunate to enjoy such a privilege. I trust I shall not be deemed presumptuous or egotistical when I say, that, from my present position, I see points in my humble history marked by the finger of God. Twenty years ago, while lying, not unlike a pet dog, at the feet of my mistress, in her house in Philpot-street, Fell's Point, Baltimore, I was roused from the sweet sleep of childhood, to hear the narrative of Job. A few years afterward found me searching for the Scriptures in the muddy street gutters, and rescuing its pages from the filth into which neglect and wastefulness had plunged them. A few years later, I escaped from my chains, gained partial freedom, and became an advocate for the emancipation of my race. A suspicion arose that I was not what I profess to be; to silence which, it is necessary to write out my experience in Slavery, and give the names of my enslavers. This endangers my liberty. Persecuted, hunted, and outraged in America, I have come to England; and behold the change! The chattel becomes a man. I breathe, and I am free. Instead of culling the Scriptures from the mud, they come to me dressed in polished gold, as the free and unsolicited gift of devoted friends. I will take it, and while I live, preserve it; and long after I have gone hence to my reward, if my will is carried out, it shall be preserved by my children, and remain a memento in the house of Douglass till time shall melt it into dust. I assure you, gentlemen of the Committee, you have selected a proper mode of expressing your regard for me. What could be better than the Bible to me, contending against oppression, fraud and wrong?—It is full of wisdom and goodness—faith, hope and charity sparkle on every page, all of which deal death to Slavery. An attempt has been made to press the Bible into the service of Slavery. The Abolition party in America find no more determined opponents of the cause which they advocate, than the expounders of the Word of God. That, to this audience, might appear strange; but such is the fact. I thank God that a change for the better is taking place; a purer and higher grade of men are finding their way into the Ministry, and brighter days are beginning to dawn upon my country. You could not have given me a token so appropriate as this Bible. It contains all that is right, and is opposed to all that is wrong. It knows no one by the color of his skin. It treats all alike; and says to all, "Whatsoever you would that men should do unto you, do you so unto them." If you claim liberty for yourself, then grant it to your neighbor, is the doctrine it inculcates. I feel much struck with the change in my circumstances; only a few days ago, I was in a land where I was hated and abhorred—where the blood-hound might have have been put on my track, and I have been hunted down and carried back into Slavery.—I left that land, and in eleven and a half days I set my foot on British soil and was free. I now find myself surrounded by kind friends, the very expression of whose countenances beams with sympathy such as I never expected to meet with, and which has quite overcome and unmanned me.—I could expose Slavery in the midst of those who would uphold it—I could contend for the great principles of liberty in the face of the most determined opposition, but I am not equal to address those whose sympathy has been excited for my race, and who have showed me so much kindness. I will always remember the people of Belfast, and the kind friends I now see around me; and wherever else I feel myself to be a stranger, I will remember I have a home in Belfast. I will look forward with pleasure to the day which will find me among you again—and, in the meantime, you shall hear from me, wherever my lot may be cast. Let me thank you, with my whole heart for the address and beautiful present you have made me, as well as for the deep interest you have taken in the cause of the wronged and oppressed slaves of America. You have discharged your duty nobly and as Christians should do. When I came a stranger among you, I was taken by the hand; and, I may say, my hand has been held throughout. The Committee have labored, in season and out of season, to give effect to my feeble efforts for the emancipation of my race. Without the Committee I could have done nothing; to them all the praise is due. Once more, accept my thanks for the kindness I have experienced at your hands and I bid you all farewell, until I shall meet you again.

THE ECLIPSE OF THE SUN.

We have received a beautiful and instructive astronomical painting or chart representing the eclipse of the sun which is to take place in April next, accompanied by remarks and illustrations. It is calculated and drawn by A. SMITH, principal of Public School No. 12, New York.

Presuming it will be interesting to our readers, we make the following extracts.

There will be an Eclipse of the Sun, on the 25th. day of April next, commencing at New-York, at 11 o'clock 3 minutes, in the forenoon, and should the atmosphere be clear it will present as sublime a spectacle as we seldom witness; although Eclipses are not viewed by mankind at the present day with horror and alarm as they were by the ancients, who considered them as indications of the wrath of an offended Deity, which was soon to be visited upon them, yet they are witnessed at the present day, with much curiosity and delight, as affording a positive demonstration of the ability of Astronomers to solve the great problems of the heavens, which for ages were hid in the immensity of space, and obscured by the ignorance of man.

Among all the sciences known to mankind, that of Astronomy is the most sublime, the most interesting, the most useful and the most elevating to the mind and character of man. Our very faculties are enlarged with the grandeur of the ideas it conveys, our minds are exalted above the low contracted prejudices of the ignorant, and our understanding clearly convinced of the existence, wisdom, power, goodness, immutability and superintendency of the Supreme being. It conducts the mind through the remotest ethereal regions, lays open to view the long hidden mysteries of the heavens, and presents to the mind, in their proper light, the wonderful works of the deity. The first appearance of this Eclipse since the creation of the world, (according to Sacred Chronology,) was in the year 1041, January 14th, old style, when the moon's shadow just touched the earth at the South Pole, it has appeared every Nineteenth year since, and at every return the moon's shadow passed over the earth from west to east a little further to the north, until the year 1756, March 2nd, when the centre of the moon's shadow passed a little to the north of the earth's centre, (the moon being 5'. 19". from her descending Node,) which was its 38th. periodical return. The present Eclipse will be its 43rd. periodical appearance. It will appear again in 1864, May 6th, but will be invisible in the United States. It will also appear in 1882, May 16th, at 7 o'clock, 41 minutes, 36 seconds in the morning, when the Sun will be almost totally Eclipsed, it will continue to appear every Nineteenth year, until the year 2441, May 17th, at 1 o'clock, 43 minutes, morning, when the moon's shadow will just touch the earth at the north pole, which will be its 77th, periodical and last appearance until the expiration of 12492 years, when it will come on again at the south pole, and go through a similar course.

LINES,

Composed by JACOB THOMAS, while a student. He was afterwards killed while on his way to the mission assigned him in Asia, when within four hours' ride of the station, by the falling of a tree on the bank of the river on which he sailed.

From M——— rolling waters,
From every hill and dale,
Ye favor'd sons and daughters,
Oh listen to our wail.

No messenger of salvation
Is heard in all the plain;
Oh hear our lamentation,
Nor let us plead in vain.

Shall we who taste the pleasure
Of Jesus' dying love,
Withhold the gracious treasure
Of mercy from above?

Oh! with warm emotion
We hear the plantive cry;
We joy in self-devotion,
And cheerfully reply:—

"We come, ye sons of sadness,
To loose your galling chains,
To publish joy and gladness,
And tell you Jesus reigns."

Soon may the tongues of millions,
Responsive to the sound,
Roll, in their flowing numbers,
The glad hosannas round.

THE GUILT OF AMERICAN SLAVEHOLDERS.

In a recent sermon, Prof. C. G. Finney comments upon the declaration of Christ, contained in Luke 11: 41—51, that the blood of all the martyrs from Abel to Zacharias, would be required of that generation. The inference in relation to the accumulated guilt of American slaveholders is evidently irresistable. With this solemn truth before him, well might a slaveholder say, 'I tremble when I remember that God is just, and that his justice cannot sleep forever.'

"But why and how did the Jews deserve this fearful and augmented visitation of the wrath of God for past centuries of persecution?

"The answer is two-fold: they sinned against accumulated light: and they virtually endorsed all the persecuting deeds of their fathers, and concurred most heartily in their guilt.

On the same principle the accumulaied guilt of all the blood and miseries of Slavery since the world began rests on this nation now. The guilt involved in every pang, every tear, every blood-drop forced out by the knotted scourge—all lies at the door of this generation. Why? Because the history of all the past is before the pro-slavery men of this generation, and they endorse the whole by persisting in the practice of the same system and of the same wrongs. No generation before us ever had the light on the evils and the wrongs of Slavery that we have; hence our guilt exceeds that of any former generation of slaveholders; and, moreover, knowing all the cruel wrongs and miseries of the system from the history of the past, every persisting slaveholder endorses all the crimes and assumes all the guilt involved in the system and evolved out of it since the world began. A MAHOMEDAN REBUKE.

We make the following extract from a letter published some time since in the "True Wesleyan." We never remember to have seen a severer rebuke than is contained in the Mahomedan's reply to his master.

G. Dougherty, Esq., member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and representative in the Mississippi Legislature, related to me the following:—In the year 1806, on the arrival of a slaver from the coast of Africa, J. Dougherty went to the city of Savannah to buy slaves. After several hundred had been sold in lots and single, as suited the purchasers, a middle aged man was put upon the stand, who wished to make a communication before he was sold. The purport of which was, that he was a Mahomedan, and that whenever the hour of prayer and other devotional duties came, he must have time to attend to them. Mr. D. who had lately embraced religion, and seemed to be zealous to promote the cause, gave the highest price for him, feeling confident within himself that he would soon convert him to the true faith. Taking him to his plantation, he built him a hut, and assured him that he should be allowed the time he required, and in addition, should have every opportunity to attend all the meetings of the Christians. The Mahomedan slave for a while attended these meetings, and learned something of Christianity, without, however, discontinuing his former devotions. At the expiration of about a year, his master, who was intent on his conversion, asked him formally, if he did not prefer Christianity to Mahomedanism, and if he would not openly renounce the prophet and acknowledge Jesus Christ? The slave asked, if the Christian religion allowed one Christian to hold another in slavery, and their children after them? The answer of course, was in the affirmative. The Mahomedan replied, that the religion of the prophet did not allow that. The result of all was, this slave, in a land of Bibles and gospel ministers, daily said his prayers, performed ablutions, made his prostrations, and at an advanced age died, declaring that God was one God, and Mahomet was his prophet.

Moral nature is the same in every age and country.—Why have not the Christians of Europe converted the red man of America? Let three centuries of outrage and oppression tell. Why has not Protestant England converted Catholic Ireland? The fourteen million acres of confiscated land, upon whose surface the real owners were made outlaws, can assign the reason. Why have we, in the language of the S. C. Synod, "more than two millions of heathen among us?" The wailings of dissevered husbands and wives, babes and mothers, the sound of the whip, and the rattle of manacle and coffle chain, can audibly tell why they have not become Christians. And why has not colonization, apart from missions, with its whole paraphernalia, civilized some of the nations of Africa, or, at least, mitigated the slave trade? Let the cannon balls tell, which have spent their entire force in dense masses of human flesh, within the bounds of that Christian colony. D. DEVINNE.

A LEOPARD.

Perhaps, says the Sunday School Advocate, some of our juvenile readers would like to read about an evening visit which one of our friends in Liberia recently received. The editor of the Luminary gives the following account of it:—

"AN UNWELCOME CALL."

"Late in the evening, some three weeks since, a leopard entered the house of Mr. Ruffan, at Marshall, and carried off a dog. At the time a man was sitting in the room, which had but one side door to it, and by the side of it stood a chair, on and about which one or more children were sitting. A light also was burning in the same apartment. Our inmates not expecting visitors, much less such a one, were indulging carelessly in the musings or sports of that time of day; when the leopard made a sudden bound into the room, upsetting the chair and the children in the leap, and seizing the hapless dog, wheeled and made out again. The effect of the fright, upon those witnessing the scene, was almost petrifying. The lightning speed of the creature was truly astonishing. Poor dog! if he had been in his place, under the table or in some corner, he might have saved himself from the leopard's claws. But he must needs be out among folks, and lost his life by it. So we sometimes suffer by making ourselves unnecessarily conspicuous."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON. Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE ST.

The Sabbath Recorder.

THE ORIGINAL SABBATH UNCHANGED;

OR,

THE CONTINUING OBLIGATION OF THE SEVENTH DAY, AND THE UNAUTHORIZED SUBSTITUTION OF THE FIRST, AS THE CHRISTIAN SABBATH.

BY JAMES A. BEGG, GLASGOW, N. B.

SECTION III. [Concluded.

Institution of the Weekly Sabbath and its Design.

It has, however, been supposed by some, that neither before the fall, nor after it until the time of Moses, was the Sabbath known or instituted. This is an idea which evidently owes its origin to the desire of finding vindication for the change effected in after ages. Independently of the evidence contained in the text before us, we may remark that a general argument is to be derived from the important purposes the Sabbath was, from the first, fitted to serve, in promoting the glory of God and the good of men. The remembrance of the Creator's work and of the Creator's rest, the reason assigned for the very being of the Sabbath, was ever worthy to be cherished; and the advantages brought to man and beast by the weekly sanctified and blessed day, could not have been postponed to later ages without detracting from the merciful purpose of God to them in its institution.

But as the sanctification of the seventh day has been considered by those to whom I have referred as unknown until the time of the giving of the law to the Israelites, two thousand years after, or only very shortly before that period, and as they regard the mention of it there, in the beginning of the Book of God, as a kind of interruption of the narrative, and as only spoken in anticipation, it will with reference to this be proper to examine yet more minutely, the record of its origin, and the reason of its appointment. This examination becomes the more necessary in our present inquiry, since those who take such a view, uniformly connect with it an assertion of the necessary abrogation of the Sabbath at the death of Christ—for the support of which idea, indeed, the other appears to have been framed.

That the mention of the Sabbath in the scripture history of creation is a mere anticipation in the narrative, is an assertion wholly destitute of proof. There is no mention of such a thing by Moses himself, or by any other inspired author; neither is there the slightest hint given from which it can be legitimately inferred. The language of the narrative is, besides, sufficiently explicit. It is perfectly obvious that it was upon the first seventh day that God rested, when He "ended His work which He had made"—and that it was when He rested on it, that God "blessed the seventh day and sanctified it," since it was "because that in it He had rested from all His work." Moses does not say that now, while he was writing, or at the time when the Israelites were called to remember the Sabbath, God sanctifies and blesses it—but that He had done so long before—had done so from the beginning, even when He had rested. Those intimations lead to the conclusion that this was all a past thing, that the Sabbath had been sanctified or set apart for man and blessed of God at the time, and on account of the Creator's rest; and to suppose that the sanctifying and the blessing of the day on which he did so rest, did not take place till after the Israelites had left the land of Egypt, is to imagine that the cause of the seventh day's sanctity and blessing, namely, God's resting upon it, had existed two thousand years before the effect.

The author of the epistle to the Hebrews distinctly refers to God's having sanctified the seventh day, in an argument which necessarily excludes the idea of the supposed anticipation. Exhorting those to whom he writes of the danger of their coming short of the rest that remaineth for the people of God, reminding them of the case of those whom the gospel of this rest did not profit from its not being mixed with faith, he quotes the oath of God that they should not enter into His rest or Sabbatism, because of their unbelief. The force of the appeal would, however, be destroyed, if the rest here held up to the hope of believers were applied to the Sabbath already enjoyed. The author, therefore, guards against this by quoting God's denunciation of exclusion from His rest in the language of the Psalmist, and therefore addressed to those who had full opportunity of enjoying the weekly Sabbath—for it was at such a period that God sware in His wrath, "If they shall enter into my rest; although the works were finished from the foundation of the world. For He spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all His works." Heb. 4: 1—5. The argument clearly is, that it was not their exclusion from the enjoyment of the weekly Sabbath to which God's oath refers, since "the works were finished from the foundation of the world," and the very danger of confounding the day on which God rested from all His works with the rest that remaineth, implies that the Sabbath had been sanctified to men "from the foundation of the world," and not merely from the time when God required its faithful observance by the Israelites. From the time when "the works were finished" the Sabbath had been sanctified; but, at a much later period, God still warns the Israelites in Psalm 95: 11, that there was another Sabbatism from which unbelievers would be excluded. They might have confounded these two, had not God, so late as the days of David, intimated the futurity of the rest referred to, "although the works were finished from the foundation of the world;" but, that very danger implies that Moses' statement of God's sanctifying and blessing the Sabbath was no anticipation. It was from the foundation of the world.

The reason assigned for God's sanctifying and blessing the Sabbath day is, as opposed to the idea of such imaginary anticipation, most instructive; for the "because" applied as forcibly to the very first seventh day which followed God's own rest, as to any that came after it. And if the Lord "blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it He had rested," this is a reason the force of which, from its very nature, must have taken immediate effect, and is a reason which never can be impaired so long as the world in this form exists. If God's rest be the reason for man's, it must have been from the earliest time, and be obligatory upon all to the latest ages. That reason was as true, and as full of significancy to all the races of men living previous to the time of the exodus of the Israelites, as it was to them after it; and it is a reason having as direct a bearing at the present day as it has had at any former period, and is equally applicable to men in every clime beneath the vault of heaven. The Sabbath being the memorial of the world's creation and the Creator's rest, all are taught to identify themselves with it, so that no nation, kindred, tongue, or tribe, is excluded from sharing in the privileges it confers, or exempted from the obligations which it imposes. The same instructive lessons which creation now teaches us, it has ever been teaching unto all. "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth His handy work. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world." Psa. 19: 1—4.

When it is imagined that the Sabbath was not given till the time of the Jewish economy, and that it was meant to continue only till the coming of Christ, men seem wholly to forget the very purpose for which it was instituted, as well as the universality of application of the reason assigned for its sanctification in this very first statement of its origin. As man before the fall, and in consequence of the alienation of the human heart from the living God still more after it, needed every aid to the promotion of communion with his Maker, and whatever could help his progress in the divine life; so also the world's creation, and the rest of the Creator, were not of interest to a particular age or nation only. God's provision for both were surely of as much importance to Amram, Moses' father, or to Jochebed, Moses' mother, as to Moses himself, and, therefore, the commemoration might with equal propriety be required of them; while the privileges which the Sabbath confers were to both not less necessary. There was also as much reason to require of Amram, as of Moses, or any other of the children of Israel, obedience to the precept, "that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou;" and the need of rest for the ox and for the ass of the one was as great as for those of the other. And, in both these respects the necessities of Amram, of his household, and of his cattle, were not greater than those of all his neighbors—nor were their necessities greater than were those of all the generations of the two thousand years which preceded that period—nor were the Israelites at any time in circumstances differing in these respects from those of their gentile contemporaries; nor differing from the circumstances of both Jews and gentiles in the ages that have passed away since their dispersion by the Romans, being nearly an equal length of time.

Who, we may indeed ask, on reading the account of creation, as given by Moses, would not have felt satisfied, but from a wish to find a justification for the church's departure from the Sabbath whose institution it records, that the account given is an express history of what took place at the beginning? If it were admitted that the history of the Sabbath's sanctification and blessing may be considered as only a statement of what took place two thousand years after, then is there no ground on which we could meet the objection, if any one should choose to say that the history of man's creation, of his having been placed in holiness and happiness in paradise, of his fall and expulsion from the garden of Eden, have no relation to the time in which they stand in the inspired record of the world's history. Indeed, with equal propriety might it be said or supposed that the creation itself, and God's own resting on the seventh day, are mentioned by the historian in the way of anticipation, as to imagine that that should be so regarded which by the divine will necessarily flows out of these, namely, the blessing and sanctification of the day on which He did so rest. Moses, as the historian of creation, gives a methodical account of the divine procedure for the first week of the world's being—tells us what God did successively on each of the first six days, and then follows it up by stating what He did on the seventh;—the Creator worked the preceding six days, and rested on the one which followed—and because of this His own resting on the seventh day, "He blessed and sanctified it" for His creature man. Thus, in the second verse, we have God's rest; then it follows as the natural order of the narrative, "and God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it;" then the reason follows, "because that in it He had rested from all His work which God created and made." And so connected are they, that the separation of these several parts can only be made at the expense of the order they have divinely received.

One other objection we notice, as having its refutation in this account of the institution of the Sabbath. It is sometimes advanced against the obligation of observance of the seventh day as a day of rest by the Christian—and the objection, fairly applied, bears equally against the sanctifying of any day to the Lord—that it is not one day of the week, but that every day is to be devoted to God. To urge this as an objection, arises from ignorance or inconsideration of what is implied in a Sabbath, and inattention to the purposes it is designed to serve—the objector making nothing either of the commemoration of God's creation or of man's blessing through the rest the Sabbath brings. True, indeed, it is, that the enjoyment and glory of God are the high aims which we are ever to cherish. We are called continually to love the Lord. Every day is to be employed in the service of God and for the good of men, in the occupations of life as well as in the services which more specially receive the name religious. And this we are to do, not of constraint, but of a willing mind. But there is in this nothing peculiar to the present age. These are truths; but they are truths as old as creation. And we might question whether the divine call to universal love and faith has not been more yielded to, throughout the week, in ages in which the Sabbath of the Lord has been observed, than in any other. But more than the objector supposes is implied in our sanctifying the Sabbath, and more is designed in God's blessing it. Had Adam kept his integrity, would not every day have been with him a day of holiness to the Lord? Yet while Adam was in innocency, the Sabbath was divinely appointed, and intended of God to be kept by him in the garden of Eden. It is not merely right thoughts and feelings which constitute a Sabbath—God sanctified as well as blessed the seventh day. The very name Sabbath implies rest, and rest thereon is enjoined; and that day only is truly devoted to God, which is employed as He directs. Separation from our own labor is essential to the very being of the Sabbath, and this is designed to promote that state of mind in which every day shall, in a certain sense, be devoted to God, even when engaged in worldly business. The Sabbath is to be sanctified to the Lord in abstaining from work, in order that we may be helped the better to devote "the six working days" to Him in the manner and with the feeling in which He has pleasure. In the blessing of peaceful, undisturbed rest, finding the presence of God and communion with Him, we are to be instructed in His ways; and, through the refreshing of soul therein enjoyed, to be made strong for Him in the every-day duties of life.

"Pray without ceasing," is a divine command which is not impaired by the Saviour's injunction, "When thou prayest enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret." No man of prayer will doubt that the spirit of unceasing supplication is promoted and assisted by the advantage enjoyed through his daily and occasional regularly retiring from the bustle of business, shutting out the world's din, and secluded from the observation of men, in secret, communing with his God. Far less will he deem that the maintenance of a praying frame should supersede the closet exercise. And, if so, surely we are not to imagine that the day divinely sanctified and to be employed alone with God, appointed of Him for that express end, will interfere with sanctification of life on other days. Many seem very ready to forget, that the people of God, before the coming of Christ, as well as after it, were called to be always living in love to God and devoted to Him. The written revelation of God given to man is not merely the statement of doctrines or duties felt to be altogether new, either at the times in which its parts were penned, or at the particular periods of which it speaks. While it gives helps adapted to the state of those for whom they are designed, it is but the unfolding and explaining of what was true concerning God and men from the first. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind," had always been right and good; yet, it was audibly commanded at the very same time that the injunction was renewed, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Israel was designed of his Maker to be "a holy nation, a peculiar people." But no one pretends that this rendered injurious or unnecessary their sanctifying and enjoying the weekly Sabbath rest—unless it had been forbid o God—why then should this be conceived in regard to ourselves?

And as it was from no necessity that six days were occupied by God in the creation of the world—to whom it would have been as easy to will all things at once into being, as to divide the work into successive parts—so neither was it in weariness nor from exhaustion, that He rested on the seventh day. He rested in complacency and delight in the glorious manifestation thus made of His wisdom, power, and goodness; and He calls us weekly in holy joy to commemorate that work of creation in which His glory is so displayed.

We have, at the risk of being accounted tedious, dwelt thus on the prominent points in the first inspired reference to the seventh day as the Sabbath, from a conviction of their important bearing on the general subject. The Mosaic account of its institution and design contains within itself such evidence of its universal obligation upon men through all ages of the world, that nothing short of God's interposition to annul it should for a moment be imagined. For the conclusion to which we are brought is, that the Sabbath having been designed for Adam, even in innocence, and its institution recorded subsequent to the fall, that in the language of our Lord, it "was made for man" as such—for the whole descendants of Adam, and not for the Israelites alone—that it is the Sabbath of the Lord, the day on which He sabbatized, on which we are required to rest, upon which alone the special blessing of God has been bestowed, and all this as a standing memorial among men of His creating work, the order observed therein, and of its being completed all "very good"—that it was not more designed that it should be a seventh part of time, or one day in seven, than that it is to be the seventh in order—that the precision of the statement, and the nature of the grounds of the appointment, limit us absolutely to the day revealed by God; that not only are we without liberty to choose a day for ourselves, but that any other day than the seventh is neither that which God blessed and sanctified, nor can it equally serve the end of commemorating His rest.

In the sanctifying of the seventh day, therefore, we testify our faith in the divine wisdom, power, and love, of the Creator, and set our seal to His truth, whose existence and attributes were antecedent to the world's creation; and therein we ascribe to Him the glory of creating all worlds, and speak to the hearts of men of the blessedness of trusting Him who alone holds in His hands the regulation of all about which they are concerned, and who only can impart the blessing upon the possession of those things with which they are so much engrossed, and to the enjoyment of which they so confidently look. And, therefore, do we call upon each member of the church of Christ, to consider whether it be of no importance that he shall return to God's own appointment, accepting it with thanksgiving, accounting it and calling it "the Sabbath, a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shall honor Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord." Isa. 58: 13, 14.

HINDU IDOLATRY.

About twenty years ago, a "Jogi," or devotee, was accustomed to sit under the shade of a tree near the road which leads from this city down to the river, where the Hindu population went to perform their morning worship and bathing ceremonies. The Jogi had a "chela," a pupil, whom he was instructing in his Shastra, (a sacred book.)—He labored much and long, but never succeeded in teaching his pupil to read. When he grew old and found himself near the close of life he said to his pupil, "Inasmuch as you are not able to read this book, when I am gone, you had better bury this book by the root of this tree and come at certain times and worship the book—that will be the next thing to having learned to read it. The pupil did so. As the people continued to pass by for months, going and returning from their bathing place, they saw this young man regularly making his puja, or worship, at the root of the tree where the book was buried. They gradually began to turn aside, one after another, to join him. After some time a shrewd shopkeeper of the city perceived that the spot could be turned to account, so he bargained with the landowner for half the profit that might arise from the place, and then erected a temple under the shade of the tree. The worship and celebrity of the place have gone on increasing, and now there is a cluster of five or six temples in a cluster of trees, and a regular concourse of worshippers every Monday morning, especially of the devout Hindu women of the city and surrounding villages, who go there to worship the divinity which is supposed to reside there; and also a concourse of Mohammedan young men who go to worship—at least to gaze at—them, when they come out from the seclusion of the female apartments, and appear in open day with their best clothes on. And once a year there is an immense concourse of many thousand people, who assemble there to make offerings of fruits and flowers and pay honors to—they know not what. I have been there many a time, and tried almost in vain to say something in the midst of the overpowering din and noise to persuade them to turn from these vanities, when I knew not the history and recent origin of the place as a place of worship.

This is probably a pretty fair specimen of the way in which idolatry has propagated itself all the world over, and in every age. [Missionary Chronicle.

CASTE.—In Hindostan, the supreme authority, during the past year, has repealed the old Hindoo law, which made the renunciation of caste in favor of Christianity a forfeiture of all property and other privileges, and has made all educated persons (Christians as well as others) eligible to the most important offices. [Recorder.

In America "the supreme authority, the past year" has extended the protection of its power, over a foreign State, expressly for the perpetuation of caste. [Emancipator.

WHO IS MY NEIGHBOR?

Thy neighbor? It is he whom thou
Hast power to aid and bless,
Whose aching head or burning brow
Thy soothing hand may press.

Thy neighbor? 'Tis the fainting poor,
Whose eye with want is dim,
Whom hunger sends from door to door—
Go thou and succor him.

Thy neighbor? 'Tis that weary man,
Whose years are at their brim,
Bent low with sickness, cares and pain—
Go thou and comfort him.

Thy neighbor? 'Tis the heart bereft
Of every earthly gem,
Widow and orphan helpless left—
Go thou and shelter them.

Thy neighbor? Yonder toiling slave,
Fettered in thought and limb,
Whose hopes are all beyond the grave—
Go thou and ransom him.

Where'er thou meet'st a human form
Less favored than thine own,
Remember 'tis thy neighbor worm,
Thy brother, or thy son.

O pass not, pass not heedless by,
Perhaps thou canst redeem
The breaking heart from misery—
Go, share thy lot with him.

CHINA.

The following interesting account of the prospects of Missions in China, is from Rev. G. Smith, an English Episcopal missionary.

China, too, has already abandoned a moiety of her isolated position. She has been shorn of the talismanic lock of her fancied superiority. The wedge of foreign intercourse has been inserted, and the breach will be widened. The crisis has arrived when the natural rights of civilization and of man can no longer be outraged with safety or impunity. A decade of years may intervene, of partial resistance to the progressive movement. Any protracted effort to retard its advance will recoil on the head of the enemies of social improvement. The social machine cannot remain at its present state of oscillation; but, propelled by the moral weight of both hemispheres, will advance till an unrestricted intercourse be opened between the several tribes of the human race. God's providential plans for the welfare of mankind will be gradually unfolded with increasing clearness; and the messenger of Christ, no longer advancing with timid steps to the confines of this heathen empire, may then boldly advance to its central regions, and there, mingling the accents of prayer with the notes of thanksgiving, proclaim God's message of redeeming mercy to a fallen world.

Such, then, are the hopes and prospects to incite us onward; and O that Britain may rise to the emergency, and nobly enter on this work! Where can talents the most brilliant, and piety the most fervent, find a fairer field for their exercise than on these fields white unto the harvest? If the vastness of the work, the amount of difficulty, the mighty results to be expected, and the encouragements which mingle in the prospect, can stamp on any work the impress of true glory, then that undertaking is the attempt to diffuse the Gospel among the three hundred and sixty millions of China. The attempt itself knows nothing to equal it in past undertakings. The Great Wall of China—the Pyramids of Egypt—the discovery of a new hemisphere—sink into insignificance in the comparison with the attempt to demolish the speculative atheism and debasing idolatry of China, and to build up in their stead lively and spiritual stones into the temple of the true God. Such an object, so vast in conception, and so stupendous in results, must not be taken in hand sparingly or hesitatingly. Numerous laborers must enter on this work. Far better that China had never been opened to Christianity, than that Protestants should decline entering the breach with an adequate force. Popery already is sending hither its emissaries with redoubled zeal. Seven Popish priests are now in Hong Kong. Six priests arrived at Macao with the fleet which brought the French ambassador. French diplomacy, faithful to the Papacy, has made the protection of Popish missionaries and converts a subject of special stipulation. Half-yearly couriers from the interior of China visit Macao, and secretly conduct thence the newly-arrived Popish emissaries to the Roman Catholic flocks in the Central and North-western Provinces; where one Popish Society alone, the Institution for the propagation of the Faith, professes to number its ten Bishops, four Assistants, and one hundred and forty four priests. The impostor of Mecca for 600 years has had his numerous followers scattered over the neighboring islands, and on the forbidden soil of China itself, where Islamism, triumphing not by the usual methods of fire and sword, but by the milder arts of proselytism, has shamed the puny efforts of Christians in a holier cause. The moral and social evils inflicted by opium-smuggling, and our vicious participation in the flagrant immoralities of the system, lend an additional power to the voice of China, crying to British Christians, by the depth of her moral degradation, if not by her consciousness of it, 'Come over and help us.'

The present generation of Christians will soon have passed away. The heroes who filled the world with monuments of their power or prowess, will soon be forgotten, even in the praises of their fellow men. But the missionary work, often the source of humiliation and discouragement, will hereafter be invested in its native honor. And as the writer of these pages, just emerging from the sick-room at Macao, stood over the tombs of a Morrison and a Dyer, and contemplated the narrow habitations of the dead, he felt that there was a time fast approaching when the fading laurels wreathed by fame around the brows of the martial tenants of the neighboring graves, would leave no trace of beauty on the memory; while the names of the first Protestant Evangelists of China would even here be remembered in the affections of their fellow men, as among the most illustrious benefactors of the human race. [For. Mis. Chron.

THE MISSIONARY'S WIFE.

There is something exceedingly interesting in a missionary's wife. I saw much of the missionaries abroad, and even made many warm friends among them; and I repeat it, there is something exceedingly interesting in a missionary's wife. She who had been cherished as a plant that the winds must not breathe on too rudely, recovers from the separation from her friends to find herself in a land of barbarians, where her loud cry of distress can never reach their ears. New ties twine around her heart, and the tender and helpless girl changes her very nature and becomes the staff and support of the man. In his hours of despondency she raises his drooping spirits; she bathes his aching head and smooths his pillow of sickness. I have entered her dwelling and have been welcomed as a brother; have answered her hurried, anxious questions; and sometimes, when I knew any of her friends at home, I have been for a moment more than recompensed for all the toils and privations of a traveler in the East. And when I left her dwelling it was with a mind burthened with remembrances to friends whom she will, perhaps, never see again.—Stephens' Incidents of Travel.

"O JESUS! I DO THIS FOR THEE."—Mrs. Comstock, of the Burmah mission, was called upon to part with her two children. Duty obviously demanded that they should be brought home to America to be educated. The day came for their separation. She took one in each hand, and led them down to the ship which was to bear them away. She paused on the shore; her face grew pale; her lips quivered; she raised her hands and said, "O Jesus! I do this for Thee!" and then quietly returned to her missionary work. [Vt. Chron.

THE BURMAN MISSION.

We love to think of the Burman Mission, because it is marked with the hand of the Lord. Like other great events of Providence that have wrought the most important revolutions and reformations of nations, it was commenced under a combination of circumstances which no man or body of men could have devised or brought about. It was the working of that hand which "maketh the wrath of man to praise Him, and the remainder of wrath He restraineth." It was Ezekiel's "wheel in the middle of a wheel, high and dreadful, and their wings full of eyes. Whithersoever the spirit was to go they went."

In the month of June, 1806, a most tragical meeting took place among the native troops in the employ of the British Government at Velore, in the East Indias. The affair appears to have been produced by an order from the officers of the army, for all the Seapoys to efface all marks of caste while on duty. The family of the dethroned Sultan, Tippoo, took advantage of this order, and represented to these ignorant Hindoos, "that it was but a prelude to compelling them altogether to obliterate them—nay, to renounce caste and embrace the religion of Eesa." The general alarm which this event awakened throughout the British East India possessions, although it occurred a thousand miles from the Serampore missions, formed a favorable opportunity for

> "Those brainless wits! the baptized infidels!
> The worse for mending, washed to fouler stains," who at that time swarmed throughout the East India military and civil service—who hate and dread the spread of evangelical religion, not only in India, but in all other parts of the world where they are—to represent that "the introduction of Christianity among the natives was dangerous to the Indian Empire." Accordingly, on the 23d of August, 1806, when James Chater and William Robinson, with their wives, Baptist Missionaries from England, arrived at Calcutta in the American ship Benjamin Franklin, Capt. Wickes, of Philadelphia, on presenting themselves at the police office, some demur was made to their being permitted to proceed to Serampore. Although this was overruled by the interference of Dr. Carey, yet subsequently an order in council was issued commanding Messrs. Chater and Robinson to return home, and refusing to give Capt. Wickes a clearance unless he would take them back with him. This arbitrary order was afterwards withdrawn, by the Danish Governor of Serampore representing that it was an interference with the rights of the Danish Government; and Captain Wickes, that it would be considered an insult to the American nation. "As Government, however, appeared to be dissatisfied with the continuance of the two missionaries, to remove every subject of complaint as far as they could, a new mission to the kingdom of Burmah was contemplated."

On the evening of Nov. 7, 1806, a meeting was held in the mission rooms at Serampore, on the subject of the obstructions to the progress of the gospel in the presidency of Bengal. Two of the brethren engaged in prayer that God would give his word free course, that it might be glorified. Dr. Carey made a short address; then the question respecting a mission at Rangoon was revived; and brethren Richard Mardon and James Chater declared in a manner that melted all their hearts, that they were willing to undertake the work. Brother Mardon spoke much of his insufficency, and brother Chater of his being willing to be offered up at Rangoon for the name of the Lord Jesus. It was resolved, on that evening, that these two brethren should go without their wives to get information, and then one or both return, when farther steps should be taken. Their passage was secured in the brig Prawn, the captain of which was a Portuguese, a very kind man, and had on board ten or twelve Burmans. The weekly prayer meeting at Serampore, on the 13th of January, 1807, was particularly directed to the mission at Rangoon. Bro. Moore was powerful in prayer. The brethren could not help thinking that the spirit of God rested upon him in a peculiar manner. January 24th, these first evangelical missionaries to Burmah sailed from Calcutta, saying, "O Lord, strengthen and support me; and grant that I may neither shrink back from thy service, nor faint under it! Christian brethren, cease not to pour out your hearts before God for the mission at Rangoon, and those who are engaged in it." Hitherto the missionaries, although in a heathen land, had been under the protection of European and Christian governments. They were now venturing into the territories of a despotic and sanguinary heathen. Who can wonder at their solicitude?

After a passage of eighteen days, they arrived safely at Rangoon, in the afternoon of February 10th, 1807. On the 11th they called on Shawbunder, intendant of the port, and were received in a friendly manner. After collecting all the information in their power respecting the country, its productions, government, laws, religion, people, and the facilities for establishing a mission, they returned to Serampore in the Helen, where they arrived May 23d. On that day they sung with their brethren and their wives,

> "I'll go and come,
> Nor fear to die,
> 'Till from on high
> Thou call'st me home!"

Their report was that "all things seemed to say we shall have a mission at Rangoon;" and it was determined to renew it as soon as the rainy season was over. Mr. Mardon being afflicted with a dropsical complaint, judged it not prudent for him to return. Mr. Chater felt like Caleb when he said, "Give me this mountain, Hebren, in which the children of Anak dwell." The very object which made the other ten spies draw back, put fresh vigor into him, and constrained him to persevere.

Mr. Mardon declining the undertaking, it was agreed to make it a matter of prayer for fifteen days; and if, in that time, any one was stirred up to offer himself, then to look upon that as a call from God. When the time arrived, Mr. Felix Carey offered himself, and was accepted. The church in Serampore dismissed the two brethren with their wives from their immediate membership, and on the 18th of November they were formed into a distinct church, and chose brother Chater for their pastor. A solemn charge was given them by Dr. Carey; a special prayer meeting was held on their account; and on the 29th they sailed in the Anna, Capt. Turnbull. After a passage of eighteen days, they arrived safely at Rangoon. What a blessing did that missionary church carry to the Burman Empire!—not in gold and silver, nor in the wares of the merchant—but in that which was more precious than rubies—the wisdom of God—the salvation of Jesus Christ.

The cause, however, met with very serious reverses. It was found that a residence at Rangoon so affected the health of Mrs. Chater, that she was obliged to return to Serampore. Mr. Chater, unreconciled to such a painful separation, removed in March, 1812, to Colombo, in the Island of Ceylon. Mr. Felix Carey was called upon to translate the correspondence between the English and Burman governments, which occupied a great part of his time; so that there was a period in which little or no progress was made in the direct business of the mission. But God's work was not stayed. "Jesus Christ's man" was on the way to take up the work that others were leaving. On the 19th of February, 1812, Adoniram Judson, with his most amiable wife and other esteemed misionaries, sailed from Salem, Massachusets. On the 17th of June, they arrived at Calcutta; on the 6th of September, Bro. Judson and his wife were baptized in the Lae Bazaar chapel, by Mr. Ward, of Serampore. Mr. Chater's place had been supplied by Bro. Norman Kerr, who appears to have been a pious and devoted missionary; but the climate by no means agreed with his health. In the month of June, 1813, brother and sister Judson sailed from Madras for Rangoon, and on or about the 16th of July arrived in safety to join the mission, provided that Mrs. Judson could live in Rangoon. On the 25th of August following, Bro. Judson writes to Dr. Carey as follows:—"We continue to enjoy good health, and to be satisfied with our choice of this station. Concerning our attainments in the language, we cannot say much at present. It is our constant study; and in this we are encouraged, as we have been in some past instances, by that excellent maxim of Sir William Jones, 'that whatever had been attained was attainable by him.'" In the month of November, of the same year, Bro. Kerr returned to Serampore; Felix Carey was wholly engrossed with the business between the British and Burman governments; and the whole weight of the mission fell on brother Judson and the American Baptist churches. What the results have been since, are well known; the Maulmain, the Tavoy, the Arracan, the Assam, the Teloogoos, the Mergiu, the Ava, and the Siam and China missions, have all branched out or resulted from the Rangoon mission. Native churches with native pastors and thousands of converts, now reflect the light first kindled in the city of Rangoon. Mardon and Chater have gone to their rest in heaven. Moore, who prayed in the spirit, sings in the choir of the redeemed above. Only William Robinson remains of the brethren that sent them out. He still labors as a missionary at Dacca; and Dr. Judson now enjoys the greetings of his brethren in this country. What encouragement for others to go and do likewise.

SUNDAY AMONG THE CATHOLICS IN NEW-ORLEANS.—The following handbill was distributed about the streets of New-Orleans a short time since. One of our exchange papers publishes it sneeringly as "an illustration of the manner in which Roman Catholics keep the Sabbath." Now it is well known, or ought to be, that the Roman Catholics claim to have established the observance of the first day of the week, and on that account to be the best judges as to the proper manner of observing it. Strange that those who practically acknowledge their authority in one form should refuse to acknowledge it in another. This is the handbill:—

PHILHARMONIC BALL ROOM,
Orlean's-street, opposite the Theatre, between Royal and Bourbon-streets.
Sunday, March 30, 1845.
Grand attraction!
Catholic Orphans' Benefit!
A Grand Dress and Masked Quarteroon Ball.
Doors open at eight o'clock.
Weapons are prohibited.

INTERNAL SLAVE TRADE.—An important movement, hostile to the internal slave trade, has lately been made in Alabama. The subject was referred to a committee of the Assembly of that State, who reported that the slave population was becoming too numerous for the interest and comfort of the citizens; that non-resident planters send their slaves among them and withdraw the proceeds of their labor to be expended in other States; that as popular opinion is setting against the continuance of slavery in Kentucky, Virginia, and other States, there is danger of Alabama being overrun with this class of population; and that, therefore, it is necessary to prohibit, under severe penalties, the introduction of slaves by traders or non-residents.

HYPOTHETICAL BAPTISM.—A correspondent of the Christian Watchman tells of an interesting case of hypothetical baptism which occurred some months ago in a town of Massachusetts. It seems that a man who had been educated a Roman Catholic was converted to Christ, and made application for admission to a pedo-baptist church. But a difficulty arose on the ground that he knew not whether he had been christened, he having neither remembrance nor record to prove it. However, when the time arrived for his admission to the church, the clergyman adopted a novel plan to insure the baptism of the candidate, and yet save himself from the charge of being an ana-baptist. Leading him up to the basin of water, he said, "J——, if thou hast not been baptized, I baptize thee," &c.; then he sprinkled upon him the usual quantity of water, and so ended the matter.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY.

It was the intention of the American Sabbath Tract Society, in connection with the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, to have kept an Agent and Tract Missionary engaged in the service of the two Societies during the most part or whole of the year past. They were, however, disappointed in obtaining such services as were desired. Bro. Alexander Campbell finally accepted a joint agency for the Eastern Churches; Bro. Samuel Davison likewise for the New Jersey Churches; and Bro. Varnum Hull for the Churches in the State of New York. The two former brethren have confined their attention almost exclusively to the advancement of the object of the Missionary Association—the establishment of the Foreign Mission. The latter brother did not commence his tour until the 5th ult. His first monthly report to the Board of the Tract Society is just submitted, and from it two or three extracts are made, partly to show the utility of such labors, and partly to show what is the effect of the presentation of truth among the simple-hearted inquirers after it in our country. Such results ought to quicken us to greater diligence, and to greater sacrifices for the advancement of this important truth. The Board would most gladly continue him or another person in the field, agitating this question, but for the necessity of husbanding their funds for the enlargement of the series of Sabbath publications. They contemplate issuing, at an early period, a new and revised edition of George Carlow's work, entitled, "Truth Defended." They wish also, as soon as practicable, to re-publish a work written by Edward Stennett, (the father of the Stennett family,) in 1664. In order to publish without embarrassment these works, together with some smaller articles now under consideration, a considerable increase of the Society's funds will be required, which it is hoped will be forthcoming.—But I will no longer detain the reader from a few extracts from Eld. Hull's report.

PAUL STILLMAN.

"Second-day evening, Feb. 10, by request, I preached on the Sabbath question, at ——, where two families of Sabbath-keepers reside, the Methodists giving us the use of their house for the occasion. Notwithstanding there was another meeting in the village, and two town caucuses—and religion stands a poor chance with politics in these times—there was a respectable number present, good attention paid, and a good degree of interest manifested. I preached until 9 o'clock, and then asked pardon for detaining them so long. Some said that no apology was called for, and that if I would proceed, they would stay another hour. After the congregation was dismissed, some of our first day friends were heard to say, that a few such sermons would bring them over. It may be thought to be egotistical to give these statements, but the truth of the matter is, that such is the simplicity of the subject, that a man of moderate abilities can place the question in a most indisputable light. A number of our first-day friends were free to say, that the arguments brought were unanswerable, and amongst this number was one in high office in the county.

"Fifth-day, Feb. 12, left for ——. Stopped at ——, twelve miles distant, in time to obtain the use of the school-house for the evening, and gave notice through the school that I would lecture there that evening on the Sabbath question, announcing myself as a Seventh-day Baptist. Considering the shortness of the notice, a goodly number was present, possibly from the novelty of it, as a Seventh-day Baptist had never preached there before. After I had closed my lecture, I gave liberty to any candid persons to ask such questions as they wished. The Presbyterian minister arose and asked me on what day Adam was created. I replied on the sixth. Then, said he, he kept his first day; to which I replied, if that was so, which I did not doubt, he did as he ought to have done, for that was the Sabbath of the Lord his God. We then spoke alternately until 12 o'clock; and although I proposed to adjourn until the next day, or any other time to suit his convenience, and then canvass the whole question as we might be able, he declined, saying that he was not prepared—which, by the way, he need not have said, as I had already become well convinced of it. The people seemed anxious to hear, and I was invited to stay and lecture in that vicinity by different individuals. When it was known that I had tracts, some looked me up and came to me to obtain them.

"Sabbath-day, Feb. 14. Being unable to reach my destination before the Sabbath, in consequence of a storm, with much difficulty I reached the house of Eld. Elias Burdick, at Richland. Bro. Burdick embraced the Sabbath about fourteen months ago. He is now well established, and an able and bold defender of the Sabbath of the Bible. His conversion is attributed to the reading of Sabbath Vindicator No. 2. His change of sentiments and practice created considerable excitement, and a general inquiry upon the subject. Elds. Eli S. and James Bailey having been appointed by the Central Association to labor here, they have attended faithfully to this question, the result of which is, that about thirty others have likewise embraced the Sabbath, although they were opposed by men of ability, both in public and in private. This I regard as good evidence of the utility of circulating Sabbath publications, the good effects of which we are now beginning to see."

BURNING ALIVE.—Instances of burning men alive are frequently recorded on the pages of history; and there is scarcely any form of death which is regarded as more terrible, or any class of persons who are regarded as more guilty than those who kindle the fire. But a case of burning alive has recently occurred at Albany in the State of New York, which seems to have excited but little sympathy for the sufferer, or indignation towards the fire-kindlers. The mournful story is faithfully told in the following extract from the Albany Citizen. It is only necessary to add, that the poor subject of it was most effectually 'put out;' for having been placed in the watch-house to rave through the night, he died early next morning, a victim of the fell destroyer who has sent his millions to a premature and loathsome grave. Here is the story:—

The guardians of the night were not a little surprised to hear from a lowly gutter, a few nights since, a sharp earnest cry—"Put me out!" "Put me out!!" On drawing near, they found a lusty fellow sitting upon the curb, with his feet in the gutter, and leaning against the iron post of one of the gas-lamps. It was poor Tim Lightbody, and the terrors of the delirium tremens had overtaken him in the gutter. His brain was on fire, and his vitals burning up with rum. And now, as he leaned back against the post, so that the full glare of the brilliant gas-light shone into his wild and bloodshot eyes, an imp of the distillery whispered in his ear that his head was on fire! And poor Tim was in a condition to listen to the grinning, chattering sprite, and as it disappeared down the neck of a bottle, he lifted up his voice and cried lustily:

"Put me out! Put me out! Fire! Spon-ta-neous combustion has, has, took place! I'm in a light blaze, sir! Away, away!—ye wiry goblins! I know ye all! Ye are matches; Lucifer matches! Ye set me in a blaze! Put me out! Water! Water! Blow in my, my, ears, if they ain't burnt out! Blow down my throat—quick! it's red-hot! Oh! somebody put me out! Put me out!!"

ENCOURAGING FROM SOUTHERN INDIA.—Bishop Wilson, in reply to inquiries from an English Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, gives the following encouraging account of the progress of Christianity in India:—

"I am much confirmed in my hopes of the infinitely important consequences of this awakening of souls at Tinnevelly, because it appears precisely to resemble that at Krishnaghur, under the Church Missionary Society, which began six or seven years since. The work is one; but in Tinnevelly "the word of the Lord runs" as it were, and is "glorified" more rapidly and to a far wider extent; the inquirers and converts of this and the Church Missionary Society, amounting to about thirty-five thousand altogether. Such awakenings have not often been surpassed since the days of the Apostles; and there seems every prospect of all the south of India, containing millions of souls, becoming ere long the Lord's."

RELIGION IN FLORIDA.—A Baptist clergyman in Florida has written to a benevolent society for books and tracts to circulate among the people in his neighborhood. If he gives a true picture of their spiritual condition, they certainly need assistance. He writes as follows:—

"There is not a single church of any order within 50 miles, and no post office within 60 miles. The settlements are few and far between. Many of the people who have come to years of maturity, never heard a sermon or saw a sacrament administered. They have a few Testaments, and Bibles are still more scarce. Many have grown to manhood, who have never heard the scriptures read, and what is worse, they cannot be persuaded to believe them."

NORTHERN APOLOGISTS FOR SOUTHERN SLAVERY.—The following paragraph from Clay's True American, shows in what estimation northern apologists for slavery are held by their southern neighbors. It is in answer to a correspondent of the Louisville Journal, who had volunteered an assault upon the opponents of the domestic institution:—

"It is this miserable duplicity of northern men which lowers them in southern opinion, and makes them often so powerless when they might command. They have no sympathy with slavery. Religion, education, habit, the influences of centuries—all make them loathe it. Why affect, then, to be its apologists? Why stand up as its defenders? The south does not ask it. Her intelligent men know what the north is—how its heart feels, and its mind thinks, on the subject, and they can only despise those of their people who cater to their prejudices, or defend their ultraisms. Silence! Silence! is always safe, and let us have that a thousand times, rather than the cold-blooded, calculating villainy which sells or sacrifices whatever is noble for pelf or place—which bargains a birth-right gained and given through toil and blood, for a popular name—which tramples upon right, and the souls of men, as if they were worthless as the mud in our swamps, for the patronage of the powerful."

SUNDAY IN NEW-ORLEANS.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune, under date of Feb. 23d, says:—"Yesterday (Sunday) being the anniversary of the birth of Washington, was celebrated by the military, who turned out in great splendor and proceeded out of town, where they engaged in a sham fight, and concluded with a great feast off the proceeds of the slaughter by the butchers the day previous. The day was most mild and serene. In town, the streets looked as though the churches might be full, so had the out-of-town events drawn off the floating population."

SUNDAY ORDINANCES UNCONSTITUTIONAL.—We stated some weeks ago, that the Common Council of the City of Cincinnati, Ohio, had passed an ordinance prohibiting the Jews from vending their wares on Sunday. A case has been tried in Court on an alledged violation of the ordinance, which resulted in a decision that the ordinance itself was unconstitutional. This is right, and we trust it will serve as a warning to others against trampling upon the Constitution in their zeal to subserve a sectarian purpose.

EATING UP HIS OWN WORDS.—The following paragraph is copied from the Religious Recorder. How the writer can say such things, and then go about his ordinary work on the seventh day of the week, is a mystery to us. We can only account for it by supposing that he has learned to eat up his own words:—

"Whose day is the Sabbath? THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABATH OF THE LORD THY GOD: IN IT THOU SHALT NOT DO ANY WORK." It is God's time. No legislation of man can make it right for the government, or a single individual in the land to make it a day of secular labor. Government has no more right to authorize Sabbath breaking than to authorize theft, arson, or murder. And whoever has an agency in the profanation of this holy day, whether he does it as a private individual, or as an officer or an agent of the government, must answer for it to the Great Supreme Lawgiver. If the authority of God is paramount, and his law supreme, no human authority or law can justify any individual in doing what is expressly prohibited by the Word of God."

THE LEGISLATURE OF NEW-JERSEY AND THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.—The following extract is from the proceedings in Assembly, on Tuesday, March 10. It will be seen that the subject of Sabbath Legislation is not yet disposed of. We doubt whether it will be so disposed of as to remain quiet, until Seventh-day Baptists are allowed their reasonable request, to enjoy "equal privileges with those who observe the first day":—

"The revision of the bill for the suppression of vice and immorality, the consideration of which was postponed in the early part of the session, was taken up.

"Mr. Cannon reminded the House that a large number of petitions had been sent from the Seventh-day Baptists for a modification of the law respecting the observance of the Sabbath, and in accordance with their wishes, a motion had been made to strike from the provision in this law, which exempts them from the penalties of working on the first day, provided they do it on their own premises; the latter part, so that they can do their work any where. He felt assured that if this amendment could now be made, they would be satisfied.

"Mr. Scudder said that he had found by looking at the laws of other States on this subject, that we were much in advance of them: our law was much more liberal and favorable to these people than any other. The petitions seemed to be founded upon the constitution, but he thought there was nothing in our laws inconsistent with their rights. A majority of the people had determined upon one day as the Sabbath, but these people seemed to be disposed, as a minority, to override the majority, and unless we design to break down the designation of any day for the Sabbath, we had better let the law remain as it is. The amendment was advocated by Messrs. Cory and Phillips, opposed by Messrs. Townsend, Bilderback, and Pruden, and finally lost, and the bill ordered to a third reading."

CAPTURE OF AN AMERICAN SLAVER.

The following is too dreadful for the contemplation of humanity; but when we reflect that the infliction is not only upon humanity, but that it is humanity also that perpetrates the crime, it fills one with horror, and causes him to feel as though it would be an improvement of his associations, could he sever the ties that bind him to his race, and affiliate himself with the legion that once made their abode with the man among the tombs. No language can express the turpitude and guilt and horror of such conduct; to call it wicked, diabolical, devilish, is too tame; and to describe it in language proportioned to its character, words are needed that should come glowing from the deepest hell and in the speech of the most skilful forked tongue demon of which perdition can boast.

But this was an "American Slaver!" Not only an American Slaver, but she was "of Philadelphia!" yes, she appears to have been fitted out and owned in the "City of Brotherly Love!" Who owned her? Which of the Philadelphia merchants owned her? Who among Philadelphia gentlemen designed to have put the fruit of that voyage, the price of the tears, sighs groans, misery, blood and death into his pocket, and to have feasted and made himself happy upon the income of that Philadelphia floating hell? What has the North to do with slavery. Read and answer.

SALEM REGISTER OFFICE, March 9. 1846.

FROM THE AFRICAN COLONIES—An American Slaver Taken.—Horrible Details.—The Salem Register has advices from Monrovia to the 7th of December, of the capture of the bark Pons, of Philadelphia, with 900 slaves, on the 1st of December, by the U. S. ship Yorktown, Capt. Bell; in lat. 3 South, three days out from Cabenda bound to Rio Janeiro. When the Pons was first seen, she raised American colors, supposing the Yorktown was a British cruiser; but, discovering the mistake, immediately hoisted the Portuguese flag. On boarding her, and demanding her papers of the Portuguese captain, he replied, "I have thrown them overboard." On being asked what was his cargo, he said, "about 900 slaves."

On examination, it was found that she had shipped 913, between the ages of 8 and 30, only 47 of them females, and left at the factory 4 or 500 more, which they had intended to take in the same vessel, but were prevented by the proximity of a British cruiser, from which they narrowly escaped. The Pons was put under charge of Lieut. Cogdell, and was 14 days in getting up to Monrovia, during which time about one hundred and fifty of the poor creatures died; some of them jumping overboard in a fit of desperation. On her arrival at Monrovia several of the slaves were dying, and many were so emaciated that their skin literally cleaved to their bones, and the stench of the crowded hold was almost suffocating. The recaptured slaves were landed at Monrovia, and measures were adopted for taking care of them, by the U. S. agent for liberated Africans; 300 of them by the Methodist mission established there, who issued a circular, appealing to the Christian public for aid. The Pons had sailed for the United States, (supposed for Philadelphia,) under the charge of Lieut. Cogdell. A letter from one of the Methodist missionaries gives a horrid account of the sufferings of the slaves, and says it is utterly impossible for language to convey an appropriate idea of the horrors of their situation. The dying were huddled together with less care than is bestowed upon the brute creation, the thermometer at 100 to 120 in the hold. Most of the slaves were in a state of nudity, and many had worn their skin through, producing putrid ulcers, which fed swarms of flies.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The SENATE was occupied last week, as usual, with the Oregon question. The principal thing before the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES was the bill making appropriations for the improvement of Harbors. Mr. McConnell also introduced a bill to give 160 acres of public land to every head of a family who was willing to cultivate it.

HORRIBLE MURDER.—The following account of a most atrocious murder of three persons, was communicated by telegraph from Albany to Utica. We since learn that the murderer has been arrested and has acknowledged the deed:—

"The house of Mr. Van Ness, a farmer and Supervisor of the town of Fleming, on Owasco Lake, about four miles from Auburn, was entered by some one in the disguise of a negro, and Mr. Van Ness, his wife and child were stabbed by the villain and are now dead—his mother-in-law and hired man were also stabbed, but are yet living. No farther particulars are known, and no cause assigned for the act. It is reported that Mrs. V. ran about sixty rods, when her bowels gushed out and she fell dead. Mr. V., it is said, attempted to go up stairs for his gun, and fell dead. The child, about two years old, was torn open from its shoulder entirely across its abdomen. The hired man succeeded in keeping him off with the broom-stick, and saved his own life and that of Mr. V.'s mother-in-law, but is badly wounded.

FOREIGN NEWS.—A merchant ship from Liverpool brings news to Feb. 10, which is not, however, of any special importance.

Sir. Robert Peel's health has not been of late so good as usual, and it is said that Lady Peel is very desirous that he should retire from the fatigues of office. A rumor has prevailed that he will resign as soon as he has passed his new commercial measure.

At a late meeting of the Repeal Association, Mr. Steel took occasion to express great indignation at the introduction into the American Congress, of resolutions for the Annexation of Ireland.

LATE FROM THE RIO DE LA PLATA.—The Sun has a letter from Monte Video, dated the first of January, which contains several important items of information. It alledges that the combined squadron had pushed up the Parana as far as Tapelay, near Corrientes; that the consuls of Paraguay had declared war against the Argentine Republic, and that Brazil was preparing to do the same. Also, that there had been a battle in Uruguay between the republicans and the allied monarchists, in which the latter were defeated with the loss of 50 killed, 300 prisoners, and 2,000 horses.

Also that the combined squadron had attacked and destroyed Tapely, which was defended by only 350 men. The Argentine loss is said to be 2 killed, 500 horses, a field-piece and sundry military stores.

The writer of the letter predicts a long and sanguinary war, and a civil war in Brazil should that empire declare against the Argentines.

JUST AND GENEROUS.—When the subscription price of our Weekly was one dollar a year, a 'Down Easter' forwarded a dollar, with a request to send him the paper. The year out, he permitted the paper to run on nine numbers beyond the volume, which, at four cents a number, would be 36 cents; and then he addressed us a letter requesting it discontinued, but making us pay 10 cents postage for the information which could just as well have been communicated free of charge by the Postmaster. In this way, the said "Down Easter' got precisely one volume and nine numbers of a mammoth weekly, by paying us precisely 54 cents.

People are always wondering why publishers of newspapers don't make money.

GREAT GERMAN RAILROAD.—Letters from Berlin state that owing to the favorable weather this winter, the work on the great Silesian Railway has been carried on without the least interruption, so that it is now certain that the road will be completed in the course of the next summer, when one may go from Berlin to Vienna and to Gratz in the Austrian States, by a line of railroad which will present but one, and that a small gap, viz: that of the magnificent viaduct over the valley and the river Neisse, near Gœlitz, and which is made from the immense works in that river, which are carried on in making solid foundations for the pillars of the central arches of the viaduct. This is to be an elevation of nearly one hundred and twenty eight-feet above the level of the water. Until this viaduct (which is to cost a million of thalers) is completed, the Government is building a bridge over the Neisse, by which railway travelers can cross, and by which they will be detained not more than half an hour.

This great Silesian railroad will cross the principal centres of the commerce and industry of this province, that is to say, Breslau, Opheln, Gœlitz, Oderberg, the latter situated on the frontiers of Moravia. [Bost. Adv.

DEATH OF AN EX-EDITOR.—The Newburyport Herald, of Tuesday, announces the death in that town, on Monday, after a short illness, of Ephraim W. Allen, Esq. aged 66 years. Mr. Allen was the conductor of the Herald for thirty years, interrupted by only one or two brief intervals of absence. He was distinguished for energy and industry, and in the days of his early career was the printer, the editor, and the carrier of his paper.

In those times the communication with Boston was so slow, that not unfrequently, when important events were pending, Mr. Allen would prepare his paper for the press, on the day previous to its publication, and then proceed on horseback to Boston, return with what news was to be found there, put it in type, work off the sheets with his own hand, and then distribute them himself to his subscribers.

Such devotion and industry, says the Herald, in any other pursuit, would have been rewarded with an ample fortune; but in a vocation which, if rightly conducted, is one of the most responsible and arduous in the community, as well as one of the most inadequately appreciated and poorly rewarded, he found himself, when he surrendered the Herald to the present proprietors, twelve years ago, in the possession of a very moderate competency, as the hard earnings and prudent savings of thirty years untiring toil.

MORSE'S TELEGRAPH IN AUSTRIA.—The Journal of Commerce states, that a letter from C. Fleischmann, Esq., United States acting Secretary of Legation at the court of Austria, dated Vienna, Jan. 14, 1846, says, "I am officially acquainted with the fact, that Morse's system of Magnetic Telegraphs will be adopted here. The Council has decided upon it. It will extend from here (Vienna) to Prague, a distance of nearly 320 English miles. Morse's apparatus will be used for the important communications at the principal stations, and Bain's (of Scotland) for the use of the Railroads."

We learn elsewhere that there has been great competition and great efforts made in the highest quarter to have other systems adopted in Austria, but the American has triumphed over all.

VEVAY VINEYARD.—The Indiana Farmer and Gardener contains a notice of this vineyard. It was commenced by Swiss emigrants in 1801 at Vevay, on the banks of the Ohio. Congress granted them land on long credit. They brought their own native vines, and after struggling for years, they gave up the culture of the foreign vine. They turned attention to our native vine, first to the Cape grape, and subsequently to the Isabella and Catawba. After forty years of experience they consider our climate and soil inferior to those of Switzerland for producing saccharine matter, and consequently wine. They say that, in this country, twelve pounds of grapes are required to make a gallon of wine, and, in the old country, ten pounds. At one time they had forty acres under cultivation; now only five. They say they can cultivate other products to greater profits.

SAP HEATER.—J. T. Rich, of Shoreham, Vt., has invented a method of advancing the process of sugar-making without any extra cost of fuel, by simply suspending over, or inserting in the flue of a sugar-making arch, a tin or copper cylinder about six inches in diameter, and twenty or more inches long, and closed at both ends, with a tunnel inserted on the top, at one end, and a discharging pipe at the other, the upper part of which is lower than the tunnel. By passing the sap through this, it will be discharged boiling hot into the boiler, and consequently hasten the process of evaporation in a very considerable degree.

A WRITING MACHINE.—Charles Thurber Esq, of Norwich, Conn., a graduate of Brown University, has invented a machine by which, with raised letters, the blind may be taught to write with the same facility as those who can see. The instrument is said to be, in appearance, precisely like a small piano, or parlor organ. Each key is marked with raised letters, if for the blind. The keys are struck by the fingers precisely as in playing on the piano forte; and a small pen with common ink makes a letter at each touch of a note with the finger, on a sheet of white paper fixed up in front of the instrument.

COST OF INTEMPERANCE.—The Albany Atlas says that three-fourths of the crime and taxes, and one-half of the county expenses of the counties of Cortland and Niagara for the last year—and that year is but the history of all other years—was caused by rum drinking. Oswego county tells the same story. The county tax for the year ending Oct. 1845, is $11,935,60. Of this amount the criminal tax is $11,026 52. Of 124 persons committed to the jail of the county within the year, seventy-six—three quarters of the whole number—were brought to crime directly by intemperance. Thus the amount of money drawn from the pockets of the tax payers of that county—the great majority of whom are doubtless temperate and temperance men, opposed to rum drinking—amounted in one year to the sum of $6,764 02—more than one half of the entire criminal tax of the county.

Orange county, too, tells the same story. During the last year, 173 persons were admitted to the jails of that county. Of this number one hundred and fifty were intemperate, seven doubtful, and but sixteen temperate.

PRICE OF RELICS.—A French Journal having recently alluded to the notorious love of relics, and the extravagant prices paid for them by the English, in commenting upon the price lately paid by Prince Albert for the coat worn by Nelson when he received his death wound at the battle of Trafalgar, says we are enabled to gather a few items of interest on this point. The ivory chair received by Gustavus Vasa from the town of Lubeck was sold in 1833, for 58,000 florins, or $26,640. The coat worn by Charles the Twelfth of Sweeden, at the battle of Pultowa, was sold in Edinburg for $97,680. An Englishman offered 100,000 francs for one of the teeth of Heloise; while Lord Shaftsbury gave in 1816, $3,241 for one of the teeth of Sir Isaac Newton. But the head of Descartes,—teeth and all,—was literally given away for the sum of 97 francs. Voltaire's cane sold in Paris for 500 francs. Rousseau's waistcoat was sold for 849 francs, and his copper watch for 500 francs. Kant's wig sold for 200 francs, while the wig of Sterne sold in London for 200 guineas. The hat worn by Napoleon at the battle of Eyleau was sold for 1,020 francs, and Sir Francis Burdett paid for two pens, used in signing the treaty of Amiens, $2,220!

OLD MANUSCRIPTS.—We understand that several weeks since, whilst some workmen were engaged in taking down an old store building on the dock at Rondout, in this town, a box was discovered, hidden in some way between the floor and ceiling; and that in it was found a large quantity of Continental money—several millions of dollars, it is stated—together with a great number of old manuscript papers relating to Revolutionary affairs. One of these we have seen. It was a letter signed by Pierre Van Cortland, President of the Senate, and Evart Bancker, Speaker of the Assembly, dated at Kingston, June 30, 1780, and directed to some persons at Rochester, in this County—calling on them to aid in the cause of Independence, by furnishing clothing for the soldiers. We learn, also, that those papers, as is usual in such cases, were scattered about the village, and are in the possession of different persons. We are sorry for this, as, from what we have heard and seen, they are papers of much value as respects the history of that time, and we doubt not, would be of service in obtaining a correct knowledge of the events of that period; and we trust that means will be taken to collect them and ascertain their contents and value. [Kingston Jour.

We celebrate nobler obsequies to those we love, by drying the tears of others, than by shedding our own—and the fairest wreath we can hang on their tomb, is not so fair as a fruit-offering of good deeds. [Jean Paul.

SUMMARY.

The heavy rains of last week have caused great freshets, east, west, north, and south, the consequence of which is an immense destruction of property.

The ship Panther, in charge of Midshipman Macomb, in seventy-five days from Cabenda, on the coast of Africa, arrived at Charleston on Monday evening. She is a prize to the U. S. sloop Yorktown, having been captured and sent home under suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade.

The schr. Robert Wilson, (of Baltimore,) Lieut. Chipman, commanding as Prize Master, arrived at Charleston on Thursday morning, in 38 days from Port Praya, prize to the U. S. ship Jamestown. The R. W. was supposed to be engaged in the slave trade, and has been sent to the United States for trial.

Twenty-five slaves were recently shipped from Nashville, via New-Orleans, to Liberia, by J. S. Haynes, Esq., Executor of the will of C. Houston, by which they were manumitted for transportation to the Colony.

A seal, 50 inches long and 11 thick and weighing 70 pounds, was killed upon the ice of Lake Champlain, between Burlington and Keesville, on the 23d ult.

It is honorable to the United States, that President Polk furnishes at his levees nothing that intoxicates.

The Portsmouth Journal says that a sheep raised by John L. Brackett of Greenland, which weighed when alive 186 pounds, was slaughtered this week, and weighed, when dressed, 104 pounds. It sold in market for $9 50. Pretty good when common sheep may be purchased for less than a couple of dollars.

A number of citizens of Brooklyn, prior to the departure of the ship Brooklyn, with 200 emigrants for Oregon, purchased and presented to the passengers a complete set of Harper's excellent Family Library, 719 volumes.

The New-York Common School Journal justly remarks that, 'when the seats in a school are so high that the children cannot reach the floor with their feet, and so narrow that they have to hold on with both hands, then the verb to sit must be an active verb.'

Dr. Pardon Brownell, brother to Bishop Brownell, of Hartford, Conn., was seized with vertigo while lecturing at East Hartford, and being conveyed to a neighboring hotel, died there in an hour. His death is attributed to the breaking of a blood vessel in the head. Dr. Brownell was 56 years of age.

Among the articles now exported largely to England, are clothes-pins, (which are carried over by hundreds of hogsheads,) ivory and wooden combs, augers, gimblets, and cut tacks. In all these things we supply the English market.

A provincial actress was performing the part of Lady Anne in Richard III., and on delivering the following passage: "When shall I have rest?" was answered by her washer-woman from the pit, "Never till you pay me three shillings and three pence!"

There are no less than nine thousand different varieties of roses, and fifty varieties of pinks.

The heaviest fall of snow experienced in St. Louis, Mo., this winter, fell on the 19th ult. It commenced snowing the night previous, and kept steadily on throughout the entire day; the average depth from eight to ten inches.

If a child is taken with the croup, instantly apply cold water, ice water if possible, suddenly and freely to the neck and chest.

Baked bread on the first day produces from 71 to 72 per cent. of nutritive matter, while that five days old yields from 81 to 82 per cent.

The Postmaster General has decided that newspapers with a stamp or memorandum on the envelope or on the paper, are subject to letter postage by weight.

The Providence Journal announces the arrival at that port of the ship South America, Captain Soule, from the Northwest coast, after one of the most successful whaling voyages on record. The South America brings home 4,100 barrels of oil, 100 of it sperm, and sold 1,000 barrels at Babia. She also sent home 37,000 lbs. of bone, and brings 22,000 lbs.

It is the invariable practice throughout Holland, to bid down instead of up, at an auction. An article is set up at any price the auctioneer pleases; if nobody bids he lowers until some person cries "Mine," and that person who so claims it is then entitled to it; a practice congenial to Dutch taciturnity.

In Virginia, Mrs. Eleanor Hall of Richmond deceased in July last, bequeathing to all her slaves, eighty in number, their freedom, with a sum of money to each, enough to pay their expenses of emigration to a free state.

In Pekin, China, a newspaper of extraordinary size, is published weekly on silk. It is claimed to have been in existence more than a thousand years. It is said that in 1727, a public officer caused some false intelligence to be published in this paper, for which he was put to death. Several numbers of it are preserved in the royal library of Paris, which are 10 1-4 yards long.

The Farmers' Club invite all who wish to have a supply of fine fruit to procure grafts from choice fruit trees, and bring them to the meetings of the Club, held in the American Institute Rooms in the city of New York, for the purpose of exchanging with each other. Carefully label them, describing the fruit, that there be no mistake. Meetings first and third Tuesday of every month. The Clubs formed in other parts of the country are requested to follow the example. Thus an extensive interchange will be effected all over the country.

About nine o'clock on Wednesday evening, a young man, "just come down," was passing down Beekman street near William, where he was knocked down by two men, but fortunately some persons coming up, the villains escaped without obtaining his money. When he partially revived, he stated that he was from the State of Maine—he had taken out a well-filled purse to pay for some apples at an apple-stand on the corner opposite Lovejoy's Hotel, and "reckoned" he had learned a salutary lesson.

The Governor of Connecticut has appointed Friday, the 10th day of April next, as a day of public humiliation and prayer.

A correspondent of the National Intelligencer is writing a series of articles to show that Congress has no power under the Constitution to retrocede the District of Columbia to the States of which it was formerly a part.

A German woman, named Maria Myers, an inmate of the Blockley Alms-house, Philadelphia, was found dead in one of the sewers through which it is supposed she attempted to escape.

The Legislature of Ohio has adjourned, having passed a law thoroughly revising the tax system of the State, so that all property will be henceforth taxed at its real value, thereby increasing the basis from $135,000,000 to over $450,000,000. This is a most excellent change, and places the ability of the State beyond all doubt. It will furnish ample means both for payments of interest, and for the final liquidation of the State debt.

The Alleghany Methodist Conference lately resolved "that no minister shall be admitted to this Conference who uses tobacco in any of its forms, except as a medicine, and in that case satisfactory evidence to be given." The German physiologists affirm that of twenty deaths of men between 18 and 20 years of age in Germany, ten originate in the waste of the constitution by smoking tobacco.

There is a spring about nine miles from New Haven, Ct., emitting a large stream of water from seven to fifteen degrees colder than ordinary springs, and three dregrees colder than the most celebrated springs in Europe. A thermometer inserted two and a half feet below the surface of the water, exhibits a temperature of forty degrees, only eight degrees above the freezing point.

A petition was presented to the Tennessee House of Representatives, praying for the passage of an act to legalize a lottery for the purpose of completing the Catholic Cathedral at Natchez. Mr. McCaughan opposed the petition, saying "he had no objection to the erection of a church to worship our Saviour in, but was opposed to calling on the devil to build it."

During the month of January, a French house of this city, loaded six vessels with wheat and barley for the Mediterranean, at the rate of freight of 24 1-2 cents per bushel for wheat, and 23 1-2 cents for barley; and the same house has just taken up another vessel to load with grain for the same destination.

A quarrel in the street between two Christian gentlemen for the possession of a yard of ribbon, would not and could not be more shameful in the light of the gospel, than a war between two Christian nations for a thousand miles of territory.

Switzerland, with her twenty-two confederate Cantons, has an income for federal or common purposes, of only £56,000; less than the annual cost of a single English frigate!

Liebig, the well-known chemist, has just been created Baron by the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt.

In the Pennsylvania House of Representatives, on Wednesday, 11th inst., a bill was reported for the repeal of the charter of the Lehigh County Bank.

The Baptist meeting house at Watertown was consumed by fire a few days since. The loss was $5,000, on which there was no insurance.

It is proposed by the colored people to hold a National Convention, some time next summer, in Cleveland, Ohio. The object is to concentrate opinion among themselves, upon some plan of colonization. Some of them think of asking for a part of Oregon.

Five children were burned to death a few days ago at Fredericksburgh, near Kingston, Canada. The family went to a wedding party, leaving their children at home, the oldest being about thirteen years of age. On the return of the parents, at a late hour, they found their home a heap of burning ruins, and all their children burned to death.

The Hickman (Ky.) Standard says, "A lady residing within fifty miles of this place, has recently given birth to four sons within an hour. They have been named Polk, Dallas, Texas, and Oregon, and all are in a thriving condition."

A bill was passed by the Legislature of New Jersey to prohibit horse-racing—by just the constitutional number of votes—not one to spare. Racing for money, or where 20 or more people are assembled, is declared to be an offence, and all persons concerned, directly or indirectly giving notice of it, advertising, &c., to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and punishable by $1,000 fine or imprisonment not exceeding one year.

Mr. Rahab Marshall, well known throughout the country as the "Fakir of Ava," died at Louisville on Tuesday, 10th inst., of dropsy in the chest. He left $2,000 in gold, but owned, it is stated, about twenty thousand dollars worth of property, all of which will go to his wife, in Cincinnati, whom he had abandoned and not lived with for 20 years, and his son, a good actor and equestrian, who goes by the name of Williams.

Review of New-York Market,--Monday, March 16.

FLOUR AND MEAL—About 2500 bbls. Western have changed hands to-day at $5 50@$5 56½ for home use. New Orleans flat hoop we quote at $5 12½@5 25, round hoop we quote $5@$5 12½. In Southern there is not much doing. Georgetown is $5 12½@5 25. Baltimore about $5. Meal $3 37½@$3 50 for Jersey. Brandywine is $3 62½, hhds. $16. Bag Meal $1 25@$1 37½. Buckwheat $4 in bbls. $2 in bags.

GRAIN—There have been several lots of Southern Wheat taken by a miller at 111@114 cts. Of Corn there is not a large supply, and the market is steady. Sales 1000 bush. Barley at 64 cts. for hulling. Oats are 44@45 cts. Northern. Sales 1200 bush. Jersey at 42 cents.

HAY—The market is quiet at 80@90 cts. per cwt.

A WORD ABOUT FINANCES.—Some of our subscribers seem to understand very well, that the expenses of publishing the Recorder have to be paid every week out of the money received from them. They have accordingly forwarded their subscriptions so promptly, that we have been enabled to go through three-quarters of the second volume without embarrassment. For a few weeks past, however, our receipts have been very small; and should they continue to be as small for the few remaining weeks of the volume, the consequence to us must be serious embarrassment. We hope every friend of the Recorder who is in arrears will consider this matter, and remember that although it may cost him but little trouble to send us what is our due, it may cost us much trouble to supply the deficiency which his neglect will occasion. To encourage promptness, we will receive $2 per year from those who are behind, if payment is made before the close of the present volume. All accounts remaining unpaid at that time will be made out at $2,50 per year, agreeably to our published terms, and bills forwarded accordingly.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

ON THE DEATH OF A DARLING CHILD.

BY DR. WARDLAW.

There was the parting sigh,—
  With that the spirit fled,
And winged its flight on high,
  And left the body dead;
No prayers, no tears, its flight could stay,
'Twas Jesus called the soul away.

O! how shall I complain
  Of Him who reigns above
Who sends no needless pain,
  Who always smiles in love;
Who looks in tenderest spirit down,
E'en when he seems to wear a frown,

The eye of Jesus wept,
  It dropt a holy tear,
When Mary's brother slept,
  A friend to Jesus dear;
Delightful thought! that blessed eye
Still beams with kindness in the sky.

But O! my spirits fail,
  I feel a pang untold—
Those ruby lips so pale
  That blushing cheek so cold;
And dim those eyes of dewy light,
That smiled and gleamed so mildly bright.

To lay that lovely form,
  So lovely e'en in death,
Food for corruption's worm,
  The mouldering earth beneath!
O! worse to me than twice to part,
Than second death-stroke to my heart.

As summer flower she grew,
  Expanding to the morn;
All gemmed with sparkling dew,
  A flower without a thorn.
A mother's sweet and lovely flower,
Sweeter and lovelier every hour.

But, Ah! thy morning bloom
  Scarce felt the morning ray,
An unexpected gloom
  Obscured the rising day;
A dreary, cold, and withering blast,
Low in the ground its beauty cast.

The glistening leaves are shed
  That spread so fresh and fair;
Thy balmy fragrance fled
  That scented all the air;
And lowly lies the lifeless form,
The gentle victim of the storm.

But why in anguish weep?
  Hope dawns upon my view;
'Twas but a winter's sleep,
  My flower shall spring anew;
Each cherished flower on earth that sleeps,
On which fond memory hangs and weeps—

All to new life shall rise,
  In heavenly beauty bright;
Shall charm my ravished eyes
  In tints of rainbow light;
Shall bloom unfading in the skies,
And drink the dews of Paradise.

O! this is blest relief,
  My fainting heart it cheers;
It cools my burning grief,
  And sweetens all my tears;
These eyes shall see my darling then,
Nor shed a parting tear again.

And while I feel at heart
  The blank of comforts gone,
I only mourn a part,
  I am not left alone;
Tho' nipped some buds of opening joy,
How many yet my thanks employ!

And thou, my second heart,
  Loved partner of my grief,
Heaven bids not thee depart,
  Of earthly joys the chief;
A favored wife and mother still—
Let grateful praise my bosom fill.

THE UNKNOWN.

Daylight was fast fading from the sky, on a cold and lowering evening in November, when a poor woman, leading a little boy by the hand, rang at the door of a handsome house, in the outskirts of the pleasant town of W——.

The girl who answered the bell soon returned and told the lady of the house that a poor woman was at the door, begging a night's lodging.

The lady cast a hurried look at the dead leaves that were whirling in eddies along the streets, and then at the dark clouds drifting together overhead, and sighed. Her husband had a nervous dislike to admitting unknown persons into his house, and had often charged his family not to suffer any such to pass his threshold. She, therefore, arose with a heavy heart, and went to the door where the stranger stood holding the hand of a pale, sad-looking little boy, about six years of age. The woman, dejected and care-worn, seemed ready to sink with fatigue. The lady kindly inquired into her situation, and heard the following account.

Several years ago she had emigrated to the West with her husband and five children, in hopes of bettering their condition. Their hopes had been disappointed—sickness had entered their cabin—the husband and father was carried off by one of the fevers of the climate, and the children, one by one, had followed—the poor feeble boy which she held by the hand alone remained. When all was over she sold the little property that remained, and with her boy, began, on foot, their melancholy journey, back to their native place, at Cape Ann. That evening, for the first time, she found herself obliged to ask charity, but it was so hard to bring her feelings to it, that she had passed through the whole town without having courage to stop at a door, until she made her first application at that house.

"But," said she, "we do not want food, nor clothes, nor money, we only ask for shelter for the night."

The lady felt that this was a case in which she ought rather to risk the displeasure of her husband than send the strangers away. Accordingly, she led them into the house, and while the bed was preparing, she urged them to eat, but they both refused food, and as soon as their bed was ready they retired, and soon fell asleep.

When the master of the house returned and heard what had happened, he exclaimed, angrily:

"They shall not stay here—my father never would harbor any vagrants—neither will I."

"But, my dear," said the lady, "they are now asleep—you cannot send them away now—it is very dark, and what hurt can they do here?"

"They will get up when we are asleep and rob the house, and be off before we know any thing about it. It is all a pretence to get into the house—but they must up and off."

"O pray do not turn them out in this dark, cold night," said the lady. "If you are afraid of their robbing the house, I will sit up and watch them; but they are worn out and unable to go any farther."

"We will soon see how that is," said he, and going into the small room where they slept, he called out in a loud voice, "Come, get up and be off—you cannot stay here—I cannot have you here."

The woman raised her eyes with a look of silent despair, but the little boy, with a nervousness painfully different from the motions of a happy, healthy child, sprang from the bed and clasping his thin hands together, fell on his knees and cried out, in a shrill, imploring tone, "O, sir! don't turn us out this dark night! we are tired almost to death. O, do let us stay till daylight."

The gentleman relented at the appeal, and turning to his wife said, "If you choose to give up your night's rest for the sake of their staying, I have no objections, but you must watch all the while."

The lady willingly consented, and soothing the little boy, sent him back to bed. She then took a seat in the neighboring room and prepared to fulfil her promise, by watching them all night.

The strangers slept heavily, but not quietly. The poor woman groaned often, and murmured in her sleep of many sorrows. Once or twice, she said with a deep sigh, "Well! well! my heart is breaking, but the Lord is good."

* * * * * *

In after years the lady was called to endure loss after loss, and trial after trial, until her heart was almost crushed within her; but often when she was ready to sink in despair, the sleeping words of that unknown widow came home to her heart, and brought strength and comfort, and she felt hersel richly repaid for a sleepless night when she had learned to say, "Well! well! my heart is breaking, but the Lord is good."

Poor unknown woman! if you are still an inhabitant of this world—if the Physician has healed your breaking heart, know that your words unconsciously spoken have often strengthened the spirit of a widow almost as desolate as yourself, and in turn she now longs to tell you what she has since learned. If we truly know and acknowledge that the Lord is good, our hearts will never break, but grow stronger and stronger under trials.

PERILS OF THE SEA.

The following incidents connected with the disastrous gale of the 14th and 15th of February, were written for the Advocate of Moral Reform, by an individual who was exposed to the fury of the storm, but by God's great mercy preserved from shipwreck and death.

On the morning of the 14th, being on our return from Charleston, S. C, we took a pilot to the southward of Barnegat, and rejoiced in confident anticipation of a speedy arrival among our friends in New-York. During the day the wind was light, and our vessel being heavily laden we progressed but slowly. The night came on and with it, every appearance of a storm, but it was deemed advisable to stand in and endeavor to make the highland light. At eight o'clock, P. M., things began to assume a serious aspect, as the wind was increasing and a heavy swell rolling in from the eastward, while the snow fell so thickly as to prevent our discerning objects at any distance from us; but hoping when the moon rose, this difficulty would be obviated, we kept on our course gaining about seven knots on hour.—Previous to this, I had placed my little boy in his berth, having listened with a beating heart to his childish prayer to God for protection through the night. An hour later, feeling deeply impressed with the solemnity of our situation, I lifted my heart in prayer that God would direct me to some passage in his word which should be "as light shining in a dark place," and drawing the Bible from the cabin table, I opened to the words, "Now no chastening, for the present seemeth to be joyous but grievous: nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby." From that moment, I found "I could trust and not be afraid!" I perused several portions of the scripture, then closed the book, and calmly resumed my sewing; my mind filled with "the exceeding great and precious promises" of God's word. Never before had I so realized their freeness and fullness. By ten o'clock, all hope of being able to make the lights had left us, but we stood on until eleven, when the gale increasing, it became necessary to shorten sail, and while in the act, the wind shifted, taking us, as a sailor would say, "all a-back." During the confusion caused by this mishap, I was horrified to hear words of blasphemy, fit only for Pandemonium, belched forth by some of the officers. Oh, it was terrifying to listen to words of such awful import, while surrounded by the terrors of such a scene, and this feeling was greatly increased when it became necessary for all, except the captain and pilot, to go aloft. If ever I agonized in prayer, it was then that God would spare them yet a little longer, and not cut them off in anger. During this time, our leak increased upon us to such a degree, that the pilot wrought at the pump at intervals in order to keep her free, and was several times drenched in the seas that beat over us. Our position became extremely critical, and the anxiety of the captain almost beyond bounds, not knowing at what moment we might carry away the yard and precipitate all upon it into the boiling surges that rose around on every hand. There being no passengers, I was left mainly to my own meditations, my husband being fully occupied in attending to the vessel, and by eleven, P. M, the motion had become so violent as not to admit my enjoying the solace of reading the Bible. For three weary hours, I was most of the time compelled to exert myself to the utmost to keep my position on the cabin floor; sometimes kneeling, sometimes sitting, sometimes lying down, with the water surging over the greater part of the cabin. The wind howled so fiercely, as to defy comparison with any thing familiar to dwellers on the land.—Reflecting on the probability that not one of all who loved us were awake to pray for us, it seemed to me, that could we but keep afloat until our friends in their quiet homes or in the sanctuaries of God, could entreat the Lord for us, that the bitterness of death would be past. The thought would also crowd itself upon my mind that there were others probably, in equal jeopardy, for we had been in company with several vessels during Saturday. None perished that night, unremembered by one lonely watcher. I had always imagined that to be shipwrecked near home, must involve more suffering, than to perish at a distance, but I found the effect upon my own mind of our vicinity to home comforting. I remember speculating upon what I had with me, that friends could identify if it floated ashore, and how I could render my little boy's body buoyant, when compelled to trust him to the raging waters. Years ago I had known a female who was saved from drowning in the wreck of a steamboat, by having had on at that time, a pair of feather under-sleeves, which were then fashionable; so I concluded to cut open a pillow and placing him in it, bind it closely around him, and then by adjusting two other pillows properly about his person, I deemed it barely possible, that like the cradle of bulrushes, it might prove sufficient with God's blessing, to ensure his preservation. Sometimes I almost condemned myself in having brought the child of our adoption into such perilous circumstances. Thoughts of similar import occupied my mind throughout the three hours which I spent mostly alone that dreary night.

About 2 o'clock, on Sabbath morning, I made my way to the after door of the cabin, and enjoyed a moment's conversation with my husband, who had remained all that time at the wheel. I may truly say "enjoyed," for the Christian's hope was indeed like an anchor to our souls, and the goodness of God, not our own danger, was the theme. I cannot pretend to describe the appearance the sea then presented, save that it wrought and boiled like an immense seething cauldron. The yeasty waves chased each other in wild confusion, suggesting to my mind the idea of a pack of half starved, ravening wolves, who scented their prey, and strained every nerve to its utmost to be first at the banquet of blood. About three, A. M., the captain and pilot came in, and changed some of their outer garments, and threw themselves upon the cabin floor near the stove, to snatch a little warmth and rest, while the cabin boy and I employed ourselves in drying their dripping clothing, and the steward exerted himself to prepare a cup of hot coffee for all hands. This refreshment was much needed by all, especially by poor Jack, in the forecastle, who, with scanty clothing, had faced the storm and stood drenched for hours with brine. Things continued about the same with us until daylight, when we split our mainsail; this for awhile added to our anxiety, but prompt seamanship soon repaired the disaster sufficiently for it to be balance-reefed and under snugger sail than we had had before the day dawned upon us, though the heavens were still black with tempest. Our worn and weary crew, again divided into their respective watches, and those whose turn it was went below to snatch a moment's respite from their arduous toil. I strove also, to take some repose, but in vain; the tossing of the vessel was too great; I could not remain in my room, without doing violence to my feelings. The day wore away slowly—very slowly; the wind continuing to assail us in gusts, that threatened to carry all before them, and the sea rolling with remorseless fury, while the pumps were almost constantly manned.

Oh, how forcibly I contrasted our situation with that of those, who, in New-York, braved the storm "to go up to the house of the Lord," and how assured I felt that continued supplication was going up from many hearts in behalf of all who were upon the coast. By four, P. M., the gale broke, and by sun-down, we were tolerably comfortable, the sea running down and appearances indicating that we were to have a quiet night. When I laid my head on my pillow that night, utter exhaustion almost precluded thought, but the language of praise and thanksgiving rose spontaneously to my lips. "Sweet indeed, are the uses of adversity!" I had learned a lesson of dependence upon God, which I trust, I shall never forget. The night passed safely away, and on Monday we obtained an observation by which we found we were ten miles to the southward of Barnegat; having drifted down the coast with an offing varying from eighteen to twenty fathoms.

That night—

The moon looked gently down,
  On the calm unquiet sea,
And the breaker's sullen frown,
  Was scarce noticed in the lee.

Of the ships that were in our sight on Saturday, we could see nothing, and many a query was hazarded among us as to their situation. That night, at twelve, not being able to fetch into the Hook, wind and tide being against us, we anchored off the bar until daylight, when we got under way and stood in with a fair breeze, and soon rejoiced in seeing quite a fleet on the same tack. Although all on board felt that we had had severe weather to contend with, yet we were by no means prepared to hear the tidings that met us on landing, of so many awful shipwrecks.

GIRAFFE OR THE CAMELOPARD.

The above picture represents one of the most singular animals, it is so disproportioned. When full grown, it measures seventeen feet in hight. Its neck is nearly equal to its body, its fore legs are much longer than the hind legs, and the whole forward parts much heavier than the latter parts. Whenever it moves faster than a walk, it is by great leaps of twelve or fifteen feet. Its fore legs are so long that it can not drink, only by spreading its feet far apart, and it cannot feed from the ground, but eats the leaves and fruit of trees from among the branches. It has been exhibited in this country. It has some of the features of the camel, and is spotted like the leopard, hence its name, camelopard. Some of our readers who live in or near the cities and towns where it has been exhibited, may have seen it. It is pleasing to look at the works of God, but children should remember that the eye is never satisfied with seeing.

By observing the picture, it will be seen that there is a [illegible] and at the right hand will be seen another animal with peculiar [illegible]. It looks like some species of the goat. The world is full of creatures, some bad and some good, but man is about as bad as any of them.

A THRILLING NARRATIVE.

REMARKABLE CONDUCT OF A LITTLE GIRL.

The following extraordinary act was performed by a child in Lyons not long ago, according to a continental paper.

An unfortunate artisan, the father of a family, was deprived of work by the depressed state of his trade during the whole winter. It was with great difficulty that he could get a morsel of food now and then for his famished wife and children. Things grew worse and worse with him, and at length, on attempting to rise one morning for the purpose of going out as usual in quest of employment, he fell back in a fainting condition beside his wife, who had already been confined to her bed by illness for two months. The poor man felt himself ill and his strength entirely gone. He had two boys yet in mere childhood, and one girl about twelve or thirteen years old. For a long time the whole charge of the household had fallen on the girl. She had tended the sick bed of her mother, and had watched over her little brothers with more than parental care. Now when the father too was taken ill, there seemed to be not a vestige of hope in the family, except in the exertions that might be made by her, young as she was.

The first thought of the little girl, was to seek for work proportioned to her strength. But that the family might not starve in the meantime, she resolved to go to one of the houses of charity where food was given out, she had heard, to the poor and needy. The person to whom she addressed herself, accordingly inscribed her name in the list of applicants, and told her to come back again in a day or two, when the case would have been deliberated upon. Alas, during this deliberation her parents and brothers would starve! The girl stated this, but was informed that the formalities mentioned were indispensable. She came again to the street, and almost agonized by the knowledge how anxiously she was expected with bread at home, she resolved to ask charity from passengers in the public ways.

No one heeded the modest, unobstrusive appeal of her outstretched hand. Her heart was too full to permit her to speak. Could any one have seen the torturing anxiety that filled her breast, she must have been pitied and relieved. As the case stood, it is not perhaps surprising that some rude being menaced her with the police. She was frightened. Shivering with cold, and crying bitterly, she fled homewards. When she mounted the stairs and opened the door, the first word she heard was the cries of her brothers for something to eat—bread! She saw her father soothing and supporting her fainting mother, and heard him say—"Bread! she dies for the want of food."

"I have no bread," cried the poor girl, with anguish in her tones.

The cry of disappointment and despair which came at these words from her father and brothers, caused her to recall what she had said, and conceal the truth. "I have not got it yet," she exclaimed, "but I will have it immediately. I have given the baker the money, he was serving some rich people, and he told me to wait or come back. I came to tell that it would soon be here."

After these words, without waiting a reply, she left the house again. A thought had entered her head, and maddened by the distress of those she loved so dearly, she had instantaneously resolved to put it into execution. She ran from one street to another till she saw a baker's shop in which there appeared to be no person, and then, summoning all her determination, she entered, lifted a loaf and fled! The shopkeeper saw her from behind. He cried loudly, ran out after her, and pointed her out to the people passing by. The girl ran on. She was pursued, and finally a man seized the loaf which she carried. The object of her desire taken away, she had no motive to proceed and was seized at once. They conveyed her towards the office of the police; a crowd as usual having gathered in attendance. The poor girl threw around her despairing glances which seemed to seek some favorable object from whom to seek mercy. At last, when she had been brought to the court of the police office, and was waiting for the order to enter, she saw before her a little girl of her own age, who appeared to look upon her with a glance full of kindness and compassion. Under the impulse of the moment, still thinking of her family, she whispered to the stranger the cause of her act of theft.

"Father and mother, and my two brothers are dying for the want of bread!" said she.

"Where?" asked the little girl anxiously.

"Rue ——, No. 10, ——." She had only time to add the name of her parents to this communication, when she was carried in before the commissary of the police.

Meanwhile, the poor family at home suffered all the miseries of suspense. Fears of their child's safety, were added to the other afflictions of the parents. At length they heard footsteps ascending the stairs. An eager cry of hope was uttered by all the four unfortunates, but alas! a stranger appeared in the place of their

Naturally surprised by such an application, the hair dresser, who was a kind and intelligent man, made inquiry into the cause of his young friend's visit. Her secret was easily drawn from her, and it caused the hair-dresser almost to shed tears of pleasure. He feigned to comply with the conditions proposed, and gave the bargained fifteen francs, promising to come and claim his purchase at some future day. The little girl then bought provisions, got a basket, and set out on her errand of mercy. But before she returned, the hair-dresser had gone to her mother's, found that lady at home, and related to her the whole circumstance. So that when the possessor of the golden tresses came back, she was gratified by being received in the open arms of her blessed and praising parent.

When the story was told at the police office by the hair-dresser, the abstractor of the loaf was visited by no very severe punishment. The singular circumstance connected with the case raised many friends to the artisan and his family, and he was soon restored to health and comfort. own little one. Yet the stranger appeared to them like an angel. Her cheeks had a beautiful bloom, and long flaxen hair fell in curls upon her shoulders. She brought to them bread, and a small basket of other provisions. "Your girl," she said, "will not be back perhaps to day; but keep up your spirits, see what she has sent you." After these encouraging words, the young messenger of good put into the hands of the father five francs, and then turning around to cast a look of pity and satisfaction on the poor family, who were overcome with emotion, she disappeared.

The history of these five francs is the most remarkable part of this affair. This little benevolent fairy was, it is almost unnecessary to say, the same pitying spectator who had been addressed by the abstractor of the loaf at the police office. As soon as she had heard what was said there, she had gone away, resolved to take some meat to the poor family. But she remembered that her mamma was from home that day, and was at a loss how to procure money or food until she bethought herself of a resource of a strange kind. She recollected a hair dresser, who lived near her mother's house, and who knew her family. He often commended her beautiful hair, and told her to come to him whenever she wished to have it cut and he would give her a louisdore for it. This used to make her proud and pleased, but she now thought of it in a different way. In order to procure money for the assistance of the starving family, she went straight to the hair-dresser's, put him in mind of his promise, and offered to let him cut off her pretty locks for what he thought them worth.

ADVICE TO CHILDREN.

To the young I would say, it is a privilege to be a child. Be not in haste to take a higher place than belongs to you. It is greatly to be lamented, that so many of the young grow so soon ashamed of the sweet simplicity, the confiding, affectionate, teachable temper of the little child. They think there is something in it low and mean, which they are anxious and eager to put off. They are much mistaken. The only son of Mr. Durant, who was remarkable for his genius and his learning, always choose to be a child. Such was the simplicity of his pure spirit, that when advanced to the strength of youth, he still loved like a little child to hang upon the bosom of his mother, and breathe out his hymns and prayers. This was a thing which he who prematurely puts on the airs of a man could not do. This could be done by none but a spirit of uncommon worth, and purity, and loveliness.

While you have the qualities of children, it is your time to obtain the qualities of Christians. Improve your time. Let the sense of dependence, the confidence and love, which bind you to your parents, rise to God. Woe to the graceless youth who renounces the character of a child, before he forms the character of a Christian! He has placed himself at a fearful distance from the straight and narrow way. Now is your time to secure a place in the family of Christ. Hasten, then, to his feet. Give him your hearts. Pour your filial feelings into his gracious bosom, and be living, useful members of his heavenly kingdom.

PRAYER FOR TRUTH.

O Father, bless a little child,
  And in her early youth
Give her a spirit good and mild,
  A soul to love the truth.

THE MOUSE TRAP.

Do not put your nose in that trap, said an old mouse to her young one; it will snap and bite you. But when the old mouse had gone out of sight, the young mouse thought he could get a small piece of the cheese, and there would be no harm. The smell of the cheese was so good, he crept up with a sly look, and put his nose into the hole. But scarce did his teeth touch the bait, when snap went the trap, and caught him by the neck. Just at that time, the old mouse came, but it was now too late. The poor thing gave one kick, and was dead. Now, my child, when some good man of more age than you, and much more wise, tells you not to do a thing, you must mind what he says, lest like the mouse, you get caught in some snare, and meet with harm.

THINGS BY THEIR RIGHT NAMES.

Charles. Papa, you grow very lazy. Last winter you used to tell us stories, and now you never tell us any; and we are all got round the fire quite ready to hear you. Pray, dear papa, let us have a very pretty one?

Father. With all my heart—what shall it be?

Ch. A bloody murder, papa!

Fa. A bloody murder!—Well then—once upon a time, some men dressed all alike . . . .

Ch. With black crapes over their faces?

Fa. No—they had steel caps on: having crossed a dark heath, wound cautiously along the skirts of a deep forest . . . .

Ch. They were ill-looking fellows, I dare say.

Fa. I cannot say so; on the contrary, they were tall, personable men as most one shall see:—leaving on their right hand an old ruined tower on the hill . . . .

Ch. At midnight, just as the clock struck twelve; was it not, papa?

Fa. No, really; it was on a fine balmy summer's morning—and moved forwards one behind another . . . .

Ch. As still as death, creeping along under the hedges.

Fa. On the contrary—they marched remarkably upright; and so far from endeavoring to be hushed and still, they made a loud noise as they came along, with several sorts of instruments.

Ch. But, papa, they would be found out immediately.

Fa. They did not seem to wish to conceal themselves: on the contrary, they gloried in what they were about. They moved forwards, I say, to a large plain, where stood a neat pretty village, which they set on fire . . . .

Ch. Set a village on fire? Wicked wretches!

Fa. And while it was burning, they murdered—twenty thousand men.

Ch. O fie! papa! You don't intend I should believe this? I thought all along you were making up a tale, as you often do; but you shall not catch me this time. What! they lay still, I suppose, and let these fellows cut their throats!

Fa. No, truly—they resisted as long as they could.

Ch. How should these men kill twenty thousand people, pray?

Fa. Why not? the murderers were thirty thousand.

Ch. O, now I have found you out! You mean a battle.

Fa. Indeed I do. I do not know of any murders half so bloody.

GEOGRAPHY AND ASTRONOMY.

Most of our young readers have, no doubt, began to study Geography, and some of them may be studying Astronomy. Geography teaches the form and character of the earth, including the land and the water; Astronomy teaches the number, size and motions of the heavenly bodies, the relations they sustain to each other and the influence they have upon each other. The best way to study Geography is on a globe represented in the above picture. The earth is round, and is composed of land and water. The land forms continents and islands and is inhabited by various nations of men.

Astronomy is a very interesting study. The sun which we see every day, is the center of what is called the Solar system. It never moves, but the planets of which this world on which we live is one, revolve around the sun. The earth has two motions, one by which it turns round every day, represented by the turning of the picture ball or globe. This makes night and day by rolling us into the shade of the earth and then into the sunshine. When that part of the earth where we are is turned towards the sun, so that we can see it, it is day, and when it is turned from the sun so that the earth is between us and the sun, it is night. The earth has another motion, by which it passes round the sun once a year, and this makes summer and winter, but we cannot explain this now.

The moon belongs to this earth, or by some influence is attached to it, so that it passes round the earth in about twenty-eight days, as the earth passes round the sun once a year. That makes new moon, full moon, &c. When the moon is in that place so that the side on which the sun shines is next to us, it is full moon, and then it grows smaller as the side next to us gets into the shade by its motion. Sometimes the earth gets between the sun and the moon, so that the sun cannot shine on the moon, and then it is eclipsed. Sometimes the moon gets between us and the sun, so that the sun cannot shine on us, and then the sun is eclipsed. There will be an eclipse of the sun on the 25th day of April. It will commence at eleven o'clock in the morning, and the sun will be a little more than half covered. If it should be clear, it will be a great curiosity for the children. They must smoke a piece of glass to look through, so as not to harm their eyes.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION DELUSIVE—NO. 9.

No fact is more apparent, nor is there one connected with the subject that has been more unequivocally acknowledged, than that the Sunday laws fail to effect their professed object. Twenty thousand persons have been known to cross a single ferry between New York and Brooklyn on a single Sunday. "We have not the madness to think of coercing our State or Nation to keep the Sabbath. We know that our citizens can break the Sabbath if they will. A standing army could not prevent it." So says the Address of the Ohio Sabbath Convention. Yet, notwithstanding these admissions, as soon as a pious and peaceable class of citizens ask the Legislatures of our States to release them from all penal liabilities for pursuing their secular employments on the first day of the week, a great alarm is professed, as though the foundations of society were about to be upturned. "It will open the flood-gates of immorality," says one. "Its tendency, we have fearful reason to believe, would be to inflict most serious injury upon the morals of this community," says another. "Its effect would be to interrupt, most seriously, the religious exercises of that portion of our community among whom this people might reside," say the Chambersburg remonstrants. Just so far as there is any sincerity in these professions, we pity the ignorance that they betray; and where that does not exist, we contemn the hypocrisy which prompted such pretences.

We know it is possible—aye, very common, for men of talent and learning to palm upon themselves and others a gross and powerful delusion, while at the same time there are opposite facts in abundance, and lying on every hand of them, calculated to dispel that delusion. If it were not so, how could a million of people have been induced to visit the holy tunic at Treves, in the year of our Lord 1845? Perhaps every age has had its popular delusions. Be that as it may, we look upon the firey zeal of certain advocates of Sunday legislation as of the same class with Matthew Hopkins the witch-killer, and Peter the hermit, who urged all Western Europe to engage in a crusade against the infidels in the holy land. Each had their day, and each out-lived the popular commotion which he had created. There is reason to expect this for the advocates of the Sunday laws.

For a long time, all the most distinguished advocates of the Sunday Sabbath zealously taught that Sunday desecration certainly exposed the actors to the judgments of God in this world as also in that to come. And in corroboration of their doctrine, every accident which happened on the first day of the week was carefully chronicled, and on certain occasions a whole chapter of Sunday calamities was read off—all proofs that Sunday is a holy day, and that Jehovah visits the violators thereof with summary judgments. And we are told, that it is still the practice in places where it is supposed there is no mentor to guide the people aright. But in New York the Sabbath Recorder has published so many chapters of accidents happening on the Sabbath of Jehovah, the seventh day of the week, that it is evident that if these things be proof, then the Lord has two Sabbaths in the week, and then our first-day sabbatarians are in as much danger of judgments as the seventh-day sabbatarians! This will never do; and so the New York Evangelist has fairly given up this device, and learned to attribute things to their proper cause, as is proved by the following passage: "How is it that the elements combine, as they seem to do, against Sabbath-breaking? That those who amuse themselves on the water on the Sabbath are more apt to be drowned than other people, has long been notorious. As this is not a world of retribution, we cannot well attribute it to any miraculous interference with the laws of nature for the punishment of the guilty. The cause must be sought in the Sabbath-breaking state of mind." Well, to have learned the truth and acknowledged it, is better late than never. But why so late? There have always been obvious facts that were calculated to teach this wholesome doctrine—facts too, that were plainly against the doctrine of special judgments being inflicted for secularizing or sporting on Sundays. Why is it, as it seems to be universally acknowedged, that many more accidents happen to men while engaged in sport on all days of the week, than while they are following their daily occupations with sobriety? "The cause is to be sought in the sporting state of mind." Why is it that the fourth of July furnishes materials for the most calamitous chapter of accidents of any day in the year? "The cause is to be sought in the reckless state of mind," induced by the manner of celebrating our national independence. The cause is the same with accidents happening on Sundays. A greater number of persons are let loose on that day than on other days from the restraints attending their every-day occupations; and they plunge headlong into danger. So far, then, as the argument for Sunday laws is based upon the doctrine of divine judgments overtaking the Sunday trespasser, it is delusive.

But there are other facts which palpably contradict the theory of divine judgments being inflicted for Sunday-breaking. To say nothing of the Jews, we present ourselves, who no more reverence that day than the other five working days; yet we have occasion to magnify the divine goodness which visits us and our families with mercies, and not with judgments, on that day.

Look again at the Quakers, who, with the exception of a single assembly for worship on that day, secularize it as commonly in their families as do the Seventh-day Baptists, and have done so for near two hundred years. It is well known, that they regard neither the Sabbath nor Sunday as holy time. Yet we venture to say, that there is not a more thrifty class of citizens in the United States than are they; nor is there a class among whom fewer accidents occur on all days of the week and of the year. "The cause is to be sought" in their industrious habits and sobriety of mind.

We by no means reject the doctrine of a divine Providence, nor deny that the judgments of God sometimes overtake daring transgressors in this world; but we do deny, that there is any scriptural authority for teaching that accidents which happen on the first day of the week are judgments sent to punish the violation of that humanly-sacred day; and we affirm, that facts in great numbers demonstrate the contrary. If the advocates of Sunday have any self-respect left, they had better abandon that position. Whoever teaches it, palms a great delusion upon the simple-minded among the people. It may not be quite so gross, but it is of the same class with the arguments of the papists, who pretend the same things for their church festivals. According to the historian Binius, one Eustachius, Abbot of Flay, came into England A. D. 1201, with an epistle from heaven commanding the observance of Sunday and other holy days, in which are the following striking passages: "This I say unto you, ye shall die the death, because of the dominical holy day, and other festivals of my saints, which ye have not kept. I will send unto you beasts having the heads of lions, the hair of women, and the tails of camels, and they shall be so hunger-starved that they shall devour your flesh." The credulous historian goes on to tell us of numerous calamities that befel those who disregarded the heavenly epistle. "A man baked bread, and blood came out. Another grinding corn, blood came in a great stream instead of meal, while the wheel of the mill stood still against a vehement impulse of water. Heated ovens refused to bake bread, if heated after the commencement of sacred time." Ridiculous as these things appear, they are of the same class with those accounts published in the present day of God's judgments upon the individuals, companies, and families, that do not honor the so-called Christian Sabbath.—Papal advocates for Sunday observance have just as good authority for these things as modern protestant orthodox divines. Times and circumstances have changed, but truth has not. We repeat it, the legislation that is urged by these considerations is delusive. It has all the elements of superstition in its practice and pretence. What is superstition? Belief without evidence or reason, devotion without faith, religion without truth. That faith which is of the operation of God, is a belief grounded upon divine evidence. That obedience which springs from a scriptural faith, consists in an implicit deference to revealed truth. That religion which is derived alone from tradition, and has no sanction in the revealed Word of God, except by far-fetched and illogical inferences, may most certainly be termed superstitious. And yet this is one strong ground on which Sunday legislation is urged by the divines of the present day.

But we are told that the cause of good morals requires the enforcement of Sunday laws. Is it then the operation of the Sunday laws which has made the Seventh-day Baptists, according to the language of Mr. Bilderback in the New Jersey Legislature, "as conscientious, sedate, and orderly a people, as can be found upon the face of the earth." Where, on the face of the earth, will any one find a more sedate, orderly, and virtuous people, than the Quakers? Were they made so by the Sunday laws? Nay, verily, both these classes of citizens disregard the Sunday laws altogether, so far as their private practice is concerned. Our own citizens and others who have traveled in the continental countries of Europe and in the United States, have sometimes instituted comparisons between the morality of these countries, greatly to the honor of the United States; and one item in which it appears to them is, in the superior attention which is paid to the Christian Sabbath. As a matter of morality, we exult in it as much as any class of our fellow citizens. But it is a great mistake to attribute it to the operation of the Sunday laws. The numbers of our citizens attending public worship at all times when our churches and chapels are open, as much exceed those of continental Europe as the numbers observing the Christian Sabbath; and yet we have no State laws to compel this, while in some instances they have. It is evident, then, that the true cause must be sought somewhere else, rather than in the State laws. We attribute it to the superior intelligence and piety of the American ministry; the more thoroughly religious character of the majority of our citizens, their general intelligence, and our healthier public customs. These causes can in no respect depend upon the Sunday laws, becuse they exist in those classes of citizens who upon principle reject the Sunday laws altogether; and who would continue to exert their benign influence wherever they might be, were the Sunday laws wholly repealed. Sunday laws were never enforced with more rigor than during the reign of Charles II. of England; and there never was a more profligate court, nor greater laxity of manners among the people.

The whole history of the world proves, that morality cannot be maintained by mere human laws; it has a higher origin than the fear of man. Its source is in the state of the affections, and these must be influenced by motives drawn from the relation of man to his Creator. Human laws cannot take cognizance of the mere workings of the mind. It is of public acts alone that they can take cognizance, either to punish or reward. But public acts must be determined by defined limits and artificial boundaries. It is therefore utterly impossible to enforce a moral duty which requires the right exercise of the affections; or, to punish the violation of such laws, in a thousand studied evasions. Of course, so far as Sunday rests upon moral considerations, it cannot be enforced by human laws. In strict despotisms, like that of Russia or Prussia, there may be a stagnation of the current of human society, which to the passer-by has an apparently quiet surface, and that may often be taken for good order, or even morality; but look below its surface, and it will be easy to see that in proportion as the current of the passions has been dammed up by arbitrary restrictions, it has been accumulating a bed of mire, which, like some of our alluvial bottoms, produces a deadly miasma, which is realized only by those who reside within the reach of its noxious effluvia; stir it, and it spreads its baleful influence over every adjoining region. Such is society every where under the restrictions of human rule. If our citizens are disposed to vice and immorality, the only effectual remedy is to instruct them in the great principles of morality, their obligations to their Creator, and an intelligent acquaintance with the institutes of his will. Bring the conscience under the influence of truth, and it will need no human coercion to walk in all the paths of morality. To compel an unwilling conformity to an external religious observance, while the people are intent upon every selfish gratification in private parties, private pursuits, and every other way in which they can pursue their own desires and avoid public or penal censures, and then to exult in the general observance of that religious custom, is both delusive and hypocritical. It is in this light that we look upon the working of the Sunday laws. We can see no way for their advocates to escape from the imputation of delusion or hypocrisy. The beautiful uniformity, so much talked of by the Sunday legislators and their advising divines, is the beau ideal of the Catholic Papal Church—that for which she has shed rivers of blood, and filled the earth with groans and tears. That very uniformity has made her influence, where she has obtained the predominence, more deadly to the morals of the people, than the malaria of the Italian marshes is to the health of the people. Such it would be, we have fearful reason to believe, could it be obtained by a Protestant sect in America. Instead of promoting morality, human attempts to compel uniformity are usually productive of formality and insincerity, and therefore delusive.

To pretend that attempts to secure this are in honor of the divine law, or to claim its sanction for so doing, is still more delusive. The Jewish law never estimated Sabbath-breaking by dollars and cents, as our Sunday laws do. The divine laws never treated Sabbath-breaking as a mere offence against society. The only penalty they inflicted for its violation was death. It was a violation of the divinely-instituted national covenant, which, unatoned for, exposed the whole nation to the dreaded judgments of Jehovah. This was the principle on which blasphemers of the name of the Lord were put to death; and indeed in all cases where the transgressors incured the death penalty. That this principle was regarded as a part of the Jewish polity, is manifest from what Caiphas said, (John 11: 49, 50,) "Ye know nothing, nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not." For a nation to change a divinely-instituted penalty from that of death to a fine of four dollars, is certainly lowering the moral considerations by which Jehovah has surrounded it to a degree which must change the whole character of the law, and lead people to lose sight of the great moral reasons upon which it was originally enforced. The Sunday laws are therefore not only unauthorized by scriptural example, but, upon their assumed premises, they are delusive, by taking away from the moral considerations on which Sabbath-keeping was enforced by the Jewish laws.

As to the pretence of interrupting the worship of others, facts every day contradict it. There is not a day of the week, nor a day in the year, but what hundreds of our fellow citizens assemble in their respective churches and chapels, and worship their Creator, with no more annoyance than on Sundays.

Our leading points on this part of the subject are these: Sunday Legislation fails to accomplish its professed object—advocates theory against fact—substitutes superstition for true religion—[illegible] morality dependent upon human laws—takes external uniformity for true religion—and lowers a divine institution by a human substitution. Is not this delusive?

THE OLD TESTAMENT NOT SET ASIDE BY CHRIST.

It is important in this discussion to ascertain the opinion of the Master, of him who "is the end of the law," the antitype of its types, the substance of its shadows—And it is gratifying that we have that opinion fully and clearly expressed.

In the sermon on the mount, in which he explodes the fool's interpretations of the Jewish doctors and rabbis he fully sanctions the Old Testament as a divine code of laws and morals. And yet, to that discourse we are directed for the proof that the "law and the prophets" are to be reckoned among the musty records of a dark age, and on a par with the writings of heathen moralists. Let the reader now turn to Matt. 5. 17th 18th and 19th. 1. Christ puts his hearers on their guard against supposing he intended, in what he was going further to say, to "destroy the law or the prophets." "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill." By the law and prophets, he intended to ground divisions of the Old Testament.

Thus it is said, "they have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them." Luke 16. 29. "The law and the prophets prophesied until John." Matt. 11. 13. "The law and the prophets were until John." Luke 16. 16. We are to understand by the "law and the prophets" which he "came not to destroy, but fulfill," the moral precepts of the Old Testament, whether found in that part embraced in phrase law or the writings of the prophets. That he did not refer to ceremonial law, is clear, from the fact that he makes no reference to the ceremonial law, in his quotations, but to the moral law. 2. The word rendered "destroy," is by Campbell rendered "abrogate," and "to fulfill,"—to "ratify." "Think not that I am come to abrogate the law, or the prophets, I am not come to abrogate but, to ratify." Hence Paul says, "do we make void the law." yea we establish (ratify) the law." Romans 3. 31.

Now did he do in this very sermon, what he solemnly declares he had not come to do? Did he abrogate what he came to confirm, to establish?

Watson takes another view. He understands the word "fulfill," in the sense of completing, perfecting, and this Christ did by showing its spiritual character. 3. He again declares, "till heaven and earth pass, not one jot or title," "shall pass from the law" or cease to be obligatory. "Jot and title," mean the smallest Hebrew letter, or a point, or dot, used to distinguish one Hebrew letter from another.

4. He adds, "whosoever therefore shall break one of the least of these commandments and teach men so, shall be called least, in the kingdom of heaven" Seeing it is no object of my mission to make null or void the law,—that not the smallest iota of it has, or shall cease to be binding, while heaven and earth endure, "therefore, he that shall deem himself at liberty to break any—even "the least of its commandments," and teach others to do so, he "shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven."

Let those who think they atone for their abuse of the Old Testament by praising the New, carefully study these solemn words of Christ.

PAUL'S OPINION.—In the 24th chapter and 15th verse of Acts, Paul declares before Felix, that he believes all things written in the law and the prophets. He had none of the modern notions, that some of it is to be attributed to the selfishness—and ignorance of the writers, who wickedly, or by a mistake, attributed their own opinions to God, to give them weight with the people, and hence their writings are a mixture of truth and falsehood. He believed "all things written in the law and the prophets."

2d Timothy 3. 15. 14, Paul declares that Timothy from a child had known the "holy scriptures, which were able to make him wise unto salvation."

Here he calls them the "Holy Scriptures," a frequent title given them in the New Testament.

And in the 17th, verse asserts that they are given by inspiration of God's spirit as Peter declares, they came not by the will of man, but holy men of GOD spake, as moved by the holy ghost!" 2nd. "They are profitable for doctrine," but how can that be, if they teach false doctrine—if they are never to be appealed to in proof of doctrines. 3d. "For instruction in righteousness." Impossible, unless they teach righteousness—or if they teach unrighteousness—if they sanction crime.

4. As a crowning excellency, they "thoroughly furnish the man of God, unto good works, rendering him perfect in his moral character.—could Paul have said more in so few words?

What higher encomium could he have pronounced upon that much abused volume, the Old Testament? It is painful to see with what lightness, and contempt, men speak of these inspired pages of truth. Make what reference you please, you are met with this sufficient reply "that is only found in the Old Testament!"

BURIAL PLACES OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS.

These catacombs, therefore, furnish a valuable chapter for ecclesiastical history, for we derive from them most of the information we have with regard to Christian symbolism. The early martyrs, by whom they were for a long time peopled, "being dead still speak." They tell their own simple faith and devotion by the changeless emblems which are as expressive as words. And as we trace these pictured inscriptions down through successive generations, they unfold to us the gradual change which crept over the feelings of the church. It seems to present a strange contrast. The respect of its members for her who was "blessed among women," gradually deepened into adoration, while a reverence for some of the most sublime mysteries of our faith, was proportionally fading from their minds. Themes which at first they regarded with so sacred an awe, that they scarcely dared to comment on them in words, lost at last their divine idealism, and were coarsely shadowed forth by sensible objects. Thus it is, that in her bosom, and in places which she consecrates as most holy, papal Rome contains the evidence of that silent change, which, as centuries went by, was working in the minds of her members.

Our guide pointed out to us, as we passed along, some tombs which had never been opened, and whose inmates had been left to slumber on as seventeen centuries ago they were laid to their rest. There was one, the thin marble side of which had cracked, so that he could insert a small taper. He bid us look in, and there we saw the remains of the skeleton, lying as it was placed by its brethren in the faith, in those early days of persecution and trial. In these gloomy caverns, the followers of our Lord were then accustomed to meet, thus in secret to eat the bread of life, and with tears to drink the water of life. In one of these little chapels which tradition has thus consecrated, there were found still remaining, a simple earthen altar, and an antique cross set in the rock above it. It was with no ordinary feelings that we stood on this spot and looked on these evidences of early worship. They had remained here perhaps unchanged since the days of the apostles, and where we then were, men may have bowed in prayer who had themselves seen their Lord in the flesh. The remains were around us of those who had received the mightiest of all consecrations, that of suffering, and whose spirits were as noble as any who had their proud monuments on the Appian Way, and whose names are now as "familiar in our ears as household words." But no historian registered the deeds of the despised Nazarenes. They had no poet, and they died.—[Rev. Mr. Kip's "Christian Holydays in Rome."

THE VATICAN AT ROME.

The immense pile of building is beyond all imagination. I was told its extreme length through the apartments, and not duplicating a single room, was 79,000 feet, or nearly 14 English miles. It has 4,000 rooms, 200 flights of stairs. This immense pile contains most of the antiquities of Rome, as well as most of the celebrated statuary and paintings of the early as well as the modern artists. There you will see Raphael's immortal Transfiguration, as well as the great fresco of the Last Judgment, with an immense number of highly meritorious paintings. The sculpture is also great, the inimitable (so called) Apollo Belvidere, and the truly great Dying Gladiator, with 10,000 more, some very fine, and others common; all the Cæsars, and all the Roman Emperors, Presidents, and Senators, as well as all the orators and poets, and a host of gods of sea, land, and air. In fact, if a person was to visit the Vatican once or twice, he only sees the building. It will take him 30 days to get fully into the routine, so as to understand the road from room to room, without a valet. The whole is a world of the fine arts, on a much greater scale than any other city can boast of, in fact, than all the cities in Christendom together. The Library Apartment, when thrown open, gives a single view of 1,500 feet, and the gallery which you first enter where all the inscriptions in Latin are plastered in the walls on each side is immense. There you will see thousands of inscriptions, with the names of the persons who were merchants, or shopmen in early ages, giving a list of their articles, and the quality as well as price. Many of these were from Pompeii, and some from the ruins of Herculaneum, and very many of them from the baths of Caracalla, the palace and baths of the Cæsar, and from Adrian's palace, commonly called the villa; and also from the Pantheon and Temples of Minerva and Jupiter, and other gods and goddesses, making a number also incredible.

THE GOOD MAN'S FIRMNESS.—Two instances of Colonel Davenport's firmness deserve to be mentioned; the 19th of May, 1780, was a remarkably dark day; candles were lighted in many houses, the birds were silent and disappeared, and the fowls retired to roost; the legislature of Connecticut was then in session at Hartford; a very general opinion prevailed that the day of judgment was at hand; the house of representatives being unable to transact their business, adjourned; a proposal to adjourn the council was under consideration; when the opinion of Colonel Davenport was asked, he answered, "I am against the adjournment: The day of judgment is either approaching or it is not; if it is not, there is no cause for an adjournment; if it is, I choose to be found doing my duty. I wish, therefore, that candles may be brought." The other instance took place at Danbury, at the Court of Common Pleas, of which he was chief justice. This venerable man after he was struck with death heard a considerable part of a trial—gave the charge to the jury, and took notice of an article in the testimony which had escaped the attention of the counsel on both sides. He then retired from the bench, and was soon after found dead in his bed.

LAW AND GOSPEL.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

A distinction is sometimes made between constitutional and statute law.* By the Constitution we understand—a system of fundamental rules, principles, and ordinances, for the government of a state or nation. By Statutes we understand—those laws which from time to time emanate from legislative authority.

The Constitution determines the nature and character of the government as a whole;—that is, whether it is a Republic, an Absolute Monarchy, a Limited Monarchy, an Aristocracy, or any thing else.

The Constitution may be a written document, or scheme of government formally planned and contrived in some certain era of a nation's history, and set up in pursuance of such regular plan and design. Or, it may be that system of public jurisprudence which is made up of acts of parliament, decisions of courts of law, and of immemorial usages. The Constitution of the United States is of the former kind. That of England is of the latter, having grown out of occasion and emergency.

In this country the Constitution is the great charter, according to whose restrictions all legislative enactments are made. A statute which is opposed to the Constitution has no binding force. The legislature is obliged to frame all its laws in perfect accordance with the Constitution.

In the divine government we recognize Constitution and Statutes. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself"—seems to be the constitutional or fundamental principle, upon which is based every department of the moral government of God. Whether his government is over men in this world, or over the spirits of the just made perfect, or over angels, or any other order of intelligent creatures—love to their Creator and to their fellow creatures is the great principle which lies at the bottom of every law imposed upon them. Any statute which does violence to this principle—if such a thing could be supposed—would be of no binding force whatever. For how perfectly monstrous and subversive of all government would be a statute which could be resolved into this—thou shalt hate God and thy fellow! It is in view of this great constitutional or fundamental principle, that our Saviour says, "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." Matt. 22: 40.

But while love is the grand and all-pervading principle that runs through the whole of God's government, each department of his universal kingdom is bound by a system of laws adapted and modified to the peculiar condition of the intelligent beings inhabiting it. That system which is adapted to men in the flesh, is not suited to their condition in the resurrection state, (Matt. 22: 30,) nor to angels; and vice versa.

As each one of the United States has its own particular Constitution besides that of the general government, so we naturally look for a particular Constitution in each department of God's universal kingdom. That system of laws which is given to men in this world would very naturally be based upon some fundamental principles adapted to meet the case;—principles not contrary to, but in perfect harmony with the great fundamental principle of love, which is the Constitution of God's universal government; just as the Constitution of each of the States of the Union is not contrary to, but in perfect harmony with that of the general government.

What, then, is the Constitution which lies at the foundation of that government which God has established over mankind? It is the Decalogue. The view which we have given concerning its nature in our former numbers, sufficiently establishes this point. Yet because it lies at the foundation of that system which was given to the Jews in particular—because it was the basis of the covenant which God made with that people—because it was never formally promulged until God was just ready to impose upon that nation the Levitical service—and because it was incorporated with that service so that a breach of its precepts was punished with rigors peculiar to that economy—therefore it is contended that it can be the Constitution of that peculiar government only under which the Jews were placed, and not of that moral government to which all mankind are held in obligation. This—so far as we can understand it—is the strength of the objection so often urged against reasoning from the Decalogue in favor of any duty which it enjoins. The objection is most apt to be urged against reasoning from the fourth commandment in favor of the Sabbath.

Plausible as this objection is, we maintain that it establishes the very point for which we are contending, viz. that the Decalogue is par excellence the Moral Law. For upon what other basis could God enter into covenant with any people? He enjoined upon the Jews a system of a peculiar nature. Their obedience to that system was either right or wrong. If it was right, then their disobedience to it was wrong—it was a sin. But by what rule was such disobedience determined to be a sin? There must of necessity be some rule—some source of appeal other than the mere system itself which was enjoined. And what could it be except the Moral Law? When a citizen of the United States violates any particular statute, what is the ultimate rule by which it is determined whether his violation is justifiable? Every one knows that it is the Constitution. If he can make it appear that the statute which he violated is unconstitutional, then his trangression receives justification, and he escapes punishment. Just so in regard to the disobedience of the Jews to the peculiar system enjoined upon them. Their disobedience was either constitutional or unconstitutional. If constitutional, it was justifiable; if unconstitutional, it was unjustifiable. If it was justifiable, then it was in perfect accordance with the Moral Law. If it was unjustifiable—if it was a sin, it was so because it was in violation of the Moral Law. Wherefore the Constitution which lay at the bottom of the Mosaic system was the Moral Law.

*

*The one is not strictly the opposite of the other; for the Constitution of a State may be in part the result of legislative enactment. It would be more in accordance with the precision of treatises of law to say that there is a distinction between common law and statute law. Our language, however, is sufficiently accurate for the illustration of the argument.

PETITION OF ANDREW FAHNESTOCK.

The following Petition was presented to the Legislature of Pennsylvania while the subject of granting relief to our Sabbath-keeping brethren in that State from penalties for working on Sunday was under consideration. We own ourselves unable to conceive of any good reason upon which legislators can justify the neglect of a petition from such a man, backed up by such arguments. Next week we will endeavor to find room for an article which we have received, entitled, "A plain statement of the causes which induced the Seventh-day Baptists of Franklin County to petition the Legislature for relief." Meanwhile here is Mr. Fahnestock's Petition:—

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania:

The remonstrances which have been presented from this County, against the granting of the prayer of our petitions, which are now before your Honorable Bodies, praying for relief and protection for our Society, induce me to submit the following remarks to your consideration:—

Many objections are raised to the Legislature granting us the relief for which we ask, and exempting us from the penalties of the Act of 1794. In my opinion, under the Constitution of the United States and the State of Pennsylvania, we have a right to claim protection at the hands of the Legislature. Man is responsible to God alone for his religious opinions, and no human authority has a right to interfere with them. This is one of the great foundations upon which our glorious fabric of Government rests.

It is alledged by some, that the observance of a particular day as the Sabbath, is not a matter of conscience; and that it is immaterial what day is observed, so that it be one in seven. Be assured that, with our Society, it is a matter of conscience. We believe the seventh day of the week to be the true Sabbath. Let any one consider the inconvenience to which we must necessarily be subjected, in our worldly affairs, by keeping this day—whilst with our neighbors, generally, it is the most active business day in the week—and he will at once perceive, that nothing but a conscientious conviction of duty could induce us to make the sacrifice.

Again, we are often reminded, that the Scriptures require Christians to be subject to the laws of the land; and that those laws enforce the observance of the first day of the week. This is admitted; but we alledge that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land; that it guarantees the rights of conscience; and all we ask is, that the Legislature may afford us its protection. We do not ask for all we would have a right to demand. Let our Petition, and the Bill reported in the House of Representatives be examined, and it will be seen that we ask for but a small allowance—something similar to that of the woman of Canaan, (Matt. 15,)—merely the crumbs which fall from our Master's table—whilst all other denominations of our Christian brethren are receiving full loaves. What evil have we done, that we should be oppressed, in this land of civil and religious liberty, by the laws of our State? Did not our ancestors at Ephrata, in Lancaster County, open their doors to the sick and wounded soldiers of the Revolution—extending to them their aid and assistance, and all the comforts the establishment would afford—and that, too, without recompense or reward? Have not our meetings been conducted orderly—so far as our own members are concerned—and our hospitality extended to all who saw fit to attend them? But, alas! how have we been repaid? We are now harassed with prosecutions and fines if we attempt to occupy the time which God has given us to labor, and treated as transgressors. Our condition is somewhat similar to that of the man who, in traveling from Jerusalem to Jericho, fell among thieves. We, therefore, now call upon the Good Samaritans of the Legislature for protection. Our forefathers, like yours, fled from European oppression, to seek a City of Refuge in these then western wilds, that they might, unmolested, enjoy the liberty of conscience. This precious privilege we were permitted to enjoy until last summer. Shall it be continued to us? We would consider it more tolerable to be deprived of the privilege of voting for our State and County officers, and to be deprived of holding office, than to be deprived of the rights of conscience.

Now, in conclusion, I most solemnly declare, that during twenty-two years that I have presided over the Seventh-day Baptist Congregation, I have searched the Scriptures with diligence to ascertain what God requires of me in this sacred office concerning the Sabbath day, and I have always found it to be my duty to teach that the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord, and to observe it as such. I can find no evidence in the holy Scriptures that the observance of any other day will be acceptable before God.

As a duty, which I believe I owe to my congregation, I present this, my humble petition, to your consideration, hoping that you will give it an impartial perusal.

May the Sovereign of the Universe protect our religious liberty, and grant that our land may remain a City of Refuge for all religious denominations.

ANDREW FAHNESTOCK,
Pastor of the Seventh-day Baptist Society.

SNOWHILL, 15th February, 1846.

D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE GREAT REFORMATION.—The first three volumes of this work were published by the author in the French language only, and afterwards translated by other hands into the English language. Yet, strange as it may seem, only about 4,000 copies of the work have been sold in France, while nearly 200,000 copies have been sold in England and America. This fact has induced the author to publish the fourth volume first in the English language, and also to prepare for the press an English version of the three former volumes. Although he claims to be familiar with our language, he has deemed it advisable to procure the aid of a native Englishman, and Dr. Henry White visits Geneva for the purpose of assisting him.

PROGRESS OF THE BILL OF EQUAL RIGHTS.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Our brethren have not been able to attend at Trenton to confer with the members of the Legislature on the subject of Equal Rights since the 28th of January, at which time a number of them were there, and had an interview with several of the members of the House. But frequent communications have been forwarded to them from time to time expressive of our wishes. The following is a copy of a letter recently forwarded to S. W. PHILLIPS, Esq., Chairman of the Committee, together with his answer:—

The Letter to Mr. Phillips.

DEAR SIR,—I have been looking with much anxiety on the movements of the House in regard to the bill of Equal Rights, but have not been able to learn that there has been any action upon it since you reported it to the House the second time. It is the expectation and wish of the friends of the bill, that it should have the decision of the House, either for or against. As it now stands, it precludes any farther effort on the part of its friends to obtain their rights in any other form. If the bill must be amended before it will receive the sanction of the Legislature, let it be in such a manner as not to affect or alter its principle. We can not consent to ask for any thing less than equal rights, nor are we willing to accept of any thing short of it. This was fully explained to your Honorable Committee when the interview was had by a number of the petitioners from Essex, Middlesex, and Cumberland, when a full and free discussion of the object of the bill was had, and we supposed it was perfectly understood. Had the bill been lost upon its second or third reading, in time for farther movement, we should then have suggested the amendment to the old law which would have met our case. As it now stands, we are prevented from any farther effort, for this bill is yet on the files of the House waiting the pleasure thereof. We are extremely anxious to have it tested; and if you will grant us the favor to call it up and have its fate decided in some way or other, you will confer a great favor on the petitioners.

Very respectfully yours,
D. DUNN.

New Market, N. J., March 12th, 1846.

Mr. Phillips' Reply.

FRIEND DUNN,—The understanding with myself and Mr. Cannon, and his Seventh-day Baptist friend was, and also mine with Judge Titsworth, when he was here last, that an effort should be made to have a part of a section of the old law stricken out, which effort was made, and considerable said. Upon the ayes and noes being taken, we had nine in favor of striking out, and the rest against it; and, to my surprise, Mr. Cannon and all of our Middlesex members (except myself) voted against it. I hope you will excuse me for allowing your bill to lie over so long, supposing that your views could be answered by the amendment proposed to the old law. I will now, upon the first opportunity, call up the original bill. I received a letter, and a substitute bill, from a distinguished gentleman from Burlington. I offered it to the Committee. They did not like it as well as the original one, and requested me to report the old bill the second time without amendment.

In great haste, your much obliged,
SIMEON W. PHILLIPS.

CORRECTION—RELIGION AT THE WEST.

We cheerfully make room for the following communication. The article to which it refers was handed us by the Corresponding Secretary of one of our benevolent societies, who, we are quite sure, had no intention of grieving any body, or lending his influence to create a false impression.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In the 28th No. of the current volume of the Recorder, fourth column of the first page, we find an extract from a letter, said to have been written "to one of our societies," drawing a doleful picture of the state of religion in the western "garden" to which it refers. Inasmuch as certain corroborating circumstances, and especially the notice of a remittance in the preceding number, render it more than probable that a great portion of your readers will be led to the conclusion that this is the place referred to, and consequently imbibe a very unfavorable as well as erroneous opinion of the state of the church here; in view of these things, and of the fact that a disaffected brother here states that he wrote the letter in question; the church at its last meeting of business, passed a resolution condemnatory of said extract, as containing a great deal more error than truth, and calculated to make a wrong impression on the minds of your readers. The church also appointed the undersigned a committee to make the foregoing expression public through the medium of your paper, with your consent, which we trust you will grant. The committee would readily grant, however, that there is not so much of the life and power of religion generally as is disirable, but we trust that (as it is in other places,) there are a goodly number who are striving to press their way onward and upward, and fill their places faithfully at the family altar and prayer meeting, at the covenant meeting and the communion table, and we may add, that our Sabbath meetings are as fully attended generally, as in any other place with which we are acquainted. We did not design a long communication, and will only add, in conclusion, that we think a little reflection on your part would have induced you to exclude from your columns statements which have such a direct tendency to grieve so many of your subscribers, readers, and brethren.

Yours in the Gospel,
STILLMAN COON,
JULIUS M. TOOD,
HENRY B. CRANDALL.

THE SABBATH QUESTION.

Although we have lost a golden opportunity in New-Jersey by our supineness, still the rights of the Seventh-day Baptists are attracting much attention abroad. The subject is before the Legislature of Pennsylvania; favorable reports have been made by the committees, in the Senate and the House of Representatives; and many powerful pens are espousing the cause in the public prints. The editor of the "American Press," a Native American paper, published at Lancaster, in commenting on the Bill "granting Equal Privileges," before the Legislature of this State, (New-Jersey,) makes the following just remarks:—

"This bill bears the right title, and we hope it may not only become a law in New-Jersey, but that a similar law may be passed in every State of the Union, where any Seventh-day Baptists are found, however few their number may be. For it is perfect nonsense, to talk about 'Equal Rights,' so long as any class of people, however small their number may be, are compelled by law to keep any Sabbath contrary to the manner of their belief."

And in the same paper a correspondent supplies some very pertinent observations from a work by Judge Herttell, entitled the "People's Rights Reclaimed," which I append for your readers.

In discussing this point, remarks the correspondent, Judge Herttell proves beyond all doubt, that if God appointed no particular day as a Sabbath, then he has not delegated that power to any body else, and consequently, a law, compelling the observance of any particular day as a Sabbath, is not only contrary to the command of God, but a direct infringement of the liberty of conscience. The argument is truly masterly, and I commend it to general attention.

"If God by his alledged command instituted a Sabbath, and omitted to designate the particular day of the week to be observed as holy time, by whose authority, permit me again to ask, is the first day appointed for that purpose? To whom did he give the right, or delegate the power, to designate any particular day as the Sabbath of the Lord? Certainly not to civil government, all will allow, who are not prepared to embrace the political religious dogmas of the holy aliance of church and State. God did not command civil government to keep a Sabbath, nor authorize our Legislature to appoint a day. The alledged command, if given at all, was given to man, and not to political government. And if God, as is now alledged, did not name the particular day of the week to be kept holy as a Sabbath, reason and common sense would say, he left that matter to the choice and convenience of those to whom his commandment is addressed, and on whom alone it could be of any moral obligation, that is man. If then, God gave to man the right to choose the day, he gave to each man alike the equal right to choose for himself.

Here we take our stand, and shall maintain that God has given to each man the equal right to judge in this matter for himself, and to choose any day or any time, he in his conscience may think the best, to rest from labor, and offer prayer, praise and gratitude to the great first Universal and Invisible Cause of life, to whom, and to whom alone, man is accountable for his opinions in matters of religion. Yes, that it is the natural right of every man, to choose for himself, will be maintained, until, by some special word of God, not of man, it shall be made to appear, that he gave to some men, not only a right to choose for themselves, but also for their neighbors, and to coerce them to keep a Sabbath, chosen by another; and until it shall also be proven, on what particular man, or class of men, he has conferred these double rights, leaving others destitute of any. It may perhaps be said, that each individual having this right to choose for himself, all have it, and therefore can delegate another to choose for them, and that government can thence derive a right to choose for its constituents a day to be kept holy as a Sabbath. Were this admitted, my argument would lose nothing of its weight, because the power must in fact be delegated, or it could not be righteously exercised. Now if there is an article in our Constitution, by which the power is delegated to the Legislature to choose a Sabbath of the Lord, I will bow in submission. But that power is not, nor indeed can it be given, although each person has a right to choose and keep a Sabbath day, the particular day, in his opinion, not being essential, he may delegate, if he will, another to choose for him. But if he conscientiously thinks the particular day is essential, he can have no moral right to authorize another to choose for him a Sabbath day which he in his conscience deems the wrong one. He has no moral right himself to choose a day he conscientiously believes to be wrong, and he never could righteously delegate to others, or to government, a right to coerce him to keep a Sabbath day against his conscience. The right, or the liberty of conscience, therefore, is natural and unalienable. The right to choose a Sabbath day has not been delegated to our Legislature, and the right to coerce any against their conscience to keep a religious holy day, is not possessed by man, nor can it be righteously exercised by any human power. The law in question, therefore, by designating, or recognizing, the first day of the week as a religious Sabbath, and coercing a part of the community against their conscience and opinions to keep it as holy time, is an exercise of power without any right to do so, not being delegated to our Legislature by God or man, and hence is an act of usurpation, spiritual oppression and intolerance, and a violation of the natural and unalienable rights of man.

* * * * *

The incompatibility of the statute law, with the alledged command of God, will appear singularly striking when we undertake to read them together. Thus: God commands us to keep the seventh day (of the week) as the Sabbath,—our Legislature commands us to keep the first; God commands us to do no work on the seventh day,—our Legislature tells us we may do as much work as we please on that day; God commands us to do all our work on the other six days in the week, including the first—our Legislature forbids us at our peril to do any work on the first."

Keep the Ball rolling. Principles are eternal. Truth is mighty, and must prevail. W. M. F.

Bordentown, March 6th, 1846.

CIRCUMSTANCES ALTER CASES.—We have been forcibly reminded of this maxim by reading a Protestant criticism upon a Catholic argument. It seems that the Freeman's Journal, a Roman Catholic paper, has published an article headed "Missionary Success a Test of Truth," in which the editor declares that there are most manifest evidences of want of success in all Protestant missions, while the Catholic Faith invariably achieves its way with the most promising success; hence he concludes, that the Catholic is the only true church. But this doctrine is exceedingly unpalatable to all good Protestants, on which account one of our exchanges has attempted to refute the argument by which it is sustained, and to prove that according to scripture teachings we must always expect the strait and narrow way to be traveled by the few, not the many. This view corresponds very well with our notions of truth, but very ill with the practice of some of our opponents, who not unfrequently argue for the sacredness of Sunday from the number of those who observe it. If we mistake not, the very paper in question has more than once done this. Hence when we read in its columns such a bold advocacy of the truth in opposition to a Catholic error, we could not help thinking that in this instance, if in no others, "circumstances alter cases."

SUNDAY TRAVEL ON RAILWAYS IN SCOTLAND.—A letter from Mr. Begg, dated March 2d, says: "As I anticipated, the shareholders of the North British Railway have determined, notwithstanding the opposition, to run trains on Sunday. They held their meeting on the 17th of February, and a long debate ensued, the result of which was a majority of 1,433 shares for Sunday traveling. It is the line to Berwick, and is expected to be opened in May next; there will then be only the Newcastle and Berwick to finish, in order to connect Scotland and England; and there can hardly be a doubt that the opposition to Sunday trains on it will be even less strenuous, being an English line. It is expected to be opened in August next. The Edinburgh and Glasgow half-yearly meeting was also held last week, when Sir Andrew Agnew, as usual, moved that Sunday trains should be discontinued on the ground of their being a violation of the fourth commandment. On the suggestion of an English shareholder, the words of the fourth commandment were embodied in the motion.—The motion was negatived as usual—but the non sequiter of a motion for abstaining from work on the first day, with the authority of a divine command in favor of the seventh day, is engrossed in the Company's Minute Book"

SUNDAY.—Under this heading one of our exchange papers says, "To speak of Sunday, as the religious papers do, in a way to induce a belief that the fourth commandment of the Decalogue has any part or lot in the matter, is ridiculous and absurd. As for the sanction of the New Testament, our Sunday has no more claim to it than the Fourth of July, or the Eighth of January."

DR. EDWARDS AT THE WASHINGTON "SABBATH CONVENTION."—The Boston Investigator publishes a full report of the speech of Dr. Edwards at the recent Washington Convention, accompanied by nearly a column of animadversions, designed to show up some of the inconsistencies of the Doctor and his friends. The following is the concluding paragraph. It would be well for the Sabbath cause if those whom it concerns would consider it and be instructed:—

"Dr. Edwards and his brethren had better reform themselves first, by keeping the seventh day as Moses commanded it should be. When they do this, it will be time enough for the goats to consider the subject. We wish to have the leaders in this movement consistent men, or the people cannot follow them. Take the beam out of your own eye, Doctor, first, and you will save the time and animadversions of CORRECTOR."

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN THE REGENCY OF TUNIS.—The Malta Times of the 10th gives the following letter from its correspondent at Tunis, dated the 27th ult., announcing the interesting fact of the abolition of slavery in that regency:—

"Every step that the Bey of this Regency has taken within the last few years, in order to ameliorate the condition of the slaves, has very properly been hailed with applause by the humane. This very day he has issued the following circular to all the foreign Consuls, intimating the entire abolition of slavery:

"Praised be God!—From the servant of God (praised be he!) the Musheer Ahmed Basha Rey, Prince of the Tunisian Government, to our ally (N.) Consul-General of (N.) at Tunis. Hence the object of our writing to you is to inform you that the holding of a species of property, consisting of human beings to whom God (glorified be he!) has been gracious, is very unjust and quite revolting to our feelings. This affair gave us no peace of mind these many years during which we have endeavored, as is well known to you, gradually to put a stop to it, and now it is our pleasure to declare that we abolish in the whole of our dominion, that kind of property consisting of slaves.

"Henceforth, every one in our regency who is a slave we consider as free, and do no more acknowledge him as bona fide property. We have informed all our governors in our Tunisian kingdom of the same. Now we make known to you that you may be aware of the fact that every slave entering our dominions, whether by land or by sea, is that moment free.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The SENATE was occupied most of last week in considering the Oregon question. It seems to be the general opinion, that the passage of the resolutions giving notice to Great Britain of the cessation of the joint occupancy of Oregon will lead to a speedy settlement by compromise of the matter of difference.

The principal business before the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES related to the River and Harbor Appropriation Bill. Many items of the bill were agreed to, amounting to over $800,000. Although the final vote upon it is not yet taken, there is little doubt that it will receive the sanction of both the House and the Senate.

FOREIGN NEWS—TWENTY-TWO DAYS LATER.

By the arrival of the steamer Hibernia, twenty-two days later intelligence from England has been received.

Sir Robert Peel's Tariff bill passed its "crisis" in the House of Commons at 3 o'clock on the morning of the 29th ult., by the decisive vote of 337 to 240. This was on the motion to bring in a bill—a test question. The bill will doubtless pass the House by about one hundred majority The debate was continued through twelve nights, and was most earnest and able. There were 101 speeches—48 in favor of and 53 against the bill.

From India, advices have been received of a great battle, or rather a two days' struggle, between the Sikhs of the Punjaub, and the British army, which terminated in the defeat of the Sikhs, after a most tremendous slaughter. The British loss is some 3,300, including 50 European officers; the Sikhs lost some 30,000.

Rumors have been current recently unfavorable to the health of Sir Robert Peel. It was said that he had been twice cupped on the neck, to ease the pressure on the organs of the brain under which he labored, and that his health involved a speedy relinquishment of the cares and anxieties of office. These rumors caused much uneasiness, until at length an official contradiction appeared, which declared them to be unfounded—adding, that he never was in better health.

Not so the once herculean and still burly Daniel O'Connell. He has attained the allotted duration of human life; but, if all the accounts which appear be true, is not destined long to exceed it. Those who see him nightly in the House of Commons declare that he is sinking fast, and that the last twelve months have added thirty years' load to his existence. He enters and leaves the House on the arm of his son John; and, once or twice, when he essayed to speak, his voice was so feeble that he could scarcely be heard in the reporters' gallery. This appears to be the winding up of a career which will always stand out, despite its imperfections, as one of the most remarkable in the history of the British nation.

The affairs of Ireland are absorbed in the contemplation of the great free-trade drama which is now being acted in England. Mr. O'Connell is in London, and the management of the Repeal Association is confided to his lieutenant, Mr. Smith O'Brien.

France.

Mr. King, the American Minister, gave a grand ball Monday, Feb. 23, in celebration of Washington's birthday. Mrs. Ellis, his excellency's neice, did the honors of the saloons with that unaffected and witching grace for which American ladies are celebrated all the world over. Upward of 400 of the elite of Parisian society did themselves the honor of accepting the invitations of Mr. King, as well as all the most eminent American citizens now in Paris.

Washington Irving, the United States Minister at Madrid, has quitted Paris after several weeks' stay. Mr. Wheaton, United States Minister at Prussia, is now there.

Many parts of France have suffered severely from inundations. The waters, however, have now retired. The weather is most beautiful and mild—like spring or early summer.

The operations of the Bank of France last year amounted to 1,489,907,000 francs, the highest amount they have yet attained.

The Archbishop of Paris has published a long appeal to his people, in favor of penitence and prayer, winding up with his gracious permission to eat meat on certain days, and to consume eggs and milk on certain others.

Miscellaneous.

Whether or not we are to have war, great preparations are being made for it in England. The army is to be increased 10,000 men; the militia are to be in readiness for immediate training; the ordinance corps are to receive an accession of 1,500 men; the royal marines 2,500 men; and the land regiments of line 6,000. The increase in the navy will be about 1,000 men.

Accounts have been received of the loss of the emigrant ship Cataraque. The vessel left Liverpool in April last with 369 emigrants on board, and a crew of 46, for Van Dieman's Land. In August she reached Bass' Straits, and on the 4th of that month struck on a reef off King's Island. Nearly one-half of the passengers were drowned below. About 200 reached the deck and clung to the ship, but the severity of the weather caused her to go to pieces. Only nine of all on board survived. The ship was out of her reckoning.

Louis Philippe is said to be in favor of referring the Oregon dispute to the arbitration of three English and three American gentlemen—thus carrying ont the idea of Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts.

Baron Von Bulow, Minister to the King of Prussia, died at Berlin recently.

Twelve men were killed near Dover recently by an explosion of gunpowder in a cave where they had taken refuge, and others terribly wounded.

Father Mathew has published a letter, accompanied with specimens of bread and "stirabout," made from Indian Corn. Efforts are now making to introduce this excellent beverage, not only in Ireland, but into the three kingdoms generally, on the plan which marks its use in the United States.

From Persia we hear, with alarm, that the cholera is raging furiously.

THE AUBURN TRAGEDY.—We gave some account last week of the murder of several persons near Auburn, N. Y., by a negro man. The murderer has been arrested, and confesses his guilt. The following account of him is given by one who visited him in his cell:—

William Freeman, the murderer, was born in or near Auburn in 1823. His father is dead—his mother still resides in Auburn. He had only one brother, as we are informed, Dan Freeman, who was hung as our citizens will recollect in this place, for killing his supposed wife, or a white woman with whom he lived a few years ago!

William is a middling sized man, about 5 feet 5 1-4 inches high, and is a man of few prominent traits except his villainies.

When he was quite young, and before he went to prison, he became offended at a yonng woman where he was living, for some trivial offence, and drew a knife and rushed upon her with the intention of taking her life. She escaped however, and he was permitted to escape punishment by making a promise to behave himself in future.

He has lived in or near Auburn since his birth until 5 years ago last fall, at which time he was convicted of stealing a horse, and sentenced to 5 years' imprisonment in the State Prison, where he remained until last fall. Since his release from prison he has had no particular employment. Has boarded with a woman in Auburn who takes in washing, and paid his board by doing chores and errands for her.

At the time of his arrest, five years ago, Van Ness was an acting Justice for the town of Fleming and issued the warrant for his arrest, as is stated in the Tocsin. Munroe, the police constable who at that time arrested him, says Freeman then said, (as he took him,) with an oath, "Munroe, if I ever get out of prison, you and others who have been engaged in having me taken up shall pay for it." And there can be no doubt that his plans have been maturing for some time to carry his diabolical threats into execution, and that he has well succeeded, the victims of his murderous work too plainly show.

The Oregon is in length 330 feet by 35 feet width of beam, and of 1,000 tons measurement, having berth accommodations for about 600 passengers, without the necessity of cots or extra beds. The propelling power consists of an engine of 1,100 horse power, with a 72 inch cylinder and 11 feet stroke. Entering upon the main deck, the enclosed space from the Ladies' Cabin forward, forms a promenade 200 feet long. The massive engine is in the centre, though occupying but a small space, and four or five side parlors, fitted up with ten or twelve berths each, open out over the guards, as also a smoking room, denominated the "Exchange," and the wash-room and barber's shop, which is fitted up with marble slab, Croton water, wash-bowls, etc. Passing into the main cabin forward, a continuous line of berths extends from end to end of the boat, over 300 feet, and numbering some 200 berths. This includes the after cabin, which is connected by an ample passage way with the forward one; 500 yards of expensive carpeting cover the floors in these cabins, and each berth is fitted with Mackinaw blankets and Marseilles quilts, each article having the name of the steamer worked in it; a 30 pound mattrass, and also bolsters and pillows, with linen of the finest quality. The curtains are of satin de laine, of the richest tints, with embroidered inner curtains.

Of the cost of all this magnificent splendor, it is hard to make a fair estimate. If we say $30,000 for the furniture and fittings, it is by no means exceeding the mark, and though it appears to be a large sum, the reckoning of a few items will be a convincing evidence of its truth. For instance, the chairs in the ladies' cabin cost $20 each; the sofas $200 each; one pair of mechanical lamps, in porcelain, with shades, $225; the centre tables $80 each; the fringe at the ceiling $12 per yard; the draw curtain complete, $500; each state-room set of fittings, $250; the castors, waiters, &c., $50 to $100 each; the carpets $1,800 in all, and so on to the end of the chapter. Nothing is superficial, as is generally the case, but all is real. The cost of the boat itself was about $130,000.

SUICIDE.—A Washington letter-writer, under date of March 18, gives an account of the suicide of Commodore Crane, Chief of the Bareau of Ordinance and Hydrography. He had been in his office and read the letters on business. About 12 o'clock some of the clerks went to the door and found it locked, and supposed that he had gone to sleep. The clerk looked through the keyhole and saw him in his rocking chair. As he continued however in his office till about 4 o'clock, suspicions were aroused and the door was forced open. He was found in the same position in his rocking chair, with his throat cut, and dead, He was the sixth on the list of captains. The list contains about 68 captains. Commodore Barrow, Stewart, Jones, Morris and Warrington, were before him on the list. He was a native of New-Jersey.

A DOCTOR KILLED BY HIS OWN PRESCRIPTION.—We have just seen a private letter from Macon, Ga., stating that Dr. Ambrose Baber, an old and highly esteemed physician of that place, died on the 8th inst. from the effect of his own medicine. He wrote a prescription for a dose composed in part of Prussic acid, to be administered to a patient. The druggist sent the medicine, with a message that whoever took it would be killed. The patient thereupon refused to take it, when the Doctor, to convince him that there was no danger, swallowed it himself. He died in half an hour. The prescription was copied exactly from a medical work, but the quantity of Prussic acid was eight times greater than it should have been. So much for a typographical blunder! [Tribune.

A NEW JOHN GILPIN.—The Lebanon Star tells a good railroad anecdote. The other day, when the cars stopped, on the way to Xenia, for a moment, a countryman mounted the locomotive to see what he could learn. In the progress of his investigation he took hold of a crank and giving it a turn, with the speed of the wind, off sprang the locomotive, detached from the car, while all that could be heard from the unlucky wight was—Stop her! stop the thing! But regardless of his cries, on it went, whizzing and snorting, and was only arrested in its progress, at the distance of seven miles, by running off the track. No harm was done—the only inconvenience being the necessary labor and detention of getting back the truant locomotive, and the awful fright to its John Gilpin rider.

ANOTHER VICTIM.—The body of 'Sam Roe,' was found at the foot of a deep ravine near New-Canaan, Ct., on Sunday last. A correspondent of the Norwalk Gazette says, that the fallen man was in an easy sleeping posture; and there, as we found him, in fearful solitude, he had died, unpitied and alone; nor was this all, his breast, head, and face, had been disrobed by birds of prey, leaving a ghastly spectacle, which the mind contemplates only with horror. About two rods from the body, a basket was found containing a bottle of Rum, another smaller bottle was found but a few feet from his person, empty. At a subsequent examination an "old vender" testified that he sold two such bottles full to 'Sam Roe' on the day that he was missing, Nov. 28th.

REMARKABLE LIBERALITY.—A London paper mentions that the Treasurer of the Wesleyan Missionary Society has received the sum of $220, as a donation from a female servant, "the fruits of many years' self denial for the Lord's sake." This is regarded as one of the most munificent benefactions ever given to the missionary treasury. The donor would listen to no remonstrance—entreating Mr. West to take the roll of bank notes, which was at last accepted, on the condition that she would faithfully promise to let him know, if living, whenever she might be in temporal need.

STRIKING CONTRAST.—"The King of England," says a graphic writer in Littell's Living Age, "took from the pockets of his subjects four thousand millions of dollars to replace the Bourbons on the throne of France. The interest of this sum, at 5 per cent., would be two hundred million dollars annually; which would go so far toward placing Jesus Chirst on the throne of this alienated world, as to support a standing army of four hundred thousand Missionaries of the Gospel in pagan lands, and Christian lands paganized by systems of grinding oppression and moral degradation."

The Freshet caused by the recent rapid thawing of the heavy snow, has caused immense damage to mills, bridges, canals, etc., as we learn by exchange papers from every direction.

The Hudson River is again open, and boats are running between this city and Albany with their usual speed and comfort.

In New-Haven, on the night of the 19th, a gang of three negroes became so riotous as to awaken the neighbors; who called in two medical gentlemen, who found a negress lying in the cellar, with no covering but the smouldering cinders of a stocking! She died in an hour. So much for the effect of Rum!

Several of the growers of Hops in this State, have petitioned for the re-enactment of compulsory inspection of every bale of Hops sold in this State. The dealers, consumers and exporters, we believe, are all opposed to any such restriction, as they never depend upon the inspection for quality, preferring their own judgment.

Mr. Reuben Rowley, of Wrentham, made his second escape from the State Lunatic Hospital at Worcester, on Sunday, and was at home on Monday. His feet were much blistered, it is said, by his journey, which must have been in part on foot.

The Richmond Compiler mentions the death in Cumberland County, (Va.,) of Syfax Brown, aged one hundred and fifteen years four months and five days. He was for many years the slave and personal servant of John Randolph, Esq., of Mattoax, father of the late John Randolph of Roanoke.

A writer in the Kingston (Jamaica) Morning Jouanal, under the signature of "Vox Africani," thinks that Great Britain should not hesitate one moment about declaring war against the United States, and says that "every motive of policy should induce the Government to seize an opportunity so favorable." The writer lays great stress upon the facilities with which Great Britain could pour her "African sons" into Florida, Louisiana, and the Carolinas, and indulges in the most extravagant hopes as to the results which would follow.

It is remarkable that within the same week three vessels should have arrived in our ports as prizes to the American squadron for having been engaged in the slave-trade—viz. the Pons, captured by the Yorktown; the Panther, a prize of the same vessel, which arrived at Charleston; and the Robert Wilson, a prize to the sloop-of-war Jamestown, which reached Charleston also.

On the night of the 21st ult. a daring robbery was committed in La Grange, Ga., by a slave. He succeedee in stealing from the mail stage the carpet-bag of Mr. Snider, a merchant of this city, containing nearly $8,000 in bank bills and specie. The negro was arrested two days subsequently, seven miles from La Grange, and confessed his guilt. Of the money lost most of the gold has been recovered—about $2,000.

The New Haven Register gives an account of the latest Yankee notion, in the shape of a patent spring hook. By a very delicate but ingenious machine, as soon as a fish attempts to nibble the bait on the hook, a second hook comes down and catches him on the back of the head, and he is a "gone sucker."

If a tallow candle be placed in a gun and shot at a door one inch in thickness, it will go through without melting or sustaining the slightest injury. If a musket ball be fired into the water, it will not only rebound, but be flattened the same as if fired against a solid substance. A musket ball may be fired through a pane of glass, making a hole the size of the ball, without cracking the glass, and if the glass be suspended by a thread it will make no difference, and the thread will not even vibrate.

The Richmond Whig of March 20, says:—We learn that Mr. Thos. Ritchie, Jr., arrived in this city, by the cars, on Monday last and proceeded at once to Chesterfield Court-House, to give himself into the custody of the proper officers of that county. We are informed that Mr. Ritchie refused bail, and that his trial will take place on the 25th inst.

MURDER OF A MISSIONARY AT THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.—The South African Commercial Advertiser, of December 13th, gives an account of the murder of the Rev. Mr. Scholtz, of the Berlin Society mission. Mr. Scholtz and two other German missionaries were on their way to join their brethren in Kaffirland. They had encamped on the Fish River heights, about seven miles from Fort Peddie, where they were attacked, Nov. 29th, by a party of Kaffirs, and Mr. Scholtz and one of his attendants killed.

On the second of December, the Lieut. Governor visited the mission station, in company with a Kaffir chief and immediately summoned two others, who were told unless the murderer, whose tribe had already been ascertained, were given up, condign punishment would be visited upon the whole tribe. It was thought he would be produced.

Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

Miscellaneous.

THE SOVEREIGNS OF ENGLAND.

The following from an exchange paper, will be found convenient for those who wish to fix in their minds the succession of sovereigns on the British throne:

First, William the Norman:
Then William, his son
Henry, Stephen, and Henry;
Then Richard and John.
Next, Henry the third;
Edwards, one, two and three;
And again, after Richard,
Three Henries we see.
Two Edwards, third Richard
If rightly I guess;
Two Henries, sixth Edward,
Queen Mary, Queen Bess;
Then Jamie, the Scottsman,
Then Charles whom they slew,
Yet received after Cromwell,
Another Charles too;
Next James the second
Ascended the throne;
Then good William and Mary
Together came on,
Till Anne, Georges four,
And fourth William all past,
God sent us Victoria,—
May she long be the last!

THE TEN LOST TRIBES.

The following paragraph, which lately appeared in a German paper, uuder the head of Leipsic, is calculated to lead to some interesting inquiries:—

"After having seen, for some years past, merchants from Tiflis, Persia, and Armenia, among the visitors at our fair, we have had for the first time, two traders from Bucharia with shawls, which are there manufactured of the finest wool of Thibet and Cashmere, BY THE JEWISH FAMILIES, who form a third part of the population. In Bucharia (formerly the capital of Sogdiana) the Jews have been very numerous ever since the Babylonian captivity, and are there as remarkable for their industry and manufactures as they are in England for their money transactions. It was not till last year, that the Russian government succeeded in extending its diplomatic missions far into Bucharia. The above traders exchanged their shawls for coarse and fine woolen clothes, of such colors as are most esteemed in the East."

Much interest has been excited by the information which this paragraph conveys, and which is equally novel and important. In none of the geographical works which we have consulted, do we find the least hint as to the existence, in Bucharia, of such a body of Jews as that here mentioned, amounting to one-third of the whole population; but as the fact can no longer be doubted, the next point of inquiry which presents itself, is, Whence have they proceeded, and how have they come to establish themselves in a region so remote from their original country? This question, we think, can only be answered by supposing, that these persons are the descendants of the long lost Ten Tribes, concerning the fate of which theologians, historians, and antiquaries, have been alike puzzled; and, however wild this hypothesis may at first appear, there are not wanting circumstances to render it far from being improbable. In the 17th chapter of the second book of Kings, it is said, "In the ninth year of Hosea, the king of Assyria took Samaria and carried Israel away unto Assyria and placed them in Halah and in Habor, by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes;" and in the subsequent verses, as well as in the writings of the prophets, it is said, that the Lord then "put away Israel out of his sight, and carried them away into the land of Assyria, unto this day." In the Apocrypha, 2nd Esdras, xiii. it is said, that the Ten Tribes were carried beyond the river (Euphrates,) and so they were brought into another land, when they took counsel together, that they would leave the multitude of the heathen, and go forth into a further country, where never mankind dwelt; that they entered in at the narrow passage of the river Euphrates, when the springs of the flood were stayed, and "went through the country a great journey, even of a year and a half;" and it is added that "there they will remain until the latter time, when they will come forth again." The country beyond Bucharia was unknown to the ancients; and it is, we believe, generally admitted that the river Gozan, mentioned in the Book of Kings, is the same as the Ganges, which has its rise in those very countries in which the Jews reside, of whom the Leipsic account speaks. The distance which these two merchants must have traveled cannot, therefore, be less than three thousand miles; and there can be little doubt that the Jews, whom they represent as a third part of the population of the country, are descendants of the Ten Tribes of Israel, settled by the river Gozan.

The great plain of central Asia, forming four principal sides, viz: Little Bucharia, Thibet, Mongols, and Mancheous, contains a surface of 150,000 square miles, and a population of 20,000 000. This vast country is still very little known. The great traits of its gigantic formation, compose, for the most part, all that we are certain of. It is an immense plain of an excessive elevation, intersected with barren rocks, and vast deserts, of a black and almost moving sand. It is supported on all sides by mountains of granite, whose elevated summits determine the different climates of the great continent of Asia, and form the division of its waters. From its exterior flow all the great rivers of that part of the world. In the interior are a quantity of rivers, having little declivity, or no issue, which are lost in the sands, or perhaps feed stagnant waters. In the southern chains are countries, populous, rich, and civilized; Little Bucharia, Great and Little Thibet. The people of the north are shepherds and wanderers. Their habitations are tents, and town camps, which are transported according to the want of pasturage. The Bucharians enjoy the right of trading to all parts of Asia, and the Thibetians cultivate the earth to advantage. The ancients had only a confused idea of central Asia. "The inhabitants of this country," as we learn from a great authority, "are in a high state of civilization; possessing all the useful manufactures, and lofty houses built with stone. The Chinese reckon (but this is evidently an exaggeration) that Thibet alone contains thirty-three millions of persons. The merchants of Cashmere, on their way to Yarkand, in Little Bucharia, pass through Little Thibet. This country is scarcely known to European geographers." The immense plain of Central Asia is hemmed in, and almost inaccessible by mountain ranges of the greatest elevation, which surround it on all sides, except towards China; and when the watchful jealousy of the government of the Celestial Empire is considered, it will scarcely be wondered at that the vast region in question is so little known.

Such is the country which these newly-discovered Jews are said to inhabit in such numbers. The following facts may, perhaps, serve to throw some additional light on this interesting subject.

In the year 1822, a Mr. Sargon, who if we mistake not, was one of the agents to the London Society, communicated to England some interesting accounts of a number of persons resident at Bombay, Cannanore, and their vicinity, who were evidently the descendants of Jews, calling themselves Beni-Israel, and bearing, almost uniformly, Jewish names, but with Persian terminations. This gentleman, feeling very desirous to obtain all possible knowledge of their condition, undertook a mission for this purpose to Cannanore; and the result of his inquires was, a conviction that they were not Jews of the one tribe and a half, being of a different race to the white and black Jews at Cochin, and, consequently, that they were a remnant of the long-lost Ten Tribes. This gentleman also concluded, from the information he obtained respecting the Beni-Israel, that they existed in great numbers in the countries between Cochin and Bombay, the north of Persia, among the hordes of Tartary and in Cashmere—the very countries in which, according to the paragraph in the German paper, they exist in such numbers. So far, then, these accounts confirm each other, and there is every probability that the Beni-Israel, resident on the west of the Indian Peninsula, had originally proceeded from Bucharia. It will, therefore, be interesting to know something of their moral and religious character. The following particulars are collected from Mr. Sargon's accounts: 1. In dress and manners they resemble the natives, so as not to be distinguished from them, except by attentive observation and inquiry. 2. They have Hebrew names of the same kind; and with the same local terminations, as the Sepoys in the ninth regiment Bombay Native infantry. 3. Some of them read Hebrew, and they have a faint tradition of the cause of their original Exodus from Egypt. 4. Their common language is the Hindoo. 5. They keep idols and worship them, and use idolatrous ceremonies intermixed with Hebrew. 6. They circumcise their own children. 7. They observe the Kippoor, or great expiation-day of the Hebrews, but not the Sabbath, or any feast or fast days. 8. They call themselves Gorah Jehudi, or White Jews; and they term the Black Jews, Collah Jehudi. 9. They speak of the Arabian Jews as their brethren, but do not acknowledge the European Jews as such, because they are of a fairer complexion than themselves. 10. They use on all occasions, and under the most trivial circumstances, the usual Jewish prayer, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord." 11. They have no cohen (priest,) levite, or casi among them, under those terms; but they have a kasi (reader,) who performs prayers and conducts their religious ceremonies; and they appear to have elders and a chief in each community, who determine in their religious concerns. 12.—They expect the Messiah, and that they will one day return to Jerusalem. They think that the time of his appearance will soon arrive, at which they much rejoice, believing that at Jerusalem they will see their God, worship him only, and be despised no more.

This is all the information that can be collected from the accounts of Mr. Sargon. The celebrated Oriental Geographer, Ibn Haukal, however, describes with great minuteness, under the appellation of Mower-al-nahr, the region in which these Jews are said to have been discovered. He speaks of it generally as one of the most flourishing and productive provinces within the dominion of Islam, and describes the people as distinguished for probity and virtue, as averse from evil, and fond of peace. "Such is their liberality," says he, "that no one turns aside from the rites of hospitality; so that a person contemplating them in the night, would imagine that all the families in the land were but one house. When a traveler arrives there, every person endevours to attract him to himself, that he may have opportunities of performing kind offices for the stranger; and the best proof of their hospitable and generous disposition is, that every peasant, though possessing but a bare sufficiency, allows a portion of his cottage for the reception of his guest. Thus, in acts of hospitality, they expend their incomes. Never have I heard of such things in any other country. The rich and great lords of most other places expend their treasures on particular favorites, in the indulgence of gross appetites, and sensual gratifications. The people of Mawer-el-nahr employ themselves in a useful and rational manner; they lay out their money in erecting caravanseries, or inns, &c. You cannot see any town, or stage, or even desert, without a convenient inn or stage-house, for the accommodation of travelers, with every thing necessary. I have heard that there are above two thousand nehats or inns, where, as many persons as may arrive, shall find sufficient forage for their beasts, and meat for themselves."

These particulars, we should presume, can scarcely fail to prove interesting, both in a moral and a religious, as well as in a geographical point of view. The number of the scattered members of the tribe of Judah and the half-tribe of Benjamin, rather exceed than fall short of five millions. Now, if to this number be added the many other millions to be found in the different countries of the East, what an immense power would be brought into action were the spirit of their nationality once roused, or any extraordinary event to occur, which should induce them to unite in claiming possession of that land, which was given to thom for an "heritage forever," and to which, in every other clime of the earth, their fondest hopes and their dearest aspirations never cease to turn!

THE EXAMPLE OF CHRIST.

The nearer our Saviour drew to his glory, the more humility he expressed. His followers were first his servants, and he their master; then his disciples, and he their teacher; soon after, they were his friends, and he theirs; straightways after his resurrection and entrance into his immortal condition, they were his brethren: "Go to my brethren, and say unto them, I ascend to my Father and your Father;" lastly, they are incorporated into him, and made partakers of his glory, "That they also may be one with us," saith he; "I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one; and the glory which thou gavest me, I have given them." O Saviour, was this done for the depression of thyself, or for the exaltation of us, or rather for both? How couldst thou more depress thyself, than thus to match thyself with us poor wretched creatures? How couldst thou more exalt us, than to raise us unto this entireness with thee, the all-glorious and eternal Son of God? How should we learn of thee to improve our highest advancement to our deepest humility; and so to regard each other, that when we are greatest we should be least!—Bishop Hall.

CHRIST'S VOLUNTARY POVERTY.

Who can think other than with scorn of that base and unworthy conceit which hath been entertained by some, that our Saviour lived here on earth upon alms? He that vouchsafed to take upon him the shape of a servant, would have hated to take upon him the trade of a beggar: service is a lawful calling, beggary not so. He that gave life to all creatures, could take a maintenance from them without asking. He that did command the fish to bring the tribute money for himself and his disciples, and could multiply a few loaves and fishes for the relief of thousands, could rather arise a sustenance to himself and his than beg it. But here was neither need nor cause; even ordinary means failed not; many wealthy followers, who had received cures and miraculous deliverances, besides heavenly doctrine from him, ministered to him of their substance. Neither was this out of charity, but out of duty: in the charge which he gave to his disciples, when he sent them by pairs to preach abroad, he tells them the laborer is worthy of his wages; and can we think this rule doth not much more hold concerning himself? Had not himself and his family been furnished with a meet stock raised from hence, what purse was it which Judas bore? and how could he be a thief in his office, if his bags were empty? He, therefore that could say, "It is a more blessed thing to give than to receive," certainly would not choose, when it was in his power, rather to receive than give. "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof;" and he distributes it as he pleaseth amongst the children of men. For me, I hope I shall have the grace to be content with whatsoever share shall fall to my lot; but my prayer shall be, that I may beg of none but God.

POSITION OF THE LIBERTY PARTY.

MR. EDITOR:

Will you permit us, who have long been engaged in the Anti-slavery cause, to present to your readers, very briefly, a few considerations on the present condition and future prospects of the Liberty party? The positions we shall advance will be of material importance, and are therefore deserving of a careful and candid examination. We trust, then, that no one of your readers will hastily commit himself against them, but follow the apostolic injunction—"Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good."

Lest we make this communication too long, we will present what we have to say in the shape of simple propositions.

I. Slavery will be abolished before the present moral and political movement against it shall cease.

II. It will be abolished by some national political party, that shall have the power and inclination to do it.

III. The Democratic party will not abolish it: it has the power, but not the inclination. On the contrary, it has labored, and will continue to labor FOR its aggrandizement and supremacy.

IV. The Whig party, as now organized, will not abolish Slavery: for it has not the power nor the will to do it. It never has taken any ground, as a party, against Slavery: prominent Slaveholders are its leaders: it musters three or four hundred thousand voters in the Slave States, of whom a hundred thousand, probably, are personally Slaveholders. While these are members of the party, it cannot become an anti-slavery party; and should these be withdrawn from its ranks, the result would be a radical disruption of the party, and its final extinction, or its re-organization on another basis.

V. The Liberty party have the will to abolish Slavery, but they have not the power. Can they attain the requisite power to abolish it by their own legislation? We answer, that THEY CANNOT, while they refuse to take ground on any subject except the abolition of Slavery.—The reasons for believing this are these:

1. If there be three national parties, the Liberty party must have a million of votes: if there be but two, it must have a million and a half of votes to abolish Slavery. This great number cannot be obtained by appealing to the anti-slavery principle only. No political party ever attained such numbers by advocating one principle, and refusing all expression of opinion on other subjects.

2. Those who act with the Liberty party must forsake all connection with the determination of all other political questions until Slavery shall be abolished, even if that be not accomplished in six, twelve, or twenty years. This will not be done by one-third or one-half the voters of the United States.

3. The appeals to the anti-slavery principle thus far have not secured the votes of the masses in any part of the country. In 500 counties in the Free States, the Liberty party, in six years, have not carried a single one, but their votes have been almost entirely from the class of Philanthropists and of Religious men.

4. The past success of the party does not warrant the expectation that it can become a permanent, national, triumphant party, on its present basis. The vote last year, after six years existence, was about 70,000. To abolish Slavery, fifteen or twenty times that number are indispensable.

VI. The Liberty party CAN attain the requisite power to abolish Slavery, by taking such ground as will bring to its standard sufficient numbers. This can be done by taking right ground on all political questions; by making it a party of progress; of national reform; of justice, economy and peace; in a word, just such a party as our country needs—such an one as every Patriot and Christian can sustain, and ask the God of Heaven to bless. To make it such, it should take such ground on every subject as will best promote the good of the whole country.—This should be done without any reference whatever to old party distinctions. Without presuming on any superior wisdom, we will state what we conceive that ground should be, on some of the most important topics that now present themselves:

1. THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY,—by constitutional means, should continue to be the paramount object of the party.

2. EQUAL POLITICAL AND CIVIL RIGHTS, should be secured to every citizen without reference to nativity, color or descent. This principle would do away with all monopolies and special privileges, granted to corporations or individuals, and also with all unequal taxation.

3. A THOROUGH REFORM OF THE JUDICIARY SYSTEM—both State and National, so that the Laws shall be made more intelligible, decisions more conformed to justice, judgment more speedily rendered, the number of technicalities diminished, and the cost of administering justice greatly reduced.

4. THE ELECTION OF ALL NATIONAL AND STATE OFFICERS,—so far as the nature of the circumstances will permit. Especially should this reform be applied to the office of Post-masters, who should be elected by the citizens of the town or city in which they are located.

5. THE REDUCTION OF SALARIES—of all persons in public employ to as low a rate as will secure incumbents of the requisite qualifications and abilities.

6. THE GRADUAL REDUCTION OF THE ARMY AND NAVY—with a view to their ultimate abolition as soon as the circumstances of the country, and of other nations, shall render it advisable. Every President recommends an increase of the preparations for War, and they now swallow up two-thirds of the National Revenue. During, the fifty-six years that our Government has been in operation, there has been War with civilized nations only three years. Yet according to a recent report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Congress has appropriated during that period—

For Military Service,	$286,998,357
Making a total of	$465,931,481

The Pensions and Interest on the Public Debt, consequent on these preparations, amount to about One Hundred Millions more. A similar expenditure for the next half century, proportionate with our increaie as a nation, as recommended by Presidents Polk and Tyler, would require more than One Thousand Millions to be expended in preparations for Wars, of which there is now not any probability. Such enormous and grievous taxation for War, in the present age of the world, after thirty years of profound peace, is neither necessary or wise, and should be opposed by the Liberty party.

7. A TARIFF FOR REVENUE—so long as the expenses of the National Government are as great as they now are. But should they be reduced—as they might be by the measures before enumerated—to one-third or one-half the present amount the cumbrous machinery of the Custom Houses would be no longer necessary, but the public Treasury could then be supplied better and more cheaply by a small direct tax upon the many and increasing millions of industrious citizens. In this case, the Tariff should be abolished, but so gradually, as to save every interest vested under its provisions.

8. THE REDUCTION OF THE POST OFFICE TAX.—In this Republican country, the people ought to be served as cheap as the subjects of ancient monarchies; and the Franking Privilege should be entirely abolished.

Thus, while Slavery will be abolished by the legislation of a national party having the power and the will to do it, we affirm that the LIBERTY party may become that party by using the means we have stated: but,

VII. If they REFUSE to do this, they will be a mere TEMPORARY party, shortlived in existence, few in numbers and accomplishing no other good than to prepare the way for the coming of another that shall succeed it, that will not only be anti-slavery, but will take ground on all the subjects in which American citizens are interested. It will take the place of the Liberty party, do its work, and the early anti-slavery pioneers will ultimately become enlisted in its ranks.

Now, Mr. Editor, we submit these considerations to your readers, and will make no argument respecting them, further than to ask, whether it would not be better for the great cause in which we are engaged, for the Liberty party to improve the opportunity which now presents itself for obtaining the power directly to abolish Slavery, (and which opportunity is fast passing away,) than to commit our noble enterprise into the hands of another set of men to come after us, whose devotion to the One Idea of Abolition will be more recent in its date, less unmixed in its character, less predominant over other interests, and more liable to the opposition of old party prejudices, and the seductions of selfish interests.

GUY BECKLEY,
THEODORE FOSTER.

Ann Arbor, Mich. Feb. 24, 1846.

"REV. BAPTIST MINISTER, CÆSAR."

A good colored man has fallen in Israel. Departed this life, on the 24th of Nov. last, in the city of Montgomery, Ala., after lingering a few months, apparently with old age, the Rev. Baptist Minister, Cæsar, in the 76th year of his age. Cæsar was a native of Virginia, a servant, and emigrated to Alabama with his master, Mr. John Blackwell, in the early settling of the country. Cæsar being a good servant, and a zealous and good preacher of the gospel of Christ, his master gave him considerable liberty, and time to go and discharge his duty as a minister, until his master died.

Then, on the 15th day of December, 1828, the Alabama Baptist Association purchased Cæsar, and gave him liberty to visit all the churches in its bounds, and preach the everlasting gospel for the benefit of the colored population of the country. The writer can truly say that his labors have been much blest.

His moral and religious character was above suspicion and reproach. On true and fervent piety he had built its whole structure, and exemplified in his life all its ennobling principles. In his early days, he prepared for himself a building of God, eternal in the heavens, and enlisted under the banner of King Emanuel, the captain of our salvation. It was this consoling reflection that caused him triumphantly to enter the dark valley of the shadow of death, with a composure peculiar to the saint of God, who feels that his covenant friend is near.

In the Alabama Association, the loss of the deceased will be greatly felt, especially by the colored population in the vicinity of Elim, Antioch, and Montgomery churches, where the most of his last labors were spent, and large numbers of colored members baptized by his hands. But the days of his usefulness are past, and he has been gathered to the family tomb. No more will he be seen in tears, earnestly exhorting the old, the middle-aged and the young to deeds of holiness. He has finished his mortal career, performed his pilgrimage on earth, and nothing of him now remains but the memory of his virtues.

DR. SCUDDER IN CINCINNATI.

The Watchman of the Valley, Jan. 29th, reports a meeting held at Lane Seminary Chapel, at which Rev. Dr. Scudder, more than twenty years a missionary among the heathen of Asia, made some important statements on the condition of India. Especially we notice his remarks on caste, and the mistake which the missionaries had committed in allowing it to come into the church. Dr. S. said, as reported in the Watchman:—

"Caste is one of the most formidable obstacles which the missionary has to encounter. Dr. Scudder is convinced that they erred at first, in granting any toleration to this absurdity. They ought to have required every candidate for the church to renounce it. It is now much more difficult, too, to establish right principles on the subject, than if they had begun right. One of the missionaries—Mr. Winslow we think—had lately taken the true stand, and excluded it altogether from his church. All the missionaries required their communicants to renounce it so far as to sit together at the same communion table."

We see not why Dr. Scudder's principle does not apply in its full force to slavery, which as the Watchman remarks, creates "a caste far more inexorable than that of India." Beginning right may be attended with serious difficulties, but they will always be less than the difficulty of getting right after having begun wrong.—Boston Rec.

AN EXTRACT FROM A SPEECH OF REV. JOSHUA LEAVITT, AT HALLOWELL.

The gospel which has been preached among the Choctaws and Cherokees has enslaved them. The missionaries of the Board went there in 1817. They found the people of course, ignorant, and degraded, and slavery was there, though in a very mild form. They established printing presses, and opened schools, to which slaves as well as masters were admitted and taught to read the Bible. And we are told that their labors were singularly blessed of God, by the pouring out of his Spirit; and that among these tribes, a larger proportion of the whole population have been brought under the influence of the gospel, than in any other part of the missionary field, except in the Sandwich Islands. They have now been laboring there almost thirty years. A whole generation has grown up under the influence of the gospel, as they have administered it. And yet we are informed that after the missions in these tribes had been in operation twenty-four years, in 1841, laws were passed prohibiting emancipation, and forbidding the slaves to be taught to read. I say then, that the gospel cannot have been faithfully administered there. In a community where so large a proportion have been gathered into the church, if the same gospel had been preached which Jesus Christ preached, such laws could not have been passed. And if our most successful missions are to do no more for heathen tribes, than these have done in twenty-four years labor, we may well doubt whether the world would be much improved by being brought under their influence.

CHILDREN AT THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

Including the four families now resident here, who have become disconnected with the American Mission, there have been born of those parents at this time in the service of the mission, or who have recently died, one hundred and eighty-two children. Of these twenty-two have died, or about 8 per cent; twenty-four were born previous to 1830. Of the whole number living, eighty-eight are boys, seventy-two girls. Total, one hundred and sixty; whole number of parents, eighty-five; of families forty-one; so that in about two-thirds of a generation the increase has been one hundred and seventy-five per cent. At the same ratio of increase the descendants of these Missionaries in one hundred years would amount to 59,535.

The native population meantime has greatly decreased, and the number of the native children in proportion to the adults is very far from being so great. And yet the climate of course favors the natives rather than the American population. A most remarkable illustration this, of the comparative influence of virtue and vice on population. The fact that the missionaries consisted chiefly of young married persons of course must be considered, but that alone by no means accounts for the result.

[Vermont Chronicle.

SLAVERY IN SIAM.

"Slavery, in a modified form, exists to a very great extent, embracing probably a vast majority of the native born population. Indeed it is impossible for a people, so enslaved to vice as are the Siamese, to exist in the form of a civil and political community, and yet be free. There is little or no ground to hope that this population can, as to the mass of them, become free in fact, until they shall have come under the enlightening and sanctifying influence of the gospel. An enlightened Christian people cannot long remain in name, much less in fact, the victims of civil bondage."

THE RIGHT OF SLAVES TO THE BIBLE.—We find an article of this title in the New York Observer. The following extract will give the reader an idea of its character.—The publication of such an article in that paper, is to our mind an interesting evidence of the progress of free principles; for the Observer has not been distinguished for going before public opinion on moral questions.

"The withholding of the Bible from the slave cannot be justified by the plea of necessity, or that oral instruction is the best that can be given to the slave under the circumstances. It is better to endure the penalty of human laws, than to incur the displeasure of God. Human legislation cannot change the principles of right or wrong, or justify contempt of Divine authority. To establish paganism by law would not sanction idolatry, nor would the sin of blasphemy be washed away by the legislative promulgation of atheism. If God has made it sinful to withhold the Bible from the slave, governors and legislators cannot repeal His law, nor justify His subjects in disobeying it; if He has made the Bible necessary to the salvation of the slave, they have no right to extend the effect of their legislation into eternity. Where such unhallowed assumption of power is attempted, we must obey God rather than man, and He will take care of the consequences.

The Bible treats man as an intellectual and moral being; it confers the right and imposes the duty of cultivating his intellectual and moral powers. God has committed to writing the revelation of his will, and, by making it the privilege and the duty of all men to peruse and study this written revelation, to exercise their judgment upon it. He has not only provided for their religious instruction, but for their intellectual culture. In the Divine economy, as well as by the constitution of human nature, religious and mental progress are inseparable. But slavery, wherever it has existed among men, has invariably produced, as a general result, the moral and intellectual degradation of its victims. Upon them heathenism still rests, though surrounded by the institutions of the gospel."

THE GUILT OF AMERICAN SLAVEHOLDERS.

In a recent sermon, Prof. C. G. Finney comments upon the declaration of Christ, contained in Luke 11: 41—51, that the blood of all the martyrs from Abel to Zacharias, would be required of that generation. The inference in relation to the accumulated guilt of American slaveholders is evidently irresistible. With this solemn truth before him, well might a slaveholder say, "I tremble when I remember that God is just, and that his justice cannot sleep forever."

"But why and how did the Jews deserve this fearful and augmented visitation of the wrath of God for past centuries of persecution?

"The answer is two-fold: they sinned against accumulated light: and they virtually endorsed all the persecuting deeds of their fathers, and concurred most heartily in their guilt.

On the same principle the accumulated guilt of all the blood and miseries of Slavery since the world began rests on this nation now. The guilt involved in every pang, every tear, every blood-drop forced out by the knotted scourge—all lies at the door of this generation. Why? Because the history of all the past is before the pro-slavery men of this generation, and they endorse the whole by persisting in the practice of the same system and of the same wrongs. No generation before us ever had the light on the evils and the wrongs of Slavery that we have; hence our guilt exceeds that of any former generation of slaveholders; and, moreover, knowing all the cruel wrongs and miseries of the system from the history of the past, every persisting slaveholder endorses all the crimes and assumes all the guilt involved in the system and evolved out of it since the world began. SUNDAY LEGISLATION ANTI-CHRISTIAN—NO. 10.

We are well aware, that it is making a grave charge to call any act or proceeding anti-christian, which is approved and sanctioned by so large a portion of the Christian world as as have given their sanction to Sunday laws. We make the charge, however, deliberately and understandingly, setting down nothing in malice, nothing capriciously. We intend no personal disrespect to any man or body of men. There are many whom we love, and in many respects venerate, some of whose sentiments and observances we nevertheless regard as anti-christian in their origin and tendencies. We believe it to be a common thing for pious men to hold anti-christian doctrines; in no other way can we do justice to the characters and sentiments of such men as Fenelon, Thomas a'Kempis, and Blaise Paschal, among the papists —Luther, Calvin, and Zuinglius, among the reformers—and Richmond, Whateley, and Noel, among Protestant hierarchists. The spirit of Antichrist does not belong to the Roman hierarchists alone. On one occasion our Lord said to Peter, "Get thee behind me, Satan; thou art an offence unto me, for thou savorest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men." "Try the spirits whether they be of God; for many false prophets are gone out into the world," is the language of John. All legislative interference with the kingdom of Christ, we regard as dictated by a false spirit; all attempts at enforcing by civil law the precepts, doctrines, or institutions of religion, savor not of the things that be of God, but those that be of men. On no point are the instructions of the New Testament clearer than on the separation of Christianity from human judicatories. This is very apparent in the blessed Saviour's conduct and manner of life.

1st. He clearly distinguished between the civil and the sacred law, both of the Jews and of the Romans. His adversaries, the Scribes and Pharisees, sought to embroil him with both, that if possible they might find some legal pretence for putting him to death; but he ever baffled all their endeavors by maintaining the duty of men to both the one and the other, in the double capacity of servants of God and citizens of the State.

2d. This distinction is further apparent from his ever declining to decide judicial questions by even Jewish laws. On one occasion a man applied to him to speak to his brother to divide the paternal inheritance with him. "Man," said he, "who made ME a judge or a divider over you?" He could instruct them on the danger of covetousness, and enjoin upon them principles which, if followed from the heart, would lead to a voluntary exercise of equity and justice; but to do or say any thing which could be construed as the exercise of judicial authority, he steadfastly refused. The church is not the place for the exercise of judicial law. Moral or persuasive power is the only power for her to exercise. There are numerous instances which show plainly enough, that our Lord never intended that Christianity should interfere with the judicial laws. It follows, then, as a matter of course, if Christianity could not interfere with the civil law, that the civil law could never of right interfere with it; otherwise, it might have been utterly impossible, while rendering unto Cæsar what Cæsar claimed, to have rendered unto God the things that were God's.

3d. Our Lord declared the entire distinction of his kingdom from the civil government, before the Roman court. "My kingdom is not of this world," said he. He had been adjudged in the highest Jewish court to be worthy of death as a blasphemer; but as they had not authority to put him to death under Roman rule, and as the Roman laws did not take cognizance of such religious questions, they led him to Pilate, and accused him of treasonable designs against the Roman government. But having heard their witnesses, and having examined him himself, Pilate acquitted him entirely of all their political charges. When he was led away to be crucified, it was not under the judicial sentence of the Roman court; but Pilate just gave him up as a victim to popular phrenzy to appease their clamors "Pilate gave sentence that it should be as THEY required."

In every feature in which we can contemplate it, the kingdom of Christ is presented as independent of and separate from the civil power. It appears to have been so arranged by God himself, that the kingdom of heaven should commence when the civil power that ruled the whole world should declare that religion was not the object of civil legislation; and that the kingdom of heaven should be so taught that it should not interfere with any civil law which did not interfere with the rights of conscience; and then it was to interfere only by persuasion, and where that failed, his disciples were rather to seek safety in flight, than in opposing carnal weapons to civil power. There are no exceptions to this feature of our Lord's conduct and manner of life. His procession through the streets of Jerusalem to the temple, and his driving out the buyers and sellers, appear designed on his part to awaken the attention of the slumbering population of the city, to his claims as a religious teacher; in the multitude, it was a religious enthusiasm awakened by the popular effect of Christ's character upon them; but as soon as they attempted to turn it to a worldly purpose, and make him their leader, he withdrew himself from them.

The doctrine of Jesus Christ is directly opposed to coercion in matters of religion. "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshipers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship him." John 4: 23. He had a covenant with Israel which respected the externals of his worship; but it has passed away, and his covenant now is with such only as have his laws written on the heart. This, secular laws can neither produce nor distinguish. They can take cognizance only of the public or visible acts—the bare act, without consideration of motives—while in true religion a consideration of motive is indispensable. What, then, does mere abstinence from labor on a Sabbath enforced by human laws, avail for the promotion of true religion? So far as it is regarded as a conformity to God's law—so far as it is received as true religion—it is an injury to the soul; it is covering up a divine standard with a human device.

It is essential to true religion that it be voluntary. "If I do this thing willingly, I have a reward," was the language of the Apostle, and he did not expect a reward without it. The first Christians are represented as doing what they did, "willingly, of themselves," and they were assured, that "if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted," though the service be ever so small. On the other hand, "eye service, as men pleasers," is always represented as odious in the sight of God. Accordingly all the means employed by Christ or his apostles to bring men to obedience, was teaching and preaching. It is a fact of history, both sacred and profane, that in its early struggles with ancient superstitions, deep-rooted prejudices, and the long-established intellectual habits of mankind, Christianity never won a single convert by coercion. Its entire success was achieved in harmony with the reason and free-will of man. That, then, is anti-christian which seeks for a single religious observance an unwilling and coerced homage.

Again, Jesus Christ has strictly forbidden a coercive dominanoy over the religious faith of men. "Ye know that the princes of the gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise eominion upon them, but it shall not be so among you." Are these words of the Lord Jesus Christ of no account? What do the advocates of religious coercion mean by passing them by as though they did not exist? How dare they smite their fellow servants, as they who say, My Lord delayeth his coming.

The whole tendency of coercive measures is opposed to the example and exhortations of the apostles of Christ. "We persuade men;" "We were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children;" "For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal;" said Paul. Can that body of men say so who have helped to make a civil law to fine or imprison their fellow men for not religiously observing Sunday? Let those ministers who advocate these laws, compare their course with the exhortation of the Apostle to a primitive minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and then say if they have not missed the spirit of their sacred calling, and partaken somewhat of the spirit of Antichrist, when they have advocated coercive measures to compel people to keep Sunday. "The servant of MEN, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto ALL those that oppose themselves, if peradventure God will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth." How much gentleness is there in summoning a man to a Justice's office for trading or working on Sunday, and then fining him three dollars; or, as in Pennsylvania, four dollars; and if he be unable or unwilling to pay it, selling his goods; or, if he have no goods, locking him up in the county prison among felons? Is this the gentleness of Christ? Say, ye reverend divines who hold conventions to urge legislatures to enforce these Sunday penalties, is this the gentleness or patience of an apostle of Christ? Are fines and prisons consistent with the meekness with which ye instruct us who oppose ourselves to your dogmas? Apt to teach, are ye indeed; and docile creatures we must be, to learn from such arguments. Before ye go farther, inquire what the effect of these strong arguments has been upon Plymon Seaver of Vermont, or upon the Sabbath-keepers at Snowhill in Pennsylvania; and then, if ye think best, pursue your meek instructions!

But hold, says one, it is the magistracy that does this; we ministers have nothing to do with courts of justice; our business is in the pulpits of Christian churches, and in Christian Sabbath Conventions. Very likely; so said the holy Roman inquisitors when they delivered the poor heretic over to the civil power to be dealt with according to the civil laws which they had urged the civil power to make. If the laws of papal states are "lions," are not the inquisitors and Jesuits jackals or lion providers? If Christ has commanded his servants to promote his kingdom by the gentle persuasives of meekness and truth, is it not anti-christian to labor to promote it by fines and imprisonments? S. D

☞ The following article, in a printed form, was furnished to the members of the Pennsylvania Legislature, for the purpose of enabling them to judge intelligently whether the Sabbath-keepers at Snowhill have a claim upon their protection. It shows beyond a question, that if ever "lewd fellows of the baser sort" perpetrated "mischief by law," they did it in this instance. And yet, strange as it may seem, when these unoffending citizens, after having been thus cruelly peeled and persecuted by wicked men, asked the Legislature to relieve them from fines and imprisonments for working on Sunday, there were found Christian ministers and professers ready to remonstrate against granting their request! O shame! where is thy blush? If such men had been born at the right age of the world, and in the right countries, they would have made fit tools for the darkest deeds which disgrace the history of the bloody Inquisition.

A PLAIN STATEMENT

Of the causes which induced the Seventh-day Baptisis of Franklin county to petition the Legislature for relief.

This religious sect, in this county, is small, numbering about one hundred members—a part of them being single persons of both sexes—reside at a place in the southern part of the county, called Snowhill. Snowhill is not a town or village, but the name of the Estate, which is held in common by those members who are incorporated. The other members of the Snowhill society, mostly reside in its immediate vicinity. The church, in which they all worship, is on the Snowhill estate, and has attached to it a kitchen. The reason for having this kitchen is, that at their annual meeting, generally in May or June, they prepare a supper in the afternoon, of which all who are present are invited to partake, whether they are members or not. In the evening, after dark, the Lord's Supper is administered. Their meetings for public worship are on Saturday, which they observe as the Sabbath. The Snowhill establishment has existed about seventy years, during all which time, the members of the Society and Congregation have worked on Sunday, until last summer, when prosecutions were first instituted against them, under the first section of the Act of 1774, and fines collected from some of the members.

Having given this brief history, or statement, I proceed to give the facts which have led to the application to the Legislature for relief.

For a number of years past, at the annual meetings, these people have been much disturbed and annoyed—and particularly at the former—by wicked and mischievous persons. Being entirely averse to litigation or contention of any kind, they patiently bore with all. This only seemed to encourage increased disturbance, until the 17th of May last, when, at an annual meeting, it became so outrageous, that an individual, who was not a member of the congregation, instituted a prosecution against several persons for a riot. At the August Sessions of the county of Franklin, twenty individuals, young men and youths, were indicted for a riot and for disturbing their religious worship, and sixteen of them convicted;—twelve of them were sentenced to thirty days imprisonment in the county jail, and to pay a fine of ten dollars each—four to pay a fine of five dollars each, and the whole to pay the costs of prosecutions. To show the nature and character of the riot, the following extracts from the notes of the evidence, taken by one of the counsel for the Commonwealth, on the trial, are submitted. The names of the defendants are suppressed, to avoid unnecessary exposure. As they are unknown to the Legislature, it was deemed useless to give them.

Benjamin Fahnestock says: "When the word was given that the supper was ready, they (some of the rioters) rushed on to the table. They commenced eating as soon as they sat down. They did not wait till grace was asked." Speaking of the meeting at night, he says: "There was a great deal of noise, both inside and outside of the meeting house—talking, laughing, cursing, swearing. It was during the meeting. Meeting commenced at early candle-light, and dismissed between 11 and 12. Noise could be heard inside the church." The same witness says, he went out of the church after eight o'clock, and continues, "and at the door met Mr. R———, cursing and swearing very hard. I spoke to him that he should be quiet—told him we would not bear it any longer. He did'nt listen to me—would have the last word; it was a free country—could do as he pleased. I went to the back of the kitchen. H—— S—— was cursing and swearing—he was acting as if he was drunk. Saw V—— R——, cursing and swearing—walking about there—appeared to be drunk. I went then to the front of the meeting house. There I met J—— E——, cursing and swearing—drunk too."

Frederick Sites said: "Between nine and ten, was at Snowhill—saw Mr. ——— at the cellar window of kitchen—had his knife out, and made an attempt to cut at it—at one of the rungs. Then he put his foot against one of the rungs and tried to shove it in—ten or fifteen around." Again he said: "There was very loud talk—I remained at the window five or ten minutes—saw some cutting-up round the house; running through—other cutting-up; very much noise, swearing and the like—very loud. I heard noise inside the door; running out and in, and talking. I saw them throw some butter around in front of the house." On his cross-examination he said: "Swearing in front of the church and inside."

Adam Welch said, that he was at the kitchen window that night, and then proceeded: "The crowd was trying to take out bread and butter; twelve or fifteen near the window." Stated he heard them say, "Let Sam go, by God; if it is to be got out he can get it."—"You could have heard it at the big road. I saw the window was broke—noise big. It was about twenty-five feet from the preacher's stand; preacher was there."

John Heffner said: "Adam Welch and me went to the place where the butter was trying to be got out." Again, "Might have been twenty near to or about the window. There was a good deal of noise—saw one jumping against the rung with his feet, but did'nt know him. It appeared to me the wrung cracked—a great deal of noise."

John Light said: "About the time they were taking the Sacrament, the biggist noise. The commencement of taking the Sacrament, between nine and ten o'clock."

These extracts will suffice to show the character of the riot. None of the above witnesses are members of the Church. Some twelve or fifteen other witnesses were examined on the part of the prosecution, who testified to the same and similar facts. It was proved that a crock containing butter, and a plate with some other provisions, standing inside the kitchen window, were broken and their contents destroyed; that the butter was thrown about on the ground and on the walls of the kitchen; that one or two of the defendants were seen with bottles of liquor, treating others; that the noise continued during the whole time of the meeting; and that the members of the congregation who were not more than fifteen or twenty feet from the preacher, at times could not hear him on account of it.

Such are the facts and circumstances of a case which excited in the County as much interest as any that has been tried for several years, and which drew crowds of anxious spectators to the Court Hall during its progress. The result gave general satisfaction to the moral and religious community.

The number of persons around the meeting house was considerable, perhaps between one and two hundred; but the defendants were all that could be identified as being engaged in the riot and disturbance.

The defendants were sentenced on Saturday. Within ten days afterwards, prosecutions were commenced against several members of the congregation for working on Sunday, and fines collected from them. These prosecutions were instituted by persons who were in some way connected with the rioters, and continued until they ceased to work on Sunday. There cannot be a doubt that the persons who instituted them, were influenced by feelings of malice and revenge, and not from any regard they had for the Sabbath. Such is the universal opinion in the community where these occurrences happened. The writer cannot forbear adverting to the last prosecution of a member of the much-abused Society. S——, a Seventh-day Baptist, and M——, a first day man, left home on Sunday morning with their wagons —the one for Baltimore, the other for Georgetown. S—— had kept the preceding day as the Sabbath, and started early so that he might make his trip in six days, and return in time to keep his next Sabbath. They both traveled the same road, and must have been seen by the individual who gave the information. Yet S—— is selected and made to pay a fine, whilst M—— is permitted to pass without being prosecuted. The writer has lived in the County of Franklin for upwards of twenty-five years, and does not recollect of having heard of a solitary prosecution for a violaiion of Sunday, until these suits were commenced against the Baptists.

A copy of one of the convictions is annexed. There were several others, but it is deemed unnecessary to copy them:

Commonwealth vs. Obed Snowberger. } BREACH OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Information, on oath of William B. Raby, taken the 26th day of August, A. D. 1845, who charges Defendant with being engaged in worldly employment or business on Sunday the 24th day of August, A. D. 1845, contrary to the law, at the Township of Quincy, County of Franklin, and State of Pennsylvania. Warrant issued to Hugh M. Sibbet, Constable of Quincy township, August 26, 1845. Warrant returned, not served. Defendant appears, and pleads guilty to the charge of laboring on the day stated above. Therefore, be it remembered, that on the 29th day of August, A. D. 1845, Obed Snowberger, of Quincy township, in Franklin county, convicted before me, one of the Justices of the Peace in and for said County, of being engaged in worldly employment on Sunday the 24th day of August, instant, being the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, and I do adjudge him to forfeit for the same the sum of Four Dollars, to be distributed according to the Act of Assembly in such cases made and provided. Given under my hand and seal, the day and year above written.

SAMUEL SIBBET. [L. S.]

Defendant paid fine and costs same day.

Franklin County, S. S. } I do hereby certify, that the above is a true transcript of a Judgment entered by me at the suit of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, on complaint of William B. Raby, Plaintiff, against Obed Snowberger, Defendant. Witness my hand seal, at Funkstown, the 10th day of September, 1845.

SAMUEL SIBBET. [L. S.]

WE, the undersigned, members and Commitee of the Congregation of Seventh-day Baptists of Snowhill, Franklin county, certify, that the facts set forth in the foregoing statement, in relation to the establishment at Snowhill, and to the riot, and prosecution of members under the Act of 1794, are correct.

DEATH OF A MISSIONARY'S WIFE.—The Christian Watchman publishes a letter from Burmah, stating that on the 9th of Nov., 1845, the wife of Rev. Mr. Ingalls, missionary at Maulmain, "met the Christian's glorious death, without a pain, a sigh, a groan, or even the stir of a muscle."

THE CHRISTIAN'S HOME.

"This world is poor from shore to shore,
And like a baseless vision,
Its lofty domes and brilliant ore,
And gems and crowns, are vain and poor,
There's nothing rich but heaven.

Fine gold will change, and diamonds fade,
Swift wings to wealth are given;
All-varying time our forms invade—
The seasons roll, light sinks in shade;
There's nothing lasts but heaven.

Empires decay, and nations die,
Our hopes to winds are given;
The vernal blooms in ruin lie,
Death rules o'er all beneath the sky—
There's nothing lives but heaven.

Creation's mighty fabric all
Shall be to atoms riven;
The skies consume, the planets fall,
Convulsions rack this earthly ball—
There's nothing firm but heaven.

A stranger lonely here I roam,
From place to place I'm driven,
My friends are gone, and I'm in gloom,
This earth is all a lonely tomb—
I have no home but heaven.

The clouds disperse, the light appears,
My sins are all forgiven;
Triumphant grace has quelled my fears,
Roll on, thou sun, fly swift my years,
I'm on the road to heaven!"

A PLEASANT SURPRISE.

A young man of eighteen or twenty, a student in a university, took a walk one day with a professor, who was commonly called the student's friend, such was his kindness to the young men whose office it was to instruct.

While they were now walking together, and the professor was seeking to lead the conversation to grave subjects, they saw a pair of old shoes lying in the path, which they supposed to belong to a poor man who was at work in a field close by, and who had nearly finished his day's work.

The young student turned to the professor, saying: "Let us play the man a trick: we will hide his shoes, and conceal ourselves behind those bushes, and watch to see his perplexity when he cannot find them.

"My dear friend," answered the professor, "we must never amuse ourselves at the expense of the poor. But you are rich, and you may give yourself a much greater pleasure by means of this poor man. Put a dollar into each shoe, and then we will hide ourselves."

The student did so, and then placed himself with the professor behind the bushes close by, through which they could easily watch the laborer, and see whatever wonder or joy he might express.

The poor man had soon finished his work, and came across the field to the path where he had left his coat and shoes. While he put on the coat he slipped one foot into one of the shoes; but feeling something hard he stooped down and found the dollar. Astonishment and wonder were seen upon his countenance; he gazed upon the dollar, turned it around, and looked again and again; then he looked around him on all sides but could see no one. Now he put the money in his pocket and proceeded to put on the other shoe; but how great was his astonishment when he found the other dollar! His feelings overcame him; he fell upon his knees, looked up to heaven and uttered aloud a fervent thanksgiving, in which he spoke of his wife, sick and helpless, and his children without bread, whom this timely bounty from some unknown hand would save from perishing.

The young man stood there deeply affected, and tears filled his eyes.

"Now," said the professor, "are you not much better pleased than if you had played your intended trick?"

"O, dearest Sir," answered the youth, "you have taught me a lesson now that I will never forget. I feel now the truth of the words which I never before understood—it is better to give than to receive."

We should never approach the poor but with the wish to do them good.

A MELANCHOLY SCENE.

By the politeness of the Chaplain of the Auburn Prison, we were present at the Clerk's room the other morning, when twelve new convicts were committed. They had arrived the night before, from different parts of the State. Washed thoroughly from head to foot, arrayed in their ring-striped uniform, clean, but in some cases worn and patched, with cow-hide stogies —their heads still wet from the scouring bath, they were marched into the presence of the chief keeper. Here they were measured with exactness. Their age, place of birth, time of being sentenced, and period for which they are sentenced, are asked and recorded, after which they are distributed to their several workshops.

In the group received on this occasion, we were struck to see such a proportion of young persons. Out of the twelve convicts, two were but fourteen years old, one sixteen, two seventeen, two were twenty-one, one twenty-three, and only three that were over forty. Here were eight out of twelve persons who had gone to such length in sin as to become inmates of the State Prison before they had exceeded their 23d year, and five of them who were not eighteen! And what was the most heart-sickening fact of all, one of the boys, but fourteen years old, is the third brother now in this Penitentiary, with their father. A father and three sons all here together! What a lesson is this to parents on the subject of training up children in the way they should go. Set your children the example of a pious life, and they will follow you to the house of God. Let them see in you an example of dishonesty and crime, and you will have them with you in the State's Prison.

CHINA MISSIONS.

All Christian philanthropists have their attention now turned to China. It is a world within itself—a world just discovering its interior to other worlds—just opening its highways to invite the inhabitants of other and distant lands to come, and learn, and teach—to come, and pity, and bless. But much as there may appear to be novel, unexpected, and remarkable, in the position of China at the present time, it has all been anticipated, labored for, and expected, by devoted Missionaries and Missionary Boards for a period of forty-two years. The success is marked by the finger of God; but the labor to effect it has been done by God's servants. Our Saviour said to his disciples, "Other men labored, and ye have entered into their labors." So may it be said of those who go to China now. China open, is not what China once was, when her ways were shut up and enclosed by her great wall of national prejudices. Then the world, and many in the church, looked askance, and said, China is impregnable to the Christian missionary. But even then much labor was expended for her good—labor such as the world thought little of, but which has been mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds.

Before William Carey went to India, the rule on which he acted, and which he taught, was, "Attempt great things; expect great things." Carey's heart never quailed at the difficulties in the way of a good work. He never hesitated about undertaking a good work, on account of the paucity of denominational resources. He fixed his eye upon the promises and predictions of Jehovah, and labored quietly on, expecting the nations to submit to the word of the eternal God. Carey's doctrine and example infused the same spirit into others who followed him in the same work. They did not drink of his cup, but he showed them how to drink of the perennial fountain of divine promises. They were enabled to labor as seeing Him who is invisible.

The early missionaries had confidence and enterprise equal to any possible undertaking that presented a prospect of forwarding the conversion of the world. At a very early period in their history, in writing to the Board at home, after enumerating most of the considerable languages of India, among which was the Chinese, they say:—

"We have frequently reflected on, and discoursed about, the possibility of effecting a translation of the Bible, or some part of it at least, into some, if not all, of these languages; and after considering the matter in all its forms, we have reason to think it practical to us."

On the 18th of January, 1801, there was baptized, at the mission station at Serampore, Ignatius Fernandez, a gentleman of Portuguese extraction, but who was born on the Island of Macao, near Canton. He was wealthy, spoke several languages, and being much devoted to the cause of missions, he became of great assistance to the cause. This circumstance seems to have induced the Board at home, or at least some of its members, to address a letter of inquiry relative to a mission to China; to which Mr. W. Ward replied as follows:—

February 5, 1804.

. . . "With respect to the practicability of a Portestant mission to China, it appears that almost insurmountable difficulties are at present in the way. So it appears to brother Fernandez. He is certain that no one can go into China but as a Chinese; for this he must have the language and appearance of a Chinese. With respect to the language, brother F. learned of the natives, without pains, so much as to be understood by them in common things. He does not think it can be learned without a native teacher, nor that a missionary could introduce himself, if he were in other respects qualified, without a native guide. Both the Chinese and Catholics would be his inveterate enemies. If there be any place in the neighborhood of China where Chinese live, or whither they resort, where a missionary might qualify himself, this appears to be the most likely means."

Vast and almost insurmountable as the obstacles to China's reception of Christianity then appeared to some, Carey and Marshman and others set their hearts upon its accomplishment. February 7th, 1806, Carey wrote to J. W. Morris at home:—

"Four or five persons in our family are laboring hard at the Chinese language. Among them is brother Marshman and his son, and my son Jabez. A young Armenian, a Mr. J. Lasson, born at Macao, and educated under native Chinese masters, are instructing them."

Marshman writes to Ryland, March 14:—

"I have begun the Chinese language, and nearly committed to memory four hundred sentences. Mr. Lassar is an excellent teacher, and a man of ability. I have begun writing the language. John Marshman and Jabez Carey are my companions. I can only say now, that I find it perfectly attainable."

On the 10th of February, 1808, a public examination was given in the presence of Dr. Buchannan and other officers of the East India Company; and again, September 26th, of the same year, at which prizes were distributed to the successful candidates. In 1809 Mr. Marshman and his son, with their teacher, Mr. Lassar, commenced translating into English the works of Confucius, the Chinese philosopher. In a memoir of the Serampore translation, published November, 1809, they say:—

"Relative to the Chinese, the encouragements given to the study of this language by three of our youths, have not only contributed to their proficiency, but with other circumstances have tended to accelerate the translations. Providence has furnished us with a Chinese foundery, if it may be so termed. More than eighteen months ago we began to employ, under Chinese superintendance, certain natives of Bengal, for many years accustomed to cut the patterns of flowers used in printing cottons; and have found them succeed beyond our expectations. . . . . Some months ago we began printing a newly-revised copy of the Gospel by Matthew, to the middle of which we are nearly advanced."

From this time onward, they steadily advanced with their work; and in a review of the Serampore mission, published December, 1817, they say of the Chinese translations:—

"We have been hitherto occupied in preparations for future operations. We have been enabled to bring through the press an edition of the New Testament, and the whole of the Pentateuch."

A second edition was then in the press; and they add:—

"The demand for the Scriptures we have already found so great from the Chinese found in the various isles, and in almost every port of India, that our edition of the New Testament, of two thousand copies, is almost exhausted. . . . . Our Chinese press will scarcely allow us to supply the demand, till we have brought the first edition of the Scriptures wholly through the press; in which work, as the translation of the Old Testament has been long completed, we are of course at present all engaged."

To be brief, the London Missionary Society had during this time sent out Robert Morrison and William Milne, to commence a Chinese mission, who, not being permitted to reside in China, resided, the first in Macao, the last in Malacca. These devoted men steadily pursued the same object, and a few years afterwards effected another full translation of the whole Bible, and subsequently a Chinese and English Dictionary.

All this time, China itself was imperviously shut up against all foreigners, by her own jealous restrictions; and all English commercial intercourse was under the narrow restrictions of the East India Company's chartered monopoly. But Jehovah's servants having nearly completed their preparatory work, we shall now see the King of kings taking the rod of iron with which he providentially ruleth the nations, and at once breaking down that restrictive policy by which the Chinese had shut themselves up from the free intercourse of enlightened nations for probably three thousand years.

The first in the series of events by which this mighty revolution was accomplished, was doubtless the increasing acquaintance which the mercantile population of China formed with the manners and literature of other nations, through the medium of the translations which we have noticed above, and which they received in their migrations to the adjacent iles and ports, and carried into the Empire in their visits to their native districts.

The next potent cause was the breaking down of the East India Company's charter, after two hundred years' monopoly of the whole India trade by this overgrown company. At the expiration of the last period of its existence, in 1834, the people of England arose, and with a mighty voice, which awed the Parliament of England, demanded that it should be no more renewed. The consequence was, that a vast number of traders flocked to the China markets; and hovering all along her northern coast, despite of her restrictive policy, drove a great contraband trade, the growing magnitude of which alarmed the imperial court. Accustomed to the most wily diplomacy, they soon found a plausible pretext for complaint, and for a more restrictive policy towards all foreign nations, in the progress of the iniquitous opium trade. In this policy they were placed upon a vast vantage ground, before their own nation and in the eyes of the whole world. It was a curious, yet monstrous phenomenon, which the world understood not, that a heathen nation, which had steadily rejected Christianity for eighteen hundred years, should now lift up a cry and a charge of immorality against one that had professed to be guided by the divine religion of the Son of God for the same length of time! But the Ruler of the nations knew the hollowness of the pretence, and so did the British Government, for all the maritime powers of India were engaged in the trade, which had been pursued and had been steadily increasing for nearly a century. The trade was awfully iniquitous; but the time chosen to complain of it was one of the master-strokes of Chinese policy to maintain their isolated character. Their complaint was really just, but their object was iniquitous, and it did not succeed. The Most High, who turneth the nations as he will, made them to tremble and bow before the progress of the British arms; which, whether justly or unjustly swayed, every where protect the missionary servants of Jehovah. The result is known. Their five principal ports are opened to the commerce of nations, the circulation of the Scriptures, and the preaching of the gospel. Almost every Missionary Society in Britain and America has its Chinese Mission, Christian churches, schools, and printing presses.

Who that contemplates these facts, which are now written on the page of history, but must see and admire the way of the Lord, and rejoice in the work of his servants? The beginning was very small, but the result is magnificent; the Bible translated is offered to three hundred millions of souls! Who can regret the forty-two years of labor? Who can doubt whether Jehovah is on his way to give to his Son the heathen for his inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for a possession? S. D.

MR. JUDSON TO BE MARRIED.—It is said in a Philadelphia letter to the Journal of Commerce, that Mr. Judson is to be married to Miss Chubbuck, (known to the literary world as "Fanny Forrester,") who will accompany him on his missionary labors in India. She will carry with her, it is added, the high devotion which a former one of the name exhibited, who followed the missionary fortunes of her husband in the East.

DEACON TODD.

THE BOY WITH THE SHORT MEMORY.

Returning from meeting one Sabbath afternoon, the deacon was accosted by a man.

"Sir, did you see a boy on the road driving a cart with a bag of cotton in it?"

"I think I did," said the deacon, musingly. "A boy with a short memory, was'nt he?"

The man looked confused, and said, "Why do you think he had a short memory, sir?"

The deacon seemed to enjoy his confusion, and even determined to increase it.

"I think so; and think, moreover, that he must belong to a family that have short memories."

"What in the world makes you say that?" said the man more than ever confused.

"Why simply this," said the old gentleman, assuming all of a sudden, a very grave and solemn manner, "Because God Almighty has proclaimed from Mount Sinai, in a most solemn manner, among other things, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy;' and the boy has forgotten all about it. His memory must be very short indeed, VERY."

We rode off as the deacon pronounced the last word; and left the man to his own thoughts. He had evidently not been to church that day, but surely he had heard a sermon.—Christian Index.

☞ The above article is going the rounds of the papers, and seems to be a general favorite. We could not help thinking, however, when we read it, that Deacon Todd's memory was even shorter than that of the boy at whose expense he made himself merry. It is very true, as the Deacon says, that God Almighty has proclaimed from Mount Sinai, in a most solemn manner, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.' But it is also true, that God Almighty has proclaimed with equal solemnity, 'The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work.' Now as Deacon Todd had undoubtedly worked all of the seventh day, in opposition to one part of the divine commandment, and then quoted another part of the same commandment to reprove working on the first day, it strikes us that the boy might with much better grace have said of the Deacon, 'His memory must be very short indeed, VERY.'

THE BILL OF EQUAL RIGHTS IN NEW JERSEY.

We have received a letter from Mr. Bilderback, a member of the New Jersey Legislature, in which he expresses his opinion of the moral character of the Seventh-day Baptists, and states his reasons for not favoring their petitions. The following extracts contain the substance of the letter:—

"In addition to what I then said [in the Assembly,] I must say, as one Christian should for another, that I have followed steamboating between Salem and Philadelphia for nine years past, and have taken these people called Seventh-day Baptists, with their produce, to market. But I never saw one of them on board of a steamboat on their Sabbath day. I believe them to be as honest as any people in the world, and I do not believe they, as a society, would ever disturb any person on any day, but would have respect for their fellows in all cases. As to honesty, I believe those in Cumberland and Salem counties are above the average of professing Christians of other denominations. They have given some of the best signatures to their petitions which this State can produce."

So much for the moral character of the Seventh-day Baptists. Now for the reason why their petitions should not be granted:—

"The Constitution of the United States gives you all the privilege to worship on any day you please. And the Constitution of this State, in addition, gives you the privilege of working in your own shops, and on your farms, and in your woods, whether owner or tenant. Now if the Bill had asked us to grant the Seventh-day Baptists the privilege of carting wood, brick, stone, or any such thing, or of pulling down or building up houses on the Christian Sabbath, or first day of the week, we should have fully understood the bill. This, I believe, was what was meant by equal privileges. This we could not consent to grant. Our children would ask why we brought them up to keep this day holy, and let some people work on it. This, sir, would make many sceptics."

Here, then, we have the gist of the objection to granting the petitions of Sabbath-keepers—it would open the way for them to act out their principles, and thus lead men to question the sacredness of Sunday. No doubt this objection exists in many minds, and leads them to wish that Sabbath-keepers were banished from their midst. Indeed, there are probably not a few persons who would cheerfully contribute something towards paying the expense of colonizing them upon some lonely island or far-off continent. For our part, however, we are not disposed to accommodate such persons, either by leaving the country, or by submitting to legal enactments which require us to do all of our Sunday work in our "own shops," or in our "woods." We claim, and expect sooner or later to enjoy, the same privileges and immunities on the first day of the week as our neighbors enjoy on the seventh day. We ask for nothing more—we can accept nothing less. To accept less, would be to acknowledge a principle which, if carried out to its legitimate results, would give a death-blow to religious freedom. It would require that in a community of which the majority were Presbyterians, Baptists should do their baptizing in their own houses out of sight; while in a community of which Baptists should happen to be the majority, Presbyterians might be subjected to a similar necessity. Such a principle we never can acknowledge—never will acknowledge while we have strength to oppose it.

OLD TIMES IN NEW ENGLAND.—A correspondent of the Christian Reflector is giving some curious illustrations of the customs of the people thirty or forty years ago. He thus speaks of the custom, which was then common, of furnishing the ministers with all kinds of liquors when they were called together to examine a candidate for ordination:—

"The last that I ever knew of intoxicating drinks being set on the table for the use of the ministers at an ordination or installation, was in my native town. Dr. Beecher was one of the council, and he moved that all the decanters be taken away before they proceeded to business, which was accordingly done. Some curious items of expenses attending ordinations are found in the ancient records of those towns which supported their ministers by a town tax. I have read many of them, and remember that a large part of the sums charged was for 'Rhum and Cyder,' as they used to spell the words."

SABBATH PETITION TO THE BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

Our readers will be glad to learn, from the following Petition, that in Great Britain as well as in the United States, the "powers that be" are receiving occasional intimations of their duty towards those who keep the Sabbath of the Lord. If such petitions could be sent up to the legislative halls of every government under which Sabbath-keepers are now living, the time would not be far distant when their religious views would be better understood, and their civil rights regarded.

Unto the Right Honorable, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled,

The Humble Petition of James Aiton Begg, Bookseller and Stationer, in the City of Glasgow—Showeth:

That your Petitioner is a Christian who receives as equally inspired the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, who reverences their authority, and desires to regulate his faith and practice by the maxims they inculcate and the examples they approvingly exhibit;—

That he believes the purpose of God at creation, in sanctifying and blessing the seventh day as the Sabbath, (a memorial of His having finished all things in six days,) was a purpose of love to all men; and as he finds no authority, direct or indirect, in the New Testament Scriptures, for the change which has been made, in substituting the first day of the week, (commonly called Sunday,) for the seventh day, (commonly called Saturday,) he has felt constrained, by conscientious convictions, for upwards of thirteen years, to return to the observance of the original Sabbath;—

That, in so conducting his business, abstaining from all secular employment on the seventh day, he encounters difficulties, and is liable to obstructions, arising out of the existing state of the law, which he considers it to be the duty of a wise and paternal government to remove;—

That the difficulties and obstructions referred to, are created by statutes passed in former ages, whereby every conscientious observer of the Sabbath of God's appointment is thereupon liable to interruptions, while he is also weekly prevented from giving obedience to the divine commandment of working on the other six days, being debarred from following his honest calling on the first day, which he regards as wholly destitute of divine sanction as a day to be set apart for sacred purposes;—

That, under the authority of those laws, Sabbath-keepers may be required to appear in Courts of Law, and may have civil process served upon them, on the Sabbath;—

That your petitioner, having recently been called to serve as a Juror in the Circuit Court of Justiciary, was indebted solely to the indulgence of the Court for the opportunity afforded him of retiring as the Sabbath drew on; a privilege which might have been refused, and in consequence, he might have been subjected to penalties, for refusing to violate what he firmly believes to be the will of his God and Saviour;—

That, although, for upwards of two hundred years past, there have always remained in our land, Christians observing the seventh day as the true Christian Sabbath, yet, under the operation and enforcement of our laws enjoining Sunday sanctification, others, holding this faith and practice, felt themselves necessitated to seek refuge in America, where now there are many Sabbath-keepers, scattered throughout the different States of the Union, (there being five thousand in that of New York alone,) recognized there as virtuous, industrious, and peaceable citizens; and, by a late arrival from that country, there are accounts of the introduction into the Legislature of the State of New York, of a Bill for the amendment of a former law, enacted specially in their favor;—

That your Petitioner has no desire to leave his native land; and having ascertained that a Bill has been introduced by the Right Honorable the Lord Chancellor, and is now upon your Lordships' table, having for its object, the relieving certain of Her Majesty's subjects from penalties incurred on account of their religious opinions, he prays your Lordships that Sabbath-keepers may be allowed to share in the privileges of its provisions.

May it, therefore, please your Lordships, to take your petitioner's case into favorable consideration, and to grant relief and protection to all who may observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, by framing such enactments as shall prevent them from being required, against their conscience, on the seventh day, (reckoning it, as in sacred Scripture, from evening to evening, commencing with the preceding evening at sunset,) to appear as witnesses, or to serve as jurors, in any Court of law; that they may be protected from having civil process served upon them, and be exempted from the necessity of appearing in civil Courts in relation to any such process, on that day; and, that they be not, in any other way, required, against their conscience, to engage in affairs of a secular nature on the day which they regard as the Sabbath of the Lord; but that there may be extend to them, in regard to that day, the enjoyment of equal privileges, in their seeking to maintain its sacred character inviolate, as are enjoyed on the first day by those who ascribe sacredness to it;—And, farther, that your Lordships may grant protection to all Sabbath-keepers from molestation or restriction in following their usual lawful occupations on the first day of the week, when, by nature, these avocations do not interfere with the rights of others.

And your Petitioner will ever pray.

J. A. BEGG.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—The First Alfred Sabbath Tract Society has contributed Fifty Dollars to the treasury of the American Sabbath Tract Society, to constitute Bro. James R. Irish a LIFE DIRECTOR. This is as it should be. Auxiliary Societies, by contibuting in this way, best promote the object of the General Society, as they not only add to the funds of the Society, but also add valuable members and managers to conduct its affairs. Will not others go and do likewise? According to the Constitution, twenty dollars contributed at once, or in two payments, constitute any person a Life Member; or fifty dollars, in the same way, a Director for Life. T. B. S.

DEDICATION.—The Church at Rockville, R. I., have recently completed a new house of worship, which was dedicated on first-day, March 22d, with interesting and appropriate religious services. The order of exercises was as follows:—

1. The congregation joined in singing the 261st Hymn.
2. The Scriptures were read by Eld. W. B. Gillett, of New Jersey.
3. The choir sung the 260th Hymn.
4. Prayer was offered by Eld. Clarke, of Hopkinton, followed by Eld. Gillett.
5. Singing—"The Lord is in His Holy Temple."
6. A Discourse was delivered by Eld. Gillett, from Collossians 1: 18—"And he is the head of the body, the Church."
7. Singing—"The House of God."
8. Dedication Prayer by Eld. Coon, of Hopkinton.
9. Singing—"Salvation to our God."
10. Benediction by Eld. Coon. A. B. B.

MISSIONS IN WESTERN AFRICA—THE RECAPTURED SLAVES.—A full meeting was held in New York on Wednesday evening of last week, the object of which was to present to the friends of the Missionary Enterprise in Western Africa the immediate and pressing claims of the Liberia Mission upon their sympathies and generous contributions. After a prayer, documents were read relative to the case, condition, &c., of the Africans recently recaptured from the slaver Pons, most of whom are said to be young. An address was then made by the Rev. Mr. Roberts of Jersey City, who was followed by Mr. Scudder of this city. Mr. Roberts alluded to his own early interest in the cause of Missions, and made an able and effective appeal on behalf of the recaptured slaves. Mr. Scudder presented a vivid picture of the condition of the slaves while on board the Pons, and said he regarded their capture as the work of the Almighty, for it was by this means that they had been brought in contact with the missionaries, and placed in the way of obtaining that knowledge which was debarred them in their former state. The business of subscription was then taken up, and by ten o'clock the Recording Secretary reported the sum of eleven hundred and fifty dollars, exclusive of the miscellaneous collection.

THE RE CAPTURED SLAVES.—A meeting of the Colonization Society was held last week at the Tabernacle in New York, when about $700 was raised for the support of the slaves re-captured on board the bark Pons.

MISSIONARY INCOME.—The income of the English Wesleyan Missionary Society for the year 1845 exceeded that of any former year, being the truly noble sum of one hundred and twenty thousand eight hundred twenty-three prounds, or about five hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

EMBARKATION OF MISSIONARIES.—The Rev. George W. McMillan and his wife embarked from Boston for Madras, a few days ago. They are sent out by the American Board to join the Madura Mission, in Southern India. Religious services were held on board the ship, as she was about to leave the wharf.

BAPTISM OF A CONVERTED JEW.—We learn from the Christian Observer, that on Sunday, the 15th ult., Mr. Victor Herschell, a convert from Judaism to Christianity, was baptized [sprinkled] in the Seventh Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia. Mr. H. is a brother of the Rev. Ridley H. Herschell, of London, who recently visited this country, and who, since his conversion, has been actively engaged in missionary labors among his Jewish brethren.

INCONSISTENCY.—A writer in one of the Boston papers is showing up some of the inconsistencies of the advocates of Sunday legislation. In his last article he speaks as follows:—

"The first day was not the Sabbath, is not, and never can be the Sabbath, until a new creation takes place, and God rests from his labors on the first day; then, and not till then, will the first day be the Sabbath. Mark that! . . . Now if those who acknowledge the law of the Sabbath binding on them, would keep the seventh day as commanded, they would be entitled to credit for consistency. If they say, as I presume they will, that the day was changed to the first, it is for them to prove it, by showing when and by whom it was changed. Should they even succeed in doing this, it would not prove that those who do not make a profession of Christianity are bound to observe Sunday, but that they themselves are only bound to observe it in consequence of their profession to do so."

DEGREE.—A correspondent at De Ruyter says: "I see by the Circular of Castleton (Vt.) Medical College, that the honors of the Institution were conferred upon Dr. Ir. a Spencer, of De Ruyter, at the last annual session, by an honorary degree of Doctor of Medicine. This is a mark of respect to which Dr. S. is richly entitled. As a man and a physician he is much esteemed among us." [Chenango Telegraph.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The SENATE is still engaged upon the Oregon question. Attempts have been made to fix a day when the vote shall be taken, but they have failed. A message was received from the President, in answer to an inquiry from the Senate, whether there are any circumstances connected with the foreign relations of this country, which require an increase of our naval or military force. His answer is decided in favor of an increase.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES did but little business last week. The General Appropriation bill was the principal thing under discussion.

WRECK OF THE PACKET SHIP HENRY CLAY, WITH LOSS OF LIFE.—This magnificent ship, which sailed from Liverpool on the 22d of Feb., went ashore on Squam Beach, N. J., on the night of the 24th of March. The following particulars are given by the mate, who reached New York on the 25th :—

The Henry Clay was driven ashore on Tuesday night, about 12 o'clock, on Squam Beach, about one mile and a half north of the place where the John Minturn went ashore. The gale from the south-east was dreadful, and when the ship struck she broached-to broadside on, the sea making a breach over her. Captain Nye ordered the masts cut away in order to ease her, and although she thumped heavily during the night, she remained perfectly tight until about daylight, when the keel broke off and she commenced making water.

At this juncture the second mate, Mr. Cooley, volunteered to attempt carrying a line to the shore in the life-boat. Four of the sailors accompanied him, and they succeeded in reaching the beach, where already many persons were assembled, all eager to render assistance. Having established a communication by drawing a hawser on shore and making it fast, the second mate gallantly returned to the ship, but owing to the drift of the spars around her, he was unable to approach within several yards. He therefore laid off under the hawser, while along it six persons made their way and dropped into the boat. Thus freighted with 11 souls, he was drawn again toward the shore by a line there made fast; but before the boat could reach it, an overtopping wave broached her to, stove in the side, and six of the passengers, of whom two were seamen and the other four second cabin passengers, were drowned. Mr. Cooley and the other five clinging to the wreck of the boat, it was drawn ashore and taken from the surf, Mr. Cooley then senseless, having been dragged down by one of the crew, who had seized and held on to his leg.

As soon as he had recovered, this gallant fellow was for again attempting the rescue of those on board, amounting in number to more than 300 persons, of whom were four cabin passengers, two gentlemen and two ladies, the other steerage passengers and seamen. The men on the beach, however, who by this time numbered some 80 or 90 persons, dissuaded him from any farther attempt, as the tide was falling, and undertow very strong. Meantime they promised to busy themselves in establishing other lines from the shore to the ship, and as Captain Nye, who remained in the ship, had hailed Mr. Cooley while in the boat, and, as well as he could understand, had said something about sending up word to New York, Mr. C. at once started from the beach, and by dint of hard riding reached New Brunswick just as the Philadelphia night train was coming through, and so came on to this city.

The Henry Clay had no pilot on board, and on account of the thick weather experienced within the three days previous to going ashore, the Captain had not been able to get an observation. The first intimation of being near land was when she struck the beach. She belonged to Grinnell, Minturn & Co.'s line of Liverpool packets, was built by Messrs. Brown & Bell in the early part of last year, and made her first voyage from this port to Liverpool in May. She was one of the largest and most magnificent packets belonging to this port.

EASTERN TRAVEL—CHEAP FARE.—The New-York Farmer and Mechanic says: "The coming season promises to open in favor of cheap traveling for the public. A lease of the Stonington railroad is said to have been obtained by the owners of the mail line of steamers, the Oregon and Knickerbocker, will commence their trips about the first of April, at which time they take possession of the route. The Worcester and Cleopatra, owned by the Long Island Railroad Company, and the new steamer California, owned by the Norwich and Worcester Road, will form the regular Worcester line; while the New-Jersey Steam Navigation Company will put in requisition the Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Narragansett and Mohegan, to run outside; also, that old favorite, the Neptune, of the opposition, will call for her share of public patronage."

The Express says: "Warm weather, which will start the travelers, will put the fare down, so far as the boats are concerned, to a point below what has ever been known, and the profits of the boats will be small. A combination or a compromise may be made, but it is hardly to be expected."

OLD TIMES.—In 1627, there were but thirty-seven ploughs in Massachusetts, and the use of these agriculture implements was not familiar to all the planters. From the annals of Salem, it appears in that year it was agreed by the town to grant Richardson Hutchinson twenty acres of land in addition to his share, on condition "he got up ploughing."

1643. The court order, that at the election of assistant, four Indian beans should be used instead of paper,—the white to be affirmative, and the black negative.

1646. The court order, that if any young man attempt to address a young woman without the consent of her parents, or in the case of their absence, of the County Court, he shall be fined £5 for the first offence, £10 for the second, and be imprisoned for the third.

1649. Matthew Stanly, was tried for drawing in the affections of John Tarbox's daughter, without the consent of her parents; convicted and fined £5—fees, 2s. 6d. Three women was fined 5s. each for scolding.

1653. Jonas Fairbanks was tried for wearing great boots, but was acquitted.

THE ALPACA.—An Association has been formed for the purpose of introducing this beautiful animal into the United States. It seems that in England the experiment has been successfully tried; that in that climate the female became matured two years earlier than in its native mountains, and produced finer wool than was imported from South America, having more "yolk" imparted to it by the superior pasturage, that the fleece was increased seventy per cent, the length of the staple being also much improved; and that they were hardy, docile animals, affected neither by intense cold, rain or heat.

"The clip in Peru weighs nine pounds, while that in England is said to weigh seventeen and a half. The flesh is fine, savory, easily digested, and recommended in Peru by physicians to invalids in preference to fowls. The fleece of one alpaca is equal to six merino sheep. In 1834 England imported 6000 lbs. of wool; up to 1845, she had imported 12000 lbs.

REV. CHAS. T. TORREY.—We learn from Philadelphia that Mr. Torry is expected to live but a few days longer, and that Messrs. A. A. Phelps and C. D. Cleaveland, who have been active in the efforts to procure his release, meeting with insuperable difficulties, have withdrawn their offers to compensate the owners of the slaves whom Mr. Torrey aided to escape from Baltimore, making a powerful appeal to Gov. Pratt for his unconditional pardon. The probability is that this appeal will not be heeded, and that Mr. Torrey will die in prison.

GREAT EFFECTS FROM SMALL CAUSES.—The New-Hampshire Statesman says that Mr Mark Gillis, of Nashville, an ardent Loco-Foco, lost a favorite horse during the election labor. He had been some distance from the place of meeting, to procure two or three delinquent voters, and was upon full drive toward the ballot-box, when his horse had a leg instantly broken by stepping into a hole in the bridge over which they were passing. The delay caused thereby resulted in the election of Messrs. Gay and Beard, two staunch Whigs. The voters in charge of Mr. Gillis would have turned the scale the other way. The Whigs instantly started a paper, and raised and paid Mr Gillis the value of his horse.

MOCK AUCTIONS.

In this city are many men who hire a store, and open an auction for the sole purpose of robbing strangers. Every thing around is in the style of a regular auction, with an auctioneer and several interested bidders in the robbing conspiracy. All manner of deception, under the cover of trade, is practiced to rob those who may fall into the clutches of these mid-day highwaymen.

To put strangers on their guard, the Mayor has employed a man, bearing in front of these robber auction-rooms this significant banner in blazing capitals, "STRANGERS, BEWARE OF MOCK AUCTIONS!"

For so generous and noble a stand in behalf of strangers who visit the city, the Mayor is deserving of the best feelings of the entire community. As our chief city magistrate has made so favorable a beginning, may we not hope that he will strike a still heavier blow by exposing the various other evils that abound in this community.

TURNING THE TABLES.—The Mock Auctioneers in Chatham-street, have hit upon a method of escaping the effects of Mayor Havemeyer's locomotive placards, 'Beware of Mock Auctions,' which does much credit to their ingenuity, if not to their honesty. They have flaming handbills stuck up inside their own establishments, containing the portentous caution, in the biggest kind of letters—'Beware of Mock Auctions!' If a countryman calls they immediately direct his attention to the Mayor's men with the placards, and observe that there are some very suspicious establishments 'just above,' and that they have to hire this man with his placard to go up and down the street and prevent strangers from being taken in! This is the cunningest piece of work yet.

AN ELOPEMENT.—In consequence of fair promises of marriage, a young lady of Cabotville, Mass. (a manufacturing town on the line of the Boston and Albany Railroad.) was induced to elope with a young man at that place. They took 'French leave,' and went straight on to Buffalo as fast as the steam horse could whirl them there. On their arrival at that city, they took rooms at one of the first hotels, and the young man told the all unsuspecting girl that he had sent out for a minister, who would sood tie their destinies together in the 'hard knot' of matrimony. But then, poor creature, came a bitter disappointment—a destruction of the airy castle hope had built. Under this comforting assurance, and taking advantage of her confidence in the near approach of the consummation of all her fondest anticipations and brightest dreams, the faithless villain attempted to accomplish the ruin of the fair girl whose affections he had won, and who had given convincing proofs of her attachment to him, and reliance on his promises. But the fellow was baulked in his infamous design. The vigorous resistance of the poor girl, and her cries for help, brought assistance ere her strength failed her. The landlord burst into the room, and soon received a frank and honest statement of all the circumstances from the poor girl. His measures were quickly taken. At his request the weeping girl left the room. Then locking the door, he said to the faithless, heartless fellow—"Now, you contemptible scoundrel, bring to me all your baggage and open it." The command was obeyed. "Now," he added, "strip yourself of all your outer garments, and hand them to me." This order was also obeyed. He then searched his trunk and pockets, and taking therefrom all the money that he could find, amounting to about $60, he returned the fellow his clothes and baggage, and when he was dressed, gave him a hint to leave the house that he was not slow to take. He then gave the girl all the money, and putting her in the safe charge of a friend, sent her home to Cabotville. He has since received a letter from her, thanking him heartily, in the name of herself and her parents, for his timely aid in rescuing her so effectually from an unmitigated villain.

The landlord has his reward. We trust the false hearted seducer will receive the full punishment his villainy merits. [Albany Citizen.

DINAH DEPUY.—This aged and eminent disciple of Christ, widely and familiarly known in this city and elsewhere as "Aunt Dinah," on Friday the 20th inst., listened to the welcome summons, "child, your Father calls, come HOME!" Few among the living have exhibited in so high a degree of the power of faith, and few of the Lord's poor have done more to honor his holy name. God had given her a dark skin—man had in consequence made her his slave for near 50 years—grace received made her the Lord's free woman in the highest sense. She was emancipated from human bondage at an advanced age, learned to read, and has been a burning and shining light in the Church for many years. "Having nothing and yet possessing all things," receiving "day by day her daily bread" in answer to prayer, she literally felt that she was a King's daughter, and possessed a happiness that Queens might envy. None who knew her could have witnessed her end without exclaiming. "Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like hers."

"Servant of God, well done,
Thy glorious warfare's past,
The battle's fought, the race is won,
And thou art crowned at last,
Of all thy heart's desire,
Triumphantly possess'd,
Lodged by the ministerial choir,
In thy Redeemer's breast."

SUMMARY.

The Salem Church, Ross county, Ohio, has recently sent $200 to the American Board, accompanied with an urgent remonstrance against the pro-slavery position of the Board, in which they say, 'We sustain no relation to the Board, implying approbation of the principles we have been reviewing!'

A lady consulted Dr. Abernethy respecting a nervous disorder, the minutia of which appeared to be so fantastical, that the doctor interrupted their frivolous detail, by holding out his hand for the fee. A one-pound note and a shilling were placed upon it, upon which he returned the latter to his fair patient with the angry exclamation, "There, ma'am! go and buy a skipping rope; that is all you want."

Ezekiel says that he heard of a rumseller who once experienced a generous emotion, which was something so entirely new and strange that he did not know what ailed him, and accordingly sent for a doctor.

A Pittsburgh paper says, that smoke is yet emitted from a portion of the ruins of the great fire in that city. Passing the site of the late Waverly House on Monday, we saw smoke rising from the ruins on the lot south of it—relic of the great fire of July last.

On Sunday week an old barn was burned at Syracuse, and a few days after a boy, whilst grouping about the ruins, discovered under a plank a hole in which was deposited dies and other materials for coining, and quite a large quantity of spurious halves and quarters of dollars.

The rioters at the recent municipal election, at Montreal, were not altogether devoid of gumption. A correspondent of the Kingston Whig says, on remonstrating with one of the gang who had possession of the hustings, for unusual violence towards a particular voter, the fellow made answer—"Sure we let that fellow off twice before without bating him, and he sneaks straight back again; what's the use of bothering so much to keep him off, when a trifling dimonstration will settle him for all day."

We learn from the Columbia (Ga.) Enquirer, that in conformity with a recommendation of the Grand Jury of Liberty county, a large and respectable meeting of the citizens, irrespective of party, was held at Hindesville on the 2d ult, to take into consideration the evils resulting from electioneering, and to devise some plan to arrest its progress in future.

In the debate in the Massachusetts Legislature on Friday, Mr. Giles, of Boston, said he was endeavoring to find some of the descendants of Miles Standish, as they had at the present time locked up in the British Court of Chancery, no less than six manors, yielding an annual income of £60,000.

Mr. Loring Larkins, formerly captain of the schooner Merchant, was tried at Charleston last week, on a charge of being about to engage in the slave trade, and convicted. The punishment is a fine of not more than $7,000, and imprisonment of not more than five years. It is time that some example should be made of such unprincipled Americans as are engaged in this infamous traffic. There are two other prisoners whose trials are now progressing.

In the neighborhood of Baltimore there is made annually from sixteen to seventeen millions of assorted cotton goods, besides five or six hundred thousand yards of duck, consuming more than twenty thousand bales of cotton per year.

Mr. John Barker, of Newburgh, has discovered a mode of mixing fine Wool and Fur in the manufacture of hat bodies, so as to avoid the weight and clumsiness of those composed wholly of the former, and the liability to crack of those composed of fur only. In the new hat, the elasticity given by the fur is combined with the strength of a wool body, avoiding the defect of either.

The trial of Albert J. Tirrell is progressing at Boston. His counsel has urged in extenuation of the prisoner's guilt, if he really be guilty, that he has been addicted from his childhood to a disease called Somnambulism, and that if he ever allowed himself to be drawn into the commission of the crime imputed to him, he must have been in this state, and was therefore (argues the counsel) unaccountable for the transaction.

One of the editors of the Christian Herald, says there are three theatres in Boston, two hundred gambling establishments, not less than [illegible] hundred houses of ill-fame, and two thousand places where intoxicating drinks are sold.

The Albany Citizen says that the State Canals will be ready for navigation by the 20th of April, or near that day.

The Hudson River Railroad, the Troy & Schenectady to Utica, and the New York & Connecticut Railroad bills have been ordered to a third reading in the Assembly.

The trial of Albert J. Tirrell, at Boston, for the murder of Maria Bickford, was concluded on Saturday. The Jury, after being out two hours, returned with a verdict of NOT GUILTY. After the reading of the verdict he was again arrested on the other indictment of Arson, and remanded to prison to await trial.

A proposition has been submitted to the Michigan Legislature to amend the Constitution of that State, so as to extend the right of suffrage to the colored man.

DIED,

At Westerly, R. I., on the 19th of March, CATHARINE, wife of Charles Bradford, aged 38 years. Few, during life, retain a larger space in the affections of a widely-extended circle of connections and friends, than Mrs. Bradford. But it was only in the domestic scenes of home, as an affectionate wife, and the kindest of mothers, that her virtues could be fully known and justly appreciated. To her afflicted surviving partner and children, in this trying dispensation of Divine Providence, the gratifying consolation remains and is cherished, that her pilgrimage here was passed in the faithful discharge of every moral duty, and that she died with the Christian's hope of a blessed immortality.

In Hopkinton, R. I., March 11th, LYDIA ANN, daughter of Gardner Burdick, aged 24 years. The deceased was a member of the 3d Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, and an ornament to the cause of Christ. In her sickness, she showed much of the beauty of holiness, and in her death she gave evidence of the sustaining power of religion in the hour of dissolution. A. B. B.

A FARM FOR SALE,

IN the township of Piscataway, State of New Jersey, lying north-east from New Brunswick, half a mile from the Bridge, half a mile from Snyder's Mills, and in full view of the railroad car-house. Said farm consists of about ninety-five acres of land, in a good state of cultivation, and well adapted to raising grain and vegetables. It has a good variety of fruit trees, considerable wood, and five acres of salt meadow. The house is in good repair, and has a well of water at the door. There is also a new barn, sheds, &c. ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,

LIKE A LITTLE CHILD.

FROM THE GERMAN OF TERSTEEGER.

A trustful little child that loves
And leaves all to his Father's care,
That all his Father's deeds approves.
Nor once to grieve or murmur dare,
Such, Saviour, let me ever be—
Such, my relation unto thee.

Make me a gentle little child,
Who knows but one on earth to love,
And who amid the deserts wild,
Dare not without his Father move,
But clasping close the outstretched hand,
Treads firmly on the shifting sand.

Oh! tend me as a wearied child,
And let me lie upon Thy breast,
And with Thy voice of love beguil'd,
Forget the foes that would molest.
With gentlest voice, O lull each fear!
With kindest hand, O dry each tear!

Thus, Jesus, Saviour, let me be
Not only child-like in my will,
But Thine own child—a child of Thee,
Whose love alone my breast can fill.
And if Thy child—Thine heir at last,
When earth, and grief, and care are past.

INTELLECTUAL TRAINING OF GIRLS.

I said I would have the intellect of girls as highly and richly cultivated as boys. I do not mean that some women have not now a better education than some men—but that take any given family, where the boys and girls are of equal capacity, and the boys will have the best education, for these reasons, they are not subject to so many interruptions, and they continue longer at their studies. Girls are kept from school if it is cold or hot; if it rains, snows, or is muddy; if there is company, they must stay to see them; if extra business, to help; and teachers can tell you how slow is their progress with such interruptions. At the age of twelve or fourteen they are taken from school permanently, because their labor is needed at home; boys of this age being of no use at home, are sent to school, if for no other reason but to keep them out of the way, whereas if they were trained to usefulness, they could all go to school, and all together do as much at home as is now done by the girls alone.

Girls having finished their education just when the foundation is laid, and the superstructure should have been reared, are then dressed like women, and begin to have company. A few years are spent in learning the arts of fashion, in dress and manners, and then commence the duties of life, without any preparation, except what little they have learned in cooking and other work, and this has been limited to a few things; for although the mother has prevented the daughter from going to school, the object was to forward the work, and not to educate the girl in house-keeping; so she has been employed in those things that required little thought or judgment; while the mother, or some other competent one, has done the difficult parts; and thus the poor girl is enfeebled every way, in body and mind.

How can girls be otherwise than delicate, when they are not allowed to do any thing that can possibly strengthen their physical powers—how can they be learned when they have not the time, and how can they have judgment and decision when others always think for them?

The rich do not take their daughters from school quite so young, as they do not need their labor; they usually send their girls where, to the rudiments of a common education, are added a smattering of what is called the higher branches, and they are soon perfected in these, at least in their own estimation; as a young girl of fourteen told me very complacently that she had "finished astronomy;" but the most of their time is spent in drawing, at the piano, worsted work, and French. They must paint, if they have no taste for it, play the piano if they cannot distinguish tunes, and speak French if they are never to use it.

Boys are not served so, compelled to learn what they never can use. With all these drawbacks, the daughters of the wealthy complete their education much younger than their sons. Does the objector ask, do you discard fashionable acquirements? No. I only ask that they keep their place. I would have every boy and girl learn to sing, and believe this knowledge, so far from taking from their other studies, would but expedite them, provided it was introduced by a good teacher, and at such times as the mind needed a change. I would have every boy and girl learn the principles of proportion and perspective, so that they could sketch correctly a landscape, an animal, a building, or machine; and if they had a taste for music or painting, I would improve it, but not at the expense of more important studies. The years from sixteen to twenty are usually worse than wasted with girls; they are generally spent in frivolous work, frivolous dressing, frivolous reading, frivolous talking and visiting, while with boys this is the time that they study the most if they are ever educated. The mind during this important period being neglected, has not been enlarged with philosophical, chemical, or other scientific truths. It has not been disciplined in mathematics and kindred studies; it has not been made precise in its judgment by the ethics of the Bible. I ask not that a woman be trained in a theological Seminary, and fitted for a minister, but I do ask for her a critical knowledge of the word of God, obtained if possible, by reading it in the languages in which it was originally written, "that she may be able to give a reason for the hope that is in her, with meekness and wisdom," and that "her conversation be with grace, seasoned with salt." I care not to have her versed in the 'whereas and aforesaids' of the law school, but I would have her understand national and personal rights, so that she can teach her boys to bear, or select others to bear, the magisterial sword of God, for the defence of the right and punishment of the wrong doer; before the political demagogue can teach him to abandon every moral principle for the sake of party.

A woman needs as thorough an education as a man, for these reasons. She has to bear a part in the conversation of the family; she should therefore be intelligent. She is called to act in trying emergencies as often as a man, and therefore needs a disciplined mind. The comfort and happiness of life depends as much on the right discharge of the duties of her peculiar province as on his; she should have knowledge, then, to fill it well. The training of children in the way they should go, devolves equally upon her, and for this greatest of human employments she must have wisdom.

The knowledge of books is but a part of the training of which I am speaking, but a very necessary part—the whole consists in the mental atmosphere which the mind inhales during the twenty-four hours, whether from books, conversation, or meditation, the whole carried out in action. I know a man of fifty years of age, who since leaving college has read every thing he could get; he has a peculiarly retentive memory, but has never used his knowledge either to benefit himself or others. This man is not educated—as well might you call the books he has read educated. He is of no more use than they are when laid upon the shelves, for he has not brought their practical truths into use.

The results of this miserable deficiency in the intellectual training of our girls, is felt in our laws. Laws are made for the protection of persons and property. Women have so long been called "angels," that men seem to have come to the conclusion that they have no persons to protect; and as for property, they say women do not know enough to take care of it, and therefore the laws and customs of society virtually say they shall have none to protect. If a man dies, and leaves a snug little property, which judiciously managed would support the family and educate the children, the law kindly steps in and appoints guardians for the children—as if their mother had suddenly become a monster—and a surrogate to settle the estate—as if she were an idiot; when all these expenses are paid, the wife finds herself with but little left, save landed estate, the rents perhaps not amounting to the taxes, and none of it can be sold until the youngest child is of age. The law, in its kind care for women, gives this wife and mother, one-third of the interest of this estate, or in other words, takes every cent from her.

This is not exactly burning a woman on the funeral pile of her husband, but is rather a refinement on Asiatic cruelty. It starves her and her children together over the grave of her husband. The property might have been originally the husband's, or it might have been the wife's—or, which is most generally the case, made by the united efforts and economy of both. But no matter, it belongs equally to both while they live, and exclusively to the survivor. Reverse the scene. Let the property be taken from the husband at the death of the wife, and he left to support the children without means, and then it would not be an equal wrong; for he could enter any of the various occupations by which money is made, and so support his children, but from which the wife is excluded by the arbitrary customs of society. "Power is inalienable right" Women have moral power because they have been morally trained, and just hear how the land resounds with calls to use it, and how that call is promptly responded to, in Abolition, Temperance, Moral Reform—yea, the more self-sacrificing the cause, the louder the shout—"Go a-head, the work belongs to you." Give women intellectual power, and think you they would be crushed with such laws and customs as now prevail?

The estate of a friend of mine, whose husband left 1800 acres of land in the country, besides some city property, being so situated that she and her children were reduced to want, she petitioned the Chancellor for a right to sell what was her own; and after much delay obtained leave to sell the least valuable lot, worth $500, the law expenses for which permission amounted to $150! How long would men bear such impositions? Until they had intellectual power to assert their rights, and no longer. I am not one of those who wish woman to vote, or be eligible to office; I only ask that she know enough to secure her rights.

How long must a woman strum the piano, do worsted work, or hem-stitch handkerchiefs, to convince law-makers that she is capable of taking care of her property for the benefit of herself and children, or to convince the merchant that she can keep his books as neatly and correctly as did her departed husband? Make every woman independent, qualify her to do something whereby she can get her own living. No matter if her father is rich; the rich child is frequently a poor woman; the monied wealth of the nation is constantly changing hands.—No man in this country, who is healthy, moral, and industrious, can fail to get a competency to support a family; no woman can do this, except she be so fortunate as to teach a Seminary, or keep a millinery; and yet, women do more hours' hard work than men; why should this be so? Political economists say it arises from the great number of laborers for the amount of labor to be done—there being but few things save house-work that women are permitted to do. Let women be educated so that they can compete with men in those branches of business where they can do just as well as men; they then open to themselves a road to competency. They can tend dry goods stores as well as men—they please most customers better as saleswomen. They can tend ladies' shoe stores, bakeries, music and book stores. They can set types, and shall I say edit, as well as men? They can keep the books of any firm, and no young lady should be considered educated until she could keep handsomely and correctly a set of books by double entry.

Would you not have a girl learn house-keeping? it may be inquired. I answer, Yes—every girl, rich or poor, should be made a good housekeeper, but there are more women than there is house-work to be done. But, says the objector, you will take from our young men their bread. Well, if some must do without bread, I am willing to have as many men as women starve. But I fear no such result. On the contrary, I expect there will be much fewer hungry persons than there are now, whenever the desired reform shall have been effected. There is all the prairie-land to be tilled, and the ocean to be peopled, the management of steam, every branch of architecture and the various mechanic arts, and wholesale business, which will be left to men altogether; the pulpit and the bar, the public offices, and foreign diplomacy, and many more avenues to industry and wealth, too numerous to mention. An industrious man will find enough to do. Let us place the woman on the same platform with men in a chance for a living.

Does the delicate mother fear that I would make her daughters masculine? What does she mean by masculine? Gross, brawling, reckless, uncouth, inelegant, thoughtless, immodest, presuming, impudent, ungraceful, without restraint, irreligious, without natural affection, despisers of fathers and mothers—any or all of these?—For the world I would not do it, and should be just as unwilling to have your sons such. Does she mean by masculine—thoughtful, judicious, wise, learned, independent, self-respecting—I plead guilty. I would polish every diamond, however small, to its full capacity. Remember, mother, when you teach your daughter fashionable accomplishments, they will perish with the using. But when you plant a truth in her mind, you have put there a germ that will swell and expand to interminable ages. Truth never dies, is never out of place, never comes in violent contact with other truth, but always has a niche which it beautifully fills, and forms a part of a grand unit. Do not be afraid, then, of letting it come in contact with your daughter's mind; it will not make her any thing that God will not approve and bless. [Adv. Moral Reform.

MISS BEECHER ON DANCING.

As this recreation is actually conducted, it does not tend to produce health of body or mind, but directly the reverse. If old and young went out to dance together in the open air, as the French peasants do, it would be a very different sort of amusement from that which is witnessed in a room furnished with many lights, and filled with guests, both expending the healthful part of the atmosphere, where the young collect in their tightest dresses, to protract for several hours a kind of physical exertion which is not habitual to them. During this process, the blood is made to circulate more swiftly than ordinarily, in circumstances where it is less perfectly oxygenized than healh requires; the pores of the skin are excited by heat and exercise; the stomach is loaded with indigestible articles, and the quiet needful to digestion withheld; the diversion is protracted beyond the usual hour of repose; and then, when the skin is made the most susceptible to damps and miasmas, the company pass from a warm room to the cold night air. It is probable that no single amusement can be pointed out, combining so many injurious particulars as this, which is so often defended as a healthful one. Even if parents who train their children to dance, can keep them from public balls, (which is seldom the case,) dancing in private parlors is subject to nearly all the same mischievous influences.

The writer was once inclined to the common opinion, that dancing was harmless, and might be properly regulated, and she allowed a fair trial to be made under her auspices by its advocates. The result was a full conviction that it secured no effect which could not be better gained another way; that it involved the most pernicious evils to health, character and happiness, and that those parents were wise who brought up their children with the full understanding that they were neither to learn nor practise the art. In the fifteen years during which she has had the care of young ladies, she has never known of any case where learning this art and following the amusement did not have a bad effect either on the habits, the intellect, the feelings, or the health.

Those young ladies who are brought up with less exciting recreations, are uniformly likely to be the most contented, and most useful, while those who enter the path to which this diversion leads, acquire a relish and desire for high excitement, which makes the more steady and quiet pursuits and enjoyments of home comparatively tasteless.

In reference to these exciting amusements, so liable to danger and excess, parents are bound to regard the principle which is involved in the petition, "Lead us not into temptation." Would it not be inconsistent to teach this prayer to the lisping tongue of childhood, and then send it to the dancing master to acquire a love for a diversion which leads to constant temptations that so few can resist? It is encouraging to those who take this view of the subject, to find how fast the most serious and intelligent portion of the community is coming to a similar result. Twenty-five years ago, dancing was universally practised by the young as a matter of course in every part of the nation. Now, in those parts of the country where religion and intelligence are most extensively diffused, it is almost impossible to get up a ball among the more refined classes of the community. The amusement is fast leaving this rank in society, to remain as a resource for those whose grade of intelligence and refinement does not relish more elevated recreations.

FACTS FOR NOVEL READERS.

The inveterate novel reader is sometimes driven to the admission, that the influence of this species of literature is generally evil, but excuses his own conduct, on the ground that his moral principle is firmly established, and that consequently there is no danger in his case. A few weeks since I met a young lady who justified the indulgence of her own taste for novels by this plea: "Oh," said she, "I would by no means recommend or countenance the indiscriminate reading of such romances as this, (alluding to one, in my view, of a very exceptionable character, which she had just laid down;) I know they must do mischief in a great many instances; but my principles are formed; the book cannot do me any harm."

When I hear such language as this, I fear there is need of the Apostle's admonition, "Let him that thinketh be standeth, take heed lest he fall." There is no doubt that a Christian can be so entirely under the influence of the Spirit, that the necessary temptation into which he may be thrown, will have little or no power over him. But let it never be forgotten, that in order to secure this triumph, he must keep within the boundaries which the Spirit has marked out for him. He must be able, consistently, to repeat the petition, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." Can he do this, and rush into the very midst of temptation? The Christian, forsooth, has so much moral principle that novel reading can do him no harm! God has promised to defend him from all the "fiery darts of the wicked!" But who told that Christian he would escape unscathed from the lightning heat that has destroyed and is destroying its victims all around him? In what part of the Bible has he found the promise that the Spirit of the living God would smile upon him while he indulged a morbid appetite for exciting literary stimulants, and preserve his moral constitution unharmed, though he should choose to drink poison? In what stage of his career, as a disciple of Christ, has he seen the finger of the Lord pointing to such a course? We have some wonderful instances on record, of the interposition of God for his saints, when they were in danger; but none, that ever I have read of, where those saints needlessly and presumptuously went out of their way and courted danger. This indeed is little less than trifling with the Providence of God.

Our Lord and Master was tempted, sorely tempted, no doubt. The same deceiver who is now "as a roaring lion going about seeking whom he may devour," tried his best to defeat the glorious plan of salvation in this way. Among the ingenious schemes which he resorted to, was this, perhaps more ingenious than all. He persuaded and obtained our Saviour's consent to go with him to the top of one of the high towers on the temple. "Now," said the tempter, "throw thyself down—there will be a miracle wrought for thy salvation—there is no danger—thou knowest it is written in the Scriptures, 'He shall give his angels charge concerning thee.' Throw thyself down from hence." But the Lord did no such thing. Why? He gives his own reason. "It is written, thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." That is, thou shalt not try him—thou shalt not, by throwing thyself voluntarily into danger, without any divine command or permission, trifle with the promises made to those who are by the providence of God brought into danger.

We read of a man of strong faith who had to take up his lodgings with several hungry lions; and of some other godly men, who were thrown into a furnance heated till the malice of wicked men could make it no hotter. These men suffered no harm. They could not avoid the danger They were condemned, because they feared God rather than man—and God sustained them, and showed the rulers of the earth that "it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes."

Had these men rushed into this danger, in the absence of any such circumstances, they might have professed ever so much reliance on the promises of God, and it would have availed them nothing.

It is just so with the novel reader. He is satisfied that the legitimate influence of the novel is evil. Be his principles ever so firmly established then, he has no guaranty of his safety. Sending angels to deliver a Daniel from the power of the lions, and sending angels to help a novel reader from hurting himself while he is indulging a depraved taste, and tampering with his passions, are two very distinct acts of Providence; and the presumption that angels will come in the latter case because they came in the former, is, to say the least, not warranted by Scripture or reason.

Many a victim has been ruined by this false confidence. It was but a few brief months ago, and we all read with the utmost surprise that an ambasador of Christ, whose praise was in all the churches, had fallen from the high eminence to which his genius and his supposed piety had raised him. His name is now a by-word among the enemies of the cross of Christ. That man, according to his own confession, owes his fall to an appetite early formed, for elegant but exciting works of taste. He flattered himself that he had "moral principle" enough and to spare; and so he revelled in the fascinating scenes of Byron and Bulwer. Alas for moral principle, when a literature from the bottomless pit, with all the trappings of elegance and classic beauty are needlessly and presumptuously brought to bear upon it! Alas for virtue, when unprotected by the Holy Ghost! This man fell, and oh, into what a fearful gulf did he fall!!

Reader, in vain is all your reliance on moral principle, if you place yourself beyond the bounds where God has promised to protect you. If you are reading the fashionable exciting novels of the day, there is no safety for you, be your principle what it may. There is no safety for you, because you are on the enemy's ground. The fact of your being in your present position, is evidence in itself that you have virtually tempted the Lord your God. He has never promised to protect you where you are. You are on dangerous ground. You have no assurance that you are safe until you escape. [Adv. Moral Reform.

THE WAY TO BE HAPPY.—Happiness is always to be found if we only condescend to pick it up seed by seed. As none of its ingredients should be thought too minute to be gathered and added to our store, so none should be deemed too insignificant for distribution to others. Occasions for conferring great benefits do not often occur, and when they do it may not be in our power to bestow them; but the little services and gratifications which every current day places within the reach of the humblest member of society will constitute, if we all throw our share into the common stock, no inconsiderable aggregate of human enjoyments and mutual good will.

THE CURSE OF SODOM.

"For we will destroy this place, because the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the Lord, and the Lord hath sent us to destroy it." Gen. xix. 13.

There's a wail in the blast that is sweeping the plain,
And the sky is o'erspread with a mantle of gloom,
For vengeance broods over iniquity's reign,
And the angels of warning now herald its doom!

Mourn—mourn o'er the city that lifteth its pride,
The wreath that is kindling shall humble it low,
And consuming destruction encompass it wide,
For the just are not found who may ruin forego!

Flee away to the mountain ye righteous for life!
Linger not! heed the warning that mercy hath given;
Abroad on his mission, through darkness and strife
Death shall ride in his might at the bidding of Heaven!

Aye, wail now ye wicked! none heedeth your cry,
The arm of Omnipotence wieldeth its ire,
And the vengeance that long hath slept silent on high
Cometh down on your homes in a tempest of fire!

A cloud goeth up from the land to proclaim
That in ashes the fair city smouldering sleeps:
All left of its glory a wreck and a name;
While eve deepens o'er it her shadows and weeps!

DELTA.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

A friend has laid upon our table a bound volume of the "New-York Gazette and the American Weekly Mercury," published in New-York and Philadelphia, over a hundred years since. The following notice from the Mercury is dated January 8, 1740.

"The Rev. Mr. Whitfield having taken up 5000 Acres of land on the Forks of the Delaware in this province, in Order to erect a Negro School and settle an English town, All persons who are disposed to contribute to said school, may pay their contributions to Mr. Benezet Merchant in Second st., The Rev. Mr. Gilbert Tenant at New Brunswick in New Jersey, Mr. Henckman, Bookseller in Boston, or to the printer of this paper."

We copy the above precisely as it was printed, as a specimen of many others contained in the publication. Our readers would regard this antique volume—could we pass it round—as a curious literary medley. The paper on which it is printed would now be deemed scarce fit for wrapping paper; the types used, the language, orthography, forms of expression, arrangement of articles inserted, and the subject matter mark the work as a reminiscence from a generation that have long since passed away. We have looked upon it in its homely guise, with a feeling akin to reverence—not unlike that produced by beholding locks of hair, preserved from the grave of buried friends. This old book is a truthful mirror of what was passing one hundred years ago. When the population of the city was something less than 10,000—a sixth part were slaves, and the city and province were under the English government. The first stage route had not then been started between New-York and Philadelphia—the "Bouwery" was spoken of, as a farm quite out of town—vessels were two months in crossing the Atlantic, and several days in going to Albany, several tribes of Indians resided in the interior of the State, and their wild game, free as the mountain roe, coursed over hill and plain.—The scenes of the Revolution, were then hid by the veil of futurity—National blessings, civil and religious, then in store for our common country, were scarce conceived; the power of steam was unknown, and the idea of "chaining the lightning," would have been regarded a vagary, as wild as any that ever crossed a disordered brain.

One may open this volume, and take his stand with the actors who penned its columns, with his mind's eye on the then passing events, also on what has since transpired, and a book of God's Providence will open before him full of instruction. If he fails to see in it the traces of a Divine hand, dull, dark, and blind must be his mental perceptions. Where is the slavery that a hundred years ago stained the honor of our goodly state, and held its galling yoke upon so large a portion of our citizens? Thanks be to God that here He has numbered it with the things that were. Who can count the blessings and privileges that the unfolding scroll of time, has scattered in the pathway of the present age? Suppose our fathers had seen them in the distance, as clearly as Moses beheld the land of Canaan, would they not have exclaimed to their children, "there's a good time coming, wait a little longer." Suppose they could have seen only the cup of good that has been extended to man, divested of the evil that man's sins have mingled with it, how unbounded would have been the joy of anticipation. This view would have required a wider scope of vision than the present time. But is it not yet to be? Has not the Christian's Magna Charta depicted it in shades of living light? (See Isa. 60: 21, and 61: 11, and Zech. 14: 20, 21.) Is not the Car of human progress being moved steadily in that direction by an unseen and irresistible agency? Search and look, for he that runs may read. Not only "get off the track" but put thy shoulder to the wheel of that Car, with all the moral strength that God has given and that faith may give.

The above extract was selected instead of others, because it mentions two names dear to the church of Christ.—A hundred years ago, WHITFIELD and TENANT, those men of God, stood where we stand—here they lived and toiled, endured and suffered, till their earthly mission was accomplished, and they were called to go up higher. Their names have outlived their age, will outlive ours and many yet to come—for their deeds of love have left "Footprints on the sands of time" that time's flowing waters will fail to wash away. But how few that now venerate the name of WHITFIELD remember that in his day and while doing his Master's work with singleness of purpose, he was assailed by calumny, his aims misrepresented and his good, evil spoken of. His Biographer informs us that the specific object of benevolence that first introduced him so extensively to the churches, was reported as having been started by him for sinister ends.—Obstacles were laid in his path, by those from whom he had reason to expect sympathy, and like many that have lived before and since, he shared the lot of the Christian in being chastened, and tried, and purified in the furnace of affliction. The long silence of the grave has buried in oblivion the accusations of his foes, while his virtues and the blessed truths he taught, are still had in lasting remembrance. A hundred years to come will also pass as a tale that is told, and ere they have gone it would not be matter of surprise, should the name of the founder of this association, (maligned and reviled as it has been,) find the place it deserves with the list of the benefactors of past ages. But whether it shall be so or otherwise with them or those who may walk in his steps the evanescent nature of all things earthly when rightly appreciated, makes the displeasure of the few or the approbation of the many, seem of small account. The balances of Eternity will soon reverse all wrong decisions, and then the redeemed soul will realize most perfectly, that

One God-approving smile "whole years outweighs"
Of human censure or of human praise.

POWER OF TRUTH.

Once on a time an ancient king,
Required to know what was the strongest thing;
One said it was a king, another—wine,
A third, that it was woman, all divine;
But women, wine or kings, the fourth declared,
With simple TRUTH was not to be compared.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

From the London Child's Companion.

THE CHILD IN THE DARK VALLEY.

"My Father! through the valley's shade
Will you not go with me,"
The dying boy with faintness said,
"And my protector be?"

"My son! my son! I must abide
The time which God hath set;
Life's toils my path must still betide,—
Mine hour is not come yet."

"O, mother, you have always blessed
Your little boy—will you
Go with me in the shades of death,
And help my passage through?"

"My child! I would, but cannot go;
God hath not called for me:—
But Jesus waits for thee, I know,
And he will go with thee."

"Yes!—father!—mother!—yes, I see—
The valley now is light;—
My Saviour walks along with me,
And Heaven appears in sight!

"How sweet the music that I hear!
Bright angels bid me come!
A little while, and I'll be there:—
I'm almost—I am—home!"

THE FIFTH COMMANDMENT.

Exodus xx: 12. Honor thy father and thy mother; that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

This the apostle calls "the first commandment with promise." Eph. 6: 2. By this he means that there is no promise connected with the preceding commandments. Thus he understands it as a promise, as though it read, "If you will honor your father and mother, your days shall be long upon the land." This also suppose that if they did not honor their father and mother, their days would not be long upon the land.

There is something here a little peculiar to the Jews. "The land which the Lord thy God giveth thee," means the land of Canaan, which was given to the seed of Abraham. It intimates the manner in which God would punish them if they did not obey the law. As their days were to be long on the land, if they obeyed, so the reverse was true if they disobeyed. This implied threatening could be fulfilled in one of two ways; by destroying them, or by driving them out of the land. God did punish them in both these ways, some were slain in the land, and some were carried away captives out of the land, so that their days were not long upon the land which the Lord their God gave them. The particular duty inculcated in this commandment is that of honoring our parents, and from the fact that God wrote it on a table of stone as a statute, we may infer that to dishonor our parents is a great sin. Though what was peculiar to the Jews may have changed, the obligation to honor our parents has not changed, and never can; it grows out of the relation we sustain to each other as parents and children, and lies deep in our social nature and mode of existence.

I. The nature of the duty here enjoined. To honor is to esteem or respect our parents. But where this respect is felt, it will show itself in our conduct.

1. We should always be modest and respectful in our behaviour in their presence.

2. We should always address them with deference and kind language.

3. We should always respect their authority and obey their commands so far as we can.

4. We should gratify their wishes in every thing that is not wrong, to the extent of our abilities.

5. We should provide for them as they may need, and as we may be able, when they become old and need assistance.

II. The reasons upon which this duty rests.

1. God has commanded us to do it.

2. It is but a reasonable return for what parents have first to do for their children. Children at first are helpless, and their parents have to nurse them, protect them, feed and clothe them, instruct and in every way provide for them until they can take care of themselves.

3. It is only on the ground that we honor our parents, that we can expect to be honored as parents by our children, and we all do or shall desire that. Let children, when they are inclined to disobey and dishonor their parents, think how they will feel when they shall be parents, and their children shall treat them in the same way. They can expect no better treatment. We will tell you a little story to illustrate this principle.

A son had got to be a man, and had a little boy of his own, and he thought he was a pretty little boy and loved him much. But his father was old, he had got all the property of his father into his own hands, and then was so cruel as not to be willing to take care of his old father. One day he gave his little son a blanket, and told him to go and give it to his grandfather, and tell him he must clear out, that they could not keep him there any longer The little boy replied in all his innocence, "Papa, Grandfather must not have all the blanket." "Why," inquired the doting father. "Because," said the child, "I shall want half of it for you, when you get to be old." This touched the heart of the cruel son and showed him his wrong, and he repented. Let us say then, children, "honor thy father and mother," for it is right, and of it you will never repent when you shall be old. [Juvenile Wes.

THE BEGGAR AND THE DIVINE.

Once on a time a divine who thought himself, and was thought by others, good; while taking a morning walk, happened to meet with a poor beggar, when the following dialogue took place.

Divine. God give thee a good morning.

Beggar. I never had an evil morning.

D. God bless thee and make thee prosperous and happy.

B. Nor am I unprosperous or unhappy.

D. Whence camest thou, and whither art thou going?

B. I came from God, and I am returning to him.

D. Who art thou?

B. I am a King.

D. But where is thy kingdom?

B. The kingdom of heaven is within me, so that my will and all my desires are subdued to the will of God, insomuch that what he wills I will also; hence, I never had an evil morning, and am not unprosperous or unhappy.

The divine concluded his walk full of thought, having learned a lesson on the subject of reconciliation and submission to God, which made him wiser than he was before.

THE EPHRATA MONUMENT.

Many of our readers are aware, that our German Seventh-day Brethren of Pennsylvania, though opposed to conflict with arms, were warm Whigs during the Revolutionary War; and that after the battle of Brandywine, they opened their extensive establishment for the reception of the wounded American soldiers, nursed them, and closed the eyes of some hundred and fifty. Within a twelve month some of the neighbors have formed an association to erect a memorial over their earthly remains. The corner stone of the monument was laid last autumn, in all due form; and we give below some extracts from the Oration of JOSEPH R. CHANDLER, Esq., delivered on that occasion; which bears honorable testimony to the patriotism, benevolence and piety of those unobtrusive followers of the Lord Jesus.

Col. J. Warren Scott, of New Brunswick, N. J., and his sister, (both now in very advanced age, but who were at Ephrata in 1777 with their father, Dr. Scott, who was one of the surgeons, charged with the care of the sick and wounded,) were present at the laying of the corner stone. The good old Colonel presided. Gov. Shunk officiated in laying the stone; delivered an address, and repeated it in German. Several other addresses were made to a great multitude of people who congregated to witness the ceremonies; which are spoken of as being deeply impressive.

We stand on holy ground. The soil beneath us is steeped in the blood of patriots—the very dust of the earth around us is companioned with the ashes of our nation's defenders; the solemn breeze of mid-day pauses as it sweeps along as if to take up again the notes of prayer and praise, which in other times it bore onward and upward, the odors that it had stolen from the wild flowers around, blending with the increase of piety which was breathed from this sacred hill.

We stand on holy ground. The patriotism that led to death the multitude of tenants of the earth below, has found response in the men of our day, who, not called to repeat the sacrifice, are yet able to appreciate the spirit in which it was made, and to acknowledge the obligation which it imposed.

We stand on holy ground. The sanctified piety which expresses itself in acts of goodness to others, is remembered here this day in gratitude, and the legitimate heirs of those who gave their home to the wounded patriot, and a grave to the dead, have come up hither to put their seal upon the deed by which this land in its new dedication becomes the nation's, and to show themselves heirs not more to the extended wealth than to the lowly and truthful virtues of their pure minded ancestors.

We stand on holy ground. A sense of the place and the duty, has hushed the martial notes that but now pealed upon the air. The lofty plume that was waving in the breeze is vailed in deference to the time; and freemen who were walking their sentry round upon the ramparts of liberty, to school themselves in its defence, have paused amid the solemnity of the hour and stand silent in the awful influences of the place and duties of the occasion.

What, Mr. President, what, Ladies and Gentlemen, has given sanctity to this place, and what gives consequence to the ceremonies of this day?

More than a hundred years ago a society of religionists, that had been lured to this country from Germany, by the representations of entire freedom of religious worship, gathered under a favored and a learned leader, and selected a portion of land including that on which we stand, and formed themselves into a religious community, adopting certain conventional rules consistent with their views of Scripture, and regulating their lives by the law of God; having a discipline whose peculiarity, which if a cross, was only a cross to themselves, while their intercourse with the world was distinguished by that practical benevolence which illustrates the command to love our neighbor as ourself.

Beneath their unfailing industry, the soil yielded a rare abundance. Their lofty independence, which was exhibited in the form of Christian humility, led them to avoid accessions by gift, that involved the risk of pride of possessions; and their patient labor gave activity to the richness of the soil, and made the wilderness blossom like the rose. But the piety which led them to impose restraints upon themselves, dictated enlarged regard for others. Their stored garner yielded its harvest up to the wants of the less provided, and their door was open to the afflicted and destitute. To them earth owed her teeming field and her flowery meadow; to them society was indebted for the fervor of sincere piety and the beautiful example of the most attractive morals. The austerity of monastic life never shaded the smile of benevolence upon their face; and the quaint garment with which they disguised their manly shape, never intercepted an appeal which misery aimed at their hearts, nor concealed from the wearers the truth, that they were men, and men were their brethren.

Society ought to have bestowed some imposing designation upon those, who thus by patient labor and constant piety,

"Gave blossom to nature, and morals to men;"

but historians, while they concur in their account of all the good qualities which distinguished this people, do not agree as to their name; and I shall not here discuss the propriety of the various appellations by which they have been known. The great charter of our faith seems not copious in terms of religious distinctions from which to select; but it appears to me, that until there shall be found another more appropriate, these humble religionists, who were content with the labors and vir- of the primitive followers of our faith, these residents of Mount Zion must be content also, like the primitive preachers at Antioch, with the simple designation of CHRISTIANS.

What were the peculiarities of the creed, and the customs of this people, it is not a part of my design to explain. They held, in common with some other Christians, however, the inconsistency of warfare with the doctrines of Christ. Whether they were right or wrong, it is for the theologian to decide—it is enough for us to know, that they were sincere in their creed, and if averse to strife themselves, were careful never to provoke it in others.

Their enlarged Christian benevolence led them naturally to correct views of the political rights of man; and few that drew the sword in the field, were at heart more of patriots, or in creed more of whigs, than were these peaceful tenants of Ephrata. And so true were they to the cause of the country, that in the hour of bitterest contests they seem on the eminence here, overlooking the affray in which they might not mingle, like the Hebrew prophet at Horeb, stretching forth the unarmed hand, a token and a means of success. And who shall say, that the fervent prayers which piety offered from this eminence, did not strengthen the hand of the patriot in the stricken field? Their prayers, ardent and pure, were for the men that stood for human rights, they looked upwards to God for a blessing on the means employed, and for the attainment of the glorious end—the means WERE blessed, and the end was attained.

* * * * *

How often, Mr. President, how often, Ladies and Gentlemen, when we conclude the perusal of some bulletin, or history of a battle, when we have sighed for the defeated, or shared the pride of the conqueror, do we dismiss the record as if the story was told; we leave the defeated on the retreat, and the victorious on their march of triumph, and suppose that, like some dramatic pageant, the interest has ceased, and the actors will resume their place and play their parts in another scene. But, alas! there is a dread reality in such a contest as that whose occurrence we this day commemorate.—There was more to excite our sympathy than the mortification of a defeat, which the leaders experienced. The beaten army retreated, but it left upon the field hundreds whom sickness and wounds detained; the excitement of the combat had passed off, and as the thunders of the cannon and the roar of the musketry ceased, the groans of the sufferers could be heard. Where could they be placed? What reception were the suffering and the dying to have among those whose fears or whose losses made them flee away from their own possessions?

The long train of various conveyances that came slowly up the distant valley where the field had been contested, the train that bore those whose shattered limbs seemed to defy the efforts of surgery, or whose contagious disease was like "the pestilence that wasteth at noonday," was received by the men of Ephrata as if it bore forward the ingathered harvest of the season; and they garnered up the wounded, the sick, and the dying, here in their edifices devoted to public worship, with a welcome and a care that only religion dictates, that only true patriotism could at that time have evinced. The dead, from that terrible congregation, were buried with all the decencies of friendship, and for a long time, with all the ceremonies of military propriety, in the choicest earth. "The frail memorials" that denoted the special resting place of some individuals, have long since perished, and the earth rises over the ashes of all who sleep below, in indiscriminate honor.

That strong sense of public duty towards the memory of the good, which is the characteristic of our State, and which should distinguish all republics, some time since suggested the erection of a token of the recognition of the debt we owe to the memory of these martyrs for liberty; and private donations and public liberality have secured a portion of the means; a column is to arise over the grave of these dead, a column which, while it tells of their resting place and their death, will stand as a testimony forever, not only of their sacrifice, but of our sense of the benefits that have resulted therefrom. Aye, let it rise, a landmark on the great manor of Freedom; a guide for those who inquire of the past the way; a record of the mighty cost of our National Independence, a proof that it was purchased with blood

* * * * *

Here we erect the landmark which shall tell to other times of the self-sacrificing virtue of our fathers, and proclaim our own ability to appreciate them. Every hill and valley that has been hallowed by patriot blood, should bear a memorial of its consecration. Bunker Hill lifts its column above the dust of those who fell upon its heights. Saratoga and Paoli are marked with the tokens of gratitude for those who fought or died upon their fields; and now peaceful Zion is to bear a testimonial to denote the resting place of those who sought refuge and found comfort in its religious halls. The pillar that speaks of these things shall be for a sign to other generations; and when they shall stand where we have stood, and know that the foe did not press this soil, but the sufferer for his country came hither and was warmed back again to life and labor, or was soothed downward to the grave, they shall bless the memory of those that lived and those that died on this hallowed place.

TRADITION.—We do injuriously, says Milton, in thinking to taste better the pure evangelical manna, by seasoning our mouths with the tainted scraps and fragments of an unknown table, and searching among the verminous and polluted rags, dropped over words from the toiling shoulders of time, with these deformedly to guild and interlace the entire, the spotless, the undecaying robe of truth, the daughter, not of time, but of heaven, only bred up here below in Christian hearts, between two holy nurses, the doctrine and discipline of the Gospel.

THE VILLAGE OF MILTON, WISCONSIN TERRITORY.

Somebody has sent us a western paper containing a full description of this young and thriving village, from which we make the following extracts:

Milton is delectably situated on Prairie Du Lac, in the township of Milton, Rock County, W. T., Section 27, Town 4 North, Range 13 East.

This pretty hamlet was laid out some two years ago by its present worthy and enterprising proprietor, Joseph Goodrich, Esq., a native of the 'Old Bay State.' Mr. Goodrich made a location at this point in the summer of 1838, but did not remove his family hither until the month of March, 1839, when he erected the first frame building on the Prairie. This building (a small red frame) is yet standing in the rear of his present residence.

On Mr. Goodrich's first visit to Prairie Du Lac, the population consisted of twenty-six bachelors, two married men and two females in what now comprises two townships. Decator Butts, a native of Pennsylvania, is said to have been the first who made a claim on the Prairie.

The village of Milton, although yet in the infancy of its existence, contains a well conducted Temperance tavern; an excellent Academy; a skillful physician; three dry goods stores; a drug store; a post office; a plough factory; a grain cradle factory; two blacksmith's shops; a joiner's shop; two boot and shoe makers' shops; one tailor's shop, and one cooper's shop; and is the residence of the Commissioner of Ohio for the Territory of Wisconsin.

There are four congregations in and around the village, viz: Seventh-day Baptists, Free-will Baptists, Methodists and Congregationalists. The Rev. Mr. Coon is minister of the Seventh-day Baptist congregation, and the Rev. Mr. Foote formerly of Racine, officiates as minister of the Congregationalists. The inhabitants are principally from New-York and New-England, with a few from old England, from the Emerald Isle, and from the land of Cakes.

The first store was opened by Mr. Goodrich in the red frame building above alluded to, in 1839.

The tavern, the academy, the dwelling of the Physician, and one of the blacksmiths' shops, are built of gravel and lime—a preparation for the discovery of which the public is indebted to the inventive genius of the intelligent proprietor of Milton.

The tavern is truly an object of curiosity. It is hexagonal in shape, and each wall measures twenty feet, giving an area of one hundred and twenty feet on each floor. The building contains a basement and two stories. The basement is constructed of hammered limestone, the first story and the basement are divided into three spacious rooms each, of diamond form. The roof is supported in the center by a stone pillar, which rises from the basement, and around which winds a circular stair case, leading to a rotunda in the second story, from which there is a communication with six convenient bed chambers. The roof of this novel edifice is concave on the surface having a declivity towards the center, where a pipe has been introduced for the purpose of conveying the rain water into a cistern in the rear of the basement story. The center of the pillar which supports the roof contains a vacuum of sufficient dimensions to admit all the stove pipes used in the different rooms. Each wall of the building is carried seven feet above the roof and terminates in the shape of a gable with an imitation chimney on the peak. The whole of this gravel structure, which cost about $1000, bears analogy to an ancient castle, the six gables serving as a balustrade. The walls are eighteen inches thick on the basement, fifteen on the first story, and twelve inches on the second story.

Mr. Goodrich informs me that a house can be built of gravel cheaper than of any other material, and so well satisfied is he with the permanency of gravel walls, that he intends to enclose all the fields on his extensive and highly cultivated farm with gravel fences. He uses only one bushel of lime to every seven or eight bushels of gravel.

The Milton Academy is located on the west side of the public square, and measures thirty-two feet in length, thirty feet in width, and twelve feet is height. It is surmounted by a handsome belfry, ornamented with gothic spires, and having a well toned bell of 65 lbs. weight. This useful and pretty edifice is also constructed of gravel. It was built by Mr. Goodrich in 1844, and is used not only for academical purposes, but serves also as a place of public worship for the Seventh-day Baptists, who hold divine service in it every Saturday.

The township of Milton is six miles square, including a small portion of Lake Koskonong with its pellucid outlet. And its inhabitants are deservedly esteemed for their strictly moral and temperate character. They are in truth 'a church-going people,' and to their credit be it spoken, that a glass of ardent spirits has never been sold within the boundaries of their township.

As a proof of the intelligence of the people of Milton, I would here state that one hundred and forty-eight newspapers and periodicals are taken at this place, and the average number of letters sent by each mail may be estimated at fifty.

"I MARK ONLY THE HOURS THAT SHINE."—The above, if we rightly remember, is the inscription upon a sun dial in Italy. It inculcates a beautiful lesson which too many are prone to disregard. It would teach us to remember the bright days of life, and not to forget the blessings God is giving us. Life, it is true, is not all bright and beautiful. But still it has its lights as well as its shades, and it is neither wise nor grateful to dwell too much upon the darker portions of the picture. He who looks upon the bright side of life, and makes the best of every thing, will, we think, other things being equal, be a better and happier man than those who, as Franklin says, "are always looking at the ugly leg," and find occasion for complaint and censure in almost every thing they meet with.

EFFECTS OF PRAYER.

A woman came to Halle one day, and said to Augustus Herman Franke, that it was as possible for the steeples should fall prostrate, as that she shonld lay down her hatred to her mother-in-law, who had so abused and outraged her that she could never be reconciled. Franke replied, "I am not surprised at your words, as I am persuaded that you are not able to reconcile yourself to your mother-in-law. You can be able only if you implore God's grace to do it. And now from my heart I ask you to promise me, that you will pray to God for a forgiving temper." The woman could not refuse. Some days after, she returned and said, "Now I will go and be reconciled to my mother in-law." She did so. Her own pastor asked her why she had not done so before. She replied, "you admonished me to be reconciled, but did not tell me how to get a forgiving spirit by praying to God."

PHILIP JAMES SPENCER had a son of eminent talent, but perverse and extremely vicious. All means of love and persuasion were without success. The father could only pray, which he continued to do, that the Lord might yet be pleased to save his son at any time and in any way. The son fell sick; and while lying on his bed in great distress of mind nearly past the power of speech or motion, he suddenly started up, clasped his hands and exclaimed, "my father's prayers, like mountains surround me!" Soon after his anxiety ceased—a sweet peace spread over his face—his malady came to a crisis, and the son was saved in body and soul. He became another man. Spencer lived to see his son a respectable man, in public office, and happily married. Such was the change of his life after his conversion. [N. E. Puritan.

THE PLACE OF THE BIBLE.—The Bible must be all or nothing. If it once be placed on a level with the tradition of man it is taken down from its high place and degraded, and will be soon forgotten. So it was in the dark ages. The sacred volume might be found in monasteries and palaces beautifully written and adorned with silver and gold. But it was a splendid curiosity, a costly ornament, to be exhibited and admired but not used. If here and there a wealthy nobleman owned a copy of the precious book, it by no means followed that he knew any thing of its contents. A large number of the priests themselves, were enwrapped in the same ignorance. All their knowledge of the Word of God was derived from the selections contained in the breviary and missal; and even these were imperfectly understood by many of them, their acquaintance with the Latin being frequently very slender. The mind of the common people was as dark as midnight.

SUBLIMITY OF THE BIBLE.—An obscure Scotch peasant, calling on business at a gentleman's house in Edinburg, saw a bust of Shakespeare, and these lines from the Tempest inscribed beneath it:—

"The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, should dissolve,
And like the baseless fabric of a vision,
Leave not a wreck behind."

The gentleman seeing the peasant's eyes attracted by these lines, asked him if he had ever seen any thing equal to them in sublimity. His reply was just and striking. "Yes, I have. The following passage from the Book of Revelations is much more sublime:

'And I saw a great white throne and him that sat upon it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away, and there was no place for them.'"

THE STRONG POINTS.—In the controversy with Romanism, it is well to keep in view the following strong points. 1. The sufficiency of the holy Scriptures. This Romanism denies, by setting up tradition as a joint and co-ordinate rule of faith. 2. The right and duty of every man to judge of and interpret the Scriptures for himself. This Romanism denies by setting up an ecclesia docens, or teaching church, to do the individual's thinking for him. 3. Justification by faith only in the atoning blood of Christ. This Romanism makes of non-effect by teaching that fasting, a partaking of the sacraments, confessing to the priest and the like, will avail to salvation. [Alliance and Visitor.

AGAINST PRESUMPTION.

What a madness it is in us to presume on our interest in God's favor for the securing of our sinfulness from judgment! The angels were deeper in it than we mortals can ever hope to be in these houses of clay, yet, long since, are ugly devils; and they who enjoyed the liberty of the glorious heavens, are now reserved in everlasting chains of darkness. And if we look down upon earth, what darling had God in the world but Israel? This was his firstborn, his lot, his inheritance; of whom he said, "Here I have a delight to dwell." And now, where is it? Oh, the woeful desolations of that select people. What is it to tell of the suffossion of her vineyards; vastation of her tents: the devouring of her land; demolition of walls; breaking down altars, burning of cities, spoiling of houses, dashing in pieces their children, ravishing their wives: killing of their priests; eating of their own children of but a span long; and a thousand such woeful symptoms of war? The Psalmist hath said a word for all, (in a just, but contrary sense,) "Destructions are come to a perpetual end;" what destructions can be more, when there is no Israel? How is that wretched nation vanished no man knows whither! So, as it was Jezebel's curse, that nothing was left whereof it could be said, "this was Jezebel;" so, there is not one piece of a man left in all the world of whom we can say, "This was one of the tribes of Israel." As for those famous churches which were, since that, honored with the preaching and pens of the blessed apostles, where are they now to be looked for, but amongst the rubbish of our cursed Mahometism? Oh, that we could not be high-minded, but fear!

HUMILITY.

BY MONTGOMERY.

The bird that soars on highest wing
Builds on the ground its lowly nest,
And she that doth most sweetly sing,
Sings in the shade when all things rest;
In lark and nightingale we see
What honor hath humility.

The saint that wears heaven's brightest crown,
In deepest admiration bends,
The weight of glory bows him down,
The most when most his soul ascends;
Nearest the throne itself must be
The footstool of humility.

MORAL CHARACTER OF THE OLD TESTAMENT IDENTICAL WITH THE NEW.

Those who would lead us to believe a system of morals to be taught in the NewTestament, indescribably higher and purer than can be found in the Old, are fond of appealing in proof, to the tempers and benevolent feelings with which we are required to regard our personal enemies.

Now we regard these holy precepts with a feeling approaching awe, and point to them as unanswerable proofs of the heavenly origin of the gospel, and the Divine character of its author; but we cannot admit the contrast which is alledged, by some, and granted by others, to exist between these sentiments, and those on the same subject in the Old Testament. I do not mean to deny that these sentiments are more prominent in the New Testament, that they are brought out with more clearness, but to deny contrast. As for instance: where Christ says Matt. 5, "I say love your enemies" &c., that it is implied, or can be proved, that the Old Testament taught us to hate our enemies.

When he says, "Ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time," (in the land) thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy," he alludes to the false, rabinical teachings. He does not say, "it hath been said," &c, but "Ye have HEARD that hath been said," &c. i. e. your pretended teachers have so taught you, but have taught falsely, for the phrase, "and hate thine enemy," is nowhere written in the law, therefore in vindication of the law—"I say unto you love your enemies" &c. Here, it is clear, Christ intended to vindicate the law, and make it honorable, and only complains of its perversion and falsification. I think all who consider the subject with care, must perceive that he is not making, but interpreting law, and that what he says about loving enemies &c., he declares to be the real sentiments and teachings of the law.

The points are these. The Pharisees tell you the law says love your neighbor, and hate your enemy, but I say unto you, the law teaches you to love your enemies. That this is true of the law, I will now attempt to prove, by referring to specific passages in reference to the treatment of enemies.

Exodus 23: 4. 5. "If thou meet thine enemy's ox, or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again." "If thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burden and wouldst forbore to help him; thou shalt surely help with him."

Here is practical love to an enemy. Here by Moses, God requires us, and required the Jews, to do good unto those that hated them, the identical teaching of Christ in Matthew 5th.

I cannot understand the Saviour to utter it as original with himself, but affirm, in opposition to the Pharisees, such to be the teachings of the law, and of course sanctioned by him, "for he came, not to destroy, but to ratify" the law.

Another passage to which frequent reference is made, is found in Romans 12: 20. 21. "Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; and if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing, thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head"

This beautiful passage, so full of the meekness and gentleness of Christ, Paul quotes from Proverbs 25: 21. 22. "If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink." "For thou shalt heap coa s of fire on his head, and the Lord shall reward thee."

Such is the beautiful harmony existing between these two volumes of inspiration, both equally from God, and in the purity of their moral precepts, vindicating themseives from the aspersions of ignorance and depravity. Precious oracles of truth! A tythe of the moral purity and benevolence required in the Old Testament, would add a lustre to the character of those who declare against it, as teaching a defective morality. [True Wes.

THE CHRISTIAN'S CONFIDENCE.

How apt are we to misconstrue the Spirit of God to our own disadvantage! While the blessed apostle bids us to "work out" our "salvation with fear and trembling," he doth not bid us to work it out with doubt and distrust. It is the Psalmist's charge, that we should "serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice in him with trembling:" so as there is a fear without diffidence, and a trembling that may consist with joy. Trembling is an effect of fear; but this fear which we must affect is reverential, not slavish, not distrustful. Indeed, when we look upon ourselves, and consider our own frailties and corruptions, and God's infinite justice, we have too just cause of doubt and dejection, yea, were it not for better helps, of utter despair; but when we cast up our eyes to the power of him that hath undertaken for us, and the faithfulness of him that hath promised, and the sure mercies of him that hath begun his good work in us, we can fear with confidence, and rejoice in our trembling. For what are our sins, to his mercies; our unworthiness, to his infinite merits: our weaknesses, to his omnipotence? I will therefore so distrust myself, that I will be steadfastly confident in the God of my salvation: I will so tremble before the glorious majesty of my God, that I may not abate of the joy of his never-failing mercy.

CHINESE MISSIONS.

In our last number we gave a succinct account of one branch of Protestant efforts for the enlightenment of China, and of the striking interposition of the Great Ruler of Nations for the forwarding of the work. From that account, it appears that the English Baptist Missionaries turned their attention to the Chinese version of the Scriptures in the year 1804, and steadily pursued their work to its completion. In 1814 two thousand copies of the New Testament in Chinese, together with Chinese tracts, were printed and circulated among Chinese teachers in the Islands of Java, Penang, Ambayna, and other parts of India; and several Chinamen were baptized within a few years subsequent. At present the American Baptists have six missionaries and their wives, and thirteen native preachers, laboring for the good cause. Since that effort commenced, there have been seventy-five Protestant missionaries sent out to occupy the accessible parts of the Chinese Empire; between forty and fifty are still engaged in the prosecution of this magnificent object—the subjugation of China to Christ. They occupy sixteen stations, and represent at least ten different denominations of Christians. The first of those who occupied a Chinese station, was Robert Morrison, at Macoa, whither he went in 1807, from the London Missionary Society. William Milne joined him in 1813; but not being permitted to reside at Macoa nor Canton, he occupied a station at Malacca. They however labored conjointly, and were pioneers in occupying Chinese territory. Faithfully they labored on, when there was nothing but the promise of God to his Son, to encourage them to expect the opening of the Chinese empire to their labors. They labored not in vain, though they did not live to see this object accomplished. Milne died in 1822, and Morrison in 1834. Ten years afterward all China was thrown open to efforts for her thorough evangelization. None on earth can tell the sorrows they endured, or the toils through which they passed, to perform their work. In 1814 Milne, while acquiring the Chinese language, which he mastered in a good degree, so as to enable him to think in it, and to translate several books of the Scriptures into it, says, "To acquire the Chinese is a work for men with bodies of brass, lungs of steel, heads of oak, hands of spring steel, eyes of eagles, hearts of apostles, memories of angels, and lives of Methuselah! Still I make a little progress. I hope, if not to be a master, yet to gain as much as will suit the purposes of a missionary. Every sentence I value at the rate of a dollar; so that should I gain 10,000, I shall not consider myself poor." Morrison was so eminently devoted to his work, that as soon as he was able he employed the Chinese language for his own secret devotions before God, while he besought Him to succeed the Chinese missions. These have gone to their rest, but the missions live, and enlarge; and the Bible in Chinese circulates to the interior and the extremes of the Empire.

All is not done, however, that needs to be done, to give the Scriptures to the hundreds of millions of Chinamen. The translations have to be revised, and the people have to be educated. Yes, the Chinese have to be taught to read. It is a popular opinion, that the Chinese are an educated people—that they are a reading people; but it appears that there is some popular delusion about this. Mechanical ingenuity, and a shrewdness in trafficking, may exist and be a national trait, where there is no literary cultivation. This was the case with a great part of the English mechanics, and manufacturing artisans, and farm laborers, sixty years ago, and is the case with many portions of European population at the present time. Nothing but the progress of the benignant and civilizing doctrines of a scriptural Christianity is likely effectually to give education to the masses.

Of the Chinese, Dr. Macgowan, of Ningpo, writes October, 29th, 1844:—

"So far as my observations have extended, (from Chukiang to the Yangtzs'-Kang,) I have found that the ability to read well is by no means common. Perhaps not more than five per cent of the adult male population are good readers. Out of eight hundred patients, I found but twenty who professed to read native authors indiscriminately. Among the laboring people, who form the mass of the population, the ability to read is extremely rare. The priesthood are nearly as ignorant as the agriculturalists and tradesmen. I spent a few days in a celebrated monastery at Puto, ('The worshiping island,' which is exclusively occupied by priests and their servants,) and found that the Abbot was the only reader on the Island, and he could read but 'seven tenths,'—for so the Chinese express themselves—while some can read but 'one tenth,' others, far better educated, can read 'nine tenths.' As it regards the women of China, I have not yet been able to hear of one who could read; even literary men, and mandarines, have almost derided me for advocating the instruction of females.'

These facts may enable us to form some opinion of the eligibility of China for a missionary field. The magnitude of its population is unequaled by any other single country; the Scriptures are translated; facilities exist for the acquisition of the language; and the missionary can labor there with safety to his person and estate. With all the facilities, however, the language is confessedly one of the most difficult on earth to acquire. The literary men have all the pride of opinion and nationality that can be crowded into a human heart; and the common people have all the stolid ignorance of unlettered heathen. China presents a population of three hundred and sixty millions, accessible to the Christian missionary, but it has not one more inviting moral or intellectual feature, than British India, with a hundred and eighty millions of idolaters. All the odious and forbidding features of heathenism characterize China as they do other nations of Eastern Asia; and Chinamen require the same patient, persevering, and self-denying labors, to bring them to the knowledge of the truth, as all other heathen. PUT THAT AND THAT TOGETHER.

"Similia similibus curantur."

It is a quaint saying, the origin thereof we do not pretend to trace, but the wisdom of which would oft-times prove profitable to us short-sighted creatures, when we take, as we are apt to do, a one-sided view of matters, and strain an explanation of some inscrutable calamities, which befal us poor mortals here below—were we just to "put that and that together, and see now how it comes out,"—and instead of looking on the dark side of the picture, to turn the mirror and glance at its brighter radiance, dimmed by our obtuseness and obscured by our own obliquity of vision; for we often find behind "a frowning Providence a smiling face." But it is not our design to write a theological essay, nor enter upon a philosophical dissertation, and enumerate the many advantages we may derive from comparing and contrasting the occurrences of every-day life. Your ears will ring and your eyes be strained with long homilies on the "calamitous disaster" which happened at Harrisburg, Pa., on Sunday last, as "a special visitation of Providence" to avenge the "desecration of the Sabbath." Yea, indeed, the "letter-writers" at the Capitol of the Keystone State, have already heralded the circumstance, in the public prints, to be reiterated from Maine to Texas, and as in duty bound ascribe it to "Sabbath desecration." Now my object is to put that circumstance and another occurrence which happened at the same place a fortnight before, "together, and see how it comes out."

Thirty years ago one of the finest structures in the country was erected across the Susquehanna at Harrisburg, without, so far as my memory serves, any accident during its construction—(which occupied the most part of four years, and cost nearly two hundred thousand dollars)—and scarcely any thing happening to the travel over it during all the thirty years since it has been finished, either on a week day or on a Sunday; certain are we, that if an accident happened during its construction, it was on a working day. So far Providence smiled upon the undertaking. Two weeks ago the eastern division, connecting the town with the island in the middle of the stream, consisting of six arches, each three hundred feet long, was carried away by the high freshet and flood of ice and timber. Since that disaster the channel has to be ferried in flat-boats; they not having been in use for nearly thirty years, and being difficult to manage, the men who undertook that work not being adepts at that species of navigation—(but which became necessary to be actively prosecuted, unremittingly, to transport the trade, which is unusually pressing at this season of the year,)—came in contact with one of the piers of the demolished railroad bridge, and capsized. There were seven men on board; three of whom succeeded in climbing up the pier, and four went down the stream; two, eventually, were saved, and two drowned.

This is all set down to "Sabbath [Sunday] desecration." Come let us analyze the matter—let us "put that and that together, and see how it comes out"—how it stands the test of impartial and unprejudiced scrutiny. If the "deplorable accident" was an interposition of Providence to punish "Sabbath-breaking," as is assumed in all such cases, and to which it is attributed in this instance, Why, we ask, was the bridge destroyed on a Sunday, a fortnight before?—Why did the Lord leave his weekly rest—(for if Sunday be the Sabbath, it must be the the appointed day of Jehovah's rest,)—to work a work of destruction on the holy day?—and not only of that bridge, but of many others on the same stream? Did these bridges sin above all other bridges in the land? We will venture to assert that they did not. We know that very little travel passes over them on Sundays—we do not think that we err in saying, not one-fifth, at most, of the general average of the other days of the week. The stock is held, principally, by the citizens of the town, who have no need to pass over the bridge on Sundays, and few of whom have any inclination so to do, as they are a church-going people. If then the owners of the stock are not in the habit of wantonly desecrating that day by using and abusing their privilege, and holding out inducements to the traveling public, by offering greater facilities and lower rates of toll to pass on that day—in the name of common sense, wherein has the poor old bridge, that venerable pile of stone and mortar, boards and plank, offended so glaringly, as to bring down the vengeance of Heaven upon it? Why did the Lord destroy it, and destroy it on a Sunday? Why did He open the windows of heaven and send the rain to break up the fields of ice so suddenly and execute his vengeance against the old bridge, which had done much good service for thirty long years? We ask, Why did the Lord do it?—for certainly the sending of the rain and the swelling of the stream, was more the act of the Lord, than the bungling management of the ferrymen was the Lord's act. Besides, it was assumed, by the Solons of that State, a few years since, when a claim was presented, by Andrew Boggs, for damages, on the loss of several hundred barrels of salt, destroyed by a flood in the Kiskiminetas, in consequence of the erection of a dam across that river, to supply the canal with water, which so obstructed the natural passage, that the first heavy rain so swelled the stream as to overflow the banks and inundate the salt-works belonging to Mr. Boggs, and destroy the salt in question—yet, in the face of these facts, the plea was set up in the Halls of the Legislature, that the "salt was destroyed by an act of the Lord, and the State was not responsible." Now, if that was a personal act of the Lord, much more was the demolition of the Harrisburg bridge a personal act of the Lord; because, in the former, man put up an obstruction—in the latter, there was no such impediment, but all was secured by the best foresight and skill of human ingenuity. According, then, to their own showing, the destruction of the bridge was an act of the Almighty, and done on Sunday! We ask again—Wherefore should the old bridge offend Heaven, and wherefore should the Almighty leave his rest to accomplish its destruction? Was it because he believed that it was employed, purposely, to desecrate the first day of the week? No; none will pretend that was the case. Was it, then, that there was too little use made of it on that day?

One more point in the matter we must notice before we can attempt a solution. When the strictest advocates for the sanctification of the first day of the week are pressed for the "law and the testimony," and the "thus saith the Lord," for their practice, they are driven to the plea of "expediency" of keeping one day in seven holy, and the same "expediency" prompts them to invoke the Legislature to legalize and enforce its observance by all persons! Expediency and human legislation, then, and not the decree of the Almighty, have ordained the sanctity of the first day of the week; and in addition to all this, they presumptuously rob the Lord of glory of his own hallowed day of rest, by calling the first day of the week "the Sabbath," while the great Jehovah declares, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," and thrust the Sabbath of their own making down our throats by penal enactments, than which a greater presumption, nor a grosser injustice, has ever been perpetrated since the days of the crucifixion. It is the foulest blasphemy and the most despicable tyranny ever legalized in any country.

Now, if any legitimate deduction may be drawn from the foregoing circumstances, we would infer, that the "Lord of the Sabbath" has become weary of the idolatry of the people in "forsaking his holy Sabbath," and making unto themselves an idol of their own—"the workmanship of their own hands"—substituting for His institution "the commandments of men." In a word, they have made an idol of the first day, and the Lord may—(for we are not fond of traveling out of the record and drawing far-fetched explanations, or in any respect calling in question the acts of the Almighty, but after the fashion of men, after the manner of the Christian professors of the present day, we would say, that in this act, if it have any Providential significance,)—the Lord may have designed to set his face against their idol, the first day, by showing them that He works on that day; and knowing full well, that under such circumstances, the business transactions of the world would make it "expedient" to employ that day in transporting the internal trade, and the whole day be occupied in carrying the produce and merchandize across the river—which might have been accomplished in a single hour had he permitted the bridge to remain—that "expediency" would, of necessity, convert it into a working day, and thus, at least for a time, cast their idol to the moles and the bats; that they might see their folly, and return unto the Lord, to "receive the law at his mouth."

This we would regard as a much better inference, than charging the Almighty with turning from his holy rest to punish the poor bungling ferrymen for not understanding their business, and attributing it to wrathful indignation for desecrating a day which He himself never set apart for sacred purposes, never hallowed nor sanctified, much less required others to do. "Put that and that together, and see how it comes out," before you charge the Lord with such folly. If men will be foolish, it is double folly, aggravated wickedness, to bring the Lord down to their own level, and ascribe to Him the petty perverseness and vindictive purposes which move their own lean, contracted souls, in opposing and persecuting their fellow man.

We do not delight in sarcasm, nor do we desire to be captious, but we are directed to "answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit," and have, in the foregoing remarks, applied to the sticklers for the sanctification of the first day of the week, in opposition to the Lord's express injunction, the homœopathic principle, similia similibus curantur—like cures like—and have given them a dose of their own medicine; which may prove a bitter pill, but still, we trust, in the end, may purge out the old leaven, and that they no longer hide their eyes from the Sabbath of the Lord their God, but that they incline their hearts to his testimonies and walk in his law. THE HOLY LAND.—The Edinburgh Witness says that the existing condition of the land is fraught with more vital interest than even the land's past history. The state of its present inhabitants, dying away without a stroke, and leaving an uninhabited desert around them—its wonderful fertility, and yet that fertility kept in a state of abeyance—legitimate possessors still wandering in foreign lands without home, and the signs of the times indicating the day of their final restoration as not distant, but separated from the present by many a strange and fearful event—these are the circumstances that invest with an atmosphere of solemnity and awe this singular land, still a land of promise, and at which the finger of prophecy still emphatically points.

RIGHT.—In the Assembly of the State of New York, on the 23d ult., the Bill to amend the Act in relation to the Seventh-day Baptists, was read the third time and passed. Our readers are already familiar with the provisions of the old Act; we will take the first opportunity to publish the amendment.

WORSHIP OF THE SUN ON SUNDAY.

JOHN GREGORY, in his "Assyrian Monarchy," says that "the days of the week were called of the Assyrians by the names of the same planets unto whom the days of the week were severally dedicated, and all nations did from them call the days of the week in like manner." The SUN, being the most ancient as well as the chief deity acknowledged among the heathen, and the DAY of the Sun taking like dignity above other days in their estimation, and thus continuing, the inference is very natural, that SUNDAY, being a popular day among the Romans also, would be most likely of all other days to be continued as a weekly festival among them after the adoption of the Christian name, and the repudiation of the seventh-day Sabbath, which it is well known that they detested, as was expressed by one of their writers whom Chafie quotes. "The Gentiles," said he, "liked the Jewish Saturday as the devil likes holy water." And there is now sufficient evidence that Papists inherit the same affection for the Bible Sabbath.

The revolution effected by Constantine, which resulted in the popular change of the religion of the Roman Empire, was a mere political conversion. There was no deep and anxious inquiry after truth. Ambitious men could succeed best in their plans of aggrandizement under the Christian name; but unconverted pagans were still attached to pagan customs and ceremonies, and men desirous of popular favor were anxious to please all parties by conforming as far as practicable to the popular features of both the pagan and Christian systems. Hence the unholy union of these schemes under the papacy. The day of the Sun became, without the warrant of Scripture, a substitute for the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, and the commandment itself was changed to suit the innovation. Idols were worshiped, and the commandment changed to suit the practice. Thus was corrupted the source of knowledge, and the triumphs of error and delusion were complete. What more could have been done to perpetuate the great and ancient festival of the Sun, than to give it a Christian name, and establish the analogy between the pagan and the Christian objects of its dedication? The pagan, when with his face to the east he truly worshiped the natural sun at his rising, could readily give a most Christian excuse to the magistrate, by saying that he worshiped that Sun of which Malachi speaks, who arose with healing in his wings, and honored this day by rising from the grave. Let those who approve of thus perpetuating the ancient and honorable "day of the sun," go to the heathen sun-worshipers of the present time, and teach them the same analogy; and, that they may see it more clearly, give them a crucifix to represent the object of their devotions, and thus the transition will be easy. For illustration, take the following description of sun-worship on SUNDAY, from the pen of the venerable William Carey, the father of Baptist Missions in India:—

"As the worship of the SUN was performed in my sight last LORD'S DAY, I shall begin with that, especially as I have not seen it noted by any writer on these subjects. I preached to them on the spot just in front of a long row of offerings in the evening.

"The Sun, called Soorjyo, or Deebahar, is supposed to be the governor of all bodily diseases, and is therefore worshiped in order to avert his anger, and to prevent diseases. Some valetudinarians worship him EVERY SUNDAY by fasting and offerings; but he is annually worshiped on the first SUNDAY in the month of Mag, which was last Lord's day, June 14th. The name of this worship is called Dhormma Bhau, or Soorjya Bhau. The manner, it seems, is in some respects different in different places; but in these parts the women appear to be the principal actors in the worship; though none are excluded, and even Mussulmen have so far Hindooized as to join in the idolatry. It was thus conducted: At the dawn of the morning, a great number of offerings were carried into the open field, and placed in a row. The offerings which I saw consisted of fruits, sweetmeats, pigeons, and kids; and I suppose other things, as deers, buffaloes, &c., might be offered. A small pot is placed by each person's offering, containing about a pint and a half of water. A device made of a water-plant, a species of phylanthus, made to represent the SUN, is placed on the edge of the pot, and a small twig of mango tree, with a few leaves on it, put into it as people in England do flowers. The pot, with all its appendages, represents the sun perhaps as the vivifier of nature. By each offering is also placed—what shall I call it?—an incense-altar or censer? It resembles a chaffing-dish, is made of copper, and stands upon a pedestal about a foot long. This is called Dhoonachee. It contains coals of fire, and has a kind of incense from time to time thrown into it, principally the pitch of the saul tree, called here dhoona. By each offering also stands a lamp, which is kept burning all day; and the women who offer take their station by the offerings. At sunrise they walk four times round the whole row of offerings, with the smoking dhoonachee placed on their heads, and then resume their stations again, where they continue in an erect posture, fasting the whole day, occasionally throwing in a little dhoona into the dhoonachee. Towards evening the Brammhan who attends the ceremony throws the pigeons up into the air; which, being young, cannot fly far, and are scrambled for and carried away by any one who gets them for the purpose of eating. The Brammhan also perforates the ears of the kids with a pack needle; after which the first who touches them obtains them. About sunset the offerers again take up the smoking dhoonachees, and make three more circuits round the row of offerings, making the whole number seven times in the day. I have not learned the reason of this number. After this, each one takes up his or her offering, and the lighted lamp, when the lamps are thrown into a pond or other place of water, and each one takes his offering home and eats it. When the lamps are extinguished, the worship is ended."

LUTHER.

NEW-JERSEY LEGISLATION.—From the following paragraph, which we find in the Philadelphia Ledger, it seems that the Legislature of N. J., has refused to amend the law on Vice and Immorality so as to excuse Sabbath-keepers from its penalties. Such a course is both impolitic and illiberal. The consequence will be, that the Legislature will continue to be importuned for what every candid mind acknowledges to be the right of Sabbath-keepers, and the subject will thus be kept before the people, to the no small annoyance of that class of religionists who would gladly get rid the difficulty by "wrapping it up." Here is the extract from the Ledger:

"The Bill to suppress Vice and Immorality was passed in the House of the New-Jersey Legislature on Wednesday, without amendment. Many ineffectual attempts have been made during its several readings to modify the section relating to the observance of the Sabbath, by allowing the Seventh-day Baptists to work whenever they choose on the first day, and another attempt was made to introduce a clause permitting them to vend their wares in settlements in which the 'mass of the people' were Seventh-day Baptists, and afterwards modified still further by substituting the word 'all' for 'mass,' but with no better success. It seems there are communities in the lower part of the State composed almost entirely of these people."

AN ACCIDENT ON THE SABBATH.—If the following accident had occurred on a Sunday, no doubt many persons would have seen in it, or professed to see, conclusive proof of divine displeasure for the desecration of that day. But it occurred on the seventh day instead of the first day, which entirely alters the case, and makes the casualty, in their estimation, a very common-place affair. Now we do not ourselves claim to see in this accident any more significance than in many others; but we do claim, that it is quite as good proof of the divine displeasure towards men for seeking their own amusement on the seventh day, the Sabbath, as are the common run of accidents chronicled as indicating divine displeasure towards those who amuse themselves on Sunday:—

"A strange and shocking accident occurred at a shooting-match on Smith's creek, in this county, Saturday afternoon. Abraham Carrier, son of Mr. John Carrier, a young man about 19 or 20 years of age, was killed by the discharge of a gun in the hands of Nathan Hannah, in the following singular manner. Mr. Carrier was standing some distance from the marksmen examining a target at which he had been firing, when the gun in the hands of Mr. Hannah, being only half cocked, was accidentally discharged. The ball striking a rock, glanced, struck a sapling, then a tree, and glancing again struck Mr. Carrier in the head, knocking out his brains! Although the ball passed almost through the head—going in at one temple and lodging near the other, he survived the accident about twelve hours, with the brains oozing out of the ball hole!"

THE GERMAN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.—The recent movements in Pennsylvania with reference to this people, have done much to bring them into public notice, and secure a just appreciation of their moral worth. The following candid notice of them we copy from a New-Jersey paper:—

"Perhaps but few of our readers are aware of the fact, that from an early period of the settlement of Pennsylvania, there existed a religious society of much note and distinction, in the interior of that State, yet from their retired and unobstrusive life have not attracted much attention beyond their immediate neighborhood. The Society is the German Seventh-day Baptists. They built and still own the singular village of Ephrata, in Lancaster County. They established a printing office, from which they issued a large number of original works; and they founded a seminary of learning, to which many young men from Philadelphia and Baltimore resorted for their education. Peter Miller, the President of the Society, was one of the best linguists of the country. He read eleven languages with facility, and at the request of our infant government, translated the Declaration of Independence into seven different languages for the Courts of Europe. They established the first Sabbath-school on record, it having been in successful operation thirty years before the same system was suggested by the philanthropist of Gloucester, the honored Raikes.

The peculiarities of this people are: 1. They observe the original Sabbath—the seventh-day. 2. Trine Immersion for Baptism. 3. Practice Feet-washing, as directed in the 13th chapter of John, in connection with the administration of the Lord's Supper. 4. They support houses of refuge for retirement and devotion. 5. They maintain the principles of non-resistance."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHER'S SEMINARY.—We have before us a Catalogue of this Institution for the year ending March 5, 1846. It contains the names of 153 ladies, and 174 gentlemen, making a total of 327 students in attendance during the year. From the character of the course of study marked out, as well as from the apparently prosperous condition of the school, we are encouraged to hope much good from this enterprise.

FRUIT OF MISSIONS.—The "Macedonian" says that over 200 native converts were present at the celebration of the Lord's Supper in Matah, among the Karens. Who will say that nothing has been done by Missionary effort?

☞ ELD. SAMUEL DAVISON, having removed his residence to Shiloh, Cumberland Co., N. J., wishes his correspondents to address him at that post office.

☞ ELD. NATHAN V. HULL requests his correspondents to address him at Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y.

At the stated meeting of the board of managers of the American Bible Society, the Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen was unanimously elected President of the society.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The subject of giving the notice to Great Britain of the cessation of the joint occupancy of Oregon, engrosses the time and interest of the SENATE. Several long and able speeches were made during the last week, and the feeling upon the subject seems to increase as the time approaches for taking the final vote.

The principal thing done in the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES last week was the passage of what is called the Sub-Treasury Bill—a modification of the old bill in regard to keeping the public money.

TWO DAYS LATER FROM FRANCE.

The packet ship Silvie de Grasse arrived at this port on Saturday from Havre, bringing dates from that city to the 5th and from Paris to the 4th ult. The news is unimportant. The packet ship Dutchess d'Orleans, hence, arrived at Havre in the 4th ult.

The Chamber of Deputies, continued on the 3d ult. the discussion on the internal navigation bill. The article granting 5,000,000 francs for the improvement of the Seine that runs through Paris, was adopted.

The packet ship St. Nicholas was to leave Havre on the 8th ult. for New-York.

The advices from Madrid state that there has been a rupture in the negotiation for the marriage of Count de Trapani to the Queen of Spain.

The Madrid Heraldo gives a letter from Manreas, of the 18th, stating that a political conspiracy had just been discovered and effectually suppressed.

The Spanish funds were a little higher. The three per cents are quoted at 32 for the account. There was no quotation of the five per cents.

An important reduction in the duty on salt destined for agricultural uses, has been made in the French Tariff.

Another terrible railroad accident has happened in France, on the line between St. Etienne and Lyons. A concussion took place between two locomotives, which met by a mistake in the departure. There were twelve wagons attached to one locomotive. Six were smashed to pieces in an instant, as well as both the locomotives. Eight persons were killed on the spot, among whom were two women and a child. Ten were wounded fatally and twenty badly.

Marshall Bugeaud is said, at last, to have lost favor at court, owing to the bad management and fatal results of the Algerian war. The rumor is revived of the Duc d'Aumale going out to Algiers with the title of Viceroy.

The fortifications of Paris is now completely finished.

A letter from Adrinople states that a part of the town of Phillipopolis was burned down on the 12th ult. The details are not given, but 2500 houses are said to be destroyed.

A letter from Lucerne states that the Governor of Milan has recently visited Lugano, in Tesino, for the purpose of complaining of the intrigues of the Italian refugees in that Canton. The government of the Canton professed ignorance of these intrigues, but promised to inquire into the matter.

The Cologne Gazette states that an epidemic has been for some time raging among the cattle in the southern provinces of Russia, and that not less than 500,000 head of horned cattle has been lost in that province alone.

The Augsburg Gazette states, from Vienna, the 25th ult. that General de Collin had been compelled to evacuate the town of Cracow, as the number of troops under his command was too small to resist the rebels, and as he was afraid that they would gain the passage of the Vistula, near Podgorize, and thus extend the revolution to the interior. He was able to reach and secure this point without an attack from the rebels. A Frankfort journal states, from Vienna, that several officers have been arrested in Gallicia, on suspicion of their being concerned with the revolutionary movement.

A letter from Dresden, of Feb. 24th says: In consequence of the revolutionary movements in Poland, all the Russian Poles resident abroad have received orders from their government to return, under pain of confiscation of their property. Many who were residing in Saxony have already left. M. de Schrœder Charge de Affairs of Russia, who had gone to Weimar, has been recalled, as his presence here, in the present state of affairs, is considered necessary.

From the Columbus (Ohio) State Journal, March 28th.

KIDNAPPING—DARING OUTRAGE!—Our city was thrown into the greatest excitement this morning by intelligence that a respectable and peaceable colored man, who has been residing here between twelve and thirteen years, was enticed across the bridge to the town of Franklinton, last evening, and there handcuffed, gagged and forcibly placed into a vehicle to be taken to Kentucky. He was induced, it is said, by two citizens of this place, (whose names we forbear to mention until we have conclusive evidence of their guilt,) who were in the plot, to carry a trunk over under the pretence that a couple were about to leave the place clandestinely, to be married.—A colored boy accompanied him, who states that his kidnapped companion was violently seized as soon as he entered the house to which he had been directed.—He says that a number of persons were present aiding in the work. After having bound him, they called up a Justice to read some portion of the act to him in reference to fugitives from labor, intending this as a sort of sham trial. As soon as they were through with this miserable mockery, they placed him in a vehicle and started off with him. The boy himself was confined for several hours afterwards, in order to allow time for the kidnappers to escape. As soon as he was released and made known the matter, some of our citizens took fleet horses and started in pursuit. The pursuit was commenced a little before 12 o'clock and the chance of overtaking them depends mainly, as we suppose, upon the ability to reach Xenia before the starting of the cars,—a desperate chance.

The colored man, who is known by the name of Jerry Phinney, has a wife and family of small children in this city, and bears the character of an industrious, honest man. We learn that he left Kentucky some sixteen or eighteen years since, and, with the consent of his mistress labored in Cincinnati some time. Finally, his employer having no farther use for him, he preferred making his home as a freeman in this State, to returning to Kentucky. His old mistress died some years since, and it is the heirs who have sought to reclaim him into bondage, and have defiled the very Capital of our State with their presence and their acts of slaveholding tyranny.

The outrage is a great one,—one that has embittered in a ten-fold degree the feelings of our citizens against Slavery. If the circumstances are as we have stated, the man who has been thus kidnapped is a free man.—And certain is it, at all events, that the form of a trial, under such circumstances, was a mere mockery, insulting and revolting to the feelings of community. It is by such outrages that the feelings of the people of the Free States have been aroused, and are increasing every day, against the enormities and cruelties of Slavery. Slave-drivers may, but Freemen cannot see men torn from their families and condemned to Slavery, without feeling their inmost souls revolt at the spectacle. Every such outrage raises up a new breastwork for him who flees from bondage, and enlists hundreds on the side of the oppressed. The man who has been thus entrapped, in the darkness of night, was not a fugitive from slavery, and was not liable to arrest. He was permitted to come on free soil, and from that time he became a freeman.

One of the persons who aided in enticing him into the hands of the Kentucky kidnappers, was imprisoned to day to await his trial.

Since the above was in type, the Justice and others engaged in the affair have been arrested, and are at this writing undergoing a hearing. The hack has returned in which the negro was conveyed to London, he having been placed on the stage at that point.

ANOTHER REVOLUTIONARY PATRIOT GONE.—At Scipio, Cayuga Co., N. Y., March 14th, 1846, Elias Manchester, aged 87 years and 7 months.

The deseased was a native of Dutchess county, and a soldier of the Revolution. He fought the battle for freedom, and his blood crimsoned the plains of Saratoga, having been wounded at the taking of Burgoyne. He encountered the perils—endured the hardships—suffered the privations, and shared the glory of "the times that tried men's souls." In consequence of the high integrity of his character, and the benevolence of his heart, it has been his happy privilege, during his long and somewhat eventful life, to have lived in the midst of ardent and sincere friends, and to have descended to his tomb "in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in, in his season," without an enemy.

He has left to his children and their numerous descendants, the inestimable legacy of having lived and died an honest man, "which is the noblest work of God."—[Auburn Journal.

THE MILITIA SYSTEM.—In the Assembly of the State of New York, a bill has been reported "to encourage the formation and maintenance of Uniformed Corps of Militia, and to lessen the burdens of the present Militia System of this State," which will pretty thoroughly do up compulsory training if passed. It provides that there shall be but one training per year, by companies in the forenoon and by regiments in the afternoon, and that citizens liable to Military duty may commute by paying 75 cents a year, but if a minor or unassessed head of a family the commutation shall be but 25 cents. This commutation must be paid before the 10th of August in each year; if unpaid at that time the person liable to Military duty must train or pay his fine as at present. The money raised by commutations and fines is to be fairly distributed among all who have done Military duty within the year. —There are other provisions, but these are the most essential.

A FATHER MURDERED BY HIS OWN SON.—We have just been informed, says the Huntingdon (Pa.) Globe, that an aged citizen named Irwin, who resided at the Pennsylvania Furnace, on the line dividing Huntingdon and Centre counties, was murdered by his own son on the 27th ult. It appears from what we could learn, that the son was very much addicted to intemperance, and while laboring under a fit of mania potu, seized and held his father with one hand, and with the other inflicted several deep and mortal wounds with an axe upon his face. The father lived but a few hours.

MOUNT PLEASANT.—"We are pleased to learn," says the Hampshire and Franklin Express, published at Amherst, Mass., "that the beautiful situation in this town, known as Mount Pleasant, is about to be improved for a select boarding school for boys, to be opened on the 6th of May next. The property has been purchased by Rev. John Adams Nash, an experienced and very successful teacher, formerly of Pittsford, Mass."

A SPECULATION ABOUT THE WEATHER.—The Piedmontese Gazette, which is in the habit of dealing in the wonderful, says:—"The mildness of the present temperature is attributed to a large cavity or crater, observed by Professor Granthuisen of Monaco on the eastern limb of the sun, corresponding with a spot which inclines towards the north. This great cavity appearing on the 17th January, increased, and on the 23d bore towards the middle of the luminary. Its greatest diameter has been measured at 13 seconds, equivalent to 2,104 geographical leagues, whence it results that the solar superfices had 22,626,000 square leagues in complete obscurity, while the remaining portion was resplendent with light. About 12 o'clock on that day the heat at Monaco was at 11° of Reaumur, 56° Fahrenheit.

SINGULAR MARRIAGE.—A widower at Camden who was not very young, became smitten with a young and beautiful girl, and married her. A short time after, the son of this man, by a former wife, became also in love, not with a younger person, but with the mother of his father's new wife; a widow lady still in the bloom of life. He offered himself, and soon the young man and the widow were united in the bands of matrimony, so that in consequence of these two connections, a father became the son-in-law of his own son, and the wife not only the daughter-in-law of her own son-in-law, but still more, the mother-in-law of her own mother; while the husband of the latter is the father-in-law of his own mother-in-law, and father-in-law to his own father. Singular confusion may arise if children should spring from these peculiar marriages.

SUMMARY.

The New York Organ says: At the close of the exercises of a large and enthnsiastic meeting of teetotalers at Brrnswick, last week, the pastor of the church where the meeting was held, dismissed the congregation with the following truly excellent benediction: "May the Lord inspire us all with a spirit of temperance, and to go to the ballot box and vote, No License—Amen!—and amen!"

A dyer of Vienne, who lives in Lyous, has discovered a means of producing an orange-colored yellow from the citron, and by one dipping only. By this means fustic, cochineal, cream of tartar, and a preparation of tin, now used, will be no longer required; and it is said that this discovery will save time and money, and produce a superior color.

At St. Paul's Church, Oxford, Chenango Co., N. Y., on the 31st ult., by the Rev. B. W. Stone, Mr. JAMES W. CLARKE, to Miss CATHARINE J. SANDS, both of Oxfood.

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 28th ult., by Eld. Christopher Chester, Mr. SANDS PALMER, to Miss POLLY BURDICK, both of Hopkinton.

DIED,

In Mexico, Oswego Co., N. Y., Jan. 27, after a painful illness of several months, Mr. OBADIAH JOHNSON, in the 80th year of his age. Father Johnson was born in Middletown, Conn.,—renewed in the spirit of his mind when about sixteen years of age,—removed to Whitestown, Oneida Co., where he was baptized into the fellowship of the Baptist church in that place,—removed thence, nearly forty years since, to the place where he departed this life, we doubt not to be with Christ, and the just made perfect in heaven. In regard to his religious experience, it may be remarked, that the beginning of the work of grace was strongly marked, deep and thorough. It was manifestly a new creation. The enmity of his heart to the sovereignty of God, was slain. He said, whether saved or not, he knew he loved the justice of God. His heart approved it. During his last illness, as previously, he felt much for those out of Christ. "O," said he, the first time the writer of this brief notice called to see him, "what can the sinner do when he shall appear before a just and holy God? I wish," said he, while he was affected to tears, "I could address them. I wish they were here." What, it was asked, would you say to them? "I would say," he replied, "Acquaint now thyself with him, and be at peace; thereby good shall come unto thee. Sinners," he continued, "don't know God, or they would not remain so unconcerned." The closing scene was peaceful. He fell asleep in Jesus. He has left, to a numerous circle of relatives and acquaintances, a most satisfactory evidence that he is among the number who shall have part in the first resurrection. The companion of his youth—the sharer of his joys and sorrows—survives. May that grace which sustained her aged companion to the end of his pilgrimage, and which has hitherto sustained her, be her solace and support the few days that remain. And may their children and grandchildren so know and serve their father's God, that they may be an unbroken family in heaven. His funeral was attended at Mexicoville by a respectable congregation, and a numerous circle of mourners, when the occasion was improved by a discourse from 2 Cor. 5: 1, 'For we know that if our earthly house,' &c.

☞ We copy the above, by request, from the Baptist Register. It should be added, that for about thirty years previous to his death, Father Johnson was a decided and consistent Sabbath-keeper. He resided in the vicinity of the Seventh-day Baptist Church recently organized in Richland, and we cannot doubt that his influence and prayers did something to prepare the way for that organization. Ed. Sab. Rec.

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 4th instant, of a cancer, MARY, wife of Silas Greenman, in the 75th year of her age, she professed faith in Christ in early life, and became a member of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, where she has remained about 50 years, an honor to the Christian name; she has lived for the glory of God, with a deep interest in the Redeemer's kingdom. During her sickness, which continued more than six months, her soul has been drawn out for the heathen, that Christ may be preached to them. Her sickness was very painful, but she bore it with Christian patience and submission, feeling with the Apostle, that for her to live was Christ, but to die was gain. In her death, the family have lost an affectionate companion and indulgent parent, the community a faithful friend, and the church a godly mother in Israel. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." D. C.

Miscellaneous.

THE REFORMED TO HIS GLASS.

Source of untold ills! I know
Too well that treacherous smile of thine;
Insidious dram, replete with woe,
No more shall taint these lips of mine.

For years I've been thy willing slave,
At morn and eve mine homage paid;
Strength of my youth to thee I gave—
Whole Sabbaths at thine altar staid.

The more thou rack'd'st my heart with pain,
And broke with horrid dreams my rest,
The closer did I hug the chain,
And clasp the scorpion to my breast.

Thou laid'st my mental beauties waste,
Usurped the throne where reason reigned,
My every moral trait erased,
And life of every comfort drained.

O had I not been timely wrenched
In mercy from thy tyrant hold,
The lamp of life had now been quenched,
And long ago my death-knell toll'd.

But heaven be praised! thy reign has fled,
The dawn of brighter days appears,
And new-born truth again has shed
Its sunbeams o'er my future years.

Now, freed from thy deluding mask,
I see thee once with undimmed eyes;
Thy home, thy name, I need not ask,
Black fiend of ruin in disguise.

THE BIBLE LEGEND OF THE WISSAHIKON.

BY GEORGE LIPPARD.

It was here in the wilds of the Wissahikon, on the day of battle, as the noonday sun came shining through the thickly clustered leaves, that two met in deadly combat. They grappled in deadly conflict near a rock that rose, like the huge wreck of some primeval world, at least one hundred feet above the dark waters of the Wissahikon.

That man with the dark brow, and the darker grey eye, flashed with deadly light—with the muscular form, clad in the blue hunting frock of the revolution, is a continental named Warner. His brother was murdered the other night at the massacre of Paoli. That other man with long black hair drooping along his cadaverous face, is clad in the half-military costume of a tory refugee. That is the murderer of Paoli, named Dabeny.

They had met there in the woods by accident; and now they fought, not with sword or rifle, but with long and deadly hunting knives, that flash in the light as they go turning and twining and twisting over the green sward.

At last the tory down!—down on the green sward, with the knee of the continental upon his breast—that upraised knife quivering in the light—that dark grey eye flashing death into his face!

"Quarter—I yield!" gasped the tory, as the knee was pressed upon his breast, "Spare me—I yield!"

"My brother," said the patriot soldier, in that low tone of deadly hate—"My brother cried for quarter on the night of Paoli, and even as he clung to your knees, you struck that knife into his heart. Oh, I will give you the quarter of Paoli!"

And his hand was raised for the blow, and his teeth were clenched in deadly hate. He paused for a moment, and then pinioned the tory's arms, and with one rapid stride dragged him to the verge of the rock, and held him quivering over the abyss.

"Mercy!" gasped the tory, turning black and ashy by turns, as that awful gulf yawned below. "Mercy! I have a wife—a child! spare me!"

Then the continental, with his muscular strength gathered for the effort, shook the murderer once more over the abyss, and then hissing this bitter sneer between his teeth—

"My brother had a wife and two children. The morning after the night of Paoli, that wife was a widow—those children were orphans!—Would'nt you like to go and beg your life of that widow and her children?"

The proposal made by the continental in the mockery of hate, was taken in earnest by the horror stricken tory. He begged to be taken to the widow and her children, to have the pitiful privilege of begging his life. After a moment's serious thought, the patriot soldier consented. He bound the tory's arms yet tighter, placed him on the rock again, and then led him up the woods. A quiet cottage, embosomed among trees, broke on their eyes.

They entered that cottage. There, beside the desolate hearth-stone, sat the widow and her children. She sat there, a matronly woman of about thirty years, with a face faded by care, a deep dark eye, and long dishevelled flakes about her shoulders.

On one side was a dark haired boy, of some six years; on the other, a little girl, one year younger, with light hair and blue eyes. The Bible, an old venerable volume—lay open on that mother's knee.

And then that pale-faced tory flung himself on his knees, confessed that he had butchered her husband on the night of Paoli, but begged his life at her hands!

"Spare me, for the sake of my wife—my child!"

He had expected that his pitiful moan would touch the widow's heart; but not one relenting gleam softened her pale face.

"The Lord shall judge between us!" she said, in a cold, icy tone, that froze the murderer's heart. "Look! The Bible lays open on my knee. I will close that volume, and then this boy shall open it, and place his finger at random upon a line, and by that line you shall live or die!"

This was a strange proposal, made in full faith of a wild and dark superstition of the olden time. For a moment the tory kneeling there, livid as ashes, was wrapt in thought. Then, in a faltering voice, he signified his consent.

Raising her dark eyes to heaven, the mother prayed the Great Father to direct the finger of her son. She closed the book—she handed it to that boy, whose young cheek reddened with loathing, as he gazed upon his father's murderer. He took the Bible—opened its holy pages at random, and placed his finger upon a verse.

Then there was a silence.

Then that continental soldier, who had sworn to avenge his brother's death, stood there with dilating eyes and parted lips.

Then the culprit, kneeling on the floor, with a face like discolored clay, felt his heart leap to his throat.

Then, in a clear, bold voice, the widow read this line from the Old Testament. It was short, yet terrible:

"That man shall die!"

Look! The brother springs forward to plunge a knife into the murderer's heart; but the tory, pinioned as he is, clings to the widow's knees. He begs that one more trial may be made by the little girl—the child of five years, with golden hair and laughing eyes.

The widow consents. There is an awful pause. With a smile in her eye, without knowing what she does, the little girl opens the Bible as it lays on her mother's knee—she turns her laughing face away—she places her fingers upon them.

That awful silence grows deeper! The deep drawn breath of the brother, and the broken gasps of the murderer, alone disturb the stillness. The widow and dark-eyed boy are breathless. That little girl, unconcious as she was, caught a feeling of awe from the countenances around her, and stood breathless, her face turning aside and her tiny finger resting on that line of life or death.

At last gathering courage, the widow bent her eyes to the page, and read. It was a line from the New Testament:

"LOVE YOUR ENEMIES."

Ah, that moment was sublime!

Oh, awful Book of God! in whose dread pages we see Job talking face to face with Jehovah, or Jesus waiting by Samaria's well, or wandering by the waves of dark Gallilee! Oh, awful Book! shining to-night, as I speak, the light of that widow's home—the glory of the mechanic's shop—shining where the world comes not, to look on the last night of the convict in his cell, lighting the way to God, even over that dread gibbet! Oh, Book of terrible majesty and child-like love—for sublimity that crushes the soul into awe—of beauty that melts the heart with rapture! you never shone more strangely beautiful than there in the lonely cot of the Wissahikon when you saved the murderer's life.

For—need I tell you?—that murderer's life was saved. That widow recognized the finger of God, and even the stern brother was awed into silence.

The murderer went his way.

Now look ye, how wonderful are the ways of Heaven! That very night, as the widow sat by her lonely hearth, her orphans by her side—sat there with a crushed heart and hot eye balls thinking of her husband, who now lay mouldering on the blood-drenched soil of Paoli—there was a tap at the door. She opened it, and—that husband, living, though covered with wounds, was in her arms! He had fallen at Paoli, but not in death. He was alive--his wife lay panting on his breath.

That night there was a prayer in that wood-embowered cot of the Wissahikon.

WRONGS OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

The following extract is taken from an admirable little work entitled "The Elliot Family, or the Trials of New York Seamstresses," by Charles Burdett, of this city, a book which we cordially recommend to all our readers, and should rejoice to see in every family through the land.

A young girl is relating to Mrs. Elliot and her daughters, the trials through which she has passed in learning the trade of cap making. She had just entered a large establishment for this purpose, and after describing the room, forewoman, &c., thus proceeds:—

"Just about the time I was beginning to think we knew the trade well enough to be paid something for our work, Mr. B. came up one Saturday afternoon, and in his, blandest tones informed us that he had no more work at present—that he was satisfied with all of us, and when business commenced again he would give us the preference, and send for us. He was very sorry that it was so, but he could not help it.

"This was a stunning blow to all of us, for we had expected to be steadily employed for the remainder of the season, as we had worked so diligently and faithfully to learn the trade.

"But there was no use of complaining. We had gone to his establishment to learn the trade, and nothing more. We had learned it, and that was something; so with heavy hearts, we put on our things and started for our homes.

"In a day or two afterwards I saw an advertisement similar to the one which had taken me to Mr. B.'s, and I thought I would go down and see if I could not get work. I went down; and on telling my business, the man behind the counter asked my name and residence, which I gave him readily, thinking myself sure of a situation. My surprise was great, however, when I saw him look at a list he had in his hand, and, after examining it a few moments, he said:

"'We have nothing for you.'

"I did not know what to make of this, but determined to look on, and see if I could find any clue to it. Soon after another girl, whom I recognized as one who had learned her trade with Mr. B. at the same time with myself, made a similar application and received the same reply, after the list had been examined. Another and another followed, each of whom had worked there, and this led me into the secret. Both these establishments belonged to Mr. B. and the list the man had in his hand, contained the names of those who had learned the trade at the same time with myself.

"I saw through it at once. These advertisements of course, brought hundreds of girls to his shop seeking employment, and, under the pretence of teaching them the trade, he kept them at work for a month or six weeks, in which time they could make up a very large stock. By the time they had either learned the trade or had began to think they should be paid something, he always managed to get out of work, and taking down the names and residences of those who had worked there, he discharged them, promising to send for them when he had work. This list he sent to his other establishment, and advertised there for girls to learn the trade; but none who had worked in one shop ever found work in the other. In this manner he managed twice or thrice in each year to get a large stock of caps made up for nothing, at each of his establishments, while the poor girls lived in hope that when the busy season came round again, they would find plenty of work from him."

"It was not long before I found another advertisement, headed—'Cap makers wanted on trial,' and this time I felt sure of success. I was a first rate workman, and knew I could make caps as well as any one, so I went to the store named with confidence.

"This man was an unmistakeable Jew, and not so civil by half as Mr. B., but that did not surprise me at all, for I did not expect so much politeness from a man who was to pay for my work, as from one who received it for nothing. I informed him that I had learned my trade thoroughly, and that I was ready to make a cap or so on trial; but he coolly handed me a large bundle, saying: 'There are two dozen there—if you make them up to suit, I will pay the usual price, if not, I don't give anything. If you suit I will give you steady work.'

"I felt so sure of satisfying him, I took my heavy bundle and trudged home with a light heart. In a week I had them all done, and well made too, for I had taken especial pains with them, and I started for the store with the certain prospect of receiving the sum I had earned, which was one dollar and a quarter.

"On reaching the store, I opened my bundle with confidence; but imagine my disappointment when he commenced a scrutiny of my work, which at once dampened my hopes. He found more or less fault with every cap, and, without giving me time to say one word in my own defence, he wound up, saying: 'He could not think of paying for such work as that, nor could he trust me with any more, if I could do no better than I had done.' This was a dreadful blow for me, and I fell back from the counter, my eyes filled with tears of bitter disappointment, which I could not suppress, and my heart sad within me.

"In a few minutes another girl came in with her two dozen caps, for each one had that number given to her on trial. The same scrutiny followed—the same faults were found, and the same excuse made for giving no more work. Now this man had given out two dozen caps each to forty-seven girls, all on trial, to be paid for if they suited; and, out of the whole number, there was not one whose work gave satisfaction, or who received one cent for her labor. So you see he managed to get a nice little stock made up for nothing, and, by repeating this operation three or four times a year, the labor of making up his caps was not very expensive.

"Well, I thought I had learned two or three of the worst tricks of that trade, and I was fain to be content with my experience, although it was dearly bought; but I was yet to learn a little more.

"Another advertisement for cap makers attracted my attention, and this time as they were neither wanted to learn the trade, or on trial, I indulged a reasonable hope of being able to earn something, and what was more, of being paid.

"I went to the store, and, without any difficulty, received a large bundle, containing about four dozen caps, for which I was to receive, when made up, one dollar, these being a very common article. I did not much like the looks of the establishment or the proprietor. The store was a large room on the second floor, entirely unfurnished, except a very long counter, and one or two stools behind it. The proprietor was an easy spoken, civil man, but he did not much look like the personification of honesty, and as I had been deceived twice already, I thought it but fair to be on the look out for the third attempt, so I asked if I should be paid as soon as I brought my work home.

"'Certainly, my dear,' was the reply. 'Do you think I would cheat poor girls who have to sew so hard as you do for their living? No, no; short credits make long friends: only do your work well and I will do mine.'

"Thus re-assured, I started homewards quite elated with the certainty of earning my own living, and with the sure prospect of prompt payment. I worked faithfully the whole week, and by dint of drawing pretty largely on those hours which ought to have been passed in sleep, I had my whole number finished by Saturday evening, and took them to the shop.

"The proprietor was not there when I went in, but a boy who received the caps, told me he was quite sick at home, and in consequence could not get down to pay the girls off, but would endeavor to come early on Monday morning, and requested all of us to be there before nine o'clock, as he would then pay us for the work we had done, and give out more. This was told to all of us, for we had been urged not to neglect having all the work we took out finished by Saturday night, and I believe every one had done so. I must confess, I felt rather suspicious, but there was no use in saying anything, so I started homeward, but not so light-hearted as when I left it, determined, however, not to entertain any unjust suspicions.

"On Monday morning, I was at the store by eight o'clock, but it was not yet opened, so I waited at the door, and soon the other girls came along, one by one, until upwards of thirty were assembled, waiting the arrival of the proprietor. The gentleman who kept the store beneath, came out, after our patience was well nigh exhausted, and after learning the nature of our business, informed us that the second floor had been rented for one week only, by the man who recently occupied it, and that he had paid his rent and delivered the key to him on Saturday night.

"Thus, for the third time, I was defrauded, and then I felt perfectly wretched. This man would go and hire a vacant store, or a large room in the business part of the city, for a week, generally paying his rent in advance, and bringing no more stock than he could give out. Then he would advertise for cap-makers, was sure of procuring from forty to fifty. To each he gave out caps according to the quality and the time it would require to make them up, always urging them to have their work done by Saturday night.

"These tricks are played by men of no character or reputation, who would not suffer by a public exposure, and who are not established in a regular business; but the poor girls suffer through them, and that is all from which I wished to warn you."

DOMESTIC PIETY.

If there be one curse more bitter than another to man, it is to be the off-spring of an irreligious home—of a home where the voice of praise and prayer ascend not to God, and where the ties of human affection are not purified and elevated by the refining influence of religious feeling; of a home to which if the cares or the sorrows of life shall bring religion to the heart in after days, that heart cannot turn without bitterness of feeling, without anguish and vexation of spirit. If there be a curse to any country where the truths of religion are known, the deepest and bitterest curse which can be inflicted on it is a multitude of homes like that which I have supposed. Such homes send forth their sons unchecked in evil thought, unhallowed in their habits and untaught in love to God; the name and cross of Jesus Christ stamped perhaps upon their forehead, but not written in their hearts; and they send them forth to prey upon the land, and to become its curse and its destruction. But on the other hand, there is a blessing in the religious home which no tongue can speak, where in early years the heart is trained to a love of God, and to take pleasure in his worship and service,—where piety interweaves with the existence of man holy affections which die not with the circumstances that gave them birth, which last long, even though they be forgotten and neglected, and with exercise at least some check upon the evil of the human heart, and often, nay commonly, recall it to hear again the voice of God and to turn to the paths of holiness and peace. How great, how unspeakable is the happiness of a land where homes like this are common.—Rev. Henry John Rose.

THE FIRST GRIEF.

Mamma, why don't you answer me?
Why do you lie so still?
Can't you sit up, and can't you see?
Are you so very ill!

You have been sick a long, long while,
And very, very weak;
But yet you always used to smile—
Mamma! why don't you speak?

When round the bed I used to play,
And showed her my new toy,
She would smile on me as she lay,
And ask to see her boy.

Why is that shade upon her brow?
Her eyes are sunk and deep;
She is quite still and quiet now—
And yet 'tis not like sleep.

She was in Heaven, I was told,
And there she felt no pain;
But here she is all pale and cold!—
Will she not wake again?

Poor child! thy mother feels no pain!
Her spirit is at rest;
She sleeps; she will not wake again;
With angels she is blest!

'Tis sad to chill thy tender youth—
While tears convulse thy breath;
But thou must know the mournful truth—
This sleep, dear child, is death.

From the Thursday Messenger.

RESPECT DUE TO PARENTS.

"Ingratitude! thou marble hearted fiend,
More hideous when apparent in a child
Than the sea monster."

Not only the young are apt to forget the respect due to parents, but oftentimes we see children of older growth forgetting those who have reared them from infancy, and by their waywardness causing their parents to shed tears, when it should be their duty to give them reason for smiles. There is no sight which is so revolting to an upright man, as to see youth disrespecting grey hairs; but when we find a man, arrived at the age of discretion, neglecting his silver haired parents, and treating them with contempt, no word is forcible enough to express the feeling which naturally arises in every honest breast.—The very idea that the babe, whose care has caused them so many sleepless nights and so much anxious care, should in later years prove a curse instead of a blessing and repay its parents for all their love by unthankfulness, makes one almost wish that the parents' malediction might be upon him. Yet how often do we see cases in which the child forgets the respect due to his mother, and is regardless of his father's wishes! Children, learn in early age to respect your parents and obey them in all things—struggle not against their authority, but by yielding while young, you will derive honor when older, and never forget that commandment which says, "honor thy father and mother, that thy days may be long in the land that the Lord thy God giveth thee."

A KISS FOR A BLOW.

A visitor once went into a school in this city, says the Boston Sun, where he saw a boy and girl on one seat, who were brother and sister. In a moment of thoughtless passion, the little boy struck his sister. The little girl was provoked, and raised her hand to return the blow. Her face showed the rage that was working within, and her clenched fist was aimed at her brother, when her teacher caught her eye. "Stop my dear," said he, "you had better kiss your brother than strike him."

The look and the word reached her heart. Her hand dropped. She threw her arms around his neck and kissed him. The boy was moved. He could have stood against the blow, but he could not withstand a sister's kiss. He compared the provocation he had given her with the return she had make, and the tears rolled down his cheeks. This affected the sister, and with her little handkerchief she wiped away his tears. But the sight of her kindness only made him cry the faster; he was completely subdued.

Her teacher then told the children always to return a kiss for a blow, and they would never get any more blows. If men, women, families, and communities and nations would act on this same principle, this world would almost cease to be a vale of tears. "Nations would not lift up the sword against nations; neither would they learn war any more."

Where shall I spend Eternity.

A lady had written on a card, and placed it on the top of an hour glass in her garden house, the following simple verse from the poems of J. Clare. It was when the flowers were in their highest glory.

To think of summers yet to come,
That I am not to see!
To think a weed is yet to bloom
From dust that I shall be!

The next morning she found the following lines, in pencil, on the back of the same card. Well would it be if all would ponder upon the question—act in view of, and make the preparations for an unknown state of existence.

"To think when heaven and earth are fled,
And times and seasons o'er,
When all that CAN die shall be dead,
That I must die no more!
O! where will then my portion be?
Where shall I spend ETERNITY?"

Heavenly Contemplation.

As Daniel, in his captivity, did three times a day open his window towards Jerusalem, though far out of sight, when he went to God in his devotions; so may the believing soul in his captivity to the flesh, look towards Jerusalem which is above. As the pretty lark doth sing most sweetly, and never cease her pleasant ditty while she hovereth aloft, as if she were there gazing into the glory of the sun, but is suddenly silenced when she falleth to the earth; so is the frame of the soul most delectable and divine, while it keepeth in the views of God by contemplation; but alas! we make there too short a stay; down again we fall, and lay by our music.—Baxter.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trustees

SUNDAY COERCIONISTS ASSIMILATE TO ANCIENT BIGOTS—NO. II.

When Jesus Christ was upon earth, he taught doctrines very unpalatable to the orthodox religionists among his own nation. True, they had the oracles of God for instruction; but accustomed from childhood to sit at the feet of men who had acquired adventitious distinction, they had learned to give supreme respect to their traditions, and despised the sentiments of all who dared to exercise independent thought upon the requirements of God's word, and to reject the traditions of the elders when they came in conflict with its plainest doctrines, knowing that they ought to fear Him only who judges the heart. Hence, when God's well-beloved Son came into the world, although his doctrine beamed with infinite intelligence, and inculcated spotless purity of life, it was rejected by these sanctimonious men, because it did not agree with the orthodox belief of the great majority of the nation! He appealed to their Scriptures, the professed standard of their faith, for the proof of his doctrine; but when they could not disprove the truth of it, they murmured, and said, "Thus saying thou reproachest us also." Unable to answer him, they sought to turn away the people by saying, "Can any good come out of Nazareth?" These means succeeded for a time in turning away much people from hearing him, but they did not stay the progress of his doctrines; for a few became his disciples, who, after being fully instructed in the doctrines of the despised Nazarene, were commanded to publish upon the house tops what they had heard in private. This direction they faithfully followed, and soon filled Jerusalem with their doctrine.

The example of these early disciples may safely be followed by Christians in every age. Pure Christianity is too elevated in its principles, and too hostile to the flesh in its requirements, ever to be popular in any society which is under the controlling influence of worldly associations, although it may be religious in sentiment. Hence it is that many religious communities, after having begun with an elevated piety, and acquired great numbers, and an alliance with the State by means of their leading men, have soon manifested a strong tendency to deteriorate. Assuming that their most obvious peculiarities have been their glory and their strength, they have come to regard them with that veneration and sacredness which should be attached only to the plain requirements of God's Word. One of the worst effects of this state of things is, that the mind becomes so prepossessed by these peculiarities, that it rejects the plain meaning of divine truth unless it squares with those peculiarities. It is in this state of mind that a dominant party attains a hardihood of soul, which leaves no avenue for conviction of the truth, and no sympathy for small minorities suffering contumely, or injustice, whatever may be their piety, or the amiability of their deportment. Many bore witness to the amiability and wisdom of Jesus of Nazareth, saying, "Never man spake as this man." Yet this could not shield him from the most cruel and malicious attacks of the majority—the orthodox religionists of Judea—because they knew that his doctrine reproached them, when he showed the people how they had by their traditions departed from the Word of God. It is astonishing to an impartial spectator to see with what vaunting men who pride themselves upon their greatness and distinctions in society will often proclaim their own imbecility, and stamp their own names with an infamy which will last as long as the duration of history. After being foiled in a few unsuccessful attempts upon the doctrine of Jesus Christ, the erudite and orthodox teachers in Judea had no more potent arguments with which to meet the questions of inquirers, than to say, "He deceiveth the people"—"HAVE ANY OF THE RULERS BELIEVED ON HIM?" Absolutely nothing more convincing, by which to hold the wavering, than scornfully to say, "Art thou also of Nazareth?"—and then to threaten excommunication to them who would not be convinced by such profound logic.

Christ himself warned his disciples to expect the same treatment of others, saying, "If they have called the Master of the house Beelzebub, how much more they of his household." What the omniscient Saviour foretold, his disciples have often witnessed. When the learned and orthodox doctors of the Jewish Sanhedrim had answered Nicodemus in the most reproachful terms they could think of, and then, ashamed of their own weakness, sneaked away to their own dwellings, one might have inquired, Was there ever a more pitiable instance of human imbecility? But follow the disciples to Ephesus, then the most famed city in all Asia, and hear the chief men of the most famous temple in that great city, attempt to overpower the effect of one single man's address, by crying out for the space of two hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," and if ever his soul was susceptible of superlative contempt for the mingled bigotry and imbecility in petty officials, he must surely think the Ephesians deserved it. Their temple has perished and left not a column standing, but the shame of their pusillanimity remains stamped upon the scattered ruins and the very soil.

But let us follow on to the Protestant Reformation, and a hundred instances may be selected from the histories of those times, in which strong-hearted men, standing alone against all the dominant powers of earth, defended the truth, and were answered only by the loud acclamations of orthodoxy, and the threats of those who could use no other weapon so well. A single example may suffice for illustration. Look at Luther in Leipsic, called upon to dispute before the reigning princes, the pope's legate, and the doctors of the University.

Dr. Eck said, "The primacy of the church of Rome is of divine right. I find the proof in the words of Christ, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church.' St. Augustine, in one of his epistles, has so explained the meaning of the passage."

Luther replied, "Even though St. Augustine and all the fathers should say that the Apostle is the rock of which Christ spake, I would, if I should stand alone, deny the assertion, supported by the authority of the holy Scripture—in other words, by divine right, for it is written, 'Other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid, even Christ Jesus.'"

Dr. Eck, (reproachfully)—"I am astonished at the humility and diffidence with which the reverend doctor undertakes to stand alone against so many illustrious fathers, thus affirming that he knows more of these things than the sovereign Pontiff, the councils, divines, and universities! . . . . . It would, no doubt, be very wonderful if God had hidden the truth from so many saints and martyrs till the advent of the reverend father."

What a driveling speech was this to come from an officer of a court, who was appointed to defend the interests of the WORLD against the sentiments of a single man! Yet what better is offered to the objections we raise against Sunday laws?

See Luther again at Worms, standing before the Emperor, the princes of the Empire, the Pope's nuncios and legates, and the doctors of the universities of Germany.

The Court—"Cease to set up your judgment against that of holy councils."

Luther—"But upon one single condition, namely, that they take God's Word for their guide.—Men have nothing to do but to render obedience to that. My conscience is in dependence upon that Word, and I am the bounden subject of its authority."

The Court—"If you persist, the Emperor will banish you beyond the Empire, and no part of the world will then be able to give you shelter. Consider, therefore, the fate that awaits you."

Luther—"Why should any such fear separate me from the Lord, and that divine Word which alone is truth? No, rather will I give up my body, blood, and life itself!"

The Court—"The Emperor, in his character of defender of the faith, finds himself compelled to resort to other measures."

The Diet is dismissed; Luther retires under the protection of the Emperor's previous promise of safe conduct; the partizans of Rome prepare an edict for his apprehension when the term of his safe conduct shall have expired; the incensed Emperor signs it; and henceforth they rank with Annas and Caiphas of Judea, or Demetrius and the craftsmen of Ephesus. Ignoble fraternity! Ye acquired your notoriety by resisting the truth to uphold the hoary orthodoxy of your times. Would that ye had no successors! But alas! men emulous of your paternity take up your principles, and from the high places of this land of liberty, refuse the just rights of their fellow citizens. Men professing the holy religion of Jesus Christ, but forgetting that their sects are derived from the persecuted reformers of Germany, Switzerland, and England, now raised by adventitious circumstances to bear rule in the State republics of the western world, disdaining the lessons of three centuries of struggles for freedom and truth, dash the Bill of equal rights from their legislative tables, and tell the petitioners for these rights—"You have privileges now; you ought not to complain; you are a small minority, and ought to submit to the majority, who see fit to deprive you of your rights." True, they testified to the good character and peaceable deportment of their petitioners. One member of the Legislature of New Jersey said, "They are as conscientious, sedate, and orderly a people, as can be found on the earth, but I must be excused from voting for the bill." Another said, "I believe them to be a respectable people, but their rights are sufficiently guarded." So the partizans of Rome complimented Luther—"You are spoken of most honorably," said they. On one occasion, being invited to supper, at parting the pope's nuncio even embraced and kissed him. "A Judas kiss, thought Luther."

Now to show how closely the advoctes for Sunday legislation resemble the men of past times who are universally pronounced bigots, let us place together the words of each class:—

Said a member of the New Jersey Legislature—"The Bill in its provisions will unhinge and uproot long-established usages in our State. It would be infinitely better to adhere to the fundamental law of the State under which we have lived so many years."

Now hear the Emperor Charles V.—"Descended from the Christian Emperors of Germany, from the Catholic Kings of Spain, from the Arch-Dukes of Austria, and Dukes of Burgundy, who have all distinguished themselves as defenders of the faith of Rome, I am firmly resolved to tread in the steps of my ancestors."

Said another member of the New Jersey Legislature—"The Christian Sabbath is a civil as well as a moral institution; it does already exist, and has always existed by the laws of this and other States, and it should not be assailed or put down by any sect or party; that would be wrong and unconstitutional."

Now hear Dr. Eck—"The church militant has never been without its one Head; I would beg to ask who he can be, but the Roman Pontiff?"

The Pennsylvania Remonstrants say—"If the Seventh-day Baptists are allowed to attend to their secular business on Sunday, its tendency, we have fearful reason to believe, would be to inflict most serious injury upon the morals of this community."

Hear Dr. Eck again—"St. Jerome affirms, that if authority above all other churches is not lodged with the Pope, there will be in the church as many schisms as there are bishops."

Thus we might go on and multiply these parallels ad libitum; but we forbear, and ask respecting the contest between freedom and despotism, truth and error, What is there new under the sun? Are dominant men wiser, or more liberal, than such men were when the world was just emerging from what is called the dark ages? Are dominant sects fitter now than then to be entrusted with the rights of their fellow men? Let every man answer these questions as he thinks best, but for ourselves we wish to see the palladium of American freedom rid of all the encroachments of dominant sects. The facts of history and the movements of parties in our own times, ought to awaken the minor denominations of Christians in this country, to the truth that if they sleep around the citadel of liberty, there are vigilant men who will rob it of the priceless treasure within—the charter of their civil and religious rights.

Let no one imagine that Annas and Caiphas, Demetrius and his fellow craftsmen, the Princes of Germany and the Doctors of their Universities, were naturally the most arbitrary or hard-hearted men in the world. Far from it. By their own party they were considered the most estimable of men. They were the stern defenders of the orthodoxy of their times. Attached to the standing orders of their country, and chosen to be their leaders, they supposed they pursued a course approved by the standing orders, and calculated to promote their dominant designs. What then was their fault? They were bigots! They were learned in all the distinctions of their party; but they never looked beyond the boundaries of that party, except through their own prejudices; hence it followed, as a matter of course, that they should be intolerant in their principles; and having the power in their hands, they became the cruel and persecuting opposers of such as disputed their pretensions. Engaged in a cause that could not be supported by truth; and fearing no higher power than that of their own party, they resorted to means dishonorable in themselves, such as mortified pride and inflamed passion suggested. This will always be the case, where might is suffered to oppose right with the civil law. No intelligence, no improvement in society, no change of religious claims, will save a religious minority from persecution, if the dominant sects are allowed to enforce their pretensions by statute laws. In bigots the land is not wanting, and it is time we were all awake to the progress of these things in our Union, when fines and imprisonments are imposed for conscience's sake. It is not safe to trust human nature with the power of religious coercion.

HEAVENLY CONTEMPLATION.

As Daniel, in his captivity, did three times a day open his window towards Jerusalem, though far out of sight, when he went to God in his devotions; so may the believing soul in his captivity to the flesh, look towards Jerusalem which is above. As the pretty lark doth sing most sweetly, and never cease her pleasant ditty while she hovereth aloft, as if she were there gazing into the glory of the sun, but is suddenly silenced when she falleth to the earth; so is the frame of the soul most delectable and divine, while it keepeth in the views of God by contemplation; but alas! we make there too short a stay; down again we fall, and lay by our music.—Baxter.

FILIAL GRATITUDE.—Gratitude is a principal ingredient in filial affection. It often reveals itself in the most striking manner, when parents moulder in the dust. It induces obedience to their precepts, and tender love for their memory. A little boy was once passing the ornamental garden of a rich man. He was observed to look earnestly and wishfully at some sprouts that were germinating on the trunk of an old poplar. On being asked what he wanted, he said, "My mother loved flowers, and every green living thing. She has been dead two years, yet I have never planted one where she sleeps. I was just thinking how pretty one of these would look there." The gentleman kindly gave him a rose-bush, and the fresh wand of a weeping willow. Then the poor little fellow lifted up his streaming eyes, and gave thanks, in a broken voice, for himself, and for his dear, dead mother.

LOOK ALOFT.

In the tempest of life, when the wind and the gale,
Are around and above, if thy footing should fail—
If thine eye should grow dim, and thy caution depart,
Look aloft! and be firm, and be fearless of heart.

If the friend who embraced in prosperity's glow,
With a smile for each joy and a tear for each woe,
Should betray thee, when sorrows like clouds are arrayed,
Look aloft, to that friendship that never shall fade.

Should they who are dearest—the son of thy heart—
The wife of thy bosom in sorrow depart
Look aloft, from the shadows and dust of the tomb,
To the soil where affection is ever in bloom.

And O! when death comes in terrors to cast
His fears o'er the future—his pall o'er the past,
In that moment of darkness, with hope in thy heart,
And a smile in thine eye, look aloft and depart.

THE PENALTY OF DEATH.

The fear of sudden and violent death conveys more terror than any which enters the human heart.

"The weariest and most loathed worldly life
That age, ache, penury and imprisonment
Can lay on nature, is a paradise
To what we fear of death."

It startles and shocks the sovereign instinct of nature; imprisonment does not. It excludes earthly hope; in the solitary cell Hope sits by the prisoner, and makes his lot a cheerful one. Pardon, revolution, a thousand incidents, may open the door of the prison, but not of the grave.

Nay, why is it that punishment is opposed by a puling philanthrophy? Because it is terrible. For this very reason all who would not light the torch and whet the knife of the midnight murderer—all who would not have the dark form of murder bending over the couch of innocence, and its fear mingling with every moment of the life of weakness—desire to see it retained. It is better that guilt should die than that innocence should bleed. God makes death the wages of sin; and piety that would repeal that law is unwise if not guilty.

WILL THE JEWS EVER RETURN TO PALESTINE?

The Jews are the most remarkable people on the earth, or of which the pen of the historian has given us any account. It is now, according to our common chronology, over 3760 years since God called Abraham to come out from his kindred that he might [illegible] tion and a separate and peculiar people; and from that time to the present day, their distinct existence, separate from all other nations and people, may be traced upon the chart of time where they have visibly left the marks of their journey across the face of nearly forty centuries. Since that time other nations, great among the nations of the earth, and distinguished upon the prophetic page, have been called into being, fulfilled their mission, retired and have been blended among other nations and lost for ever as the tide of humanity has rolled on, as the waters of one billow are overswept and lost amid the waters of the one that follows it. The Assyrians were lost in the Chaldeans, the Chaldeans the in Babylonians, the Babylonians in the Medes, the Medes in the Persians, the Persians in Greeks, the Greeks in the Romans, and the Romans were lost amidst the Goths and others; so that there is not now a man living on earth who can say that he has coursing in his veins one drop of the distinct blood of one of these nations. But while these changes have been going, Israel after the flesh, has preserved a distinct existence, and though scattered among all nations, he has been mixed with none; amid the tide of nations whose billows have broken over each other, and defaced every mark and foot print of distinct tribes and nations, he has lifted his judgment smitten head amid the storm and above the billows unbroken and unmingled with the blending ruins of dissolving nations among whom he has lived and suffered. That there is something remarkable in all this, and that indicates some important design of Providence yet to be secured by the preservation of this people, strongly impresses itself upon our mind.

We believe that the Jews themselves are strongly impressed with the belief that they shall be gathered to their own land, and look forward to the event as the end of their long night of dispersion and sorrow, and as the opening of a new and brighter era in their wonderful history. However mistaken they may be concerning the circumstances and results of such a return, the fact that they look for it, and long for it as the commencement of a happy and glorious career, cannot fail to tend strongly to bring about the result; and that too without any special interposition of Providence, more than what attends the progress and destiny of every nation and people, as each struggle through its changes and fills out the pages of its own history. Even in the fullfilment of prophecy, God employs what may be called the common agencies and influences of humanity, and in this case, the fact that the Jews believe in and long for their return to the land of their fathers, cannot fail to elicit on their part such measures and efforts as will naturally lead to such a result; if, therefore, their own efforts can succeed, we may consider their return as certain. With their views and feelings, considered in connection with the more enlightened, liberal and humane policy of other nations towards them, which for the last few years has marked the progress of events, we do not see how anything short of the unseen hand of God that rules the world, can prevent their return to the land which the proprietor of all things gave to Abraham and to his seed for a possession. Already the work has begun, hundreds and thousands are collecting in the land of Palestine that they may live, and die, and sleep, with the ashes of their early fathers.

COMMIT THY WAYS TO GOD.

Reflection will teach a man that he should trust himself to some superior being; and reason unites with revelation to tell us to commit our ways to the Lord. Human life is such a journey that man needs a guide and provider. It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps.

Men are entirely ignorant of the future; hence, since we know not what our circumstances will be, ourselves cannot form the plans which shall be best to be adopted. Every man may say in verity, thus far in life hath the Lord led me. Our own present condition, and that of others, utterly and entirely a way that was unknown to ourselves. The great and blessed God has been our conductor, though unseen, and it may be unacknowledged. Ought we not then to acknowledge him and commit our ways to him?

Time is an ocean, and each person's life a voyage. Its tossings and heavings, its tempests and innumerable perils, should plainly tell to each voyager that himself cannot steer his frail and tempest-tossed bark. He needs a pilot, if he would not dash amid rock and quicksands. If he would make the port of safety, he needs a helmsman other than himself. Let him commit his ways to God.

The world is a wilderness, a dark and thorny desert. Shall the traveler attempt to thread its wilds alone? Let him remember, it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. He has not been the way before, and does he not need a guide? Fellow traveler, the only proper guide is God;—to him let us commit our ways. 'Tis rational and wise, and safe.

Voyager, traveler, by prayer commit your ways to God. Venture not alone upon such an ocean, through such a wilderness. Thou canst not guide thine own bark, thou canst not direct thy steps; every morning and evening, ask wisdom of God. Tempt not the journey, the voyage, alone—pray.

DO SOMETHING EVERY DAY.

When the late William Ladd, of precious memory, commenced his enterprise as the advocate of Peace, and the originator of Peace Societies, he stood almost alone. The great majority regarded his views and projects as ridiculous, and treated them with uncourteous levity. Of the few who respected his motives, and acknowledged the importance of his object, nearly every one pronounced his scheme impracticable, and deemed co-operation [illegible] aged; but sometimes, when he saw that he was making apparently no impression, and that among Christians, where he expected sympathy, he found very little to cheer him onward, his spirit was oppressed, and he feared that he might be compelled to abandon his undertaking. At such times he would go down from his residence at Minot, to Portland, where, in Dr. Payson, he ever found a cordial and steadfast friend.

In one of these visits, he described to Dr. P. some of the difficulties that beset his path, and solicited advice. "My dear brother," said the Doctor, "your case is not peculiar. Every man who undertakes to make the world better, has to meet similar trials and discouragements. Do something every day, and before you die you will find that your cause has made progress."

"That expression," said Mr. Ladd, just before his death—"That expression—'Do something every day'—was worth every thing to me. Not a day has passed without my thinking of it, and endeavoring to act upon it. I have done something every day since for the cause of peace, and blessed be God, it has not been in vain."

Let ministers and all others who are laboring for the good of mankind, and who feel oppressed and disheartened in view of their limited efficiency, remember this lesson. Let them patiently proceed, doing something every day, and after a series of years they will find that much has been accomplished.

JUST SO.—Mr. Cecil, riding one day with a friend,—a very windy day,—the dust being very troublesome, his companion wished that they could ride in the fields where they could be free from dust; and the wish he repeated more than once while on the road. At length they reached the fields, where the flies so teased his horse, that he could scarcely keep his seat on the saddle. On his bitterly complaining, "Ah! sir," said Mr. Cecil, "when your only trouble, and all your anxiety was to get into the field, you forgot that the fly was there. Now this is a true picture of human life, and you will find it so in all the changes you make in future. We know the trials of our present situation, but the next will have trials, and perhaps worse ones, though they may be a different kind."

BREAD UPON THE WATERS.—A pious mother had a prodigal son. He was about to leave her, and go to sea. As a last resource, she placed a Bible in his chest, with a prayer to God for his blessing upon it. Year after year passed away, and nothing was heard of the wanderer. But the eye of his mother's God was upon him. A long time after, a clergyman was called to visit a dying sailor. He found him penitent and prepared to die. He had in his possession a Bible, which, he said, was given him by a dying shipmate, who expiring in the hope of the glory of God, gave it to him with his parting blessing. On the blank leaf was found written the name of John Marshall, the above-mentioned mother's prodigal son.

When a founder has cast his bell, he does not presently fix it in the steeples, but tries it with his hammer, and beats it on every side to see if there be any flaw in it.

Christ doth not, presently after he has converted a man, convey him to heaven: but suffers him first to be beaten upon by many temptations, and then exalts him to his crown.—Arrowsmith.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, April 16, 1846.

ENFORCING THE SABBATH BY CIVIL PENALTIES.

There does not appear to me to be a clear understanding of the question as to what means may properly be used for the support of the institution of the Sabbath, either by the church, its ministers and members—or by the State, its legislators and citizens. For, whether they are acting as Christians merely, or as citizens, or as both in one, or as mixed bodies, some of whom are of one character and some of another, for the most part those who engage in the work do not seem to understand. This is shown by the disputes which arise in the conventions for the support of the first day as the "Christian Sabbath." In these disputes, some contend that their conventions are civil in their character—others that they are purely ecclesiastical. Some would exert an influence on community by an array of arguments and conventional resolutions, and others would obtain the same end by the enactment and enforcement of laws for that purpose by the State. The reason of this confusion I think is, that these men have no distinct idea as to which of the precepts of the Decalogue may be enforced by legal penalties, and which may not. Yet they all seem to have reference to the fourth precept of the law, in their efforts in this matter. No doubt the precepts of the Decalogue are binding on all men to whom they come; and they may be compared to the strait road through this world to the next. And God says, "That is the way, walk ye in it." Besides, for every refusal to walk in this way, or to obey these precepts, God has fixed a penalty. The penalty for disobeying some of these precepts, is ordained to be inflicted, in part at least, by human hands, according to divine direction. For the purpose of inflicting such penalties, God has ordained the "powers that be," that is, he has authorized civil governments. Others of these precepts are of such a nature, or relate to such duties, that disobedience thereto cannot, with any good results, be punished by human authorities. And all that men have a right to do, either as Christians, citizens, or magistrates, in respect to these precepts—and what they have no right to fail to do—is to obey them themselves, and counsel or advise others to do the same. And though it be right to enforce by law some parts of the Decalogue, it will not follow that it is right so to enforce what is not commanded therein. Much less would it be right to enforce the violation of God's law, by necessitating any to secularize the seventh day, of which God has said, "In it thou shalt not do any work." Still, if it be right to enforce the true Sabbath by penalties, then those who may think Sunday to be the true Sabbath, ought not to be censured for taking such means to have it kept. But if the true Sabbath ought not to be supported in that way, then surely the false one should not be.

In order to decide whether the true Sabbath may or may not be enforced by penalties, we must have some way to determine what parts of God's law civil governments are bound to enforce, and what they should leave to the action of moral suasion, and to be administered upon by God himself.—Now there may be some essential difference between the precepts of this law, which constitutes a rule to go by in determining which of them may be enforced by penalties inflicted by the civil authorities. Indeed, such must be the case, it seems to me. But the question is, what is that essential difference between the different precepts of the law? I answer, it is this—Some of these precepts prohibit such acts as, when they are committed, directly and necessarily violate the rights of individuals, and do them positive injury, while others of them enjoin such things as, being neglected, individuals are not necessarily robbed of their rights thereby. Therefore civil society has a right to punish the violator of the former kind of precepts in self-defence, but when the latter kind is violated, civil society has no right to punish the offender, because it has no rights to secure to itself or its members in that way. Now if this is the true principle to go upon, (and if it is not let that be shown,) let us see to which of these classes of precepts the fourth commandment belongs. Suppose one individual breaks this commandment, does his breach of this precept necessarily infringe upon the rights of others? No, certainly it does not, and for this reason they have no right to punish him for what he has done. Should it be said that disobedience to the law of the Sabbath is injurious to community, I respond that the same may be said of every law which God has imposed on man, whether it requires love to God and man, or compliance with the positive institutions of Christianity. But it would be a sin against the rights of both God and man to enforce these duties by pains and penalties. And though "the Sabbath was made for man," and it is his duty to keep it, for his own good as well as the honor of his God and Maker, irrespective of any arguments drawn from the Christian scheme in general, or any personal connection therewith or interest therein, yet human legislators have no right to inflict penalties on those who refuse to obey the law of the Sabbath, for the reasons above stated.

But should any, in connection with a violation of the fourth commandment, or indeed any other of the ten, actually prevent others from the enjoyment of their equal and natural rights, such ought to be punished for a breach of the peace, or for his actual violation of the rights of others. But nothing can be added for Sabbath-breaking, because that, in itself, cannot be proved to be an actual violation of others' rights. Notwithstanding, like every other instance of evident disregard of God's authority, the tendency of Sabbath-breaking must be evil, only evil, and that continually, whether it be perpetrated by few or many, by the State or the Church.

OUR ANNIVERSARIES.—The Anniversaries of the American Sabbath Tract Society, and the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, are to be held this year at Berlin, N. Y., on the fourth and fifth days of June. At those meetings several questions of deep interest will be brought up for consideration and decision. It is expected that the Missionary Association will then determine upon the location for its Foreign Mission, and also arrange some general plan for missionary labor in this country. The Tract Society will probably make arrangements for the publication of several works now nearly ready for the press, besides marking out a plan for other labors. It is very important, therefore, that a full delegation be present, and that the delegates make their calculations to remain until the business is completed.

A GOOD LETTER.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The following communication I obtained by solicitation for publication in the Recorder, and accordingly forward to you.

The author of it is the Rev. HIRAM CORNWELL, who for a number of years has been well acquainted with our people in this region, and is well known to several of our older brethren in the ministry. A number of years ago, when quite a young man, Mr. Cornwell accompanied Elder Amos R. Wells into Virginia, and also into New Jersey, where he formed some acquaintance with our people in those States, as to visit and preach the Gospel to them was the principal object of Elder Wells' tour to those places.

Here we see that our people have reason to be encouraged to exert themselves to spread the knowledge of the truth respecting the Sabbath. And though in this cause, as in the cause of Temperance, SELF-INTEREST gives life and strength to the opposition, when every other obstacle is removed, yet even this in not sufficient in all cases to prevent the truth from taking effect. For some do see, that to urge the world to take the Scriptures as their rule of faith and practice, and at the same time to violate its injunctions in order to secure the advantages of worldly influence, and avoid the labor of opposing the traditions of men, is not the way to turn others to the testimonies of God in his Word. And there are those who, when they see that the principles of interpretation necessary for the support of the first day as the Sabbath, will, when they are carried out, not only justify the idolatry of the Protestant and Roman churches, but even authorize the perversions of God's Word on which infidelity itself subsists—I say, there are those who, seeing this, will abandon a course fraught with such shameless folly.

LUCIUS CRANDALL.

DEAR BROTHER CRANDALL,—I send you a copy of the letter which I recently addressed to the Baptist Church in Hartsville, of which myself and family are members, relative to the views we now entertain on the subject of the Sabbath. The letter reads as follows:—

HARTSVILLE, March 21st, 1846.

DEAR BRETHREN,—I have a subject to present, which, however idle it may appear to you, to me is one of importance, which is to say, that myself and family, after mature deliberation in searching the Scriptures, prayer, and meditation, have come to the conclusion of embracing the Sabbath of the Bible. I can find nothing in the Holy Scriptures sufficient to warrant the change of the Sabbath, either by precept or example—that is to say, that the first day supersedes the seventh in its sabbatic claims on fallen man—and all Scripture that was given aforetime, was given for our instruction, to Gentiles as well as Jews. This is no impulse of the moment. The subject has been presented, by several members of my family, for some two years. But as to myself, I made up my mind some time in October last, to search the Scriptures on the subject of the Sabbath, and to read with candor those publications and treatises on the Sabbath, which I have always before treated with indifference or silent contempt. Still, when I obtained Mosheim's Church History, I thought it somewhat strengthened the observance of the first day. But I have been perusing it for some two months for that purpose, and find, that the burden of the History confirms the seventh-day Sabbath; and in compliance with the requirement of Him who said, "Remember the Sabbath day, and keep it holy," we resolve, in future, as a family, that it shall be our faith and practice. Finally, brethren, farewell; be perfect, be of one mind, and the God of peace be with you all, Amen. Yours in hope of eternal life,

HIRAM CORNWELL.

BROTHER CRANDALL—After giving my consent to the publication of the above letter, I thought proper to state one circumstance which gave rise to my investigation of the Sabbath. It was the reading of Mr. Brown's Address to the Baptist Denomination. On the first reading, I admired the affability and mildness of the Address, and said, That man breathes a good spirit. Still, I strove to point out some inconsistencies, and laid it aside. I took it up again, and read on the subject of the different views which the Baptist denomination held on the Sabbath—especially the no-Sabbath principle. I recoiled at the thought, and said, I shall never embrace that principle. I finally concluded, after so many inducements, to investigate the subject. I thought, either the first-day people or the seventh-day people must be in an error. I now made up my mind to look into the subject; have done so; and am convinced that the seventh day is the only Sabbath of the Bible.

I am, dear Sir,

Yours in the bonds of Christian union,

HIRAM CORNWELL.

BAPTIST ANNIVERSARIES.—The American Baptist Home Missionary Society is to hold its Fourteenth Anniversary in Brooklyn, N. Y., on the 13th and 14th days of May. The Ninth Anniversary of the American and Foreign Bible Society is to be held in New York on the 15th day of May. The first meeting of the recently organized Missionary Union will take place in New York during the following week. It will be attended by several missionaries from abroad, and will unquestionably be a meeting of great interest.

THE GERMAN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS—UNPRECEDENTED CONTEMPT OF RICHES.—The speech of Mr. Chandler, published in the last Recorder, contains the following passage, alluding to a fact in the early history of the German Seventh-day Baptists, which may not be so generally known as it deserves to be. We will venture to say, that it is the only thing of the kind on record, and it serves to explain the reason of their being so little known. The humble in this world always pass unnoticed. Mr. Chandler says:—

"Their lofty independence, which was exhibited in the form of Christian humility, led them to avoid accessions by gift, that involved the risk of pride of possessions."

The following extract from the Seventh-day Baptist Magazine for August, 1822, states the fact to which Mr. Chandler doubtless alludes. It is from a letter to the General Conference by Jacob Konigmacker, one of the members at Ephrata. He says:—

"In former times, the brethren frequently visited the members about Philadelphia, to hold communion with them. Governor Penn frequently visited their meetings. He was so much pleased with their doctrines, that he sent for the brethren, and informed them that he had made a grant to the Society of five thousand acres of land on Calico Creek, which he had called the Seventh-day Baptist Manor. But they did not accept of it, because it was against their religious principles to be possessed of such a large portion of worldly estate."

P.

TO DIRECTORS OF RAILROADS.

The following considerations were presented in a letter from Dr. Edwards to those Directors of Railroads who continue to run their cars on Sunday:—

"1. It is a gross invasion of the rights of the people. The people have a right to the stillness and quiet of the Sabbath. The rumbling and screaming, the tumult and bustle, noise and confusion of the rail cars, as they run through a village, and often in the time of public worship, is a gross and outrageous violation of that right."

REMARKS.—If conducting business, running cars, &c., on Sunday, be an invasion of the rights of the people worshiping on that day, are not the rights of the Seventh-day People invaded when others transact business and run cars on the Sabbath? Will Dr. Edwards deny equal rights? How else can he maintain this proposition?

"2. It is exceedingly injurious to the men who are employed in it. It tends to blunt their moral susceptibilities, to degrade them in their own eyes and in the eyes of their fellow men, and to debase their whole characters It tends to lessen their conviction of moral responsibility, to render them reckless, and thus to increase the danger of all who travel under their care. It tends also, if they have families, greatly to injure their children, and increase their exposure to evil, crime and infamy."

REMARKS.—If men are greatly injured by Sunday employments, and their moral character debased by the neglect of a human ordinance—which we have a right to suppose Sunday to be, until the Doctor shows us a Divine Law for its observance—how much more are ministers debased by neglecting the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment, which they are required to observe and teach!

"3. It tends to demoralize the public mind, to weaken the efficacy of law, and thus to endanger the purity and permanency of all our institutions: while it keeps many away from the house of God, and thus lessens the efficacy of the means of grace. This no man, or body of men, for the sake of increasing the value of railroad stocks and dividends, aiding and abetting others in breaking the Sabbath, or for any other secular purpose, have a moral right to do. And while they do it, it is wholly without right, in opposition to the moral law, and in violation of one of the great principles by which every man in the community is bound to be governed."

REMARKS.—The law of God sustains Friday as a day of sacred rest, just as decidedly as it does Sunday. "Six days shalt thou labor, but the seventh day is the Sabbath." What law is brought into disrepute by working on the first day of the week? A palpable disregard of the fourth Commandment by a Doctor of Divinity, does more to weaken the efficacy of law than all the Rail Road Companies in the country can do by running their cars on what God allows for a working day!

"4. The Sabbath day was not made for secular business, nor was it given to man for that purpose. Of course it does not belong to them. If they take it, they take what is not theirs. That is not honest. Honesty is contentment with what belongs to a man. An honest man, who is acquainted with his rights, will not take what is not his. The Sabbath day for secular business is not his. So to take it for that purpose is not honest."

REMARKS.—Will Dr. Edwards and his supporters steal a day which God has sanctified and blessed, viz: the seventh day, and substitute the Pagan day of Sun worship, and yet pretend to honesty? Read the assertion above

"5. Property gained by the open violation of Divine laws, is not apt to wear well. It does not seem to produce a good influence on the minds of the possessors. And if it goes down to their children, and they pursue a similar course, it seems to be followed with a curse. And should men wisely regard their own highest interests for this world and the interests of their children, they would not consent to gain any more property, or retain it any longer, than they could, by obeying Divine laws."

REMARKS.—This may be the reason why the Doctor's property does not wear well, and that his salary as a Sunday lecturer does not seem to procure a good influence on the mind of its possessor. Let those who violate the fourth Commandment take heed to their ways. LUTHER.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

The following rich morceau I have had lying in my cabinet more than twenty years without recollecting the source from whence I derived it, but have frequently promised friends to whom I have read it, that I would send it to a public print for insertion. It is now at your disposal. W. M. F.

MARCH OF INTELLECT IN IRELAND.

A Parent asked a Priest, his boy to bless,
Who forth charged him he must first confess;
"Well," said the man, "suppose, sir, I am willing,
What is your charge?"—"To you, 'tis but a shilling."
"Must all men pay, and all men make confession?"
"Yes, every man of Catholic profession."
"And whom do you confess to?"—"Why, the Dean!"
"And do the Deans confess?"—"Yes, man, they do, Confess to Bishops, and pay smartly too."
"Do Bishops, sir, confess—if so, to whom?"
"Why, they confess and pay the Church of Rome."
"Well," quoth the man, "all this is mighty odd—Does the Pope confess?"—"O yes, to God!"
"And does God charge the Pope?"—"No," quoth Priest,
"God charges nothing." "O, then, God is best—
God is able to confess and always willing—
To Him I will confess, and save my shilling."

MADISON UNIVERSITY.—It is well known that the Baptists of the State of New York have conducted to a high degree of success a Literary and Theological Institution at Hamilton. In its establishment, it was intended only for the accommodation of young men preparing for the ministry. For a few years past, however, its doors have been thrown open for the reception of students irrespective of the profession which they were designing to follow. But the Institution has suffered some embarrassment from the want of a proper charter, on which account it could not confer degrees, and was under the necessity of making an arrangement with the Columbian College at Washington for this purpose. We are glad to learn, that the State has recently granted it a very liberal charter, under the name of the Madison University, which has greatly encouraged its friends, and will undoubtedly enlarge its sphere of usefulness.

THE PASSOVER.—This great festival of the Jews, commemorative of their coming out of Egypt, commenced the present year on Friday, the 10th of April. It continues seven days, during which time the Jews eat no other bread than that which is unleavened. It is common in this city for them to engage the exclusive use of one or more large bakeries, where the cakes are prepared. They are made of pure water and flour, rolled out very thin, and pierced full of small holes to prevent their rising. Then, with all possible haste, they are placed in a very hot oven, where they are baked before they have time to ferment. This work was done last week, and the cakes were exposed for sale in every part of the city. A full description of the ceremonies connected with the celebration, will be found in the Recorder of May 1, 1845.

NO BAPTIST PAPER IN PENNSYLVANIA.—The Baptist Record, formerly published at Philadelphia, was discontinued some months ago; and encouragement was held out, that another paper would soon be started for the benefit of Baptists in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. It seems, however, that there is now but little prospect of carrying out this plan. The experiment of supporting such a paper has been once or twice tried at a heavy loss, which renders it very difficult to induce men to invest money in the enterprise.

REVIVAL IN HAMILTON, N. Y.—A letter from Prof. Maginnis, published in the Christian Watchman, gives an account of an interesting revival in the Literary and Theological Institution at Hamilton, and also in the Baptist Church of that village. Ten or eleven students of the Seminary have recently expressed a hope that they have obtained the forgiveness of sin through the blood of Christ. The number of hopeful converts in the village is much larger.

WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY.—The Christian Secretary says that a revival has been in progress in this Institution during the whole of the past term. Twenty-five of the students have professed faith in Christ, leaving only twelve unconverted students at the College, and some of these are seriously impressed.

REV. J. L. SHUCK, accompanied by the Chinese convert, Yong Seen Sang, has visited several southern cities, where he has made statements in reference to the condition and prospects of the Chinese Mission. He has accepted an appointment from the Board of the Southern Convention, and is now their missionary.

AMERICAN MISSIONARY UNION.—An Act has recently passed the Legislature of Pennsylvania, changing the name of the Baptist General Convention to that of the American Missionary Union. By this act the Convention retains, under its new name, all its existing powers, privileges, rights, and property, and is subject to all its present duties, obligations, and liabilities. A similar bill before the Legislature of Massachusetts has passed the Senate, and was adopted by the House, with a slight amendment.

SUCCESS A TEST OF TRUTH.—A late London paper says that the converts to the Roman Catholic religion from the upper ranks of society, during the last three months, now exceed one hundred, of whom nearly forty are clergymen. What will be said to this by those Protestants who are accustomed to argue the correctness of all their opinions from the success which has attended their efforts?

"LEGION OF HONOR."—This is the very appropriate heading which the editor of the Western Episcopalian gives to his weekly list of receipts. We wonder what heading he would give to a list of his delinquents.

DEATH OF A MISSIONARY.—A recent arrival from Africa, brings intelligence of the death, on the 5th of January, of Rev. Wm. B. Williams, late Principal of the Conference Seminary at Monrovia. He had been in he country only eighteen days, and had taught school only eight days, when he was taken sick of the fever which terminated his life. Mr. Williams was born in Hancock, Delaware Co., N. Y., in 1818.

COLONIZATION OF THE JEWS.—There is considerable agitation at the present time among the Jews in some countries, with reference to returning to the land of their fathers. This circumstance has led to the organization of a society in England for the purpose of encouraging their colonization. The London Watchman says:—

"At a meeting of gentlemen feeling deeply interested in the welfare of the Jewish people, recently held in London, it was resolved, that a Society be formed, under the title of 'The British and Foreign Society for promoting the Colonization of the Holy Land.' The Society is to be restricted to the making all necessary preparations to facilitate the realization of the gradual colonization of Palestine, and the present protection and promotion of the civil and religious rights and liberties of the Jewish people in every part of the world; the Committee to consist alike of Jews and Christians, Englishmen and foreigners. The co-operation of politicians and good men, of every country, sect, and rank, is invited, it being a fundamental rule of the Society, that it shall be entirely silent and neutral as to every point of religious controversy."

Such is the plan hit upon by men who are undoubtedly anxious to promote the welfare of Israel. As an argument in favor of the plan, a distinguished writer maintains that Palestine is fully open for the return of the Jews. He says:—

"A country once densely inhabited lies solitary—her pastoral hills unfrequented by the shepherd—her rich fields untilled, and shaggy with thistles and prickly shrubs—her villages sunk into heaps of ruins, and her cities without inhabitants. During the identical years in which Ireland quadrupled its population, the population of Palestine has sunk to a tenth."

ANOTHER ACCIDENT ON THE SABBATH.—We published last week an account of a sad accident which occurred to a company of sportsmen who were amusing themselves by shooting at a mark on the Sabbath day. Here is another, which is copied from the Dubuque Express, and which we recommend to the attention of those men who say so much about Sunday accidents:—

"Mr. Rufus Axtell, a young man who has for the last months resided in this city, either intentionally or accidentally shot himself on last Saturday, in the vicinity of Capt. Anderson's residence, about six miles from this place. On the day previous, he went to Capt. Anderson's for the avowed purpose of hunting a few days in the neighborhood; and on Saturday morning with his dog and gun left the house. As he did not return at night, Capt. A. and his family felt uneasy about him, but concluded that he had stopped for the night at some neighboring house. At about 11 o'clock next morning the dog returned without his master. This circumstance, with the restless conduct of the dog, excited their most fearful forebodings.

The Captain and some of his friends followed the faithful animal, who led them directly to the spot where the young man lay. They found him on his back, with the contents of the gun in his heart—the thumb and joint finger of his left hand shot off—his clothes mostly burned to cinders on his body—and his gun, ramrod, and powder-flask, lying separately near his body. It is supposed that about half of a pound of powder, which he had carried in the left pocket of his vest, exploded and ignited his clothes.

He was much respected by his acquaintances, moral in his habits, and a worthy member of the Christian church in this city. We understand that he has affectionate parents in Michigan, who will deeply deplore his untimely death."

ANOTHER.—What would the New York Evangelist and similar prints have said, if the avalanche described below had occurred on a Sunday instead of the Sabbath? They would undoubtedly have regarded it as a signal indication of the Divine displeasure towards the men who were at work on that day, and would accordingly have placed it in their list of "Sabbath Accidents:"—

"AVALANCHE AT TROY.—Another avalanche occurred on Saturday, in the immediate environs of that city, for which Troy has become famous. Two men were instantly killed, together with a pair of fine horses. It was near the former avalanches, on the opposite side of a small stream, and near a block of brick houses. Nearly three hundred feet of an abrupt hill of clay soil, came down with irresistible force, and had it not been for a brief warning, a great number of laborers would have been buried up, who were digging away the hill. The two who were killed, ran some distance, but, supposing they were beyond the reach of danger, stopped to look back, and were caught by the terrific avalanche. The owner of the horses saw the earth coming down, and attempted to get his team beyond reach, but seeing it impossible, he barely had time to save himself."

"Writing (says somebody) is a species of luxury for which, when one has long indulged it, nothing else can furnish a satisfactory substitute. It is a dissipation which annually brings hundreds of infatuated young men to the galleys, and which seeks to vanquish the cares of life by attacking them in columns. The spoils are spoiled paper, wasted pens and patience, squandered energies and ink."

The human mind is created and placed in this world to be educated for a higher state of existence. It is here that its faculties begin to unfold, and that those mighty energies, which are to bear it forward to unending ages, begin to discover themselves.

Chas. T. Torrey is recovering his health. The Baltimore correspondent of the Boston Atlas says he has authority for saying that Mr. Torrey disapproves of the decision of Messrs. A. A. Phelps and C. D. Cleaveland, in determining to apply the money, subscribed to aid in his release, to another purpose. It is now considered certain that Mr. Torrey will not be released on any terms.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

There were two leading subjects of discussion in the Senate last week, both of which related to Oregon. One was a resolution calling upon the President for copies of correspondence on Oregon not yet communicated—the other was the resolution giving notice to Great Britain; the former was passed—the latter spoken about by several distinguished Senators, and left where it was found. There were no questions of genetal interest decided by the House.

FIVE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Pilot Boat William J. Romer, arrived at New-York on the 10th inst., bringing English papers to March 11.

The comments of the English Press on the refusal of the American Government to Arbitrate on the Oregon Question look warlike.

The Revolution movement in Poland has spread extensively, and a Government had been organized at Cracow. The latest advices, however, appear to indicate that the struggle of the unfortunate Poles for freedom will prove unsuccessful.

Cotton had slightly advanced, and remained firm.

The prices of Wheat and Flour had improved.

The Tariff was still under discussion in Parliament, with a prospect of being speedily completed in accordance with the plans of the Ministry.

There has been no action in Parliament on the Oregon question.

MESMERISM AND SURGERY.—An extraordinary surgical operation was performed in this city a few days since upon a patient in a state of mesmeric sleep. It consisted in the removal of an adipose tumor from the back of a colored woman who has been a servant in the family of Rev. Dr. Higbie. Only five minutes were occupied in magnetizing the patient, who sat in a chair, with her head thrown forward, and resting on a table. An assistant editor of the Tribune, who was present, says:

"The magnetizer having pronounced the patient in the proper state, Dr. Bostwick (assisted by Drs. Samuel R. Childs and John Stearns,) proceeded with the operation. He first made an incision about eight inches in length across the tumor, and then proceeded to remove it by the usual process. The operation lasted three minutes, and required no usual amount of cutting. We stood within two feet of the patient, and watched her narrowly. There was no muscular twitching, and no manifestation whatever of sensibility to pain, or even of consciousness. A physician examined the pulse and said it was quite natural, though somewhat feebler, perhaps, than usual. A dead body could not have exhibited stronger insensibility to pain. The tumor weighed ten ounces. The wound did not bleed near as profusely as such wounds do when the patient is in a natural state. The whole operation of removing the tumor and dressing the wound, occupied just half an hour.

"The wound having been dressed, and the garments of the patient adjusted, Mr. Oltz awoke her by a few passes, which occupied less than a minute. Her appearance was much like that of a person suddenly aroused from ordinary sleep. Questions were put to her implying that the operation had not been performed, and that she would have to be magnetized again. She said she would rather submit to the operation at once in the natural state than wait any longer. She was asked if she did not know that the tumor had been removed. She replied in the negative, and with every appearance of perfect simplicity and integrity, declared that she had felt no pain, and was wholly ignorant of whatever had transpired during her sleep."

WONDERS OF CHINA.—The mechanical ingenuity and skill of the Chinese is proverbial, and is evinced in the construction of their temples, roads and bridges, particularly the latter; of which it is said they can boast the longest in the world. Travelers assert, that the bridge of Layang, which stretches over an arm of the sea, is built precisely similar to the bridges of Babylon, but entirely of stone. "The Builder" describes its length to be 26,800 Paris feet, and comprising 300 arches, or rather openings of pillars. These are not overspread by arches, but there are placed above them large slabs of stone, which form the roadway 70 feet broad. The distance of the pillars is nearly 74 1-2 feet, the latter being 70 feet high, and 15 feet broad, and strengthened with stone facings, of the form of triangular prisms, which extend over the whole height of the pillars up to the traversal slabs. The latter, of course more than 70 feet long, extend in breadth to 15 feet in thickness. Other reports, however, assign no more than 43 feet, old Paris measure, to the distance of the pillars, and only 4 1-2 feet to breadth and thickness of the traversal slabs by which, of course, the length of the bridge is reduced one half. Even so, it would be an astonishing structure, being six times the length of the longest bridge in Europe, viz., the Pont de St. Esprit, at Lyons. The parapet is, according to some reports, a railing, according to others, a ballustrade, and every pillar supports a pedestal on which a lion, 21 feet long, and made of one block of marble, is placed. SWEET AND SOUR APPLES.—Mr. J. E. Elliott, of Clinton, N. Y., has sent us several apples of the kind usually called sweet and sour. In those sent, the divisions between the sweet and sour portions, are very distinctly marked by external ridges. The proportion of the sweet and sour parts, vary in different apples. In many cases, there are alternate strips or divisions, each distinctly sweet or sour, over the whole apple—there being sometimes four or more of these divisions. We have several times seen this kind of apple before, it having first been brought to our notice at least twenty-five years since. But we have never seen or heard of but one kind having these peculiar qualities. The sour part is in appearance and taste a Rhode-Island Greening—in fact the apple would at first sight be taken for a genuine Greening, and were it not for the sweet portions, they would be considered identical. FUNERAL OF THE QUEEN OF THE GIPSIES.—An English paper says at Wincanton, on Friday, a funeral took place which created a great deal of curiosity, and attracted hundreds of persons to witness it. It was that of Dove Burton, commonly called the "Queen of the Gipsies." The deceased, who was ninety-five years of age, with her aged husband (the "King") was admitted into the Wincanton Union-house some time since, being unable any longer to tramp the country, and she died there on Monday, and was followed to the grave by her aged partner and some of the Gipsy tribe, very respectably dressed, and who appeared to feel deeply their loss.

WATER CRESSES.—The cultivation of this wholesome esculent is said to have become an inportant branch of horticultural industry in many parts of England, being used not only as a vegetable, but as an article in pharmacy. It is most generally eaten as a salad, but in France and in the north of Germany, it is boiled like spinach, and eaten with eggs. As a medicinal growth, it possesses high antiscorbutic qualities. The demand for water cresses has become so great in the London market, that the cultivation of the plant has become a special business, whilst it is not uncommon to find plantations of it covering four or six acres of ground. Some idea may be formed of the enormous consumption in the great metropolis, when it is stated that the annual sales amount to more than £10,000.

STATISTICS OF PARIS.—Paris is inhabited by 912,035 individuals, who occupy 34,396,800 square yards of surface, or nearly 8,600 acres. It contains 42,000 houses, 192 streets, 57 gates, 46 military roads, 37 quays, 20 boulevards, 37 avenues, 103 squares, 37 bridges, 105 courts, 9 palaces, 23 remarkable edifices, 6 public gardens, 4 triumphal arches, 5 columns, 1 obelisk, 35 libraries, 15 museums, 28 monumental fountains, 38 churches, 25 convents, 26 hospitals, 4 equestrian statues, 24 theatres, and 39 barracks.

SUMMARY.

Professor Morse has recently made some interesting and valuable improvements in the Magnetic Telegraph. Several experiments have been made, which have resulted in the discovery that the Telegraph can be worked without the use of batteries, and thereby facilitating communication, and saving much expense and trouble.

Some idea of the extent and character of the delicacies of Cincinnati may be inferred from the list of marketing, brought in by one person alone, who supplies the city from the counties of Jay and Randolph, Ind.: 74 Deer, entire carcases, 270 Deer Saddles, 172 Oppossums, 4300 Rabbits, 483 Squirrels, 2290 Peasants, 10,100 Patridges or Quails, 90 Wild Turkeys, 340 small birds, 6 Coons.

The ship John Quincy Adams, of Boston, which has just arrived from Canton, has in its log-book the following account of vessels wrecked at St. Helena, :—"Feb. 18, ran into the Roads of St. Helena, intending to stop for water. Perceiving a very high surf on shore, we spoke one of the ships at anchor. The captain told us there was no communication with the shore, and that the day previous heavy rollers had come in from the northwest, without any wind, and had caused the destruction of nine vessels by throwing them on the rocks."

The Newark Advertiser says: The Somerville Railroad has not gone into the hands of a Boston Company as reported in some of the papers. It is held, on the contrary, by Mr. Stearns, the purchaser at the late public sale, though it is probable that a company of our own citizens, chiefly, may be associated with him in the contemplated thorough improvements. A new track is to be laid with the T rail. The road will probably, at no very remote period, be continued to the Delaware opposite Easton, Pa.

David Tichenor, a veteran of the Revolution, and a brother of the late Isaac Tichenor, formerly Governor of Vermont, died at his residence in Newark, N. J., in the 88th year of his age.

Ezekiel Starr, an eminent Cherokee, and Representative or Delegate of that Tribe at Washington, died in that city on the 6th inst., in the 45th year of his age.

Within the seven years preceding 1842, it is said that ninety millions of dollars went to Europe from the United States for the article of iron.

A new foundry is to be established at South Boston, by Cyrus Alger and others, for the manufacture of iron, steel, and copper articles, with a capital of $200,000. About one hundred and fifty hands will be employed.

A new Railway Engine is said to have been invented by Mr. Brunel, which will work on eight driving wheels, and run fifty miles per hour.

During the month of March, 4,349 passengers arrived at this port from foreign countries.

It is estimated that $80,000 worth of sheep are annually destroyed by dogs in the State of Ohio. One farmer lost 50 in a single night.

A bill has passed the Massachusetts Senate, to abolish the distinction between written and spoken defamation of character, which provides that every person who shall defame another by words, shall be punished by fine, or imprisonment in the common jail, or by both fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court. The truth of the matter charged as slanderous is allowed to be a sufficient justification for defamatory words.

Mr. Cist, in his last Advertiser, says Front-street is not only the longest street in Cincinnati, but, with the exception of one or two streets in London, the longest in the world. It extends from the three mile post on the Little Miami Railroad, the Fulton and Cincinnati, as far west as Storr's township, an extent of seven miles. In all this range there are not ten dwellings which are not three feet distant from the adjacent ones, and two thirds of the entire distance is as densely built as is desirable for business purposes and dwelling house convenience.

It is said that a mixture of snow and nitric acid, in the proportion of half an ounce of the former to two drams of the latter, will produce a powerful freezing mixture, reducing the thermometer from 62 to 30 degrees, being 32 degrees lower than the freezing point of water.

A letter received in Boston from Pernambuco, dated Feb. 21, states that the northern provinces of Brazil were suffeing severely from drouth, and that multitudes of cattle were dying for want of water. Vegetation was in some places almost entirely destroyed. It was thought the growing crops of cotton and sugar would suffer very severely.

The following curious custom is said to exist on the Elbe. The peasantry who possess any land, however small, never enter the church without a nosegay in their hands. Thus they show that they claim the consideration due to persons who possess property in the parish (town.) Among the country people in the neighborhood of Hambury, there is no garden so small as not to possess a place for the flowers intended for this purpose; and the plat is distinguished by the name of "the Church Nosegay."

The Mechanic's Ledger says, that a Mr. Bigelow, an ingenious American Artisan, has invented a power-loom for weaving ingrain carpets, which is already in use by the Lowell company, who have set 50 looms in motion, and expended nearly $100,000 in this branch of manufacture. The carpets produced are of the finest quality. Mr. Bigelow has also completed a machine for the manufacture of Brussels carpeting, which has every prospect of success. He has also invented a machine for the manufacture of Marseilles quilt, a species of work seldom attempted in this country. It is said that he has received an offer of $80,000 from England for the patent.

A contempoary says, "that the most beautiful flowers and other figures may be painted on silk with a very fine camel hair pencil, dipped in a solution of nitro-muriate of gold, in the proportion of one part of the nitro-muriate to three of distilled or rain water, on silk, satin, &c., and hold them over a Florence flask, from which hydrogen gas is evolved during the decomposition of water, by sulphuric acid and iron filings. The painted flowers, &c., in a few minutes will shine with all the splendor of the purest gold. A coating of this kind will not tarnish on exposure to the air or in washing."

Capt. REUBEN SMITH, Sen. aged about ninety years, a native of Cranston, R. I. died at Providence on Thursday, 3d inst. He early enlisted in the service of his country, and served during the War, on land and sea. He was esteemed as an honest man, and a hospitable friend and neighbor. It is believed there are few of this venerated school that survive him in that State

The Rev. Mr. Hall, of Norwalk, Conn., in his late work upon "The Puritans and their Principles," says that the far-famed blue laws are "an absolute fiction—a mere Munchausen affair—the work of a Rev. Mr. Peters, an Episcopal clergyman, a tory, who abandoned this country at the opening of the Revolution, and fled to England."

A woman lately died at Tolosa, in Spain, at the extraordinary age of 150 years. She leaves a daughter in her 82d year—born of course in her 78th year. So says a Spanish Journal.

Mr. Charles Auld and Samuel L. Auld, brothers, were found dead on the Prairie, near Melrose, Ill., on the 5th ult. They left Melrose on the 24th of February last, in a state of intoxication, and are supposed to have frozen to death while in that condition.

The St. Louis Circuit Court decided last week that where a bankrupt, subsequent to his discharge in bankruptcy, promises, orally or otherwise, to pay a debt, the moral obligation resting upon him is sufficient consideration to support his promise.

The Grand Rapids (Mich.) Eagle estimates that there are now 3,000,000 feet of lumber on the Grand River, below that village, ready for shipping; and that above, there are at least 2, 500,000 feet to be floated down this Spring. The amount of lumber to be shipped this season, it says, will far exceed that of any other.

When a stranger treats me with disrespect, said a poor philosopher, I comfort myself with the reflection that it is not myself that he slights, but my old coat and shabby hat, which, to say the truth, have no particular claims to admiration. So if my hat and coat choose to fret about it, let them—it is nothing to me. The philosopher, with all his poverty, was rich in wisdom.

It is stated that in 1840, there were only twenty-one churches of the Presbyterian and Congregational denominations in Wisconsin. Now there are seventy-three. The Home Missionary Society assisted in forming twelve the last year.

Ferguson could tend sheep in the field, and there accurately mark the position of the stars with a thread and beads, and with a knife construct a watch from wood. What was this, but the result of deep reflection?

A. Lewis writes to the Boston Mail that a copper mine has been discovered in Lynnfield, two miles from the hotel, the shares in which are held at two hundred dollars. Copper has been discovered within a few hundred rods of the Lynn depot.

Mr. James S. Wood, of Buchanan, Va., has invented an instrument called Piano Violino, or a union of the piano and violin.

A new machine for sowing wheat has been invented in England which distributes the grain equally over the whole surface of the ground. It has been found that with the use of this machine there is a very great saving of seed.

A fine healthy well dressed female infant, was found on the steps of Bishop Hughes' house on Sunday evening.

George Sherman, a young clerk in the Post Office at Bridgeport, Conn., was on Wednesday of last week arrested on a charge of stealing money from various letters which have passed through that office during the last four or five months. The whole amount of his depredations is about $750. He has confessed his guilt. The culprit is of a very respectable family, a general favorite in Bridgeport, and about seventeen years of age.

The Providence Journal states, that a large elm tree on the margin of the Mosshasuc river, near Smith's Bridge, was cut down to make room for the Providence and Worcester Railroad track. It contained seven cords of wood, and it was ascertained by the grains on the tree that it must have been 160 years old.

Wicks, a murderer lately executed in England, in his conversations with the clergyman who attended him in his last days, stated that he had not only been a witness at the two last executions at the Old Baily, but had actually paid each time for a seat at the window of one of the houses opposite the place of execution, that he might view it the better.

Recently at New Orleans a challenge to fight a duel passed between Miss Mary Adkins and Miss Turner, the latter accepting, and choosing pistols. Recorder Genois, hearing of it, locked up both parties.

During the ministry of Rev. Dr. Proudfit in Salem, N. Y., between 30 and 40 of the young members of his church became preachers of the gospel. So says the Memoir of Dr. Proudfit.

The Utica and Schenectady Railroad has resolved to reduce its fare through from $3 to $2 after the 16th inst. This is right and just. All free tickets are to cease on and after that date.

A convict by the name of Pierce, sent to the State Prison from Brooklyn, about fifteen months ago, hung himself in the cell on last Thursday. It appears that a negro informed him of the death of his father, which was caused principally by the misdeeds of the son; this apparently preyed upon his mind considerably, also with the knowledge of one of his brothers having been arrested for some felony; therefore, to both these causes the rash act was attributed.

The Assembly of New-York has passed the bill incorporating the "Ocean Steam Nevigation Co." by a two-thirds vote, and the Company are prepared, as soon as the Senate passes the bill, to go vigorously on with the construction of the vessels.

At Waterville, N. Y., a few days since, the dwelling-house of Timothy Leonard was burned to the ground; and the saddest part of the calamity is, that Mr. Leonard, his wife, and a girl about 12 years old, perished in the flames.

Among the passengers for Havana by the Brig Rapid, which sailed on Tuesday last, we notice the name of Alfred Stillman, Esq., of this city.

Three whales were captured on the 31st ult., in Delaware Bay, having been observed for some time swimming about the ship channel with a series of curious motions, as if flying from some more formidable monster of the great deep. After circumnavigating in this way for some time, they at last made directly for the shore, where they were speedily secured. The largest measured in length 18 feet—in circumference 15.

On Tuesday evening of last week an action for breach of marriage promise came up in this city before the Sheriff's Jury, in which Miss Sarah Greer, a young lady of irreproachable character and great personal beauty, was plaintiff, and Eli W. Butler defendant. The acquaintance, correspondence, and attentions, had continued from 1842 up to last fall, when the defendant withdrew and married a lady from New Haven. The Jury gave the plaintiff three thousand dollars.

Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,
President of the Board of Trustees

STATE CONVENTION.—STATE OF NEW YORK, SS. We, the Secretary of State, the Comptroller and the Treasurer of the said State, having formed a Board of State Canvassers, and having, in conformity to the provisions of the act entitled "An Act recommending a Convention of the people of the State," passed May 13th, 1845, canvassed and estimated the whole number of votes or ballots given for and against the said proposed 'Convention,' at a Central Election held in the said State, on the fourth day of November, in the year 1845, according to the certified statements of said votes or ballots received by the Secretary of State, in the manner directed by the said act, do hereby determine, declare, and certify, that the whole number of votes or ballots given under virtue of the said act, was two hundred and forty-seven thousand, one hundred and seventeen; that of the said number, two hundred and thirteen thousand, two hundred and fifty-seven votes or ballots were given for the said Convention:—That of the said first mentioned number, thirty-three thousand, eight hundred and sixty votes or ballots were given against the said Convention:—And it appearing by the said Canvass that a majority of the votes or ballots given as aforesaid are for a Convention, the said canvassers do farther certify and declare that a Convention of the people of said State will be called accordingly: and that an election for Delegates to the said Convention will be held on the last Tuesday of April in the year 1846, to meet in Convention at the Capitol, in the City of Albany, on the first Monday in June, 1846, pursuant to the provisions of the aforesaid act of the Legislature.

Given under our hand at the Secretary of State's Office in the City of Albany, the 26th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty five.

N. S. BENTON, Secretary of State.
A. C. FLAGG, Comptroller.
BENJAMIN ENOS, Treasurer.

STATE OF NEW YORK, SECRETARY'S OFFICE.—I certify the preceding to be a true copy of an original certificate of the Baord of State Canvassers, on file in this office.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

From the Philadelphia Saturday Courier.

THE CHILD AT HIS MOTHER'S GRAVE.

BY MRS. D. ELLEN GOODMAN.

I'm kneeling by your grave, mother,
I'm thinking now of you;
The moon is on the wave, mother,
The grass is wet with dew.

I'm gazing on thy face, mother,
And in thy mild blue eye,
Each look of love I trace, mother,
Thy voice comes trembling by.

Oh, yes—I see thee now, mother,
I feel thy gentle hand
Upon my childish brow, mother,
As by thy side I stand.

And oh, I would forget, mother,
That thou art with the dead;
That thy bright sun hath set, mother,
Thy spirit heavenward fled.

The wind is murmuring by, mother,
It lifts my dampened hair,
As I gaze up to the sky, mother,
And see thee smiling there.

There is one lovely star, mother,
More brilliant than the rest;
That shines its light afar, mother,
Across the blue sky's breast.

It gazes down on me, mother,
Its eye of silver light
Is like a sparkling gem, mother,
Upon the brow of night.

Is that the far-off Isle, mother,
Where thou art gone to dwell?
I know I see thy smile, mother,
And feel thy voice's spell.

I lay my pallid cheek, mother,
Upon my mossy bed;
And think I hear thee speak, mother,
Though thou art with the dead.

Thou tellest of the joy, mother,
Of the pure bliss of heaven;
And a blessing to thy boy, mother,
I feel that thou hast given.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., 1846.

Stories about Dogs.

There are at least thirty different kinds of dogs—some large, some small, some fierce, some gentle, some slender and graceful, some sturdily made and very powerful. There is the lap-dog, with a soft lustrous eye and silken skin, fit to be the pet of the fine lady—and there is the fierce bull-dog; that will seize a bull by the nose and pin him to the ground. There is the greyhound that is so swift as to outstrip the deer, and the patient foxhound, that follows reynard with a keen scent, till at last his fleetness and his tricks can avail him nothing, and he surrenders to his fate.

But amid all this variety, the Newfoundland dog is the best fellow. He is, in the first place, the most intelligent, and in the next, he is the most devoted, attached, and faithful. When the people came from Europe to America, they found this fine breed of dogs with the Indians of Newfoundland and the vicinity. They are large shaggy, web-footed, and almost as fond of the water as the land. They possess great strength, and have a countenance that seems to beam with reason and affection. There are many pleasant tales of this creature, well authenticated, of which I shall now tell you a few.

One day, as a girl was amusing herself with an infant, at Aston's Quay, near Carlisle bridge, Dublin, and was sportively toying with the child, it made a sudden spring from her arms, and in an instant fell into the Liffey. The screaming nurse and anxious spectators saw the water close over the child, and conceived that he had sunk to rise no more. A Newfoundland dog, which had been accidentally passing with his master, sprang forward to the wall, and gazed wistfully at the ripple in the water, made by the child's descent. At the same instant the child reappeared on the surface of the current, and the dog sprang forward to the edge of the water.

Whilst the animal was descending, the child again sunk, and the faithful creature was seen anxiously swimming round and round the spot where it had disappeared. Once more the child rose to the surface; the dog seized him, and with a firm but gentle pressure bore him to land without injury. Meanwhile a gentleman arrived, who, on inquiry into the circumstances of the transaction, exhibited strong marks of sensibility and feeling towards the child, and of admiration for the dog that had rescued him from death.

The person who had removed the babe from the dog turned to show the infant to this gentleman, when it presented to his view the well-known features of his own son! A mixed sensation of terror, joy, and surprise, struck him mute. When he had recovered the use of his faculties, and fondly kissed his little darling, he lavished a thousand embraces on the dog, and offered to his master a very large sum (five hundred guineas) if he would transfer the valuable animal to him; but the owner of the dog (Colonel Wynne) felt too much affection for the useful creature to part with him for any consideration whatever.

A gentleman who lived at a short distance from a village in Scotland, had a very fine Newfoundland dog, which was sent every forenoon to the baker's shop in the village, with a napkin, in one corner of which was tied a piece of money, for which the baker returned a certain quantity of bread, tying it up in the napkin and consigning it to the care of the dog.

At about equal distances from the gentleman's mansion there lived two other dogs; one a mastiff, which was kept by a farmer as watch dog; and the other a staunch bull-dog, which kept watch over the parish mill. As each was master over all the lesser curs of his master's establishment, they were severally very high and mighty animals in their way, and they seldom met without attempting to settle their precedence by battle.

Well, it so happened that one day, when the Newfoundland dog was returning from the baker's with his charge, he was set upon by a host of useless curs, who combined their efforts, and annoyed him the more, that, having charge of the napkin and bread, he could not defend himself, and accordingly got himself rolled in the mire, his ears scratched, and his coat soiled.

Having at length extricated himself, he retreated homeward, and depositing his charge in its accustomed place, he instantly set out to the farmer's mastiff. To the no small astonishment of the farmer's family, instead of the meeting being one of discord and contention, the two animals met each other peacefully, and after a short interchange of civilties, they both set off towards the mill. Having engaged the miller's dog as an ally, the three sallied forth, and taking a circuitous road to the village, scoured it from one end to the other, putting to the tooth, and punishing severely, every cur they could find. Having thus taken their revenge, they washed themselves in a ditch, and each returned quietly to his home.

One day a Newfoundland dog and a mastiff, which never met without a quarrel, had a fierce and prolonged battle on the pier of Donaghadee, and from which, while so engaged, they both fell into the sea. There was no way of escape but by swimming a considerable distance. The Newfoundland dog being an expert swimmer, soon reached the pier in safety; but his antagonist, after struggling for some time, was on the point of sinking, when the Newfoundland, which had been watching the mastiff's struggles with great anxiety, dashed in, and seizing him by the collar, kept his head above the water, and brought him safely to shore. Ever after the dogs were most intimate friends; and when, unfortunately, the Newfoundland was killed by a stone-wagon passing over his body, the mastiff languished, and evidently lamented his friend's death for a long time.

A Thames waterman once laid a wager that he and his dog would leap from the centre arch of Westminster bridge, and land at Lambeth within a minute of each other. He jumped off first, and the dog immediately followed; but as it was not in the secret, and fearing that its master would be drowned, it seized him by the neck, and dragged him on shore, to the no small diversion of the spectators.

A native of Germany, when traveling through Holland, was accompanied by a large Newfoundland dog. Walking along a high bank which formed the side of a dike or canal, so common in that country, his foot slipped, and he fell into the water. As he was unable to swim, he soon became senseless. When he recovered his recollection, he found himself in a cottage, surrounded by peasants, who were using such means as are generally practised in that country for restoring suspended animation. The account given by the peasants was, that as one of them was returning home from his labor, he observed, at a considerable distance, a large dog in the water, swimming, and dragging and sometimes pushing something that he seemed to have great difficulty in supporting, but which, by dint of perseverance, he at length succeeded in getting into a small creek.

When the animal had pulled what it had hitherto supported as far out of the water as it was able, the peasant discovered that it was the body of a man.

The dog, having shaken himself, began industriously to lick the hands and face of his master; and the peasant, having obtained assistance, conveyed the body to a neighboring house, where, the usual means having been adopted, the gentleman was soon restored to sense and recollection. Two large bruises with the marks of teeth appeared, one on his shoulder, and the other on the nape of his neck; whence it was presumed that the faithful animal had seized his master by the shoulder and swam with him for some time, but that his sagacity had prompted him to let go his hold and shift his grasp to the neck, by which means he was enabled to support the head out of the water. It was in the latter position that the peasant observed the dog making his way along the dike, which it appeared he had done for the distance of nearly a quarter of a mile, before he discovered a place at which it was possible to drag his burden ashore. It is therefore probable that the gentleman owed his life as much to the sagacity as to the fidelity of his dog.

True Contentment.

I once met with a poor woman who seemed to have learned perfectly the lesson of contentment,—that lesson which the apostle considered so very important, and which, it is to be feared, very few people adequately comprehend. The outward circumstances of this individual were such as to excite feelings of commiseration. She had been left a destitute widow, with three small children. After the burial of her husband, her property in money amounted to only fifteen cents. During his sickness, many articles of furniture had been sold to supply him with medicine, and to provide for the wants of the family. There were now remaining only a cheap bedstead, four chairs, a small table, a trunk, and a few cooking utensils. The indigent woman had not many friends, for she had lived but a short time in her present home, and there are but few in this generation who seek the friendship of the poor. A neighbor, however, not quite so destitute, offered to solicit some washing for her, and when I first saw her this was her occupation. She was in a small kitchen. A kettle of hot water was hanging over the fire, and the woman was standing washing at a tub which stood on a bench near the door. The room was cleaner and neater than I have seen many a parlor.

But what interested me most was, the perfect contentment which seemed to possess her mind; she spoke of her condition as if it were very desirable, alluded to her comforts as the gift of her Heavenly Father, and seemed exceedingly grateful while recounting them. She said that she hoped that the blessings of her present life would not cause her to forget that it was not her home. She dwelt at length upon the mercy of the Saviour; upon his tenderness and compassion. She said she had deserved nothing but punishment, and she had received a multitude of blessings. She spoke of her hope of eternal life, as the free gift of God, and as a treasure too precious to be estimated, and she seemed to look forward to the future with the same contented, happy state of feeling with which she viewed the present.

As I left that small and scanty furnished room, I could not avoid the conclusion that its humble tenant was much happier than hundreds and thousands of those who dwelt in handsome and spacious houses, and who have all their temperal wants supplied without any trouble of their own. It is the soul, after all, not outward circumstances, which makes happiness.

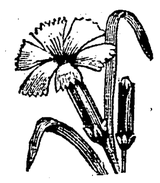
RETURN OF SPRING, OR MAY DAY.

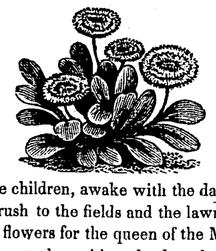
The winter is over and gone,
The south with soft zephyrs again
Is breathing on hill-top and lawn,
And spreading new life through the glen.



Lo, spring with her flow'rets appears
To cheer us with beauty and glee,
To dry up our dark winter tears
And bid us from bondage be free.

The birds have returned with their songs,
The robin now sings on the spray,
The lark is seen winging our lawns,
The blue-bird unites in the lay.

The groves are all mantled with green,
The apple, the peach, and the pear,
All blooming with beauty are seen,
An earnest that fruit will be there.



Wake children, awake with the day,
And rush to the fields and the lawns,
Seek flowers for the queen of the May
And crown her with garlands and songs.

Story for Little Girls.

A FABLE.

"It happened once, that all the animals, beasts birds, fishes, and insects, assembled to hear a sermon from one of their number; I have not been informed who was the orator. The subject of the discourse was the duty of living to do good: and the audience seemed much delighted with the number and variety of the motives presented. As they went to their respective homes, after the performance, thus they moralized to themselves.

"Said the ant, 'This sermon is a very good one for some folks, but it has no sort of application to me. What can such a poor, little, crawling thing as I, do for the good of the universe? Besides, I have so large a family of my own to provide for, that it requires all my time and attention. If I had wings like the butterfly, I would not live so useless a life as he does.'

"Said the butterfly, 'I am really ashamed of the ant, who has such stores laid up, that she does no more good with them. I am sure if I were half as rich, I would supply all the poor of the neighborhood. But when I can hardly get enough for myself, how can I help others.'

"The little fish complained that he had neither time, nor talents, nor opportunity of doing good; he was so insignificant that he had no influence; and moreover he had to get food for himself, and take care that he was not made food for others. If he were only as large and strong as the whale, he might be useful.

"The sheep declared that as he had no horns to defend himself, it was absurd to think of his doing anything for others; he hoped his neighbor the goat would apply the sermon to himself.

"Thus each excused himself; and on the whole, the sole result of the discourse so much applauded, was to convince each, that himself was most unfortunate, and his neighbors without excuse.

MORAL—People who do not do their duty in the situation in which they are, would not be likely to in another."

From the Cross and Journal.

For the Young.

My young friends, keep out of bad company. I will tell you what happened forty years ago, when the writer of this was a school boy. There were two boys of perhaps sixteen or eighteen years of age. In those days boys were not men till they were twenty-one or two. Well, these boys were both remarkably steady: every body thought they would turn out good men. Well, one of them did; he became a preacher and a useful man, but the other one got into bad company; and, as young men generally take a turn for good or for evil about that age, he lost his religious turn of mind. From bad he got to worse, and finally stole a horse and was sent to the wheelbarrow. That was the law, then in that State, forty years ago. They were chained to a wheelbarrow and made to work on the public roads. His name was Mount. Well, before his time was out he got away, and late one evening he came to my mother's house. The family all knew him—My mother called him Mr. Mount. He hung his head and said, "That is not my name; my name is Carwell." Presently in came my brothers, who had been his schoolmates. They said, "Why, Mr. Mount, how do you do?" "My name is not Mount," said he, faintly, and hung down his head. "No," said my mother, "I thought it was Benjamin Mount, but, upon reflection, he, poor fellow, is at the wheel barrow."

He was very dirty. A bed was made for him on the floor before the kitchen fire. When he went to bed, myself and one other brother went to a back window and looked in. We saw him take off the rags from around his ancles. They appeared cut to the bone with the irons he had worn while chained to the wheelbarrow. Next morning he was off by times. We soon heard of his escape, and then we knew it was him. Now what must have been his feelings, when called by name to often? True, he was altered, but we knew him, and he knew us; for, as I said, some of us had been his schoolmates. Now, let young men beware of bad company; as I said before, sixteen or eighteen and along there, is the turning point; it is an important point in your history. Mind what is told you by an OLD MAN.

A boy's class and a Missionary.

A Sunday school was opened near my house just at the time that I first felt the blessedness of a pardoned sinner; and in that school it was my privilege to become a teacher. This was a great advantage to me, as it matured my knowledge of divine things, and afforded me constant opportunities of speaking to my class about the salvation of their souls. The boys generally conducted themselves well, and gave me much satisfaction by their dilligence in committing hymns and large portions of the Scripture to memory; but I often sighed in secret, because I could not perceive that any of them had experienced that important change, without which a sinner cannot enter heaven.

In the year 1812 I left them to study for the ministry and then proceeded to India, and afterwards to Russia, to teach my fellow creatures in those distant lands the sacred truths which I had taught my class in an English Sunday School.

On my return from Russia, I had been preaching to a large congregation in London, when two young men came to converse with me about their going as missionaries to the heathen. There also came a third person who, after waiting some time, said with a smile, "you do not appear to recollect me, sir!" "No, sir, I do not know that I ever saw you." "Indeed!" said he, "why I was once in your class in the Sunday school." "What is your name, sir?" "My name is W." "There were two brothers of that name, one was called Samuel, and the other Johnny." "Well," said he, "I am Johnny." "I am delighted to see you, sir, after such a lapse of time: what is your occupation?" "I am captain of a brig, and am happy to say she is my own. My wife's father and my father united together, and bought the vessel for me." "This is very gratifying intelligence," I replied; "but pray, captain, how are you sailing on the voyage to eternity?" At this he looked grave, and the tear trickled down his sun-burnt cheek, while he added, "I hope I am going on well, sir. I carry a 'bethel flag' with me, and when I came into port I hoist the flag as a signal to see if there are any praying sailors there; and if there are we have a prayer meeting; and on a Sunday I give them a word of exhortation." "Well, Johnny, this is transporting: do tell me where and when this good work began." "It began, sir, in the Sunday school, and through the blessing of God I have been preserved by it amid all the snares and temptations peculiar to a seafaring life." "Can you tell me anything of the other boys of my class?" "Yes, one of them died triumphantly, while he was a student at College. Two others I have seen this voyage in London. One of them is a Baptist, and the other a Churchman; both of them are pious men; and as we were conversing about our early days, we could all trace up our religion to the instruction you gave us in the Sunday school."

Reader! think what I felt at this unexpected disclosure of the divine blessing with which God has followed my feeble labors. I had not seen these youths for two and twenty years; but God had watched over the seed which I had sown, and he had watered it and made it grow. May all who read this be encouraged to labor and pray, and wait, and at last meet the same rich reward.—Amen.

Virtue and Vice.

You may tell me that the fresh bud on the tree is lovely, that the blossom on the thorn is lovely, and that the flowers of the field are lovely—and so they are; but neither bud, blossom, nor flower, is half so lovely as a youthful heart devoted to virtue and to God.

Not fairest blossoms, buds nor flowers
So fresh and fragrant shine,
As youthful hearts with all their powers,
That cleave to things divine.

You may tell me that the eagle and vulture are fierce and fearful in the air, and that the lion and tiger are fierce and fearful in the forest—and so they are; but neither the one nor the other is so hateful or so terrible as a human heart set on evil.

The birds of prey and savage beasts
Are not so fierce and fell,
In all their rage, as human breasts
Where evil passions dwell.

This being the case, how earnestly should the young love and pursue holy thoughts and deeds, and how heartily should they hate and avoid all things that are evil!

Love then the Lord, to him thy breath,
And thy young heart be given;
That when thy body sinks in death,
Thy soul may rise to heaven.

MORAL BRAVERY.—We remember the story of a cruel master who, without cause, had determined to sever a slave mother, and her only child. She had been faithful under the very worst usage, and she determined to remain so until he told her, that on the morrow, her child must be borne to New Orleans to be sold there in the slave mart. It was mid-winter. The earth was frosted with a hard crust, yet at midnight she started for the Ohio, determined, if she could, to live and die with her child. She reached its banks as the pursuers rose on the hill beyond—no boat was near—masses of rotten ice were sluggishly drifting along—death was ahead. Trusting to heaven, she put her feet on the treacherous element, and with it bending and breaking beneath her, (spectators on either side expecting to see her and her child sink at every moment,) she boldly pushed on from cake to cake, until she landed safe on the Ohio shore. Five minutes sooner and she must have perished—two minutes later and she would have met with a watery grave, for before she had proceeded twenty steps the ice behind her, close on the Kentucky side, had broken and was scattered ere she reached the mid river. "Thank God you and your child are safe," exclaimed the hard-hearted master, as he saw her land, rejoiced that he had escaped the responsibility of their death. "Brave woman," said a Kentuckian who had witnessed her escape and met her at the landing, "you have won your freedom and shall have it." The mother and the child were kept together, and liberty is now their lot in their humble but happy home. Was there not true heroism here, and is not the scene worthy the sweetest song of poetry or the holiest praise of man?—True American.

I LOVE MY MOTHER BEST.

I have a father good and kind,
As father need to be;
And though so tall, I do not mind,
I sit upon his knee,
And listen while he loves to tell
Of days long since gone by;
Of persons that he knew full well,
When he was young as I:
And I am sad when he's away,
And smile when he is near;
Yes, my good father, truth to say,
Is very, very dear.

I have a sister; she has grown
Past me three inches high,
And ten times is, 'twas ever known,
More beautiful than I;
And sweet and pleasant is her voice,
And gentle still the same;
Nor easy vexed, nor ever cross,
When I have need of blame;
Ne'er sister good as mine, I guess,
Shame were it not to tell,
I love my gentle sister Bess,
Words cannot tell how well.

I have a little brother too;
Was cherub o'er so fair?
With rogueish eyes of laughing blue,
And softly waving hair—
And mischief is his great delight,
His face brimful of joy,
When doing what he know's not right,
The little saucy boy.
Yet in my heart I cannot find
To check his roguish glee;
Dear little Charley, brother mine,
How precious is to me.

These friends have I, and yet one more,
Still dearer than the rest;
Though I should count them o'er and o'er,
I love my Mother best!
Let others love me as they will,
Be gentle as they may,
My mother holds me dearer still,
And kinder is than they;
In saying so, I never thought
'Twas speaking 'gainst the rest—
I'm sure my father knows I ought
To love my mother best.

An Affecting Scene.

BY REV. N. RICE.

The time had arrived at which the children of a happy family usually retired to rest, After the usual preparations had been made, the pious mother directed the youngest (a son of nearly four years) to recite his prayers as usual, which he did, and was properly placed in bed. His sister, a little older than himself, retired also, after having embraced her affectionate little brother in her arms. The mother returned to another family residing in an adjoining room, where the father of these children was sitting. In a few moments a voice was heard. It was the voice of prayer, and the voice of a sister praying for herself and little brother. The parents listened, and directly loud sobs were heard, while the voice of prayer from the little daughter continued in strains like the following:

"Lord, bless me and give me a new heart. Make me a good child, that I may go to heaven. Lord, forgive me, for I have been angry with my little brother to-day, and struck him; and give me a new heart, that I may never do it again. Lord bless my little brother, and give him a new heart, that we may both go to heaven. I want to love the Lord. I want to go to heaven. I want a new heart that I may be happy."

Directly the mother arose, entered the room and found both children bathed in tears. The daughter looking up to her dear mother said, "I have been praying for a new heart, that I may go to heaven; and that my little brother may have a new heart and go to heaven too." Upon asking the little boy, bathed in tears and sobbing aloud, "What are you crying for?" He replied, "I want a new heart that I may go to heaven. I want God to forgive me, that I may go to heaven with you and father and sister."

The little girl then requested the mother to pray with them. The request with pleasure was granted. She knelt and prayed with them by their bedside; after which she left the room in which they were. The father, scarce able to restrain his grief, went into the room, and bowed over the dear ones, and assured them that God was good and would hear little children's prayers, forgive and bless them, and take them to heaven when they died.

Thus comforted, he left them in tears, and in a little time were peacefully locked in the slumbers of the night. How happy were those parents in their reflections and remark upon the scene which had just passed before their wondering and weeping eyes. I am sure of this, as that father is the writer of this imperfect sketch. —Mother's Assistant.

The Mouse in Liquor.

"A mouse, ranging about a brewery, happening to fall into a vat of beer was in imminent danger of drowning, and appealed to a cat to help him out. The cat replied it is a foolish request, for as soon as I get you out I shall eat you. The mouse piteously replied, that the fate would be better than to be drowned in beer. The cat lifted him out, but the fume of the beer caused puss to sneeze, and the mouse took refuge in his hole. The cat called upon the mouse to come out—'you sir, did you not promise that I should eat you?' 'Ah!' replied the mouse, 'but you know I was in liquor at the time.'"

REASONS FOR OPPOSING SUNDAY LEGISLATION—NO. 12.

It was no mere sectarian feeling which induced the publication of this series essays in opposition to Sunday Legislation. However disposed we might have been quietly to hold our own views respecting the Sabbath and Sunday observances, the advocates of religious coercion would not let us enjoy our quiet and unobtrusive course. They must needs frame measures to abridge our liberties, and expose us to the persecution of every petulent man who might find an occasion in his acerbous soul to pick a quarrel with any of our people, and expose us also to the extortion of every miserly official, who could find an opportunity to wrest three or four dollars from any of us who should happen to drive a waggon past his door on the public highway, under the miserable pretence, that the creaking of the wheels, the rattling of the chains, the trampling of the horses, or the crack of the whip, disturbed his Sunday meditations; albeit his thoughts may have been about the worth of the carriage in which his own sons and daughters had taken a trip to make their Sunday visits. This is not altogether a fancy sketch. There are citizens of good report among all religious men, who have been stopped in the highways with their teams, when peaceably pursuing a journey which would occupy several days, while at the same time every horse and carriage from the adjacent livery stables has been hired out to the youngsters of the place, who are treated as making no disturbance, because forsooth they have attended a Sunday morning or a Sunday evening meeting. During the past year, peaceable citizens in several States of this Union have been prosecuted, fined, and imprisoned, for a conscientious refusal to sanctify the popular day of worship, or abstain from their secular employments on Sunday.

To submit to these impositions without complaint, under a government which professes to extent its protection over all the rights of all its inhabitants, and which, by its National and State Constitutions, guarantees the natural rights with which all men are equally invested by their Creator, would be to manifest more than stoical indifference to our own welfare. It would not be that manly defense of our rights which Christianity itself teaches, when it requires us to be ready to give a reason to every man for the hope or the faith that is in us. But it is not merely the protection of our civil rights, that requires us to speak out against these arbitrary measures. The prosecution of these measures, and the arguments by which they are enforced, load our own sentiments and practice, in the eyes of the ignorant at least, with obloquy and reproach. Thus in the Statutes of the State of New Jersey, the law for the enforcement of Sunday-keeping is entitled, "An Act for the Suppression of Vice and Immorality." How can the Societies of Friends, the Seventh-day Baptists, or the Jews, be justly classed with infidels, drunkards, gamblers, and other profligate persons? Such a classification is a lie upon the statue-book, and a libel upon the otherwise and every-where-acknowledged good character of these several classes of citizens! Just as soon, however, as a respectful representation of these grievances is made to the State Legislatures, it is met with remonstrances from without, and evasion and opposition from the members of Legislative Assemblies; and men who have pronounced a high encomium upon the character and conduct of the petitioners, evince a painful reluctance to granting them a legal right to the exemptions they claim! To what is all this to be attributed? Not to a designed departure from the principles of our free government, or a design to violate our constitutional guarantees of equal rights. To what then? To a fear of their standing in popular opinion—to a want of a clear understanding of the religious and political bearings of the question—or, what is worse, to a bigoted veneration for ancient religious usages, and attachment to dominant sects, who have arrayed themselves against all who dissent from their Sunday dogmas.

Now for ourselves we disclaim, and are determined, as far as our frail nature will permit us, to eschew all sectarian animosities, and all retaliatory measures. We rejoice to believe that the many Christians from whom we differ respecting the weekly Sabbath, do notwithstanding hold in a spiritual unity the faith of the common salvation; and most gladly would we be united with them in the promotion of a common Christianity as far as truth and righteousness will permit. But when they depart from the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, and require others to do so, and that with pains and penalties, we should feel bound to withstand them, though Peter himself were among them.

We have not a particle of opposition to offer to a union of any of our fellow citizens for the purpose of promoting, by moral suasion, their particular views of religious or civil observances. The truth has never ultimately suffered by free discussion. But as all the great errors in the world have been first imposed upon mankind by arbitrary legislation, when a body of men, powerful in numbers, and great in talents and learning, exert themselves to bring the whole civil power of the nation to compel the reception of their theological dogmas, and the observance of their particular views of religious duty, it is obviously time for those who are in the minority to bestir themselves in defense of their just and constitutional rights.

We find no fault with any association of Christian men, for excluding from their councils those who differ from them in sentiment, when they are engaged in the prosecution of an object which is not designed to extend to, or interfere with, the rights of others, but only of such as voluntarily submit to its rules. Exclusiveness, in such a society, may be a virtue. But when the designs of an association are to dispose of other people's affairs, such other people ought to be consulted; and when there is no consultation allowed, there is no obligation to submit. This is the doctrine of the Declaration of Independence, and the principle on which our revolutionary fathers justified the forcible separation of the colonies from the government of Great Britain. This principle will justify those who dissent from the Sunday observance, in resisting the laws for its enforcement, if they are not to be heard where public opinion is manufactured; and if their petitions for exemption by the Legislatures are thrown under the legislative tables.

Respect for our fellow men has kept many of us, who have no fellowship for the sanctification of a day which has no other sanctity than what is imparted to it by human laws and general custom, from an open and direct attack upon its observance; and it is probable that we should have continued to let it alone, and contented ourselves with a private defense of our principles, had we been let alone, and had not the rights of our people been invaded, and had we not witnessed a settled determination, on the part of certain religionists, to carry their coercive measures over the rights of all other citizens whatsoever. They have made us feel that our rights are endangered by their proscriptive course; and we feel bound, for our own welfare and that of our children, to defend them. They have created a prejudice against us and our faith, because we cannot submit our sentiments to the dogmas of their theological standards. Zeal for our faith, therefore, requires that we should show that the popular sentiment is founded on a gross superstition—as baseless as the claims of the popes of Rome to the supremacy of the kingdoms of the world; and indeed, that the modern movement to enforce Sunday-keeping has the broad mark of the apocalyptic apostacy, which was to be characterized by an endeavor to lord it over God's heritage.

The object of the frequent Sabbath Conventions is avowedly to manufacture public sentiment, so that the movers in such conventions may be able to forestall the State Legislatures, and ultimately the National Congress, and compel them to enact more stringent laws than what now exist, requiring all public and corporate bodies and private persons to observe that idol day before which they require all the citizens of this republic to fall down and worship. Let them but succeed in putting such men into office, and electing such legislatures, and such a Congress, as they want; and then, as in old times, "An herald will cry aloud, To you it is commanded, O people, States, and languages, that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship, on the SUN-DAY, which the ministers and the people have set up. And whoso falleth not down and worshipeth," "shall pay four dollars for every offence, or, in default thereof, be imprisoned one week." We know that the pretence now made is not quite so bold as this representation; but that it is intended to cover as large a demand, is very evident from the claim which is made to the stillness of the Sabbath, uniformity in the times of worship, the stoppage of the Sunday mails, and the removal of every influence which is adverse to the sanctification of the so-called Christian Sabbath.

All this may seem very pious and right to sectarians, who have no sympathy with the rights of any body but themselves. But do they not know, that these things which they call pious and right, would, if carried out, be death to some other people? Do they not intend it shall be so? What other object can there be in setting up these claims to universal dominion of other men's consciences? It is an unreasonable assumption indeed, which leads them to suppose that all other people will tamely submit to such a dominion. What! give up all their own sense of obligation to God, and delegate it to the magistracy of the land, because forsooth the Protestant ministry say, "The law makes the legislature and executive answerable to God for disobedience!" This is rank Popery in Protestant churches.

That the State laws, and the laws of the National Union, and every private corporation, and every master of a household, should allow officers and servants to rest and worship on that day of the week which teach believes to be required of him by divine revelation, we fully believe; and we as heartily advocate such a policy as any of our fellow citizens. But that any body of men should undertake to impose any day, or any other religious observance, upon their fellow men contrary to their conscientious belief, is of the very essence of despotism, and ought to be resisted.

Errors of the rankest growth have often obtained an apparent sanctity and permanence; in the church and the State, by general custom and ancient usage. And when this is the case, there is no possibility of persuading men that they are wrong, without shocking their prejudices and attacking their prepossessions. In the present case, we are aware that we shall shock the religious prejudices of a large portion of our fellow Christians; and that we have attacked prepossessions which are hallowed by the earliest associations of childhood, Christian fellowship, and pious affection. But have not writers on the first-day observance done all this to those who observe the seventh day? And by so much as they are the more numerous, is the aggravation of what they have inflicted upon the few increased. We doubt not but that many will express a pious horror at our labor in attempting to invade this long-entrenched and fortified veneration for antiquated religious observances and legal restrictions. We may be told, that to attack these is to attack religion itself! But we believe otherwise. The Pharisees accused Jesus Christ of serving the devil; the Jewish people charged the apostles with subverting the nation; and the nuncious of the papacy said that the Reformers of the sixteenth century taught the doctrines of hell; yet in each case they had no better reason for the charge, than that they opposed the sentiments of the dominant or orthodox party of the times. What are we, that we should be treated any better than those good men?

In view of what has been said, we purpose to pursue our course, unswayed by passion or prejudice, and unswerved by friendship or enmity. We have a work to do which is of great moment to the cause of unadulterated Christianity; and we intend to do it in a Christian way, and in accordance with our constitutional rights as citizens of the United States of America. In defence of the theological aspects of our position, we plant ourselves upon the holy Bible, determined never to yield our position until we are fairly shown that it is wrong. Our legal position, we shall defend by the standard Constitutions of our country; and when called upon, in the highest courts to which we can obtain access. If we have occasionally used a harsh word respecting the Sunday observance, we have only to plead the example of our opponents, who stigmatize the observance of the seventh day as superstitious and Jewish, and they have, therefore, no ground for complaint against us when we call Sunday pagan and popish. If we have treated the subject as important, and vital to the interests of primitive Christianity, let it be remembered, that they have memorialized the nation, that their "Sabbath is the great institution for keeping alive the knowledge and worship of the one living and true God, and thus giving efficacy to his moral government among men." If we have written with some earnestness against the compulsory observance of Sunday, as an impolitic and anti-scriptural observance, let not our opponents complain; for be it remembered, that they are many to one of us, and opposition to the seventh-day Sabbath, and to no-Sabbath, is incorporated in all their standard religious literature. "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." S. D.

INDIAN VIEWS OF THE CREATION.

A late traveler among the Indian tribes of North America relates some curious facts in regard to the Chipewyan Indians. Their notions on the subjeet of the Creation are very remarkable. They believe that, at first, the globe was one vast ocean, not inhabited by any living creature; but that the Great Spirit came down in the shape of a mighty bird, whose eyes were fire, whose glances were lightning, and the clapping of whose wings was thunder. He rested on the ocean, and immediately the land rose, and remained on the surface of the water. This omnipotent bird then produced all the variety of animals from the earth, except the Chipewyans, who were produced from a dog; and this circumstance occasions their aversion to the flesh of that animal, as well as to the people who eat it. The Great Spirit having finished his work, he made an arrow, which was to be preserved with great care, and remain untouched; but the Chipewyans were so devoid of understanding, as to carry it away. This sacrilege so enraged the great bird, that he has never since appeared. They believe that there was a great deluge, which spread over the whole earth, except the highest mountains; on the top of which their ancestors preserved themselves. They have also a tradition among them, that they originally came from a remote country, inhabited by wicked people; and had traversed a great lake, which was narrow and full of islands; also that in ancient times their ancestors lived till their feet were worn out with walking, and their throats with eating.

There seems to be a singular coincidence between this notion of the creation and the Mosaic account: "The earth was without form and void, and the spirit of God moved on the surface of the waters."

THE LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Mr. Editor,—I could not more clearly express my own views of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Redeemer, than they are expressed in the following extract. It is my humble opinion, that if the popular sects could discard "the interminable controversies about three divine persons in the Godhead," and be content with the simplicity of doctrine here presented, it would greatly favor the cause of Christian Union. I will not now say from what source I have obtained this article, lest the weight of the [illegible] in the minds of some of your readers by the "heterodxy" of the denomination to which the author of it belongs:—

"That Jesus was as truly and properly a man as Adam was, I have no doubt. But he was something more, by divine endowment, than Adam or any other human being ever was. The Father dwelt in him, acted through him, and spoke by him, as he never has, in, through and by any other man. He was brought into existence at a particular period of time, with an unvitiated human nature, for the very purpose of being the bodily temple of the Father, the manifestation of Divinity in humanity, the infallible spiritual and moral Light, Guide and Restorer of our lost world. He is therefore the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, the Way, the Truth and the Life, the Lord, the Judge, and the Redeemer of the human race, which titles can with no truth or justice be applied to any other human person. Consequently what he said and did stands stamped with the divine signet, and is, to all practical purposes, virtually God's own word and work. It is entitled to all the reverence, and has all the intrinsic authority which can be conceived to belong to any act or utterance of the Infinite Spirit. This is what I call faith in Christ. It involves nothing of the interminable controversies about three divine persons in the Godhead, or about the pre-existence of the soul of Christ, or about the nature of that soul; whether it was extant from all ages, or pre-existent only for a certain period before the creation of Adam; whether it was generatively divine, arch-angelic, sub-angelic, or superhuman. It involves only this,—Was the man Christ Jesus the medium of an infallible manifestation of the true God to human beings, of the only true wisdom and righteousness? Did the Father truly dwell in, act through, and speak by him? Can he be believed on and trusted in as the perfect and all-sufficient mediator between God and men, as the Lord and Saviour of the world? I believe on and trust in him as all this. And I recognize no other human being, in or out of the flesh, as worthy of such faith and confidence."

* * * * *

"Either the record is false, or Jesus was an arrant imposter, or he was insane, or he was by divine endowment something more than a mere man—and stood in a relation to God incomparably nearer and more sacred than any other human being ever has. I adopt the latter conclusion. I hold him to be not merely a son of God, but the Son of God—the only-begotten Son of God—the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his moral person."

THE PERFECTION OF THE WORKS OF GOD.

BY REV. J. N. DANFORTH.

Admirable subject. The very heavens and earth are boldly apostrophized in the song of Moses, and required to ascribe "greatness unto our God." On spiritual minds the majesty of God doth make a mighty impression. Nor less his immutability, which includes his unalterable firmness of purpose and of action. "He is the Rock; his work is perfect." There is an immovable foundatian on which you may build high as heaven, and your structure will stand. It is not your work. It is the work of God in you. But I invite my readers to an enlarged view of the perfection of the works of God. And at the outset all men are ready to say, it must be so, for God himself in his own nature is infinitely perfect. Else he would not be God. The human mind instinctively ascribes all possible perfection, natural, moral and intellectual, to God. It does itself violence when it falls short of this estimate. Any deficiency of power, any of benevolence, would make the universe turn pale. Absolute perfection then is in God, sole and original. It may be averred of him as the one Supreme Being. It belongs to each of his distinctive attributes. Thus we may conceive what would be the result of the exercise of Divine power, under the impulse of infinite benevolence, controlled by infinite wisdom. In the exertion of creative power God takes delight, as is evident from the Scriptural testimony that all his works "for thy pleasures are and were created." Look at

1. The natural creations of God. How perfect and beautiful as they came from his hand! In the sublime songs of remotest antiquity are they celebrated, as when inspiration asks, "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth, when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?" Equally simple and sublime is the narrative of the historian: "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them." That was a finished work on which the eye of God looked and was pleased. Had there been any imperfection in form, in relation, in arrangement, in adaptation, it would not have been said:—"And God saw everything that he had made, and behold it was very good," i. e. perfect. Had there been any imperfection, it would have disturbed the complacency of the Divine mind. But oh! the deep repose of that mind when this work was done! Philosophy cannot explain. Poetry itself cannot intrude. But philosophy, poetry, piety, all that is intellectually active and spiritually contemplative in man, may look on these works, investigate, analyze and enjoy them. They are the source of some of the sweetest, noblest emotions of the human breast. There can be no beau ideal beyond them. It is not an imaginative perfection which inheres in them. It is no dream of romance. All that is asserted to be true, is substantially true according to the meaning of language. Beauty is blended into beauty. Wonder is piled on wonder. And yet we poor denizens of earth, have as yet looked only into the vestibule of this grand temple for the worship of God. The architecture thereof has been little studied by us. The arcana there things within the circle of creation that are "to be sought out by all those that have pleasure therein."

2. God's "work of the law" is perfect. Natural men show "the work of the law written on their hearts," defaced indeed, but by themselves.—The rule of action was always perfect in its substantive construction, in the nature of its details, in the completeness of its deductions, and in the power of its enforcements. It is perfectly fitted to the physical, intellectual and moral nature of man, even as light to the eye, and sound to the ear. Obeyed physically, it would ensure perfect physical health. Studied intellectually, it furnishes the most complete system of universal philosophy. Observed morally, it answers all the moral ends of our being. Loved ardently, it is found to be capable of calling into exercise the highest affections of the soul. How perfect that precept. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself." Examine all the precepts, and see with what singular precision they are framed and fitted to promote the purest socialities of life. The spirit of this law is the life of benevolence. It is the death of misanthropy. It is the grave of selfishness.

The law must be perfect, for the Lawgiver is perfect. What can be added to it? What taken from it? Of what amendment or improvement is it susceptible? Is it more than sufficient? Is it less? What is the history of human law but that of imperfection, repeal, amendment, obscurity, explanation, declaratory enactments, impotent sanctions, incessant evasions, inhumation in the tomb of obsolete statutes. All all bears the imprint of man's fingers. But "the law of Jehovah is perfect."

THE COMPANY OF BOOKS.

It is chiefly through books that we enjoy intercourse with superior minds; and these invaluable communications are in the reach of all. In the best books, great men talk to us, and give us their most precious thoughts, and pour their souls into ours. God be thanked for books. They are the voices of the distant and the dead, and make us heirs of the spiritual life of past ages. Books are the true levelers. They give to all that will faithfully use them, the society, the spiritual presence, of the best and greatest of our race. No matter how poor I am; no matter though the prosperous of my own time will not enter and take up their abode under my roof—if Milton will cross my threshold and sing to me of Paradise, and Shakspeare to open to me the worlds of imagination, the workings of the human heart—and Franklin to enrich me with his practical wisdom, I shall not pine for want of intellectual companionship, and I may become a cultivated man, though excluded from the best company where I live. Nothing can supply the place of books. They are cheering or soothing companions in solitude, illness, and affliction. Let every man, if possible, gather some good books under his roof.

Church Music.—It is a matter of serious regret, that the great design of church music is so generally overlooked, and its cultivation upon correct principles so little appreciated and understood. That such is the fact to a most melancholy extent, cannot but be admitted by every enlightened and scientific observer of the progress of musical talent. Our attention was forcibly directed to this subject, a few evenings since, while listening to the remarks of Lowell Mason of the Boston Academy of Music, at a rehearsal of the choir under the direction of Mr. Rust in the Vestry of the Union Church in this town. It is too true, as Mr. Mason remarked, that both the choirs and the congregatious which assemble in our churches on the Sabbath, indulge but slight apprehensions of the importance and sacredness of this part of divine worship. It seems to be regarded rather as a recreation to relieve the tedium of attending church, than as a part of the worship of God, and as Mr. M. intimated, furnishes but another subject of idle criticism, in connection with the discourse of the preacher. [Worcester Daily Transcript.

Bunyan and the Quaker.—Bunyan had a natural turn to wit rapartee, which appears in the following story: Towards the close of his imprisonment a Quaker called upon him, probably hoping to make a convert of the author of "The Pilgrim." He thus addressed him. Friend John, I am come to thee with a message from the Lord; and after having searched for thee in all the prisons of England, I have found thee at last.

"If the Lord had sent thee," returned Bunyan, sarcastically, "you need not have taken so much pains to find me, for the Lord knows I have been a prisoner in Bedford jail these last twelve years."

Gratitude.—The famous oriental philosopher Lockman, while a slave, being presented by his master with a bitter melon, immediately ate it all. "How was it possible," said his master, "for you to eat so nauseous a fruit?" Lockman replied, "I have received so many favors from you that it is no wonder I should once in my life eat a bitter melon from your hand." This generous answer of the slave struck the master to such a degree, that he immediately gave him his liberty. With such a sentiment should man receive his portion of suffering at the hand of God.

THE RESTORATION AND CONVERSION OF ISRAEL.

The past history and present condition of the Hebrew nation cannot be explained without acknowledging the intervention of miraculous power for the accomplishment of some great and glorious purpose. That a nation without a head or a country, should have continued entirely distinct for thousands of years, is a fact without a parallel in the annals of the world. We have, indeed, the instance of a Chinese nation existing for an indefinitely long period. But the reason for this is apparent. They have been walled off from all the rest of the human family, while their selfishness and national pride have prevented the introduction among them of any new element. Not so with the Hebrews. From the commencement of the Christian era down to the present time, they have been peeled and persecuted and scattered. In every country and in every clime may be found Jews. They have lived under every form of government, and used every language among men; and yet they remain not only [illegible] respects the same. Superstition and barbarism have done their utmost to injure and destroy them; but while these have broken the most illustrious empires, and buried their inhabitants in the ruins, the Jew has seen whatever peculiarly marked his nation before the world destroyed, while he himself remains indestructible. A Babylonian, a Spartan, a Roman, are names known only to history. A Jew traverses every land, and visits every city. They have been continually surrounded by the flames, and yet have not been consumed. These facts are before us. But how shall we explain their import? No custom of the people—nothing in the history of the world—no precedent hitherto established—will help us in their solution. No theory, which does not acknowledge the interposition of Omnipotence, can at all satisfy our inquiries, and set us free from embarrassing doubts. But, if we acknowledge that the hand of an all-wise God has been in the work—that he has afflicted and he preserved—that he has dispersed in order to protect—and that, having continued them until the appropriate time, he will finally bring to light and consummate the grand object of their long-wandering and safe-keeping—then does their history cease to be, as it otherwise must be, an inexplicable riddle, and we can look forward to the day of great and good things for Israel.

A strong argument for the restoration of the Jews, may be drawn from their almost universal expectation and desire to return to Palestine, and build again the walls of Jerusalem. That millions of people, dispersed over the face of the whole earth, and occupying every station in society, should have their minds fixed upon one country as their own—their natural and only home—and should from year to year unitedly pray for a restoration to that home—is itself an indication, if it be not a pledge, that they shall return to the land of their fathers, the scene of God's manifestations of himself to man. Additional weight will be given to the argument from universal and long-cherished expectation, if we consider that the position and relations of the people, are such as to make their return an easy and speedy transaction. In the countries where the Jews are scattered they have little to detain them. Houses and lands, government offices and responsibilities, and such social or political arrangements as go to identify them with a nation, they have not. At the same time, they are to a considerable extent set free from the embarrassments attendant upon deep poverty. In such circumstances, with nothing to bind them, while they have the means and the desire to visit the holy city, they stand in a position like that which preceded their departure from the thraldom of Egyptian oppressors, with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet, and their staves in their hands. Other facts might be named, which certainly point in the same direction. The present relation of European nations to the land of the Hebrews—the influence wielded over many of those governments by Jewish gold—the increased interest and respect for the Jews—and the general expectation of the Christian community in reference to them—have been regarded as very favorable indications, and as affording good reason to believe that their restoration is not only certain but near.

But the hope of the Christian, that good is in store for the children of Abraham, rests not alone upon the "signs of the times," and his own uncertain deductions from them. He exults in a "more sure word of prophecy," to which it is his safety and his joy to give heed. That a number of prophetic promises made to the Jews have never been fulfilled, is beyond a doubt. One class of these promises speak of their joyful return and happy residence in their own land. Another class is occupied more especially with portraying the blessings which shall come upon those who are Israelites indeed, on whose hearts is impressed the seal of circumcision, and written out the law of God. The promises of the former class are sometimes robbed of all their glory, and shorn of all their strength, by being referred to the return of a few lonely captives as representatives of the vast multitude embraced by Judah and Israel. The promises of the latter class are sometimes converted into deceptive fables, by being made to show forth what should be the condition of "spiritual Israel," so-called, or the members of the Christian church—the Gentile thus applying to himself the promises of Israel, and engrossing all their blessings, while they to whom the promises were originally made, are treated as if worthy of the curses which in old times fell upon the heathen. But there are persons who cannot regard such a system of interpretation as just and trustworthy. Why, they well ask, after all those prophecies which speak of the apostacy and the consequent dispersion and suffering of the Israelites, have been fulfilled to the letter, why should we be so slow to believe that the blessings promised shall also come in their time? It is to be feared, that this unbelief is nothing else than one phase of that wide-spread apostacy from the simple truth of the Word of God, which spiritualizes his law into harmony with men's traditions, and makes goodness and obedience to consist in thinking of what is right, and doing what is agreeable. It cannot, therefore, stand; it must give place to a more natural and consistent interpretation. But more significant than all others, perhaps, are those passages which connect the blessings peculiar to the Gospel with temporal blessings to the Jews, declaring that the Lord will put his law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and be their God, while at the same time the measuring-line shall go forth, and the city shall be built to the Lord. (See Jer. 31: 31—40.) To this and kindred portions of Scripture, it is not easy to apply the spiritualizing process. And in view of such predictions, while the Providence of God is bringing about the events predicted, we are warranted in believing—nay, we are even required to believe that [illegible] Jacob, and will yet choose Israel, and set them in their own land, so that strangers will be joined with them, and they shall cleave to the house of Jacob."

HOW SUNDAY-KEEPING MAKES INFIDELS.

The opinion has more than once been expressed through the Recorder, that a strict observance of the original Sabbath is one of the strongest testimonies which can be given against Atheism and Infidelity. It testifies against Atheism, inasmuch as it is a monument set up in proof of the fact that God not only exists, but that he created the world. It testifies against Infidelity, inasmuch as it perpetuates an institution which professes to be based upon a revelation from God, and has actually been observed from time immemorial. We are prepared to go farther than this, and to express our opinion, that a neglect of the Sabbath, even by those who profess to observe the Sunday, directly countenances and supports Infidelity. Instead of attempting to prove this from any arguments of our own framing, we shall rest the proof of it upon the words of infidels themselves. The following extract from a work written by an infidel Judge, who aims to do away with all Sabbath-keeping, is exactly in point. It shows beyond all possibility of dispute, that infidels are countenanced in their hostility to any day of weekly religious rest, and consequently countenanced in their infidelity, by the arguments which professing Christians use to justify a neglect of the seventh day of the week and the observance of the first day. Let those who are accustomed to present these arguments read and ponder. The writer, in the character of an avowed infidel, is contending against all civil laws to promote the observance of Sunday, and speaks as follows:—

"Why, let me ask, are work and recreation, which are useful and innocent on other days, deemed acts of immorality when done on Sunday? The answer which is usually given to this question, is, 'that the Sabbath day, or a sabbath day, was instituted by divine appointment—was commanded to be kept holy and unprofaned by work, business, or pleasure, and therefore to work or play on the Sabbath day is immoral, and the law forbidding such immoral acts is a righteous law.' 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy; six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord; in it thou shalt do no manner of work.' If the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord, pray tell me whose Sabbath is the first day of the week?

"If this alledged command is sufficient evidence of the divine appointment of a Sabbath day, it is equally good testimony for every thing else it contains; but for nothing more than it enjoins. The time, then, for keeping a Sabbath, is as clearly designated as the divine appointment of a Sabbath day, and is equally binding; and the command not to labor on it, alike imperative; and the injunction to labor on the other six days, no less certain and obligatory; for all those four commands, if given at all, were given at the same time, by the same authority, and their authenticity depends on the same evidence, and all must stand or fall together. To disbelieve, deny, or disregard one of those injunctions, would be impeaching the authenticity of the whole. To deny its authority as to the time, is to deny indirectly its testimony as to the divine appointment of any Sabbath day, and then it would follow that the Sabbath is not instituted by divine appointment—that, to do useful work or pursue innocent pleasure on any day would then not be immoral, and the legislative prohibition could not make it so. Hence the law in question forbidding work and pleasure on the first day of the week, as acts of immorality, cannot be sustained on the authority of the alledged command of God.

"That command depends for its authenticity on the testimony of the Jewish Legislator, Moses. If his veracity and intelligence are admitted sufficient vouchers for the divine appointment of a Sabbath day, he, above all men, ought to be allowed to know the particular day of the week which God told him should be kept as holy time. That he designated the seventh, and not the first day of the week as the day which he said God appointed to be remembered and kept holy as a Sabbath, and which the Jewish people on his authority have for several thousand years observed and kept as such, are facts which will not be disputed. If we deny his testimony as to the time, or, in other words, if his intelligence and veracity are not to be relied on in regard to the particular day of the week appointed to be kept as holy time, his testimony becomes impeached, and cannot be relied on in respect to the divine appointment of any Sabbath day. The conclusion follows as in the last case stated, that there is no evidence of the divine institution of any Sabbath day—to work or play on any day is not immoral, and the statutory interdiction of business and pleasure on the first day of the week as acts of immorality, remains unsupported by the very command quoted as authority for its justification.

"If it is intended to avoid these certain and fatal consequences of disregarding the particular day appointed as holy time, by the authority in virtue of which only to keep any Sabbath is held to be a moral obligation, it must be admitted that the seventh day of the week, and not the first, is the Sabbath day instituted by divine appointment, and therefore to keep the first is not a moral obligation, nor is the work or play performed thereon an act of immorality. The law on which we are treating, therefore, if sustained at all, must obtain other support than that intended to be derived from the alledged command of God. That evidence proves too much to show that the first day of the week is a Sabbath instituted by divine authority. It rather proves that the first day of the week is not the day appointed by God's command to be kept as holy time. As strange as it may seem, and doubtless is, the law of which we are treating exacts implicit belief in the divine appointment of a Sabbath day, and at the same time by recognizing, nay, coercing the observance of another than the seventh day of the week as holy time, impeaches the testimony of the only witness relied on for proof of the divine institution of any Sabbath day. It insists on his being credited in the latter instance, though the law itself and its advocates renounce his testimony as to the day he alledged God directed to be remembered and kept holy as a Sabbath! Such is the inconsistency of the law itself, with the testimony adduced to support it.

"I am aware that it has been and may again be said, 'that the day is not essential, provided one day in seven, or a seventh part of time, be kept holy. This allegation has already been refuted by the testimony of the witness called to prove that any Sabbath day has been appointed by divine authority. But, let me ask, who says the particular day is not essential? The alledged command says no such thing. Has God said so? When did infinite wisdom find it necessary to change the Sabbath day? Where is the new command to be found, by which God substituted the first for the seventh day of the week to be kept holy as a Sabbath day? To whom did he communicate it? On whose authority but that of man and statute law, are we directed and enjoined to keep Sunday as a religious Sabbath day?

"Leaving these questions for the present to be answered by those who can best do it to their own satisfaction, I will proceed and admit, with a view to show that such admission would not in one iota relieve the law in question from the character imputed to it, that 'the particular day is not essential, provided one day in seven, or a seventh part of time, be kept holy as a Sabbath.' This is only getting over one difficulty to become involved in another. If the position now taken be insisted on, then the other, viz, the alledged divine appointment of the first or any other particular day in the week as holy time, must be relinquished. In fact, the ground now taken admits that God appointed no particular day of the week to be kept holy as a Sabbath day. The inference is obvious, unavoidable, and fatal, that to work or play on the first day, are not acts (male in se) immoral in themselves, and the law under consideration interdicting them as such, is therefore founded on palpable error."

ANOTHER PROTEST AGAINST SLAVERY.

Some months ago, a solemn and earnest protest against American Slavery was sent forth to the world over the signatures of many of the most distinguished ministers of the Unitarian denomination in this country. More recently the Universalists have taken up the subject; and a protest has just been published by them, accompanied with the signatures of three hundred and four clergymen. By this step they have cast the whole weight of their influence against Slavery and in favor of Freedom—thus setting an example to other denominations worthy of imitation. The following are the principal reasons given for protesting against the system, and urging every Christian to use all justifiable means for its abolition:—1. Because it denies the eternal distinction between a man and property, ranking a human being with a material thing. 2. Because Slavery does not award to the laborer the fruits of his toil in any higher sense than to cattle. 3. Because Slavery trammels the intellectual powers, and prevents their expansion. 4. Because Slavery checks the development of the moral nature of the slave. 5. Because Slavery involves a practical denial of the religious nature of the slave. 6. Because Slavery presents an insurmountable barrier to the promulgation of the great truth of Universal Brotherhood, and thereby most effectually prevents the progress of true Christianity. 7. Because the essential nature of Slavery cannot be altered by any kindness, how great soever, practiced towards the slave. 8. Because the long continuance of a system of wrong can not palliate it, but, on the other hand, augments the demand for its abolition.—9. Because no peculiarity of situation can excuse a perpetual denial of universal principles and obligations.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST CHURCH IN NEW YORK.—Our friends will be pleased to learn, that in pursuance of an arrangement with the Eleventh Street Baptist Church, the Sabbath-keeping Church recently organized in this city will hereafter meet at the Chapel in Eleventh Street, between Bowery and Third Avenue, on the Sabbath at 11 o'clock A. M. On the 1st of September next, they are to have full possession of the house, when such other meetings as may be thought advisable will be appointed. We hope our brethren will bear in mind the feebleness of this infant Church, and the great difficulties to be encountered in a place so full of temptations as New York; and that their prayers to the great Head of the Church will be prompted by a sense of the importance of the work, and the necessity of Divine aid. Those brethren who may wish to aid in defraying the expense attending the purchase of this house of worship, are informed that their contributions will be needed by the 1st of September next.

S.

THE DERUYTER CHURCH.—We are pleased to learn from Bro. James R. Irish, that an encouraging state of things exists in the Sabbath-keeping Church at DeRuyter. A series of evening meetings was held there some weeks ago, in connection with which the people of God seemed to be revived, and some additions were made to the church.

THE TRUE DOCTRINE.—We have already given notice, that the Court of Common Pleas of Hamilton County, Ohio, reversed the decision of the Mayor of Cincinnati who fined several Jews for transacting business on Sunday. This was done on the ground that the ordinance according to which the Mayor acted was unconstitutional. In his charge to the Jury, the Judge very justly remarked, that a Jew, or a person of any denomination, who conscientiously keeps one day holy, may prosecute his avocations on every other day, but he must not commit a nuisance to the community; his business, however, can be no more a nuisance on Sunday than on any other day.

THE JEWS IN RUSSIA.—The persecution of the Jews in Russia and Poland, has awakened much feeling and sympathy for them in different parts of Europe. In many synagogues of Franconia, special daily prayers have been offered on their behalf for help and support. Similar prayers have likewise been ordered in many of the larger and smaller congregations of South Germany. In England the feeling has been so strong, that Sir Moses Montefiore, accompanied by his wife and Dr. Lowe, started for Russia in February last, on a mission of love to the suffering. From some recent incidents in the life of the Emperor, it is hoped that the mission of Sir Moses will exert a beneficial influence upon the condition of the Jews in Northern Europe.

PRAYER FOR RULERS.—There is a standing order in the Episcopal Church, that at every service, during the session of Congress, prayer shall be offered on behalf of rulers, "that God would be pleased to direct and prosper all their consultations—that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, may be established among us for all generations." For our part we do not attach any great importance to a standing order of the Episcopal Church on its own account, but considering the state of our public relations, and the ambitious spirit which seems to animate our political chiefs, we think there is special propriety in frequently offering some such prayer at the present juncture. If all ministers of the Gospel and professing Christians would do it, they would not only obey the injunction of Paul, to pray for all men, and first of all for those in authority, but they would also have an influence to avert the scourge of war and continue the reign of peace and pleanty.

WHO SHALL DECIDE?—The proposed marriage between Dr. Judson and Miss Emily Chubbuck, seems to be regarded as a fit and fruitful theme for newspaper discussion. Some of the papers express their fears, that the connection of Miss Chubbuck, or "Fanny Forrester," with the light literature of the day, indicates her unfitness for the toils of a missionary life. Others labor to justify her course by stating that a father and mother were dependent upon the proceeds of her literary labor, and that she was therefore under the necessity of employing her pen upon such subjects as would pay best. All this talk appears to us foolish and useless. Dr. Judson probably knows as well as the newspaper scribblers, what are the qualifications for a missionary's wife; he is probably as well acquainted with the character of Miss Chubbuck as they are who never saw her; and he can probably judge as well as his officious brethren, whether she is a fit person to accompany him on his missionary tour. It strikes us, therefore, that as Mr. Judson is best qualified to judge in the case, and has the deepest interest in the result, it were well to leave him to his own decision.

NEW-FASHIONED PROTRACTED MEETING.—Most of the Protracted Meetings in this country have reference primarily to the promotion of religion in the community where they are held, and among the persons of whom they are composed. Not so in some other countries. It is said that a nine-days service has been appointed at Rome, the object of which is—not to promote religion at home, but—"to implore from God the wide-spread and happy increase of the Catholic faith in England."

PAY OF TEACHERS.—An effort is making in Boston to raise the salaries of the primary school teachers to three hundred dollars per annum. The editor of the New Orleans Tropic, alluding to the bare pittance paid to those who endure the wearing drudgery of teachers, says it is a lamentable disgrace. What has given rise to the very prevalent idea that a teacher's services are worth so little, we know not; but certain it is, that teachers who have spent years in study, and attained to the highest collegiate honors, cannot obtain in many parts of our country any thing more than a bare subsistence for their services. The idea of rasing the pay of a primary teacher, in Boston, to the enormous sum of three hundred dollars, seems there to be an extraordinary move.

THE VOICE OF MASSACHUSETTS.—In the Massachusetts House of Representatives, on Monday of last week, the following resolution was presented by Mr. Wilson, and adopted—yeas 147, nays 52. It is a testimony worthy of Massachusetts against the iniquitous and doomed system of slavery:—

"Resolved, That Massachusetts distinctly and solemnly announces to the country her uncompromising opposition to the farther extension and longer existence of American slavery; that she hereby deliberately declares her earnest and unalterable purpose, to use every lawful and constitutional measure for its overthrow and entire extinction; and she hereby pledges her cordial cooperation to the friends of civil liberty, throughout the Union, in every just and practical measure that shall tend to free our country from the dominion, curse and shame of slavery, and make her great and glorious among the nations."

GOD'S HAND IN THE RECENT FLOOD.—Our correspondent "W. M. F.," in an article which we published two weeks ago, suggested that the Lord had as much to do in destroying the Harrisburg Bridge on Sunday by a flood, as he had in taking the lives of the two men who were drowned on a following Sunday while crossing the river in a boat used to supply the place of the bridge. If any of our readers think this is making the Lord too prominent in such matters, let them read the following opinion of the learned Prof. Shepard:—

"On Sunday, the 29th ult., while the people of Bangor were appalled by the rising waters, Rev. Prof. Shepard made his way with some difficulty to the first Church, which he was to supply, in the absence of the Pastor. So great was the alarm, that few of the congregation were in attendance. A prayer was offered in the vestry, and the little company, with anxiety resting upon every countenance, were addressed from the pulpit after this manner: 'God himself has the audience of the people to-day; and while He speaks his ministers may well keep silence.' The meeting then closed."

CHRISTIAN CONSISTENCY.—A premium of $50 has been offered by a gentleman, through one of the Secretaries of the American Tract Society, for the best tract not exceeding twelve pages on the question of "the propriety of dancing by church members, and the expediency of teaching it to our children." The editor of the New-York Tribune refers approvingly to this premium, and suggests several other subjects on which he thinks tracts are needed, and for which he recommends that premiums be offered, as follows:—

$20 for the best Tract on the rightfulness and consistency of a Christian's spending $5,000 to $10,000 a year on the appetites and enjoyments of himself and family, when there are a thousand families within a mile of him who are compelled to live on less than $200 a year.

$10 for the best Tract on the rightfulness and Christianity of a Christian's building a house for the exclusive residence of himself and family, at a cost of $50,000 to $100,000, within the sight of a hundred families living in hovels worth less than $100.

$5 for the best Tract on the Christianity of building Churches which cost $100,000 each, in which poor sinners can only worship on sufferance, and in the most out-of-the-way corners.

THE YOUTH'S CABINET for May is just issued, containing a great variety of interesting matter for the young, illustrated with numerous and appropriate engravings. It has also a page of Music, "First Day of May in New York," which is worth double the cost of the number. Edited by Rev. Francis C. Woodworth; Published by D. Austin Woodworth, at 135 Nassau-st., N. Y.

THE SPIRITUAL MAGAZINE.—We have received the first two numbers of a semi-monthly magazine, with this title, published at Putney, Vt. It takes the place of "The Perfectionist and Theocratic Review," and is designed not only to advance Perfectionism, but to extend its discussions "into other and all regions of spiritual science."

A REPROOF OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH, by the Bishop of Oxford; extracted from a "History of the Protestant Episcopal Church," by Samuel Wilberforce. With an Introduction by an American Churchman. New York: William Harned, 5 Spruce st.

Such is the title of a pamphlet of sixty pages, exhibiting the course of the Episcopal Church in this country respecting slavery. It shows a prejudice against the colored man, and an unwillingness to espouse the cause of the slave, which merits the severe rebuke here given.

ROUTE TO DERUYTER, N. Y.—For the information of such friends as may have occasion to visit DeRuyter—(and we trust many will do so at the commencement of the Institute)—we are requested to state, that the best route is by railroad or canal to Chittenango, from which place a stage runs to DeRuyter, starting every afternoon on the arrival of the eastern cars.

REV. C. T. TORREY.—A correspondent of the Philadelphia North American, who visited Mr. Torrey on Friday, April 10th, contradicts in the most positive terms the report that he was "much displeased" with the course pursued by his friends, Rev. A. A. Phelps and Prof. Cleveland. He said he had the fullest confidence in their judgment, and that all they might do would be for the best. On being told that the money which had been pledged would be invested as a fund for his wife and children when he should be no more, tears of gratitude and joy filled his eyes, and his expressions of pleasure at what would be thus done, were as strong as his feeble voice and frame would allow. Upon being asked if he was ready "to depart and be with Jesus," he said, "O yes—O yes," in a way that showed that it came from the very depth of his soul. He was growing weaker and weaker every day, and cannot last long RESIGNATION OF PRESIDENT DAY.—It is stated in the New-Haven Herald, that President Day, who has for a long time filled the principal office of Yale College with credit to himself and gratification to those by whom he is surrounded, is about vacating his chair. Ill health and increasing infirmity are assigned as the reason. President Day, in 1798, was chosen to the office of a Tutor in the College; in 1803 to that of Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, and in 1817 to that of President. The last office he will have held, at the time of his resignation, twenty-nine years—a longer period than any of his predecessors, and longer than the term of office of any President of a College in New-England with the exception of President Holyoke of Harvard. His retirement will be universally regretted.

The splendid steamboat Oregon, while on her passage from Stonington on Saturday morning last, ran upon the rock known as "the Gridiron," in Hell Gate, and came very near being a total wreck. She can be got off, however, and it is estimated that eight or ten thousand dollars will place her in as good condition as she was before.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

Oregon continues to be the absorbing topic at Washington. Two important measures connected with it were decided last week.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES passed "A Bill to protect the rights of American settlers in the Territory of Oregon, until the termination of the joint occupation of the same." This bill extends the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court over the Territory; makes it a judicial district; provides for grants of lands to be hereafter made to settlers now there, and to those who may within two years settle there; authorizes the construction of a block house, the establishment of mail routes, &c.

The SENATE passed the Joint Resolution, which originated in the House, authorizing the President to give Great Britain the stipulated twelve-months' notice of the termination of the Joint Occupancy of Oregon. Below is the Resolution as it passed the Senate. Some alterations have since been proposed by the House, in which the Senate may not concur. But the final agreement of the two Houses upon some "compromise" is expected. The resolution, as will be seen, is decidedly pacific, and requires farther negotiations, which ought to lead to a peaceful adjustment of the controversy:—

"Joint Resolution concerning the Oregon Territory:

Whereas, By the Convention concluded the 20th day of October, 1818, between the United States of America and the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for the period of ten years, and afterward indefinitely extended and continued in force by another Convention of the same parties, concluded the 6th day of August, in the year of our Lord 1827, it was agreed that any country that may be claimed by either party on the Northwest coast of America westward of the Stony or Rocky Mountains, now commonly called the Oregon Territory, should, together with its harbors, bays and creeks, and the navigation of all rivers within the same, be "free and open" to the vessels, citizens and subjects of the two Powers, but without any prejudice to any claim which either of the parties might have to any part of said country; and with this farther provision in the second article of the said Convention of the 6th of August, 1827, that either party might abrogate and annul said Convention, on giving due notice of twelve months to the other contracting party;

And whereas it has now become desirable that the respective claims of the United States and Great Britain should be definitely settled, and that said Territory may no longer than need be remain subject to the evil consequences of the divided allegiance of its American and British population, and of the confusion and conflict of national jurisdictions, dangerous to the cherished peace and good understanding of the two countries:

With a view, therefore, that steps be taken for the abrogation of the said Convention of the 6th of August, 1827, in the mode prescribed in the second article, and that the attention of the Governments of both countries may be the more earnestly and immediately directed to renewed efforts for the settlement of all their differences and disputes in respect to said Territory,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to give the British Government the notice required by its said second article for the abrogation of the said Convention of the 6th of August, 1827."

EIGHT DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Unicorn, which had been so long expected, arrived at Boston on Friday afternoon—having sailed from Liverpool on the 19th ult. She was consequently 29 days in making the passage. She was detained one week in the ice, which she found as far as lat. 42. She put into St. John, N. F., for want of coal; and had head winds and westerly gales all the passage.

The Oregon Question has been brought up in the House of Lords; but nothing decided has been done or said. The official expressions were quite pacific. It is said, however, that the war party is increasing in England, and warlike preparations are continued.

Commercial affairs remained much the same as at our previous dates; though the Cotton Market had an upward tendency. The Railway speculations, the yet uncertain fate of the Ministerial Tariff, and the Oregon question, kept the Money Market rather stringent, though it was somewhat easier.

The news from Poland is unfortunate for that brave and abused people. The insurrection has been prevented coming to a head. The Poles are driven from Cracow. It is said that the body of the insurgents would retreat to the mountains of gallacia, and there commence a guerilla warfare.

The accounts from Ireland continue to be of the most unsatisfactory character, want and crime are prominent features in the picture. There has been great excitement in connection with a contested election, which resulted in a conflict between the peasantry and soldiery, which resulted in the death of one of the former, and the injury of several others. O'Connel was in London, attending Parliament, and is represented by all parties to have altered for the worse.

At a large peace meeting of merchants, traders, &c., a resolution was adopted, declaring that the non-settlement of the Oregon question was owing to the employment of negotiators "who made diplomacy a trade, and have a pecuniary interest in procrastination." The resolution goes on to designate Sir Henry Pottinger as a proper man to be appointed, adding that in the opinion of the meeting he would be sure to effect a satisfactory adjustment in a few months.

The English underwriters have already introduced a clause in their policies, stating that they do not insure against capture, or destruction by an enemy.

Biscuits of maize or indian corn, have been manufactured at Bristol, and they are described as very agreeable and nutritious.

From the annual report of the Great Western Steam Company, it appears that the vessel has made a profit of £12,431 19s. 9d. The Great Britain has made £525 16s. 9d.

The total receipts of the Irish Repeal Association from 1840 to the present time, are set down at £127,859 11s. 7d.

The cost of the French war department, this year, is 325 millions of Francs, or about 13 millions sterling. The luxury of making razzisa on the poor Arabs is rather an expensive one.

The free trade feeling is rapidly spreading through France and Russia, and a commercial treaty has lately been made between Russia and Sardinia.

There had been yet another change of Ministry in Spain; at least a resignation of the lately formed Cabinet, originating, it is said, in a disagreement with the Queen concerning the liberty of the press.

Switzerland and Italy were in a very uneasy condition. The breaking out of the Polish insurrection gave an impulse to the widely prevalent feeling of discontent in both these countries, and though there had been no decided outbreak, the Governments were alarmed and strengthening their means of repression at all points.

Unfavorable accounts had been received from New-Zealand. The forces at the command of the new Governor proved altogether inadequate, and the hostile natives, in overpowering numbers, were threatening the foreigners on every hand. There seems to have been some severe fighting, in which the natives had been victorious; but as yet we have not been able to find the particulars.

Letters from Persia announce that the cholera is making frightful ravages in the interior of Asia. This scourge which has traveled through Cabool, has already penetrated nearly as far as Teheran.

LATER.—The Steamer Caledonia, which left Liverpool on the 4th inst., reached Boston on the 20th. Her news can be summed up in few words. Sir Robert Peel's new Tariff Bill has passed to a second reading. There has been a small rise in cotton. The war in India has been brought to a close, after two severe battles. There has been considerable political trouble in Spain, and a revolution is feared.

A SINGULAR FATALITY.—A couple of weeks since, a man named Tichenor, who had long resided in Owsley County, Ky., was visited by his son from an adjoining neighborhood. One day last week, he was suddenly taken ill by some unknown disease attended with great suffering. He expired in a few hours. The son was scarcely buried before the father was taken sick with the same disease, and died in about the same length of time from the attack. An only daughter of Mr. Tichenor, a beautiful and amiable young lady, the very picture of health, was also hurried to eternity by the same calamity, in less than thirty-six hours from the time she was taken. They all suffered intensely. The sudden decease of the family had created alarm in the County.

TEXAS LANDS AND TEXAS DEBTS.—On the 18th ult., a resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives of Texas on motion of Mr. Howard, "that a committee of five be appointed to inquire into the expediency of ceding to the Government of the United States the public lands of Texas for a just equivalent, for the purpose of providing means to liquidate the public debt; and of appointing a board to ascertain and allot the same, and that said committee report to the House by bill or otherwise." The committee was appointed accordingly. In the Senate a bill for the same pupose had been introduced.

AN EXTENSIVE FACTORY.—There is a factory in New Haven in which, it is said, 120,000 mineral door-knobs are annually made, in nine different styles. A clock-maker there employs seventy-five workmen, at $40,000 per annum, and makes 200 clocks per day, or about 20,000 a year. He uses 30,000 plates of looking-glass, 10,800 lbs. of glue, 15,000 lbs. of wire, 1,500 boxes of glass, 300 kegs of nails, assorted sizes, 100,000 lbs. of brass, 200 tons of iron, 200,000 feet of mahogany and other veneers, and 500,000 feet of pine lumber, per annum.

AN EXTENSIVE COTTON FACTORY.—The Cotton Factory of Samuel Jamieson, Esq., at Norristown, Pa., is said to be one of the largest and most thoroughly finished in the United States. It is built in the form of an L, its entire length is nearly 300 feet, five stories high, and with machinery as complete as any in the world. It is propelled by steam, the engine being a hundred horse power; contains a number of self-acting mules, and drives 17,000 spindles. The proprietor is a most excellent and useful citizen, and is called, among his neighbors, the Napoleon of Manufacturers.

CROTON WATER AT THE STATE PRISON.—A large number of convicts are at work on the aqueduct which is to convey the Croton water to the State Prison at Sing Sing. A stream three inches in diameter, supplying 3,000 gallons per day, is to be drawn from the main aqueduct where it passess through the State lands in the rear of the Prison, and conveyed to a reservoir of the proper dimensions, and thence to the Prison buildings in pipes of iron or lead. It is thought the work will be completed in the month of July. The health of the prisoners has suffered much from the want of pure water, and the cost of obtaining an impure and inadequate supply of this indispensable fluid has been from $10 to $12 per day.

FIRE.—We learn from the Providence Transcript, that the Woolen Factory belonging to Jacob D. Babcock & Co., of Hopkinton, R. I., and also the factory owned by S. & D. Smith, of the same place, situated on each side of the Pawcatuck river, were destroyed by fire on the night of the 14th inst. Since the 1st of January, 1846, twenty-four mills in New-England, valued at from $20,000 to $70,000 each, have been destroyed by fire.

Letters were received at Albany on Thursday announcing the death, by yellow fever, on the Coast of Africa, of John C. Spencer, Jr., son of the late Secretary of War, who was attached as Purser to the U. S. sloop of war Marion.

SUMMARY.

Recent news from Mexico represents the United States forces in Texas as having been met by a strong Mexican force. There are serious fears that a bloody conflict may ensue, although it is understood that the Commanders on both sides are instructed by their respective governments not to commence hostilities.

The bark Cactus, just arrived at Philadelphia from Gibralter, brings several of her seamen as mutineers, they having refused to do duty on the passage, and having killed the second mate in an affray.

In Charlottesville, Va., a few days ago, a difficulty arose between several students of the University and the managers of a menagerie, which resulted in the death of one of the students.

Polly Bodine has been tried before a jury at Newburgh, and pronounced not guilty.

The ship Rainbow, Capt. Land, arrived from Canton, bringing papers to the 21st January. The Rainbow left New-York on the 1st of October, and brings an account of her own arrival out to China. She has been absent only six months and sixteen days—making a voyage out and home unprecedented.

The British residents in China have made a liberal subscription for the support of a clergyman of the Church of England in the city of Canton for five years, and have appointed a Committee to communicate with the Bishop of London and request him to appoint a suitable person. The movement appears to have been commenced by the Americans, who had in view a joint subscription for the common benefit.

The "Learned Blacksmith" says: "About the first of June, we propose, under certain conditions, to take steamer or packet for England. On our arrival we propose to take a private hickory staff and travel on, like Bunyan's pilgrim, through the country, at the rate of about ten miles a day,

"With a pocket for my wheat, and a pocket for my rye,
And a jug of water by my side, to drink when I am dry."

A Carrier Pigeon, dispatched from Southampton, England, at 10 o'clock in the morning, arrived at its home in Drury-lane, London, upwards of 70 miles, in 85 minutes.

The daughter of Mehemet Ali was married at Cairo in December last, and it is said that the bridal feasts cost ten millions of dollars; enough to marry decently and happily all the marriageable daughters of Ham in Egypt.

Edward Fitzgerald, a poor fellow with the "horrors" upon him, was arrested in New Orleans on the 26th ult., charged with larceny. In his hat was found a human skull! This the accused accounted for by stating that it was the skull of his brother, who was killed at the taking of the Alamo, and that he always carried it about him as a remembrancer.

The Journal of Commerce states the marvelous fact, that the transmission of letters between this city and Canton, which are transmitted all the way by steam, can be calculated on with more exactness as to time, than the mails between this city and New Orleans.

Five mills, one in Boston, one in Providence, one in New Jersey, one in Pennsylvania, and one in Maryland, have recently commenced, or are about ready to commence, the making of railroad iron. They will all work up more than a hundred and sixty tons of pig metal daily, say a thousand tons a week.

The Haverhill Banner states that Mr. J. P. Cushing, a gentleman of handsome fortune, now residing at Watertown, was waited upon, a few days since, by the assessors of that town to ascertain the amount they should assess him toward the expenses of the town. After inquiring, and being told the amount of the whole taxes to be raised, he desired the assessors to charge the whole amount to him!

The Cincinnati Union states that the subject of establishing vineyards is now the rage among many Ohio river agriculturists. Large plats of ground along the river are being trenched and prepared for the reception of vines the coming season. One gentleman is preparing a vineyard of some eighty acres, thirty miles from Cincinnati.

A FARM FOR SALE,

IN the township of Piscataway, State of New Jersey, lying north-east from New Brunswick, half a mile from the Bridge, half a mile from Snyder's Mills, and in full view of the railroad car-house. Said farm consists of about ninety-five acres of land, in a good state of cultivation, and well adapted to raising grain and vegetables. It has a good variety of fruit trees, considerable wood, and five acres of salt meadow. The house is in good repair, and has a well of water at the door. There is also a new barn, sheds, &c. For farther particulars call on Dr. NELSON STELLE, No. 146 Grand-st., N. Y.—Mr. Burris, No. 1 Oliver-st.—or on the premises of JONATHAN S. DUNHAM.

STATE CONVENTION.—STATE OF NEW YORK, SS. We, the Secretary of State, the Comptroller and the Treasurer of the said State, having formed a Board of State Canvassers, and having, in conformity to the provisions of the act entitled "An Act recommending a Convention of the people of the State," passed May 13th, 1845, canvassed and estimated the whole number of votes or ballots given for and against the said proposed 'Convention,' at a Central Election held in the said State, on the fourth day of November, in the year 1845, according to the certified statements of said votes or ballots received by the Secretary of State, in the manner directed by the said act, do hereby determine, declare, and certify, that the whole number of votes or ballots given under virtue of the said act, was two hundred and forty-seven thousand, one hundred and seventeen; that of the said number, two hundred and thirteen thousand, two hundred and fifty-seven votes or ballots were given for the said Convention:—That of the said first mentioned number, thirty-three thousand, eight hundred and sixty votes or ballots were given against the said Convention:—And it appearing by the said Canvass that a majority of the votes or ballots given as aforesaid are for a Convention, the said canvassers do farther certify and declare that a Convention of the people of said State will be called accordingly: and that an election for Delegates to the said Convention will be held on the last Tuesday of April in the year 1846, to meet in Convention at the Capitol, in the City of Albany, on the first Monday in June, 1846, pursuant to the provisions of the aforesaid act of the Legislature.

Given under our hand at the Secretary of State's Office in the City of Albany, the 26th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty five.

N. S. BENTON, Secretary of State.
A. C. FLAGG, Comptroller.
BENJAMIN ENOS, Treasurer.

STATE OF NEW YORK, SECRETARY'S OFFICE.—I certify the preceding to be a true copy of an original certificate of the Board of State Canvassers, on file in this office.

Given under my hand and seal of office, at the City of Albany, the 26th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty-five.

N. S. BENTON, Secretary of State.

STATE OF NEW YORK, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Albany, Jan. 28th, 1846.

To the Sheriff of the County of New York—Sir: Notice is hereby given that, pursuant to the provisions of the act entitled "An Act recommending a Convention of the people of this State," passed May 13th, 1845, an election will be held on the last Tuesday of April next, in the several cities and counties of this State, to choose Delegates to the Convention to be held pursuant to the provisions of the aforesaid act and certificate above recited.

The number of Delegates to be chosen in the county of New York will be the same as the Members of Assembly from the said county. Respectfully yours,

N. S. BENTON, Secretary of State.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE, New York, Feb. 7, 1846.

The above is published pursuant to the notice of the Secretary of State, and the requirements of the Statute in such case made and provided for. WM. JONES,

TEACHERS' CLASSES, for the special benefit of those designig to teach, will be formed at the commencement of the Fall Term, and continue seven weeks, with daily Lectures, and Model Classes.

Tuition, to be arranged at the commencement of each Term. Primary Department, $2 00 Academic, from $3 00 to $5 00. No Extra Charges for Drawing, Painting, Lectures, or Incidentals, except Instrumental Music. Convenient Rooms for study, or private board, at moderate prices. Board in the Hall, or in Private Families, from $1 00 to $1 50.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,

LINES,

Suggested by a visit to the City of Washington, in the 12th month of 1845.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

With a cold and wintry noon-light
On its roofs and steeples shed,
Shadows weaving with the sun-light
From the gray sky overhead,
Broadly, vaguely, all around me, lies the half-built town outspead.

Through this broad street, restless ever,
Ebbs and flows a human tide,
Wave on wave, a living river;
Wealth and fashion side by side,
Toiler, Idler, Slave and Master, in the same quick current glide.

Underneath yon dome, whose coping
Springs above them, vast and tall,
Grave men in the dust are groping
For the largess, base and small,
Which the hand of Power is scattering—crumbs which from its table fall.

Base of heart! they vilely barter
Honor's wealth for Party's place;
Step by step on Freedom's Charter
Leaving footprints of disgrace;
For the day's poor pittance, turning from the great hope of their race.

Yet, where the festal lamps are throwing
Glory round the dancer's hair,
Gold-tressed, like an angel's, flowing
Backward on the sunset air;
And the low, quick pulse of Music beats its measures sweet and rare:

There to-night shall Woman's glances,
Star like welcome give to them—
Fawning fools with shy advances
Seek to touch their garment's hem,
With the tongue of flattery glozing deeds which God and Truth condemn.

From this glittering lie, my vision
Takes a broader, sadder range;
Full before me have arisen
Other pictures, dark and strange,
From the Parlor to the Prison must the scene and witness change.

Hark! the heavy gate is swinging
On its hinges, harsh and slow;
One pale prison lamp is flinging
On a fearful group below,
Such a light as leaves to terror whatsoe'er it does not show.

Pitying God! is that a WOMAN
On whose wrist the shackles clash?
Is that shriek she utters human,
Underneath the stinging lash?
Are they MEN whose eyes of madness from that sad procession flash?

Still the dance goes gaily onward—
What is it to Wealth or Pride,
That without, the stars are looking
On a scene which earth should hide!
That the slave ship lies in waiting, rocking on Potomac's tide!

Vainly to that mean Ambition
Which, upon a rival's fall,
Winds above its old condition
With a reptile's slimy crawl,
Shall the pleading voice of Sorrow, shall the Slave in anguish call.

Vainly to the child of Fashion,
Giving to ideal woe
Graceful luxury of compassion,
Shall the stricken mourner go;
Hateful seems the earnest sorrow, beautiful the hollow show!

Nay, my words are all too sweeping;
In this crowded human mart,
Feeling is not dead, but sleeping—
Man's strong will and woman's heart
In the coming strike for Freedom yet shall bear their generous part.

And from yonder sunny valleys,
Southward in the distance lost,
Freedom yet shall summon allies
Worthier than the North can boast,
With the Evil by their hearth-stones grappling at severer cost.

Now, the soul alone is willing,
Faint the heart and weak the knee,
And as yet no lip is thrilling
With the mighty words, "Be free!"
Tarrieth long the land's good Angel, but his advent is to be!

Meanwhile turning from the revel;
To the prison cell my sight,
For intenser hate of Evil,
For a keener sense of Right,
Shaking off thy dust, I thank thee, City of the Slaves, to-night!

"To thy duty now and ever,
Dream no more of rest or stay,
Give to Freedom's great endeavor
All thou art and hast to-day."
Thus, above the City's murmur, saith a Voice, or seems to say.

Ye with heart and vision gifted
To discern and love the Right,
Whose worn faces have been lifted
To the slowly-growing light,
Where from Freedom's sunrise drifted slowly back the murk of night!

Ye who through long years of trial
Still have held your purpose fast,
While a lengthening shade the dial
From the westering sunshine cast,
And of hope each hour's denial seemed an echo of the last.

O my brothers, O my sisters,
Were to God that ye were near,
Gazing with me down the vistas
Of a sorrow strange and drear,
Would to God that ye were listening to the Voice I seem to hear.

With the storm above us driving,
With the false earth mined below,
Who shall marvel if thus striving
We have counted friend as foe;
Unto one another giving in the darkness blow for blow.

Well, it may be that our natures
Have grown sterner and more hard,
And the freshness of their features
Somewhat harsh and battle-scared,
And their harmonies of feeling overtasked and rudely jarred.

Be it so. It should not swerve us
From a purpose true and brave;
Dearer Freedom's rugged service
Than the pastime of the Slave;
Better is the storm above it than the quiet of the grave.

Let us, then, uniting, bury
All our idle feuds in dust,
And to future conflicts carry
Mutual faith and common trust;
Always he who most forgiveth in his brother is most just.

From the eternal Shadow rounding
All our sun and starlight here,
Voices of our lost ones sounding
Bid us be of heart and cheer,
Through the silence down the spaces, falling on the inward ear.

Know we not our dead are looking
Downward with a sad surprise
All our strife of words rebuking
With their mild and loving eyes?
Shall we grieve the holy angels? Shall we cloud their blessed skies?

Let us draw their mantles o'or us
Which have fallen on our way;
Let us do the work before us
Cheerly, bravely, while we may,
Ere this long night-silence cometh, and with us it is not day!

A WHALE-CHASE.

SELECTED FOR THE LIGHT SHIP, BY EDWARD ROBINSON, JR.

No species of fishery can compare in intensity of interest with the Whale-Fishery. The magnitude of the object of the chase, the perilous character of the seas which it peculiarly frequents, are features which prominently distinguish the profession of the whale-fisher from all similar pursuits, and which invest the details of its history with the strong character inseparable from pictures of stirring exertion, privation, and danger. The following animated description of a Whale-Chase, is extracted from Capt. Scoresby's Voyages, and will give the reader an idea of the difficulties and dangers that attend the Arctic Whale-Fishery.

On the 25th of June, 1802, one of the harpooners belonging to the Resolution of Whithy, under my command, struck a whale by the edge of a small floe of ice. Assistance being promptly afforded, a second boat's lines were attached to those of the fast boat, in a few minutes after the harpoon was discharged. The remainder of the boats proceeded at some distance, in the direction the fish seemed to have taken.

In about quarter of an hour, the fast boat again made a signal for lines. As the ship was then within five minutes' sail, we instantly steered towards the boat, with the view of affording assistance by means of a spare boat we still retained on board. Before we reached the place however, we observed four oars displayed in signal order, which, by their number, indicated a most urgent necessity for assistance. Two or three men were at the same time seen seated close by the stern, which was considerably elevated, for the purpose of keeping it down, while the bow of the boat, by the force of the line, was drawn down to the level of the sea, and the harpooner, by the friction of the line round the bolard, was enveloped in smoky obscurity. At length, when the ship was scarcely a hundred yards distant, we perceived preparation for quitting the boat. The sailor's pea-jackets were cast upon the adjoining ice; the oars were thrown down; the crew leaped overboard; the bow of the boat was buried in the water; the stern rose perpendicularly, and then majestically disappeared. The harpooner having caused the end of the line to be fastened to the iron ring at the boat's stern, was the means of its loss; and a tongue of the ice, on which was a depth of several feet of water, which kept the boat, by the pressure of the line against it, at such a considerable distance as prevented the crew from leaping upon the floe. Some of them were, therefore, put to the necessity of swimming for their preservation; but all of them succeeded in scrambling upon the ice, and were taken on board the ship a few minutes afterwards. I may here observe, that it is an uncommon circumstance for a fish to require more than two boats' lines in such a situation. None of our harpooners, therefore, had any scruple in leaving the fast-boat, never suspecting, after it had received the assistance of one boat with six lines or upwards, that it would need any more.

Several ships being about us, there was a possibility that some person might attack and make a prize of the whale, when it had so far escaped us that we no longer retained any hold of it. We therefore set all the sail the ship could safely carry, and worked through several narrow and intricate channels in the ice, in the direction I observed the fish had retreated. After a little time, it was descried by the people in the boats, at a considerable distance to the eastward; a general chase was immediately commenced, and within the space of an hour, three harpoons were struck. We now imagined the fish was secure, but our expectations were premature. The whale resolutely pushed beneath a large floe that had been recently broken to pieces by the swell, and soon drew all the lines from the second fast-boat; the officer of which, not being able to get any assistance, tied the end of his line to a hummock of ice and broke it. Soon afterwards, the other two boats, still fast, were dragged against the broken floe, when one of the harpoons drew out. The lines of only one boat, therefore, remained fast to the fish; and this, with six or eight lines out, was dragged forward into the shattered floe with astonishing force. Pieces of ice, each of which was large enough to have answered the purpose of a mooring for a ship, were wheeled about by the strength of the whale; and such was the tension and elasticity of the line, that whenever it slipped clear of any mass of ice, after turning it round, into the space between any two adjoining pieces, the boat and its crew flew forward through the crack, with the velocity of an arrow, and never failed to launch several feet upon the first mass of ice that it encountered.

While we scoured the sea around the broken floe with the ship, and while the ice was attempted in vain by the boats, the whale continued to press forward in an easterly direction towards the sea. At length, when fourteen lines (about 1680 fathoms) were drawn from the fourth fast-boat, a slight entanglement of the line broke it at the stem. The fish then again made its escape, taking along with it a boat and twenty-eight lines. The united length of these lines was 6720 yards or upwards of three and a half English miles; value, with the boat, above £150 sterling.

The obstruction of the sunken boat to the progress of the fish must have been immense; and that of the lines likewise considerable, the lines alone being thirty-five hundred weight.

So long as the fourth fast-boat, through the medium of its lines, retained its hold of the fish, we searched the adjoining sea with the ship in vain; but in a short time after the line was divided, we got sight of the object of pursuit, at the distance of nearly two miles to the eastward of the ice and boats, in the open sea. One boat only with lines, and two empty boats, were reserved by the ship. Having, however, fortunately, fine weather and a fresh breeze of wind, we immediately gave chase under all sail; though it must be confessed, with the insignificant force by us, the distance of the fish, and the rapidity of its flight considered, we had but very small hopes of success. At length after pursuing it five or six miles, being at least nine miles from the place where it was struck, we came up with it, and it seemed inclined to rest after its extraordinary exertions. The two dismantled or empty boats having been furnished with two lines each (a very inadequate supply,) they, together with one in a good state of equipment, now made an attack upon the whale. One of the harpooners made a blunder; the fish saw the boat, took the alarm, and again fled. I now supposed that it would be seen no more, nevertheless we chased nearly a mile in the direction I imagined it had taken, and placed the boats, to the best of my judgment, in the most advantageous situations. In this case we were extremely fortunate. The fish rose near one of the boats, and was immediately harpooned. In a few minutes, two more harpoons entered its back, and lances were plied against it with vigor and success. Exhausted by its amazing exertions to escape, it yielded itself at length to its fate, received the piercing wounds of the lances without resistance, and finally died without a struggle. Thus terminated with success an attack upon a whale, which exhibited the most uncommon determination to escape from its pursuers, seconded by the most amazing strength, of any individual whose capture I ever witnessed. After all, it may seem surprising that it was not a particularly large individual; the largest lamina of whalebone only measuring nine feet six inches, while those affording twelve feet bone are not uncommon. The quantity of line withdrawn from the different boats engaged in the capture was singularly great. It amounted altogether, to 10, 440 yards, or nearly six English miles. Of these, thirteen new lines were lost, together with the sunken boat; the harpoon connecting them to the fish having dropt out before the whale was killed.

HAS THE NEGRO A RIGHT TO HIS OWN PERSON?

Extracted from the Speech of T. F. Buxton, in the House of Commons, 15th of the Fifth Month, (May,) 1823.

Now, one word as to the right of the master. There are persons whose notions of justice are so confused and confounded by slavery, as to suppose that the planter has something like an honest title to the person of the Slave. We have been so long accustomed to talk of "my slave," and "your slave," and what he will fetch if sold, that we are apt to imagine that he is really yours or mine, and that we have a substantial right to keep or sell him. Then let us, just for a moment, fathom this right. Here is a certain valuable commodity; and here are two claimants for it—a White man and a Black man. Now, what is the commodity in dispute?—The body of the Black man. The White man says, "It is mine;" and the Black man says, "It is mine." Now, the question is, if every man had his own, to whom would that Black body belong? The claim of the Black man to his own body is just this—Nature gave it him. He holds it by the grant of God. That compound of bone and muscles is his, by the most irreproachable of all titles—a title which admits not, what every other species of title admits—a suspicion of violence or fraud, or irregularity. Will any man say he came by his own body in an illegal manner? Does any man suspect that he played the knave, and purloined his limbs? I do not mean to say the Negro is not a thief; but he must be a very subtle thief indeed, if he stole even so much as his own little finger.

At least you will admit this—the Negro has a pretty good claim to his own person. If any man thinks he has a better, the proof rests with him. Then we come to the claim of the White man. What is the foundation of your right? It shall be the best that can be conceived. You received him from your father. Very good! Your father bought him from a neighboring planter. Very good! That planter bought him of a trader at the Kingston Slave-market: and that trader bought him of a man-merchant in Africa. So far you are quite safe! How did the man-merchant acquire him? He stole him—he kidnapped him! The very root of your claim is robbery, violence, inconceivable wickedness. If any thing on earth was ever proved by evidence, it was proved before the Slave-trade Committee, that the method of obtaining slaves in Africa was robbery, man-stealing, and murder. Your pure title rests on these sacred foundations. If your slave came direct from Africa, your right to his person is absolutely nothing. But your claim to the child born in Jamaica is (if I may use the expression) less still. The new-born infant has done—can have done—nothing to forfeit his right to freedom. And to talk about rights, justice, equity, and law as connected with slavery, is to talk downright nonsense. If we had no interest in the case, and were only speaking of the conduct of another nation, we should speak of slavery, as we now speak of Slave-trading; that is, we should call it rank, naked, flagrant, undisguised injustice.

EXPLOSION.—The bakery and grocery store of Mr. F. O. Welch, near the market, was blown up by gunpowder last evening. Only some five pounds of powder left in a keg exploded, yet the report was quite cannon-like, and the explosion forced entirely out the lower story of one side and end of the building, and considerably shattered the remainder. Fortunately no person was in the building when the explosion took place. [Cleveland (O.) Herald, March 30.

VIRGINIA FOREVER.

What glorious liberty they do enjoy in the "Old Dominion."

At a late meeting of the Court of Common Pleas, in Parkersburgh, three citizens, Rev. Benjamin Athey, Edward McPherson and Barcus Cook, was convicted of reading incendiary matter, and put under bonds to keep the peace. We understand the facts as follows:

Some two years since, a newspaper containing a dialogue, was sent to some one in Wood County, and at a wedding party, a few months ago, one of the guests read it for the amusement of the company. This dialogue the author imagines to have occurred between a demon and a ghost just arrived at Tartarus, in which the demon inquires:

Art thou that man of blood and birth
Devoid of human feeling?
The wretch I saw who last on earth
In human cattle dealing?

GHOST—I am from the South, the Ghost replies,
And I was there a Teacher—
Saw men in chains with laughing eyes—
I was a SOUTHERN PREACHER,
And when I saw the horrid sight,
Of slaves by torture dying,
And told their Masters all was right,
I knew that I was LYING, &c.

And after this, after the above named gentlemen has satisfied the Court that they had no evil design in reading these verses, and were moreover ignorant that to receive, read or circulate, such pieces of poetry was contrary to the law of the land and the liberty of Virginia, they were only required to enter into bonds and recognizances to keep the peace in the following order: Rev. Benjamin Athey, $400 for three years; Edward McPherson, $200, for two years; Barcus Cook, $100 for one year. After which they were dismissed with the distinct understanding that their case had been handled very leniently—but such would not be shown in another case!

CURE FOR FEVERS.

The following account of the Indian mode of curing Fevers, is copied from a letter written by William Penn to Dr. Baynard, of England.

'As I find the Indians upon the continent more incident to fevers than to any other distemper, so they rarely fail to cure themselves by great sweating and immediately plunging themselves into cold water, which they say is the only way not to catch cold. I once saw an instance of it with divers more in company. Being upon a discovery of the back part of the country, I called upon an Indian of note, whose name was Tennoughan, the captain general of the clans of Indians of those parts, I found him ill of a fever, his head and limbs much affected with pain, and at the same time his wife preparing a bagnio for him. The bagnio resembled a large oven, into which he crept by a door on one side, while she put several hot stones in at a small door on the other side thereof, and then fastened the doors as closely from the air as she could. Now while he was sweating in his bagnio, his wife (for they disdain no service) was, with an axe, cutting her husband a passage into the river (being the winter of 1683, the great frost and the ice very thick,) in order to the immersing himself after he should get out of the bath. In less than half an hour he was in so great a sweat, that when he came out he was as wet as if he had come out of a river, and the reek or steam of his body so thick that it was hard to discern any body's face that stood near him. In this condition, stark naked, a body cloth only excepted, he ran to the river, which was about twenty paces, and ducked himself twice or thrice therein, and so returned, passing only through his bagnio, to mitigate the immediate stroke of the cold, to his own house, perhaps twenty paces further, and wrapping himself in his woollen mantle, lay down at his length near a long but gentle fire, in the middle of his wigwam or house, turning himself several times till he was dry, and then he rose and proceeded to get us our dinner, seeming to be as easy and as well in health as at any other time.

'I am well assured that the Indians wash their infants in cold water as soon as born, in all seasons of the year."

THE GREAT DESTROYER DETECTED.—Oh, how long have we been deceived! We long searched for the poison that was destroying our life. The drop said, it is not in me. I am but a drop and can do no harm. The little stream said, it is not in me. Am I not a little one, and can do no harm? And the demon of Intemperance, as she prowled around us, said, let my drops and rivulets alone, they can do no harm. Go stop, if you can, the mighty river. We believed her, but the river baffled our efforts. Its torrents rolled on, and for a time we contented ourselves with snatching here and there a youth from destruction. But we now see that the poison is in the drops and rivulets, and without these, that river which is still sweeping the young and the old into the ocean of despair, would cease forever.

DEATH BY POISON.—Amos S. Saxton, a native of this City, aged 45 years, came to a premature death, on Friday, by taking a quantity of Corrosive Sublimate and New-England Rum, by mistake. The deceased, a painter being employed to do some work on board the steamboat Troy, lying at the foot of Ninth-st.; the door of the storeroom, (in which was kept a demijohn containing Corrosive Sublimate, &c. for the use of the boat,) was left open in order that it might be painted; while the deceased was at work in this room, he drank freely from the demijohn, notwithstanding that it was labeled "Poison," in large letters, and the workmen had been previously cautioned. He died shortly afterwards.

☞ We regret to learn, says the Washington Union, that Mr. Serruys, late Belgian Charge to this Country, has taken his final leave of our Government, preparatory to his embarking for Europe to occupy a position equally honorable with the one he has filled in the United States. He has been appointed by his Government to a mission to Hamburg, Hanover, Bremen, and Oldenburg.

A Cure for Slander.—When men speak ill of you, live so that no one who knows you will believe it. You will find it a much better remedy than a law suit.

THE LICENSE LAW.

BY REV. J. PIERPONT.

"For so much gold we license thee,"
So says our law, "a draught to sell,
That bows the strong, enslaves the free,
And opens wide the gates of hell;
For public good requires that some,
Since many die, should live by rum."

Ye civil fathers! while the foes
Of this destroyer seize their swords,
And heaven's own hail is in thy blows
They're dealing, ye will cut the chords
That round the falling fiend they draw;
And o'er him hold your shield, the law!

And will ye give no man a bill
Divorcing him from heaven's high sway?
And while God says, "Thou shalt not kill,"
Say ye, for gold, "Ye may, ye may!"
Compare the body with the soul!
Compare the bullet with the bowl!

In which is felt the fiercer blast
Of the destroying angel's breath?
Which binds the victim the more fast?
Which kills him with a deadlier breath?
Will ye the felon fox restrain,
And yet take off the tiger's chain?

The living to the rotting dead,
The God-conteming Tuscan died,
Till by the way or on his bed,
This poor corpse-carrier dropped and died.
Lashed hand in hand, and face to face,
In fatal and in loathed embrace.

Less cutting, think ye is the throng
That to a breathing corpse for life,
Lashes in torture loathed and long,
The drunkard's child, the drunkard's wife!
To clasp that clay, to breathe that breath,
And no escape. O that is death!

Are ye not fathers? When your sons
Look to you for their daily bread,
Dare ye in mockery load with stones
The table that for them ye spread?
How can you hope your sons will live,
If ye for fish a serpent give?

O holy God! let light divine,
Break forth more broadly from above,
Till we conform our laws to thine,
The perfect law of truth and love:
For truth and love alone can save
Thy children from a hopeless grave.

DR. MASON ON LIGHT READING.

Rev. Dr. Mason, the pastor of the Bleecker street church, repeated a sermon last Sabbath evening, which I had the happiness of hearing once from his own desk, at the Madison st. church on the natural tendency of fictitious reading. It was a masterly effort, abounding in those strains of powerful, commanding eloquence which has distinguished his style as an orator, and resemble so much the majestic grandeur and power of his celebrated father. Dr. M. commenced with a vivid presentation of the impressive truth, that the natural and moral characteristics of men were formed in early life. The associations of youth generally leave indelible impressions upon the character. From this he passed to consider the influence of a man's aims and purposes upon his moral nature—if he strives for high, elevated, generous objects, his mind insensibly partakes of the same characteristics. On the other hand, low, vain selfish aims dwarfed and contracted the mind, and imparted their own mean hue to every faculty and principle of the heart. And this power will go on until the mind shall reach the dignity of a seraph, or sink to the debasement and despair of devils.

Dr. M. then illustrates what objects reading should accomplish. It should furnish the mind with knowledge, and improve the heart. Novel reading accomplishes neither of these purposes. It amounts at best, to nothing, and in most cases, to what is infinitely worse than nothing. It does not even cultivate the imagination; for the novel reader, instead of using and disciplining his own, only revels in the imagination of another. Much less does it improve the judgment, or furnish useful knowledge; for its immediate effect is to impair all the faculties, and give distorted views of facts and life. Least of all does it refine the feelings or foster the generous growth of emotion. For if you would find hearts as cold as ice, and hard as adamant against the objects of real charity—unwilling to move a finger for their relief, you must go to those who are accustomed to weep over fictitious wo. Could the history of the libertine, or gambler, or villain who revels in crime, and perpetrates unmoved, the deeds of atrocious wrong, in nine cases out of ten, he would be found familiar with the novelist, or the dramatist.

The agency of booksellers in diffusing the poison of fictitious literature, and their tremendous responsibility, were most forcibly alluded to, and the culpable remission of parents, in suffering their children to become familiar with novels, and to acquire a taste for them, was also censured as it deserves to be. Now-a-days there was no excuse for it. Good books, written with far greater talent, and possessing a greater interest, abound; and the thirst for knowledge, which belongs to young minds, can be allayed at purer sources than at the turbid, poisoned fountains of our imaginative literature. The sin and shame of the waste of time which novel reading causes, the strange spectacle of an immortal being living merely for amusement, and all the dread responsibilities of moral agency, were presented at the close, with an earnestness of manner, and vividness of imagery and force of language, which but few can equal.

[Syracuse Religious Recorder.

A SAD PICTURE.—Some appalling details were recently given at an examination before one of the town commissions of England. The London Times comments upon the practice referred to, in a strain of proper indignation, and gives the following as a portion of the testimony:—

"Have you ever known circumstances in which children have suffered by excessive doses being administered by mothers or nurses?

"Oh, yes! I have known death ensue, and also sleeping for a considerable length of time, so that there was difficulty in getting the child out of sleep. The deaths in the cases to which I allude, arose from sudden convulsions.

"Have the children in the habitual use of opiates any peculiarities of appearance?

"They look very drowsy and livid, and seem to be always sleepy. Their eyes are fixed. They become emaciated, their bellies protuberant, and they look very old.

"It is curious to see the children in the shop; they stretch out their little hands, for they know the bottle, and when they get it drink it as eagerly as the drunkard does his glass!

"You may know at once a child this accustomed to the use of these drugs. It becomes so thin that you can feel nothing but bone. Its eyes become sunken and fixed, its nose pinched; in fact, such children look like old wizened men and women. They sink off in a decline and die. I have reprobated the practice to mothers, but their answer es, 'What are we to do? it is so cross.'"

SECTION IV.

The Sabbath in Patriarchal Ages.

The inspired history of the world, down to the time of Abraham's call, is necessarily very brief. Having, therefore, given so distinctly the Institution and Design of the Sabbath in his record of of creation, Moses, by whom the entire history was penned, makes no express reference to it afterwards till the departure of the Israelites from Egypt. An idea, principally founded on this fact, has been advanced by some, that the Sabbath had not yet been revealed. The fallacy of such a view we have already shown, in the full consideration of the origin and purpose of the day of rest; and when we reflect that the single book of Genesis embraces the history of between two and three thousand years, we shall have little occasion to wonder at such omissions. In many respects, its historical details are scanty. The names of comparatively few individuals who lived during that period, are at all preserved; nor are we furnished with many incidents in the lives even of some of the most illustrious of the patriarchs. What a multitude of facts must have passed unrecorded! This being the case, the silence of the sacred penman concerning the personal observance of the Sabbath by any, can with no propriety be regarded as evidence that it was not so observed. Should we question the existence of many fearers of the Lord besides Enoch, between the death of Abel and the days of Noah, though we have not their inspired biography? Certainly not. But, although at the very outset, in the Word of God, we have the appointment of the Sabbath, and a reason universally applicable to the human race is there assigned, yet, from the want of express mention of of its observance by the patriarchs, it has been supposed by some that the divine appointment was of a later date. Having already shown, from the language of Moses, that the origin of the Sabbath must have been coeval with creation—having urged that the reason assigned by God for its observance is its being a memorial of His creation, which applies equally to the earliest and latest times; and that its advantages were alike needful for the creatures of God in all ages—having already referred at large to these, it might now seem almost unnecessary to notice the present objection. But as we may afterwards have accasion to advert to it, and as considerable importance has been attached to the silence of Moses, it may be proper to consider the objection farther, by referring to a few facts of a somewhat similar nature.

It must be obvious to all, that the Sabbath may have been observed by the patriarchs, without its being judged necessary by the inspiring Spirit, in so conscise an account of their lives, expressly to refer to it. This might, indeed, be deemed superfluous after its institution had been so distinctly given, especially when we remember that such decided testimony is borne to the faith of those who have obtained ample witness that they were righteous. As we are informed in Scripture of their calling on the name of the Lord—of their being just, and perfect, and walking with God—of their having the testimony that they pleased God—of their being heirs of the righteousness which is by faith of their obedient trust in the Lord, which enabled them to forsake kindred and country—of Jehovah's being with them—of their choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season—after all this testimony in their favor, it seems to me unreasonable to doubt their regular and consistent observance of the first divine appointment. It may surely be presumed that those who have been so praised of the Lord, the Spirit, that in a matter of such importance they did what they ought to have done. Can we ever doubt that social worship was observed by pious men either before the flood or after it, though their practice in this respect also is left unstated in the Word of God? Yet we have no express mention of the divine institution of the one as we have of the other. And, if the Sabbath is little spoken of before the giving of the law, so, it is needful to observe, that it is seldom named in Old Testament history at all. For about five hundred years after the time of Moses, it is never mentioned; and, indeed, it is only when connected with some circumstance of a general or of a national character, that it is in any way referred to—for of its personal or social observance before the coming of Christ, we never read—not even in the days of the most pious of the kings of Israel, of Joshua, David, Solomon, Jehosaphat, Hezekiah, nor Josiah. It will not, however, be thence concluded by any Christian, that at long after the giving of the law, in the times of these kings, the Sabbath was unknown. We know, indeed, the contrary to have been the case. But if we should be wrong in coming to such a conclusion from the want of evidance of its observance, where we have seven books filled with the history of five hundred years, the legitimacy of the same inference in regard to the patriarchs may surely well be questioned, and that with far greater force, where a single book is the record of the world's history, as well as that of the church, for two thousand five hundred years. As during the former period it is the great acts of faith or of apostacy in the national history of Israel, with which almost exclusively we are furnished, so also in the individual lives of the patriarchs it is the great prominent and distinguishing points of excellence in their character which are delineated, rather than the more ordinary exercises of religion which they practiced in common with others. Yet these their excellencies are sometimes set before us in language which expresses a fullness of fidelity that forbids our supposing their omission of any great duty imposed, or neglect of any great privilege conferred.

In like manner, and for the same purpose, we would notice that circumcision, although known to be observed universally by the descendants of Abraham, is never mentioned of individuals in Scripture history, from the settlement of the Israelites in the land of Canaan, till the time of Christ—a period of fourteen hundred and fifty years.

By the fearers of the Lord and their households, we have every reason to believe, the Sabbath would be observed, whatever others might do or say. When, therefore, we read of the faith of Abel, we might well conclude that he regularly hallowed the Sabbath of the Lord, independently of other evidence. But there is besides reason to believe that the reference is to this, when it is said that "at the end of days," (as literally put in the margin,) "it came to pass that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground, an offering unto the Lord; and Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof." Gen. 4: 3, 4. As it was "by faith" that Abel did so, it must have been in obedience to the will of God, which an act of faith always implies; and as the offerings of both were "brought" to the Lord, the place must have been that chosen for the divine manifestation, probably at the east of the garden of Eden; and if so, then have we reason to conclude that the time, "The end of days," was the Sabbath which God from the first had sanctified. The expression must have reference to some defined period, the end of days already specified and numbered; and, up to the period in question, we read of none such but the seven of which the week is composed.

God says, in terms of highest commendation, "Abraham obeyed My voice, and kept My charge, My commandments, My statutes, and My laws;" (Gen. 26: 5,) and with such general testimony immediately from the holy Lord, are we to doubt the Patriarch's observance of God's own Sabbath, because it is not so mentioned specially by name among the "commandments" which Abraham is stated to have kept? Such a testimony as is contained in these words, from the mouth of the Holy One of Israel, is exceedingly comprehensive. No believer in the inspiration of the record would, on reading this, believe for a moment that Abraham was a man of blood; or, that he rioted in the lusts of the flesh, although, except in reference to a few particulars, we have but a short account of his life. And if from the assurance that Abraham obeyed God's voice, and kept His charge, His commandments, His statutes, and His laws, we should feel bound to acquit Abraham of any imputation of habitual theft, or murder, or the violation of any other part of the moral law, although there be no express mention of the fact; so, in like manner, with God's recorded testimony in his favor, we have as little reason to doubt that the day which God has sanctified and blessed, because that in it He rested from His work, would be set apart by the father of the faithful for holy purposes, as part of God's charge and law. And if the Scripture acknowledgment of others, who through faith have likewise obtained a good report, be in some cases less explicit, still, the general terms of God's commendation, fully warrant our believing that they also witnessed for their Creator, and enjoyed his blessing, in sabbatic rest.

We should farther be greatly assisted in our conceptions on the subject of the patriarchal observance of the Sabbath, did always remember, in considering it, that between the creation of the world and the time of Moses, the circumstances were very different from the present. The longevity of the ancients contrasts forcibly with the subsequent abbreviated duration of human life—so that, long as the period sounds in the ear, when expressed by the number of years, the whole time of the traditionary maintenance of the Sabbath was filled up at most by only six successive generations. From Adam, to whom God gave the Sabbath in Paradise, to Moses, through whom it was promulgated anew to the Israelites in the wilderness, its traditionary history, it has been remarked, might be borne through Methuselah, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Joseph, and Amram. By the constant recurrence, therefore, of the day of rest, regularly observed by the pious descendants of Adam, and by others under their influence, the Sabbath was in little danger of being forgotten, in those early ages, in its outward form at least.

Again, although we are not told, in so many words, of Noah's observance of the Sabbath, surely we may discover something more than an unmeaning coincidence in the fact, that, as the waters of the flood receded from the face of the earth, the intervals of his movements are marked by weeks. After receiving again into the ark the returning dove, which found no rest for the sole of her foot, "he stayed yet other seven days, and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark;" she returned with her olive leaf, and he stayed yet other seven days, and sent forth the dove, which returned not again to him any more." Gen. 8: 9—12. If we may not believe this to be the act of a pious mind choosing the Sabbath blessed of the Lord, as that on which he primarily looks to God for the signal of deliverance and safety, it is at least scarcely possible to fail of observing Noah's notice of recurring weeks in his repeated "seven days'" delay. And how came time to be distinguished into weeks at all, in this early stage of the world's history, if not by the observance of the Sabbaths which marked their close, since no solar or planetary movement, or any process in nature, could lead to such division?

It has, likewise, been considered, that the "day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them," of which we read in the history of the Patriarch Job, was the weekly Sabbath. And the repeated instances there recorded of an assembly of the people of God on a determinate day, and that for the purpose of presenting themselves before the Lord, affords no little reason for the conclusion, that this was done in obedience to a divine appointment; and, if so, it is highly probable that the original institution "made for man," and glorifying to his Maker, was the one chosen for worship by the sons of God, at this time, as thus recorded. Job 1: 6; 2: 1.

We find, indeed, that the division of time by weeks is not only mentioned early in the history of man, but that this form of enumeration prevailed even among those less nearly related to the recognized family of the faithful than those we have hitherto noticed, implying, at least, that regularity of observance of weekly time in patriarchal ages, which can only be accounted for by believing the memorial of creation to have been then in some measure, and in some manner, recognized. Thus, in Mesopotamia, we find that Laban, the Syrian, when reproved for the deception practiced in substituting the tender-eyed Leah for the well-favored Rachel whom Jacob loved, and for whom he had served, soothes him thus, "Fulfill her week, and we will give thee this also for the service which thou shalt serve with me yet seven other years. And Jacob did so, and fulfilled her week; and he gave him Rachel his daughter to wife also." Gen. 29: 27, 28. Palliating the fraud he had practiced, the father is willing that his younger daughter also be given to Jacob, so soon as the first marriage, already begun, shall have been fully completed, which the seven days of the feast is here believed to imply, in conformity with what we find in the case of Samson. Judges 14: 12. This identity of seven days with the term week, in these two cases of marriage, suggests this to have been then a defined and perfectly understood period, confirming the idea that in Syria, in the days of Jacob, the return of the Sabbath marked out the term which it weekly closed; while the perfection which it indicated, became a reason for adopting the complete week for the duration of the marriage feast.

It appears perfectly evident, from the form of the divine address to the Israelites in the wilderness, that they, at least, through all their sojourn in Egypt, and through all their oppression there, had retained the knowledge of the weekly division of time. "The sixth day" and "the seventh day" are terms used in explaining to them the manner in which the miraculous supply of the manna would be given, but they are terms which could convey no meaning except to those who were acquainted with such weekly division.

It seems, indeed, unreasonable to suppose that, in the patriarchal ages, mankind would be wholly ignorant of the fact of creation having been completed in six days, and of God's resting on the seventh; and these references to their notation of time by sevens, and by weeks, intimate, not indistinctly, their knowledge of the sacred character consequently imparted to the Sabbath, and that to the righteous of the generation of men from the beginning it was known, and by them observed.

Andrews (on the Fourth Commandment) well remarks, that it is indeed unlikely that the patriarchs would have a knowledge of tithes, practiced by them as approved by God, though not enjoined in inspired patriarchal history, of sacrifices observed by all the patriarchs, from Abel downwards, of the eldest sons as the family priest, and yet that they could be ignorant of the Sabbath. He also gives it as the opinion of Calvin, that the frequent sacrifices of Abraham, and the other patriarchs, would usually be presented on the Sabbath.

THE MISSIONARY.

Addressed by Mr. Wm. Beattie to the Missionary Moffatt, on his return to Africa.

"Come over and help us! Though scorching the clime,
Though redden'd with slaughter, and hideous with crime;
Yet the night is fast waning—the day-star appears,
To establish our hopes and extinguish our fears!
Come over and help us! Our courage renew!
For the harvest is ripe—but the laborers are few!"

What voice did I hear? 'Twas the fervent appeal
Of the soldiers of CHRIST to enkindle our zeal!
'Twas the voice of His servants, whose standard of peace
Brings light to the blind—to the captive release!
"Come over and help us! till truth shall prevail,
And the Bible be taught in the temple of Baal!"

We come! We are ready! Our Master demands
This test of our fealty—this work at our hands!
And, fearless of pestilence, prisons and bonds,
To the "call," each disciple exulting responds.
For he feels—he believes that an Eye from above
Regards with complacence his "labors of love!"

"Come over and help us! Embarked in His cause,
Let us march 'neath His flag, and promulgate his laws!
Here are triumphs to gain!—here are kingdoms to win,
That groan 'neath the bondage of Satan and Sin;
Here dark SUPERSTITION is thronged in the glen,
Where demons lay wait for the spirits of men!"

Then forward! thou servant of Him we adore,
Bear the "tidings of gladness" to AFRICA'S shore!
For HE in whose cause we behold thee depart,
Shall strengthen thy hand and encourage thy heart!
And a heart so devoted—a fervor so true,
No doubts can bewilder—no dangers subdue!
To God we commend thee! and soon may we hail
Our ZION uprear'd on the ruins of Baal!

A True Sketch.

A short winter day was just drawing to a close, as a young and poorly clad girl reached the door of a splendid mansion in Bleecker Street. The servant ushered her into a large and elegant apartment, where sat Mrs. M., the mistress of so much wealth and grandeur, in conversation with a friend. The young girl stood a moment, then courtesied, and presented to Mrs. M. a small bundle, saying, "I hope the work will suit you ma'am."

'The work is well enough,' said Mrs. M. examining it carefully, 'but why did you not bring it before? It is at least a week past the time it was promised. Unless you are more punctual and keep your word better, I cannot let you have any more work.'

It was growing dark, and the room was not yet lighted, so that the tears that gathered in the girl's eyes could not be seen, but her voice was very tremulous as she answered.

'I did not mean to break my word, ma'am; but my mother has been much worse, and my little brother in chopping wood cut his foot; so I have had to'—here her voice became inarticulate, and she hastened out of the room.

'That is always the way with these people,' said Mrs. M.—'a sick mother, or a sick aunt, or a cut foot, anything for an excuse.'

Meantime Mary reached the humble dwelling she called home. Whether her feelings were laboring under the wound so thoughtlessly inflicted, or her mother's illness distressed her, or her heart sickened at the thought of helpless poverty, or it might have been the contrast between the room she had just left, and the room she had just entered, which forced itself upon her: whatever was the cause, contrary to her usual serenity and care to appear as cheerful as possible before her mother, she covered her face with her hands, and leaning upon the rude table before her, burst into a passion of tears. It was but for a moment, for a faint voice from the bed called, 'Mary.' She started from her posture of grief, and went to her mother's bed-side. 'Mary, dear, wipe your eyes and sit down by me here, and read the thirty-fourth Psalm; it will do us both good." Mary reached down from the shelf the well-worn Bible, and seated at the foot of her mother's bed, in a subdued voice read aloud. She had just finished reading the verse, "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all," when a gentle tap was heard at the door. A little girl, some years younger than Mary opened it, and a lady entered.

'Is this where Mary Morris lives?'

Mary started from the bed, 'That is my name ma'am.'

'Ah yes, you are the one I just saw at Mrs. M's. I enquired you out, and am come to see if I can be of any service to you; how is your mother?'

The last tallow candle was dimly burning beside the bed where Mary had been reading. The lady went towards it, and took the hand of the emanciated sufferer.

'Have you any physician?'

'No ma'am. My poor husband's last sickness cost me so much, that I have now nothing left to pay one. I hope I shall get better in a few days, and then all will go on well; but now it is very hard for poor Mary.'

'But you have a high fever and should be attended to; my husband is a physician; he will call and prescribe for you, and here are some provisions for the children, and Mary just open the door, my servant has brought you a wheelbarrow load of wood ready split; give all your attention to your mother and you shall be well provided for.'

Their hearts were too full for expression of thanks, but the lady needed them not, to convince her that there was no luxury like that of doing good. There were tears shed in that humble room that night, but not of bitterness, and there were thanksgivings that would put to shame the feeble gratitude of thousands who are 'increased with goods and have need of nothing.'

N. B. Mrs. M. went that night to witness the performance of a popular tragedy, and was so overcome by the distresses of the hero and heroine, as to be unable to attend to anything else for several days. D. W.

Religious Controversy.

We were comfortably situated in the stage The horses were under way, when a young man continued a conversation which it appeared had broken off at the last stopping place.

"At any rate," said he, "I do not believe the story of Jonah swallowing the whale."

"And what is there so strange in that, young man?" said an elderly man on the opposite seat.

"Strange," said the youth, "it is absurd, astonishing, impossible."

"You speak very confidently, sir; wiser men than you have believed it," continued the deacon, "and indeed why should not that be true as well as any other part of the good book?"

"I never saw it in the good book!" exclaimed the other.

"Then I am sorry to say that you are very ignorant of your Bible, young man, and it seems to me that a person who shows such a lack of religious knowledge ought not to be so confident on such a subject;" and the old gentleman looked at another very sober gentleman who sat opposite to him, as if for his approval.

The other gentleman opened his mouth for the first time, and said, "I perfectly agree with the young man, I do not believe in that story either."

The deacon looked thunderstruck, and stammered out—"But, sir, I thought that you were a member of the church."

"Yes sir, I am, and I believe every thing that is contained in the Bible."

"I beg your pardon, sir, but—"

"And I beg yours, sir, but the young man said he did not believe that Jonah swallowed the whale."

"Jonah swallowed—whale swallowed," said the deacon, bewildered, "Did you not say, young man, that you did not believe the whale swallowed Jonah?"

"Not at all, sir—I said I did not believe that Jonah swallowed the whale."

"Well, well," said the old gentleman, "that alters the case, and I'm sure I did not know what you were talking about."

Here the gentleman opposite took a pinch of snuff, and leisurely observed that such was generally the case with religious controversy; that one party was talking about one thing, and the other party of another. "Therefore," said he in conclusion, "I very seldom engage in religious discussions, and more especially do I avoid them when traveling in a stage coach."

The first disputant looked at the gentleman as if he intended to know him when he saw him again, and the young man went to sleep."—British Churchman.

Individual Effort.

It should be no discouragement to a Christian, that from the peculiar circumstances of his situation, he cannot put forth such an amount of effort as will visibly tell on the interests of Christ's kingdom. He should be solicitious only on one point, that he do what he can and in the spirit of faith. The efficacy of any effort must depend on the divine blessing, and the penny which a poor Christian casts into the treasury of the Lord, may really accomplish more for the enlargement of Christ's kingdom, than the thousands of an ostentatious giver.

God holds the resources of the universe in his hands; he could accomplish all his stupendous purposes without the aid of man, but he has condescended to admit them as co-workers with him and it may easily be seen, that in order to secure his blessing, it is not essential that our contributions should be magnificent, but hearty. Of course this view should not be abused by the niggardly, who give but little, under the plea that the widows' mite is as acceptable as the munificent gifts of the rich, for if if we do not all that we can, we can lay no claim to the widow's praise. We speak only for the encouragement of those who can really, to outward appearance, do very little, and who fear that this little will be of no avail. Such should look fiast to their own hearts, and then doing what they can, should wait confidently for the blessing of God on their work of faith and labor of love. Their effort, however apparently insignificant, will not be in vain in the Lord. The fervent prayer of a poor and obscure Christian may prove a mightier instrument for the promotion of God's glory, than the applauded service of one who occupies a broad space in the public eye. Every disciple of Christ is called to do something, and as he is required to render unto the Lord according to that which he hath, and not according to that which he hath not, no excuse will justify him in remaining idle. Revival in a Bible Class.

In 1841 there was a revival of religion in a small missionary church in Maine, as fruits of which some fifteen or twenty individuals made public profession of their faith in Christ. The revival commenced in a Bible class, taught by the pastor, in connection with the study of Scripture Questions on the Epistle of Paul to the Romans. As the class proceeded to consider the fifth lesson, "God will judge men according to their moral characters, and not by their religious privileges or professions," the pastor felt unusually solemn. Soon a deep solemnity pervaded the class, and the members were so much affected that they were unable to answer the questions. The pastor then closed the book, and began to address them on the scenes of judgment, and the interest of their souls. A revival at once commenced, and every impenitent member of that class of thirty was hopefully converted. The revival extended to the Sabbath school, in which many of the members of the Bible class were teachers. This class, which was held on a week-day evening, spent two years on the Question Book on Romans, holding a meeting every week. And all the members have ever since felt a special interest in that portion of the word of God.

DUTY OF CHRISTIANS TO LABOR FOR THE CONVERSION OF THE JEWS.

The position occupied by the Jew, is in many respects peculiar, and unfavorable to his reception of the Gospel. He stands as it were in the breach between the Pagan and the Christian. On the one hand, he is conscious of possessing the most important truths, especially the great central truth of one self-existing and omnipotent God; and hence he looks with contempt upon the idolatries of paganism, seeing no attraction in any of its sculptured follies. On the other hand, he clings with tenacity to the belief, that his fathers, to whom God had so often revealed himself, would never have rejected, much less crucified, the Messiah whom God had promised. Standing thus, he exults in his superiority over the pagan, and systematically repels the approaches of the Christian. He is, therefore, in a position peculiarly unfavorable to the reception of the Gospel. In view of this, and with a mind terrified at the imprecation of the Jewish rulers, "Let his blood be upon us and upon our children," many a sincere Christian has been led to doubt whether the Gospel is now designed to be the joy of that nation, or at least whether it is to become such through human instrumentality. Of course such a doubt, wherever it is entertained, paralyzes interest and puts an end to effort. But to our mind, the numerous conversions which have already taken place among the Jews, sufficiently refute the notion that we are not to labor for and expect their reception of Christ in the Gospel.

Granting, then, as facts will certainly require us to grant, that the sin of the Jews is not so great as to exclude them from the benefits of the Gospel —and that, in attempting their conversion, man is not presuming to usurp the place of God—let us look for a moment at their claims upon the favorable regard and vigorous exertion of the Christian church.

In doing this, the first ground of claim which would be urged upon us, is derived from their present afflicted and degraded condition. It was a doctrine of our Saviour, that the sick have an especial right to the attention and skill of the physician. If that doctrine is applicable in this case, no other reason need be presented to support the claims of the Jews. In looking at their spiritual condition, we see in it much that is calculated to awaken our sympathy. With the loss of their city and temple, departed many of the comforts and supports of their religion. The life and soul of what belonged exclusively to the Mosaic dispensation, was to be found in the temple services, and those typical sacrifices which were there offered. But when these have ceased, with no new arrangement introduced as to their consummation, or to supply their place, that code of religion which was once instinct with life, becomes a mere dead skeleton. The only food upon which they can now live, is the hope that the Messiah, to whose coming they then looked, will yet appear for their deliverance; and this hope, so long deferred, instead of sustaing their infirmity, must often be the occasion of most discouraging sickness of heart.—A view of their temporal condition shows equally well their necessitous state. Scattered through all nations, like strangers in a strange land, they have for many centuries been a hissing and a proverb, while the very name of a Jew stands connected with the worst species of persecutions, massacres, confiscations, and banishments. The remark is a common one, that 'the recollection of ancient grandeur and glory tends to enhance the sense of present humiliation and distress.' Apply this to the Jews, and the degree of their suffering may be somewhat appreciated. Once they were the aristocracy of Scripture, and stood in the foremost ranks of human exaltation. Now they are bereft of their coronets, and sunk to the very abyss of wretchedness. Once there pertained to them the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises. Now, "the city sits solitary that was full of people! She that was great among the nations, and princess among the provinces, how is she become tributary!" If any thing more than an exhibition of their necessities is requisite to show the claims of the Hebrew nation to have the Gospel preached unto them, we know not whence it can be drawn.

But a question may possibly arise in regard to their claims upon us. To this we may well turn our attention, and see if aside from their necessities we are not debtors to them in a sum which we never have paid. All will be ready to admit, that to the Hebrew nation we are indebted, not only for the embodyment and preservation of the sacred records of the Old Testament, but for those instructive and admonitiory incidents which are presented on every page of their history. They lived and acted under the eye and direction of God himself, and by preserving a faithful record of what transpired in those circumstances, they have given us a living dramatic picture of God's providence for thousands of years. Is it worth nothing to us, that we know how our Father and Judge regarded these different events in their history? And do we owe nothing to those who have, often at the expense of their own exposure, faithfully informed us in regard thereto?—Or, if we look more minutely at the sacred oracles, we shall see somewhat that appeals to our gratitude, and calls for an appropriate expression of that gratitude. Whenever, for instance, the simple and sublime records of Moses fill us with awe, and enhance our reverence for the majesty of God; whenever the sweet Psalmist of Israel awakens the deepest feelings of our souls, and enables us to pour forth the fullness of our hearts; whenever the son of Amoz wafts us to the skies, or opens before us visions of the future; —we must reflect, that Moses, and David, and Isaiah, were Jews, fathers of the present generation, who appeal to us in behalf of their children, now without the consolations of a belief in the anointed of the Lord whom they foresaw.—Or, passing to that crowning glory of God's manifestations of himself to man, inquire who were the medium of that communication—who the privileged ones of that day? Who was the eloquent preacher from the wilderness, that drew all Judea after him? Who was the loving disciple, that taught the luxury of living and laboring for others? Who was the fervid apostle to the Gentiles, that demonstrated the truth of the Gospel, and fixed the anchor of Christian hope within the veil? These all were Jews, and brethren of those whose cause we plead. They were of the seed of Abraham, upon whom the Son of God took hold. They were of the lost sheep of the house of Israel, to whom the angel of the covenant was sent.

But why multiply these proofs of obligation? Every admonition that guards us—every hope that animates us—every promise that sustains us—all that gives joy to this life, and confidence for the next—is closely connected with the history of the Jews. Do not justice and gratitude combine, then, to urge upon the Christian church the obligation to labor for their conversion?

☞ When we published some weeks ago an article concerning the Liberty Party, we had no expectation that we should be called upon to publish a reply. But the following has been sent us; and to carry out our principle of hearing both sides, we give it a place, presuming that there is no shorter way to end the matter.

POSITION OF THE LIBERTY PARTY.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I read with some interest, in a late number of your paper, an article with the above caption. As one deeply sympathizing and heartily cooperating with the Liberty Party in all its noble efforts to effect a great moral and political reform in our country, I cannot refrain from reviewing that article in a few words, awarding to the writers of it the same honesty of purpose in setting forth the sentiments therein contained, as I claim for myself in differing from them. I agree with you, Mr. Editor, that the article in question contains many truths. Cheerfully subscribing to the first four propositions, I must differ with the authors in the conclusion they have arrived at, viz: that the Liberty Party cannot overthrow slavery by concentrating all their efforts upon that one point, but must withdraw a part of their forces and direct them at other points of comparatively insignificant importance, as though slavery was so feeble an enemy as to be overcome by a divided force. The Liberty Party, from the dawn of its existence, has been characterized for its oneness of purpose, its stern adherence to the great and comprehensive principle of universal freedom. Looking upon American slavery as the most outrageous violation of all that freemen hold dear, and the first cause of all our national embarrassment; and believing that the adoption or rejection of the cherished principles and plans of either political party, could not bring permanent prosperity to our country, while this festering cancer was gnawing at its vitals—while this upas, planted by the hands of legislative enactment, and watered by the dews of executive and judicial sanction, was permitted to load the breeze with its fatal effluvia, instilling itself into every department of our body politic, and rendering us a reproach to the civilized world,—the pioneers of the Liberty Party felt called upon by motives noble and holy to sever the ligaments that bound them to those parties, which had so basely betrayed the best interest of the country, and covered the country's worst enemy with the shield of legal sanction. They united to destroy an evil paramount to all others that could afflict the country. Trusting in the God of truth, they reared the platform of universal freedom, broad as the earth, high as the heavens, feeling assured that such an object, predicated on such a foundation, could not fail of success. That object was the extinction of slavery by the power of public opinion and the legitimate exercise of the constitutional powers of the national government. Such is the Liberty Party, and may God grant that such it may ever be. Yet comprehensive as are our principles, there are some amongst us who seem wanting in ability to appreciate them, or consider them too small for the exercise of their powers. They have never experienced the potent effect of properly directed truth, or never been entirely weaned from party associations, and long to return to them. We must have help from others than "Philanthropists and Religionists." The emissaries of the devil must be called to push forward a great moral enterprise for the overthrow of his strongest hold on earth. We must strengthen our host by incorporating into our creed a silly apology for a principle advocated by one of the great parties, thereby drawing recruits from its ranks. We are told that we are to derive reinforcements from a party that "has labored and will continue to labor for the aggrandizement and supremacy of slavery," by adopting certain principles of theirs, which they can as well and with more hope of success advocate in their present connection. It is well known, that a "tariff for revenue" is a hobby which a certain party has rode almost to death. 'Tis vain to hope to draw strength from any but that party by making the tariff question an issue. The whigs claim a tariff for protection, with equal zeal and propriety. Were we to advocate, as is proposed, a tariff for revenue, and thereby gain a few votes from the democratic party, could those of our party who left the whig ranks go with us still? And in appealing to whigs, should we not have one more objection to remove before they would join our ranks, and vise versa? But were we to adopt the proposed policy, are we sure of drawing strength from the democratic party? By no means. To suppose that any considerable portion of that party would come into the measure of abolition, could they do it without a sacrifice of their cherished principle, "a tariff for revenue," evinces an ignorance of that party which is unpardonable, especially in editors of a liberty paper in Michigan. . . . . To suppose, then, that to bring them into the abolition measure, it is only necessary to bring their worn-out scape-goat along with them, is an intolerable absurdity, unworthy of its authors. But admitting the premises, that we might gain numbers by adopting the policy of the other parties, it only shows the depth of degradation into which those parties have fallen. Our party is a party of principle, and if men cannot be won to the support of those principles by an appeal to their sense of right and justice, the party is better off without them. If the one great and grand principle of universal liberty has not enough of inherent virtue to elicit their support, would it gain any thing were they drawn around it by selfish interests, and collateral circumstances. If we gain strength, we must do it by a stern adherence to our one great idea. We have only to convince men of the workings of slavery, and their responsibility, and they will lend their aid. This is and should ever be the paramount object of the Liberty Party. But it will cease to be such, if we admit any of the topics so long and bitterly contended for by the other parties. Let all our help be Lafayettes and De Calbs, who enlist, impelled by a love of liberty and hatred to tyranny.

But it is said that we have, after six years effort, gained only 70,000 votes, and that a million is necessary. That indeed must be a desponding heart, that in view of this result would turn back to Egypt. That the Liberty Party, amid the wild vortex and mad strife of 1844, should muster 70,000 dauntless spirits to bare their bosoms to the most envenomed dart of combined malice and unprecedented abuse, is cheering to every heart that can appreciate the principles of our noble enterprise. We have increased in an unprecedented ratio—and yet it is said we are to be "a mere temporary party, short lived, and few in numbers." Verily false prophets have arisen, who cannot trust the God of truth, but would rear demi-gods as help-meets.

I am assured that the authors of the article under consideration will find but few followers, and I trust they may be able to comprehend the grandeur of the one idea upon which the Liberty Party is predicated, and return to its support, and labor to convince men that slavery has brought our country so near the verge of ruin that to waste their energies to build up and tear down tariffs and banks is suicide, is madness. What would we think of a hunter who should raise his gun to shoot the sporting squirrel, when a huge bear was close upon him with extended jaws to devour him. A huge hydra has long been stalking with brazen-faced impunity over our land, crushing beneath his polluted feet the broken hearts and ruined hopes of expiring millions—virtue, religion, and morality, expire at the touch of his pestilential breath, while he shouts a malignant triumph over an expiring nation's departing glory. Philanthropists, religionists, moralists, and politicians, in the name of God and humanity, we ask your aid to destroy this monster, and save our country from the threatened judgments of an offended God. Abandon the strife for party ascendancy, for dollars and cents, and contend for the great principle of universal liberty. When this is secured, then will we unite and secure the pecuniary interests of the country. Till then, we cannot. Do not hastily commit yourselves against us; but "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good."

DARWIN E. MAXSON.

Westerly, R. I., April 1846.

SABBATH-KEEPERS AND THE LEGISLATURE OF PENNSYLVANIA.—Some weeks ago we published an appeal to the Legislature of Pennsylvania in favor of allowing such citizens as conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath to pursue their ordinary callings on the first day. We venture to say, that not a single person who read that appeal candidly, could in good faith deny the justice and safety of granting the object desired. Yet, strange as it may appear, the Legislature has refused to consider and act upon the subject. On Tuesday last, Mr. Galloway called up the bill, when it was decided, by a vote of 45 to 29, not to entertain it. The principal reasons given for not acting upon the subject heretofore are, the amount of business on hand, and the uncertainty of members respecting the wishes of their constituents. But persons who have attended at Harrisburg, think that the true reason is a fear to take a stand in opposition to public opinion, however unjust such public opinion may be.

PERSECUTION AT CONSTANTINOPLE.—The Alliance and Visitor says that the latest accounts from Constantinople bring the intelligence that persecution against the evangelical Armenians has broken out afresh, and with violence. The Patriarch's wrath, which began with excommunicating an evangelical priest, has been exercised in driving from their houses, and their daily means of support, some hundred or more devout and pious Armenians. They have generally taken joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and are cheerful and happy under their sufferings.

THE DERUYTER CHURCH.—There has been a very desirable improvement in the Seventh-day Baptist Church in DeRuyter for a few months past. An increase in interest has been manifest for more than a year past, in which many of our members have shared; and we have been confidently looking for a better state of things. We continued meetings every evening, after the close of our Quarterly Meeting in February, for about a month. There have been some five or six conversions, and two conversions to the Sabbath—one of them a member of twenty years' standing in the Baptist Church in this place. I have never known the spiritual condition of this church so good as at present. J. B.

THE SABBATH IN THE N. Y. LEGISLATURE.

To the Central Association, and all others interested:

DEAR BRETHREN,—I have been waiting the action of the Senate of this State, to announce to you the fate of the Bill for our protection on the Sabbath. I have just received news from Albany, that the Bill was lost in the Senate. The Bill that passed nem. con. in the Assembly, was referred in the Senate to the Judiciary Committee. That Committee made an adverse report, which was agreed to in the Senate. I am the more surprised at this, from the fact that some of the Senators expressed themselves favorable to the Bill, and none to my knowledge against it, while I was in Albany. In addition to this, some half dozen of the members agreed to use their influence to secure its passage. I am unable to account for the action of the Senate, after all the encouragement I received while there. We are now thrown back on the law of 1839. This failure has perhaps occurred in the most favorable time for us. We may possibly, by proper action, secure all that we wish in the amendment of the Constitution this summer. If so, we shall feel ourselves safer under the protection of organic than statute law.

It is very desirable, that the delegates to the several associations come prepared to act with reference to this matter. This defeat should only increase our activity. And if we can not receive protection in the observance of the Sabbath because we are so few, we must make the truth of the Bible Sabbath ring in every village and hamlet, in every city and town, throughout the State.

I shall make a full report to the Central Association of my action under their appointment, and of all matters of interest connected with the action that has been taken on the subject.

Respectfully, JAMES BAILEY.

DR. WATTS.—An interesting reminiscence of Dr. Watts is going the rounds, quoted from the London Baptist Reporter for January, 1846. It is to the effect that when Dr. Gibbons visited him in his last illness, he said: "Dr. Gibbons, I have been lately reviewing our controversy with the Baptists, and my conviction is, that they have the best of the argument, and I die a decided Baptist."

MARTIN LUTHER.—It is said that the 300th anniversary of Luther's death, which fell on the 18th inst., was to be celebrated with the greatest pomp in all the Lutheran Churches of Prussia. In that of the Royal Palace of Wirtemburg, in which repose the mortal remains of Luther and Melancthon, 400 artists and delettanti were to perform the Messiah, and Luther's celebrated hymn, "Ein Festerurgist unser Gott," composed by himself.

CURIOUS CUSTOMS.—It is a custom among the Jews, during a thunder storm, to open their doors and windows, because it is in a storm that they expect the coming of the Messiah. The Catholics of Suabia and other districts of Germany, toll the bells of their churches to deprecate the effects of lightning, and in Senegal there is a tribe who sit at the door of their huts, and take unwearied delight in seeing "the spirit of the world" dart along their plains and mountains of sand.

SINGULAR.—A letter from Smyrna, dated March 7, 1846, gives an account of a very singular circumstance which occurred in the Pachalic of Anatolia, in Asia Minor. The people were starving in that region for want of food, when Divine Providence interposed for their preservation. A glutinous substance, or manna, of which they make bread, has fallen in large quantities, which is gathered and sold in the public markets at 17s. per quarter.

RELICS.—The Montreal Register says that the King of Prussia has purchased the wine-vase and cup with which Luther used to administer the sacrament; and which are described as of silver, gilt in the inside. The cup resembles an ordinary goblet, but inclining in its circle to the oval; the vase has the form of a jug, is covered with subjects representing the Passion, and is said to be of admirable workmanship. From Berlin, it is stated, that the house of the celebrated Jewish philosopher, Mendelssohn, has been purchased by the Jewish commune of that city, at a cost of $35,000, for conversion into a free school for the children of the Jewish poor.

BAPTIST ANNIVERSARIES.—Official notice has been published of the time and place of meeting of the following societies:—American Baptist Home Mission Society, in the First Baptist Church, Brooklyn, Wednesday, May 13. American and Foreign Bible Society, First Baptist Church, New York, Thursday evening, May 14 —sermon by Richard Fuller, of S. C. American Baptist Society for Evangelizing the Jews, First Baptist Church, New York, Friday evening, May 15. Baptist General Convention, Peirrepont-st., Brooklyn, Tuesday, May 19. First meeting of the American Baptist Missionary Union, at the same place, Thursday, May 21.

TROUBLE.—The Evangelical Alliance and World's Convention is to meet in London in August next. Some of the newspapers are beginning to discuss the probabilities of trouble from an attempt to combine such a heterogeneous assemblage. Indeed, trouble has commenced already. At a recent meeting in Birmingham, Eng., of a large number of influential supporters of the movement, it was resolved, after much debate, that no slaveholders should be invited to attend the Convention. Of course there is more trouble ahead.

"STARVING IRELAND."—Under this heading, the Alliance and Visitor says that the contribution of Ireland for the Propaganda, for the month of December last, was £810 13s. 6d. This is at the rate of £10,000 per year, and considering the potatoe panic and outcry of famine, it is a tolerable sum wrung, at this severe season, from the wretched population of Ireland, for promoting Popery in England.

CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE.—The May number of this paper commences a new volume. It is a work of great value, occupying a place between the heavy Quarterly Reviews and the trashy monthly or weekly magazines. Its embellishments are of a high order, and its reading matter is well adapted to enlighten the understanding and purify the heart. Published by D. Mead, 141 Nassau-st.

DEAR READING.—The first newspaper published in the State Virginia was printed at Williamsburgh, the seat of Government, 1780. The terms were conspicuously placed at the head of the paper, and ran thus:—

"All persons may be supplied with this paper at Fifty Dollars a year, and have advertisements (of a moderate length) inserted for ten dollars the first week, and seven dollars for each week after."

The paper was issued once a week, and of course its cost to subscribers was about ninety-six cents per number. What would be said of such a price in these days of cheap literature?

THE SEASON IN ENGLAND.—Rev. Wm. Dean, the Baptist Missionary from China, left Boston for Liverpool on the 1st of March. In a letter to the Editor of the N. Y. Recorder, dated London, March 16, he says:—

"A fortnight ago, and I saw New England in the gloomy habiliments of winter; now I look upon Old England in the gay costume of summer. Then I was riding over the snow banks of Boston, as a ship bounds upon the ocean's waves; now I have just lighted after a flight from Liverpool to London, over the green fields of this Island world. England has justly been called a garden; as such she is putting on her brightest colors, and appears in all the promise of spring. The fruit trees are in bloom, and the fields are covered with flowers. The rich meadows are overspread with beautiful green grass, and the surrounding hedges are covering themselves with vernal leaves. The winter here has been unusually mild, and the spring presents a lovely picture, especially to the eye so recently accustomed to look upon leafless trees and banks of snow."

SUNDAY IN NEW-ORLEANS.—The following announcements of Sunday sports are taken from a New-Orleans paper of the 16th ult. They give some idea of the estimation in which Sunday is held in that city:—

To-night, at the Circus of Hows & Mabie, there will be some extra doings. Horsemanship excelling any thing ever performed by an Arab—gymnastic feats, such as were never seen in the arena of ancient Rome—and conundrums by the clown, that will throw Billy Black into the shade.

To-night, the first appearance of Mary Duff, and numerous other attractions.

A trotting match will come off at 3 o'clock today, on the Metairie Course. It is to be for $100 a side—2 mile heats in harness. The nags are William Mish's spotted horse Arab, and Harry Richards's bay horse Thayer.

This morning, the Native American Artillery, commanded by Capt. Forne, will parade at nine o'clock, and repair to the plains at Bayou St. John for drill and target practice.

TEMPERANCE INCIDENT.—A meeting of the Washingtonian Temperance Society was recently held in Baltimore, at which Mr. Mitchell, one of the six founders, narrated the origin of the Society. Several other gentlemen spoke, among whom was a Mr. Casey. The Baltimore Visitor says:—

"The last named gentleman made emphatically a 'telling speech,' as the reader will understand when informed that it brought to the pledge, in humble contrition, it is hoped, his own son, whom intemperance had separated from an affectionate and confiding wife within the first year after marriage. Oh! it was a blessed sight to see that 'prodigal son' weeping in the arms of his overjoyed father, and one which left scarcely a dry cheek in the assemblage. Would that every enemy of the temperance movement—aye, and every lethargic friend thereof, could have witnessed it."

BENEVOLENCE.—The late David Tichenor, of Newark, N. J., has left in his will to the Presbyterian Church in Newark and the Female Charitable Society of that place, each $500; the American Home Missionary Society, American Board of Foreign Missions, and the American Colonization Society, each $1000, and after providing for relatives, gives the residue of his estate (amount not stated) one half to the Treasurer of the city of Newark for the education and support of orphan children, and the other half to the American Bible Society. Mr. Tichenor was a bachelor, and died at a very advanced age.

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION IN CHINA.—Doubts having been expressed whether the Chinese edict of religious toleration, published some months since, was designed to include Protestants as well as Catholics, the British Plenipotentiary in China recently addressed a note to Keying, the High Imperial Commissioner, soliciting information on this point, to which he received a reply showing that no distinction is to be made between Protestants and Catholics.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The principal thing done last week was to agree upon the form of the "Notice" in regard to Oregon. This was done by the appointment of a committee from the House to meet a committee from the Senate, and confer upon the subject. They agreed to the form of a Joint Resolution, which was finally approved by both Houses. It is substantially that passed by the Senate, and published in our last. Pacific in its character, and requiring negotiation, there is but little probability that the Oregon question will lead to war. Besides this business, the House had under consideration the bill relative to the Smithsonian bequest, and also the bill making appropriations for the Post Office Department. In the Senate, bills were reported and twice read, for the establishment of Branch Mints at New York and Charleston.

SIX DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Steam-ship Great Western reached New York on Tuesday at 1 o'clock P. M. Her news is six days later, but is of little importance. Parliament had adjourned for the Easter holidays, and there had consequently been no discussion of the Oregon Question. The tone of the press in regard to Oregon is decidedly more pacific. The cotton market had improved since the sailing of the Caledonia. Iron was on the decline. The Corn Law was to come up immediately after the meeting of Parliament.

War in the 19th Century.—The opinion is often expressed, that the day of wholesale butcheries according to the laws of war, is past. But news from India, received by the last steamer, shows that such an opinion is erroneous. Two most bloody battles have recently been fought in India between the British and Sikh armies, of which the European Times gives the following account. Let those who think war is a trifling evil, read and ponder:—

"The first battle was under the command of Sir H. Smith, and the latter Sir Hugh Gough, which was, perhaps, one of the most bloody on record. In Sir H. Smith's battle, the whole army of the enemy has been driven headlong over the difficult ford of a broad river; his camp, cannon (56 pieces), baggage, stores of ammunition and of grain—his all, in fact, wrested from him by the repeated charges of cavalry and infantry; and in that of Sir Hugh Gough's, the Sikhs lost 12,000 men and 65 pieces of artillery. The English had 300 men killed, 13 of whom were officers, 2,500 wounded, of whom 101 were officers. The action commenced in the morning, and the work of destruction had closed by 11 o'clock in the forenoon. Sir Hugh Gough's account of this battle proves it to have been, while it lasted, one of the most terrific on record. Unlike the able maneuvering of Sir H. Smith, this affair seems to have owed its success to the daring intrepidity of our men, who stormed the enemy's entrenchments, bayonet in hand, defended as they were, by 30,000 Sihks and 70 pieces of artillery. The slaughter was immense, for our troops braved the enemy's fire by reserving their shot until they got within his entrenchments. The action terminated in the complete route of the enemy, the capture of his guns, and the loss of his camp and baggage. An awful sacrifice of life took place on the Sutlej, in attempting to cross which, our troops mowed down thousands of the flying foe, and those who escaped the fire were drowned in the stream. This victory has put the finishing stroke to the war. It has brought the Sikhs to their knees—and they are now humble suppliants for mercy and forbearance. They have agreed to pay a million and a half sterling, in the course of four years, toward the expenses of the war, the payment to be enforced by the occupation of Lahore."

Straw Braiding Machine.—The following description of a machine invented by Mr. Elisha Fitzgerald for braiding tuscan straw, we copy from the N. Y. Tribune:—

"For this machine the straw is prepared by simply cutting the requisite length and steeping in water. It is then put in a proper box or holder, perhaps two hundred straws at once, and the machine, requiring only a very slight power from water, steam or hand, does the rest. Each straw is picked up separately when wanted, and carried to the right place; two strands are carried over and packed down at each revolution of the machine; and whenever the small, soft portion of the straw is braided in, the machine cuts it off and goes after another. Should it not find one where it has a right to expect it, or should an unfit one be presented, it stops working! The attendant then puts the right sort of a straw where one should be, and off she starts again! This putting in a straw when one happens to break or miss, (which is rarely,) and the feeding with straw by the handfull, are all the work required of the attendant, who may thus attend twelve to twenty machines, each of which is braiding faster and far better than could possibly be done by hand. It is little to say that this invention must lessen the cost of braiding fine straw nine-tenths, besides transferring to this country a branch of industry for which we now pay Europe millions per annum. The machine is of moderate size, requiring perhaps three feet square of room, and is built at a cost of about $300 for each. We hear that a company has purchased the patent, and is now busily constructing machines to bring it into extensive use. The straw also, which has hitherto been wholly imported, even when the braiding was done here, will now be grown on our own soil, giving a farther diversity to agricultural productions.

Manufacture of Straw.—The extent of the Straw manufacture in this country is almost incredible. The wheat or rye from which the straw is used, is cut when green, and bleached either by the sun or some chemical process. In New-England straw plaiting and braiding is carried on to a great extent, Massachusetts alone employing upwards of 12,000 females in the business. The small town of Foxborough, in Norfolk County, with scarce two thousand inhabitants, employs fourteen hundred and twenty-eight persons in the straw business, and manufactures annually 266,260 bonnets, valued at $320,929. A snug little sum this for one small country town to receive for straw manufacture only.

The Magnetic Telegraph.—A letter dated Utica, N. Y., April 20, says:—"A new experiment has just been tried at the Telegraph office here. It has been a matter of curiosity as to how the Telegraph would communicate intelligence at different points of the line, when it gets in operation from Albany to Buffalo. The thing has been tried this forenoon by placing two machines a short distance apart, both connecting with the Albany wires, and the intelligence communicated was imprinted with equal distinctness on both. This experiment, therefore, settles all doubts upon the subject, and establishes the fact that intelligence may be communicated at as many points as is desired, at the same moment, merely by placing a battery at the several places. So then the news may be jotted down here, at Syracuse, Auburn, Rochester, &c. the same instant, without disconnecting the wire."

Earthquake in the West Indies.—By way of Havana we have received advices from the town of Cuba. On the 22d ultimo. at 7 1-2 in the morning, after a calm sultry night, low rumbling sounds were heard. Suddenly the ground shook violently, causing the greatest consternation. The people rushed into the street for safety. The first shock lasted one or two minutes, and after a lapse of five minutes, the ground was again violently shaken. It was a solemn moment; in every direction the frighted inhabitants might be seen on their knees, calling on God to save them, expecting every moment to be swallowed up. Several lighter shocks were felt during the forenoon, but it is believed that no lives were lost. Several buildings were thrown down, and very many cracked. In the evening mass was said in all the churches for their deliverence from death.

The "Camp of Israel."—The Nauvoo (Ill.) Eagle, April 16, says, This is the 'title and address' which has been adopted by the company of Mormons now on their way Westward.

A mail carrier arrived here on Monday last from the Camp, and reported the pioneer party or head Column, as having passed the tributaries of the Chariton river, over 150 miles distant. By this time they are probably on the banks of the Missouri.

Thus far, every thing has gone favorably, with the exception of the breaking down of a few overladen wagons.

If they ever reach California, their dependence must be partly upon slow traveling and partly upon miracle—but chiefly upon the latter.

It is the intention of at least some of the companies that leave this spring, to halt in the valley of the Sweetwater River, and put in a crop for the subsistence of themselves and others who may follow.

Numbers are now on their way from the Eastern States to join the expedition.

Threshing Machine.—Mr. R. K. Tuttle, of Morristown, N. J., has invented a Threshing Machine which, according to the Jerseyman, would do credit to the genius of any Yankee. It is driven by a crank, which can be turned with greater ease than a common fanning mill. Three hands only are required to tend it—one man moves it with less exertion than threshing with a flail—one feeds it, and the other rakes and binds the straw, and heaps the grain. Three bushels of wheat or rye, or six bushels of oats, can be threshed in an hour. The straw is cleaner and straighter, and less broken than when threshed with a flail.

New Bell Arrangement.—We learn from the Rochester American, that an instrument has recently been invented, which is a great improvement upon the common arrangement of house bells. It consists of a face, plate, dial, and case, similar to a neat parlor clock, within which is a simple and durable machinery connecting with a bell. Whenever from any room the bell is drawn, a stroke of the bell gives instant warning, and the index immediately turns to the number on the face plate corresponding with that of the room from which the call proceeds, and there remains fixed until readjusted.

Chances of Marriage for Females.—The following curious statement, by a Dr. Granville, is taken from an English paper. It is drawn from the registered cases of 876 women, and is derived from their answer to the age at which they respectively married. Of 876 females, there married, Silent but Eloquent.—In the dreadful earthquake which destroyed the city of Caraccas, in 1812, with forty thousand inhabitants, the clock of the cathedral was stopped, it is supposed, by the first shock. The tower in which the dials are placed, one fronting each quarter of the heavens, remained standing; although the clock has been repaired and set going again, one of these dials and its hands have never been disturbed. They still point to the hour and minute which heralded so many souls, without a single moment's warning, into eternity.

Origin of Newspapers.—Mankind are indebted to the wisdom of Queen Elizabeth and the prudence of Burleigh for the first printed newspaper. It was entitled the English Mercurie, and was, by authority, "imprinted at London by her Highness's printer, 1588." The earliest number, preserved in the British Museum Library, dated July 23, in that year, contains the usual intelligence, given after the fashion of the London Gazette of the present day.

Mechanics.—An able writer pays the following just tribute to the mechanics of this country:—"They are the palace builders of the world; not a stick is hewn, not a stone is shaped, in all the lordly dwellings of the rich, that does not owe its fitness to the mechanic's skill; the towering spires that raise their giddy height among the clouds, depend upon the mechanic's art and strength for their symmetry, beauty, and fair proportion; there is no article of comfort or pleasure but what bears the impress of their handywork. How exalted is their calling—how sublime is their vocation! Who dare to sneer at such a fraternity of honorable men—who dares to cast odium upon such a patriotic race? Their path is one of true glory, and it is their own fault if it does not lead them to the highest posts of honor and renown."

American Towns.—A writer on the vast multiplication of European and classic names for towns in the United States, remarks that in all Europe, there is bnt one London, whilst in this country we have five Londons, one New London, and seven Londonderrys. We have six towns called Paris, twenty-one Richmonds, sixteen Bedfords, nine Brightons, nine Chathams, eleven Burlingtons, sixteen Delawares, fourteen Oxfords, fourteen Somersets, nine Cambridges, twenty-five Yorks, and other English names in proportion. We have three Dresdens, fourteen Berlins, twenty Hanovers, and four Viennas. All the cities of the East are multiplied a great many times, with the exception of Constantinople, in place of which we have Constantine. There are one hundred and eighteen towns and counties in the United States called Washington; there are ninety-one Jacksons, sixty-nine Jeffersons, fifty-eight Monroes, fifty Madisons, thirty-two Harrisons, nineteen Adamses, sixteen Van Burens, twenty-one Clays, three Websters, and but one Tyler. Of Bentons there are fourteen, Franklins eighty-three, and Lafayettes thirty-four. The popularity of an individual can hardly be inferred from the number of times his name occurs on the map. Clinton is multiplied twenty-seven times, Decatur nine times, and Perry one. The national habit of imitation is very strongly shown in our names. There are very few that occur but once, and these are very peculiar. Small Pox, for instance, a town in Joe Davies county, Illinois, stands alone yet, or did when the census was taken; so does the town of Jim Henry, Miller county, Missouri; but they will, doubtless be imitated before long. [Morning Telegraph.

The Oldest Bible.—Mr. Joseph J. Mickley, of Philadelphia—who has many rare old books—owns a German Bible, that was printed at Nuremberg, by John Sensenschmidt and Andrew Frissner, in 1475. The book is a splendid folio, once owned by the Duke of Sussex. It is a perfect copy, beautifully printed, with rich illuminations, wrought with the pen and brush, and although but thirty-five years after the discovery of printing, is the fourth edition.

SUMMARY.

As a party of young ladies were taking a walk for the purpose of viewing the Falls, near Watertown, one of their number, named Frances Reed, an adopted daughter of Mr. Peter Howk, of that town, having ventured too near the edge, became dizzy, it is supposed, and falling over the steep embankment, was instantly hurried away by the current and drowned. The body had not been recovered at the last accounts.

The Packet Ship Henry Clay has been undergoing repairs. They will be completed this week, when she will be put afloat again in as good condition as she ever was.

The Oregon, it is now stated, will be afloat in a fortnight, and her repairs will not cost over five or six thousand dollars.

The largest mail ever received at the Boston Post Office, was brought there from the Caledonia, at half past one, P. M., consisting of 113 bags of letters and papers. It was important to forward the letters and papers for the South by the steamboat mail, which closes at 4 P. M. The clerks went at it, and before half past four o'clock, the mail for the South was on its way to New-York! In less than three hours, a mail, containing over 35,000 letters, was dispatched by the clerks of the Boston Post Office.

A man painted black, and otherwise disguised, attempted to rob a woman residing near Beallsville, Monroe County, Ohio. She had sold a horse for $75, which fact the villain knew. He demanded the whole amount. She gave him some bank notes, and desired that he would count them. As he stooped to do so, she struck him over the head with a heavy poker, and then alarmed the neighborhood. In a few minutes the man was found dead. So says the Belmont Chronicle.

William Cobbett, a son of the celebrated political writer of the same name, has been many years in the Queen's Prison for contempt of the Court of Chancery. This contempt consisted in his inability to defray the costs and fees in a trial had against him, which inability is called a refusal, and construed to mean a contempt.

It appears by papers found on board the slavers, that the slaves cost on the Coast $15 or $20 each, and will sell in any part of Brazil for $300. If the Pons had reached her destination in safety, she would have cleared about $250,000. If the Panther had been successful, she would have made $350,000 above all expenses.

John McGonegal, Esq. Supervisor of Irondequoit, a few days since, noticed a dog burying something in the earth, when on examination he found he had completely covered up a lamb several weeks old without inflicting any other injury upon it. As Mr. McGonegal "unearthed" it, immediately the little fellow scampered off in haste to join his late comrades. This is the "second offence" of this kind which said dog has committed this Spring.

George Kearn, an old grey-haired Christian, a local preacher in the Methodist denomination, (not a seceder,) has been imprisoned in Tazewell County, on the charge of feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and giving aid to the hunted fugitive! He is a resident of Woodford County, but as there is no jail there, he is confined at Tremont. How long shall wicked men, under the sanction of the law, be permitted to insult God, and mock his mercy and loving kindness.

At a recent township election in Elyria, Ohio, some sixty votes were cast of the following sort: "No connection with a pro-slavery Government"—"Uncompromising hostility to Slavery." The Sentinel says, "this number included all those persons who have formerly composed the third party of this township."

The ship Pacific arrived at New-Orleans, from New-York, in eight days and sixteen hours, which is the quickest passage on record.

A terrible accident occurred in the Brooklyn Navy Yard on Tuesday afternoon, April 21, by the falling of a "spile driver" by which three men were killed, one instantly, and the other two died soon after.

The Legislature of this State has agreed to adjourn sine die on the 13th of May.

The fare to Albany in the elegant North River Steamers has been reduced to 25 cents.

The Mississippi valley is likely to supply the world with pig lead. The whole amount to be brought to market this year will probably exceed seventy million pounds.

The Art Union says, that although almost surpassing belief, casts have actually been made from the daguerreotype plates; a mould has been obtained in the usual manner, impressions are obtained from the mould by the electric process. This is among the most startling facts of the age. We have seen several beautiful examples produced by Dr. Paterson, of Glasgow, on whom the honor of the discovery rests.

A mine of Cannal Coal has been opened in Calloway County, about 150 miles from St. Louis, wnich is said to be inexhaustible.

Last week a man on Federal Hill, R. I., while drawing water from a well 70 feet deep, accidentally fell in head-foremost to the bottom, were there was about four feet of water. A rope was lowered down to him, and he fastened it around himself and was drawn up to within ten feet of the top, when the rope slipped and he fell again to the bottom, about 60 feet. A person present went down and succeeded in getting him out. He had received but little injury, to the astonishment of all present.

The rum dealers, says the Worcester (Mass.) Transcript, have one good customer left. The Government, we perceive, has advertised for sixty thousand gallons! for the navy alone.

A breach of promise case has recently been tried at Lowell, and the injured lady received $3500 damages. Both parties were young and respectable, and belonged to West-Cambridge.

The departure of another of the old Jersey Blues, is announced in the death of Leonard Fisher, of Gloucester Co., aged 90. He was with Washington at Trenton, and bore a part in most of the prominent engagements of the Revolution. Just as we concluded this note, our attention is arrested by the death of still another of the old veterans of the Jersey line—Jacob Johnson, sen'r, of Hunterdon Co., who died at the age of 93, leaving a widow one year older. The venerable old couple have lived together in love more than 70 years. He has been a ruling elder in the Bethlehem Presbyterian church nearly ever since the Revolution.

As one of the Roxbury omnibuses, fully loaded with passengers, was coming over the Neck on Tuesday afternoon, a young man jumped in, and after deliberately collecting all the fares, jumped out again. To the astonishment of the poor passengers, on arriving at the head of State-st., they were informed by the driver that the gentlemanly collector had nothing to do with the concern, and that his collections were made entirely on his private account.

Bonaparte's house, at Longwood, St. Helena, is now a barn—the room he died in is a stable, and where the imperial corpse laid in state may be found a machine for grinding corn.

The Montgomery (Ala.) Journal says, that Mr. E. A. Holt, a practical planter of Montgomery County, has presented us a stalk of rye measuring eight feet in length, while one of its joints measured twenty-four inches. The stalk was cut on the 28th ult. The editor measured it himself and seems to think it was rather a tall specimen of what Alabama prairies could do.

The ship Henry Clay was brought up to the city on Tuesday of last week, and is now at the Sectional Dock. She does not appear to be at all strained—not a seam opened nor a link broken—although she has been twenty days on the beach, which is an additional proof of the superior manner in which our New York ships are built.

An idea of the value of some business locations in St. Louis may be inferred from the fact that lots in that city was leased a few days since for a term of years at $33 per foot per annum. Several other lots in the same square are under lease for $21 per foot per annum.

MARRIED,

In Grafton, N. Y., on the 16th inst., by Rev. Azor Estee, Mr. Daniel H. Maxson, of Petersburgh, to Miss Olive West, of the former place.

DIED,

In Petersburgh, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., on the 11th inst., Stephen Potter, Esq., in the 88th year of his age. Brother Potter was born in Richmond, in the State of Rhode Island. In his youth he was hopefully converted, and became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, then under the pastoral care of Eld. John Burdick. In 1787, he removed with his family into the town of Petersburgh, N. Y., which at that time was an unsettled wilderness, and in which he passed the remainder of his life. After his removal to this country he became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Berlin, where he continued his membership until the Petersburgh church was organized. He assisted in the formation of this church, and continued a member of it until by death his standing was transfered, as we trust, to the church triumphant. He was a useful and valuable member in the church, and one who accustomed himself to acts of hospitality and to the entertainment of strangers. He filled the office of Justice of the Peace for many years, and other civil and military posts, until released from them on account of the increase of years and infirmities.

Brother P. has left an aged widow, and a numerous posterity to mourn their loss. Among the latter, there still survive ten children, all of whom, except a widowed daughter, have removed to distant parts of the country. He has left sixty grand-children, sixty-one great grand-children, and one of a succeeding generation.

His funeral discourse was preached by Eld. William Satterlee, of Berlin, from Isaiah 42: 16—"I will bring the blind by a way that they know not," &c. This discourse was pronounced with firmness and energy, and was well calculated to produce a happy influence upon the large congregation which attended, and to comfort the aged and desolate widow and relations present.

W. B. Maxson.

In Berlin, on the 13th inst., of measles, Mrs. Elizabeth Hendrick, aged 80 years.

NOTICE.

There will be a Quarterly Meeting held with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Truxton, N. Y., commencing on the sixth day of the week, before the the last Sabbath in May.

JAMES BAILEY.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Eleventh Anniversary of the Central Association will be held with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Scott, Cortland Co., N. Y., commencing on the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in June, (June 5,) at 10½ o'clock A. M. Introductory discourse by Eld. C. M. Lewis; James Bailey, alternate.

JAMES BAILEY, Rec. Secretary.

EASTERN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.

The Tenth Anniversary of the Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association will be held with the Sabbath-keeping Church at Marlborough, West New Jersey, on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in the fifth month, (23d of May,) at ten o'clock. A. M. The Introductory Discourse will be preached by Eld. Lucius Crandall; Eld. A. B. Burdick, alternate.

☞ As the Secretaries have had to pay $10, the past two years, for printing the Minutes, above the amount appropriated, it is suggested that the several churches in the Association appropriate to the Treasury of the Association $3 for every 100 members in their respective churches, from which fund the Treasurer shall pay their actual cost.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.

Board of Instruction.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
Ira Sayles, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
Gurdon Evans, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. Hartshorn, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. Stillman, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. Maxson, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. Kenyon, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

The Teachers' Classes, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

The Academic Year for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

Expenses.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE WAY TO HEAVEN.

Which is the way to heaven?
Dear mother, tell,
Where children, all forgiven,
In glory dwell.
Tell me, that I may run therein,
That I a glorious crown may win,
Tell me, dear mother, tell.

Is that the glorious way?
Kind mother, tell—
Marked on that solemn day
The chariot fell.
O tell me, and let me fly away
As Elijah, in chariot bright as day,
Mother, kind mother, tell.

Or is that the gloomy road,
Dear mother, tell:
Which the glorious martyrs trode,
Defying hell!
Tell me, and e'en the hottest flame
Shall prove my love for Jesus' name,
Tell me, dear mother, tell.

ANSWER.

T'is not as Elijah rode,
In chariot bright;
Although he has reached the abode
Of pure delight.
Nor are we called to tread the road,
Bearing the stains of martyr's blood,
To heaven, so pure, so bright.

Believe, believe, dear child,
In God's dear Son;
Hark! Jesus, meek and mild,
Bids children come.
You'll find in him the blessed way
That leads to everlasting day—
To heaven, to heaven, our home.

THE BIBLE.

Within this blessed book divine,
What light and truth and glory shine!
Here may the erring find their way,
The needy drive their wants away.

Happy the child that loves to read,
And on these mental treasures feed,
But good that he had never been born
Who reads to doubt, reject and scorn.

Temperance Address to Children.

We love to talk to children and try to help them to be happy. There may be pleasure in making and seeing others miserable, but there can be no real happiness or enjoyment in it. The times in which we live, present many inducements to all, but especially to the young to practice self-denial, and thereby be happier themselves and also be the means of greater good to others.

The love of wine, beer, and cider, of rum, brandy, gin, and whiskey, is an acquired love. The alcohol, or principle in these liquors which makes people drink them, is a poison, and it is never pleasant to the human taste or stomach, until custom has made it so. When the appetite or love of any of these drinks is formed it is very difficult, and often impossible to conquer it. There are more than ten thousand drunkards in the United States under fifteen years old. Probably one-half of the five hundred thousand drunkards in our country, formed the appetite for these poisons before the age of fifteen.

The wine-glass, or beer-cup, or cider-mug, or some other form of presenting alcoholic poison, has been so common in almost all the families of our land, that childhood and youth have early and frequently been led astray by the mistaken, but well-meant influence of parental, or family precept and example. But now every body knows that alcohol, in any form, for persons in health, is always injurious to our bodies, our minds, our morals and our souls. Those of our countrymen who do not know these things, have kept themselves in ignorance, by the habitual use of these poisons, or by criminal inattention to this important subject.

The wisest of men has said, by the direction of our Heavenly Father—"Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging—look upon wine when it is red, when it giveth its color to the cup, when it moveth itself aright; at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." This is said of intoxicating or alcoholic wine or liquor. The juice of the grape, "the fruit of the vine," or unfermented wine, is nutritious, healthy, and useful, and like bread, milk and honey, is a blessing.

Now we wish kindly and affectionately to say to you, because we love the youth of our country, that any intoxicating liquor if drank by sober and respectable people, intemperance, with all its untold evils and horrors, cannot be banished from our land and world. For it has been the moderate use of these drinks, by the sober and respectable, which has formed and kept up the fashion, and really made all the drunkards. We fear that many who now drink their wine and other alcoholic liquors moderately, will soon become drunkards, and that very many who are already such, will refuse to adopt the only plan that can save them, total abstinence, and will die enemies to God and man, go into a drunkard's grave and the drunkard's eternity. But to the YOUTH, who have not yet formed the "evil appetite," and are not so corrupted by fashion, as many of their seniors, do the friends of our country and humanity look, to prevent any more drunkards being formed among them, and thus, in the next generation, to banish this woful blight and curse from among men.

Will you do it sons and daughters of America? You can if you will. The number of days, and the amount of happiness you will thus add to your own existence, cannot be counted up in time, while your increased usefulness and comfort to others, will be greatly beyond your present power to tell.

Youth's Temperance Associations, on the only safe plan, are now forming in many of our cities, towns, and villages; in the higher, district and Sabbath schools, and thus inviting to cast around you by uniting with these institutions, or forming them yourselves, "a sure defence from drunkenness." Fear not the sneer of the "wine-bibber," or lover of "strong drink." Put on "moral courage," imitate the self-denying and virtuous, and you will thereby procure self-respect, the esteem of the wise and good, and the approbation of our Father in heaven.

The Contrast.

It was a cold morning. Snow was on the ground, and many sleighs were gliding rapidly over its crusted surface. A dashing equipage was driven to the centre of a commercial square, and its thickly cloaked occupant stepped upon the pavement. A poor woman with a shivering child stood before him.

"Good sir, my child is starving—give me a shilling to buy bread."

He looked sternly upon her, and her upturned eyes dropped at the fierce look, while she involuntarily pressed her infant to her breast.

"Woman! go to the Alms-house; I have nothing for you!"

The denial, and the harshness of the tone in which the words were spoke, sunk deeper into her heart disquieting her more than the repulsive expression of his features. She sighed and said to her child, "God take compassion on thee!" and her sobs and wailing expressed the bitterness of the mother's sorrow.

He passed on.

The horses were champing on the bright bits, and throwing up their sleek and arching necks as if delighted with the clanking sounds of the bells so profusely strung around them. A boy of ten or eleven years of age was gazing with the eagerness of juvenile curiosity, wonder and delight, upon the splendid vehicle, and the noble horses. Although on his way to school, he had turned aside for a few moments, and in his open and pleased face was written the expectation of the joy which he would experience when, at some future day, he might sit behind such animals, and be whirled along the smooth road.

While his eyes were thus occupied, and his feelings were thus swelling up like the waters in an overflowing spring, his ears heard the low and piteous request of the indignant petitioner, and the coarseness and brutality of the rich man to whom it was addressed, checked the current of his joyous emotions. Scarcely were the words uttered before he was hurrying off, and ere the moanings of the woman had ceased, he was running back from a shop, distant but a few yards.

"Here, poor woman, take this bread and feed your child."

The sobbings were exchanged for a scream of surprised delight; the bread was quickly seized, and a portion of it given to the child, who, almost famished, and stiffened with cold, could with difficulty receive the proffered sustenance. The boy stood until the child commenced to eat, and the mother, whose attention and persuasive accents had been employed in various methods to impart warmth and to induce it to eat looked up, while a gleam of satisfaction at the result of her experiments, and of thankfulness for the timely relief, broke over her anxious and saddened countenance, "God bless you, little sir, and if you have a mother, may she be long preserved to you?"

The blood rose to his cheeks, and the glow spread over his forehead; his throat seemed as if filling with something, which rising, almost induced choking; tears rushed to his eyes; and with mingled feelings of pity and gladness he ran on to the school-house. Genuine charity! thou hast the uniform light and heat of the sun.

Children, be kind to the poor, for he that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord.

THE SIXTH COMMANDMENT.

Exodus xx. Thou shalt not kill.

The intention of this text is to forbid wilful murder. The law regards the intentions of the heart. Suppose a man should attempt to shoot a mad dog that ought to be killed, and some person unknown to him should be within range of his shot, and should be killed by it, he would not have violated this law, though he would have killed a man. On the other hand, should a man shoot at a man with the intention of killing him, and miss his mark, and by accident kill a mad dog, he would nevertheless be guilty of a violation of the law, because he would intend murder in his heart.

The principle in this commandment is that one man has no right to take away the life of another man, unless he is so authorized to do, under the circumstances, by God, in whose hands are the lives of all men. That God did authorize the taking of life for some crimes cannot be denied, and hence it was not forbidden at the time by this law, for God could not forbid a thing and command it at the same time. But some now think we have no authority under the gospel to take life, and hence, that we may not kill a human being for any crime. It must turn on this one point, does God authorize men to take away the life of the murderer? We leave every one to answer this question for himself; we all agree that what is called murder is wrong, that it is forbidden by this commandment. The reasonableness of the commandment may appear from the following considerations.

1. God is the author of life, and hence, he has a right to control and dispose of it. The man therefore who takes away the life of another, interferes with the rights of God, unless he can prove that God has authorized him so to do.

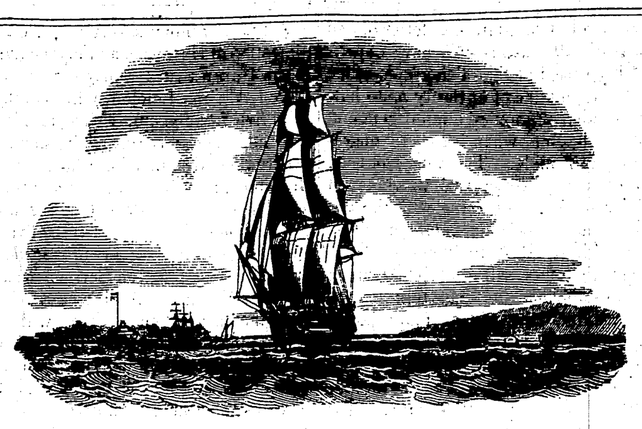
2. All men, deriving life from God, the same source, must stand on a level in regard to their right to life. As all men have the same right to life, there can be no right to kill a man, for the right to kill one man would involve the right to kill all the men in the world, since that one man has just as good a right to live as every body else.

3. Men are the subjects of God's government, and act in this life for a future state, and to cut short their probation by killing them and send them to their final account uncalled by God, must be an awful business.

4. Men sustain social relations here, which forbid us to kill one another. How much sorrow would it cause you, should some one kill your father, mother, brother or sister, and yet everybody is somebody's father, mother, brother or sister.

Children should guard against anger and all bad temper which, if indulged, may lead to murder. How many children have in a fit of anger struck their little brothers, sisters or playmates. The reason they did not kill them was, they could not strike hard enough; they struck as hard as they could. Anger itself is sinful, and often leads to murder. We will close by requesting the children to read and consider the words of Christ, Matt. v. 21, 22. We have no room to comment upon this text, let each make his own comments.

Anger may glance into the breast of a wise man, but rests only in the bosom of fools.



The End of the Voyage.

BY THEODORE THINKER.

THERE she comes! See, the noble ship is just passing through the Narrows. She has been safely wafted over the Atlantic waves. The gale only urged her more rapidly on her course homeward, and now the spires of the island city have risen upon the view of the voyager, and his bosom beats high as he thinks of the glad meeting he will soon enjoy with those whom he loves.

Onward she comes. All sails are set. How she ploughs the blue waters. See, how the white billows dash against her bow, as she flies on her course. She has been wildly tossed upon the treacherous ocean; but now she is safe. Soon she will cast anchor. How eager are the voyagers to reach the shore; for it is the shore of their native land.

Thus it is with the Christian. In this world, he is not at home. While he is tossing upon life's waves, he is looking forward to the day when, all his pilgrimage ended, he shall arrive at his heavenly home. What perils he must encounter. How rudely do the waves sometimes dash against his bark. Clouds and darkness, rocks and quicksands, storms and gales, he must encounter them all. But he trusts in an almighty Pilot, and he is safe. He thinks of his home, and the thought cheers his heart.

At length, weary and toil-worn, his heavenly home bursts upon his view. He sees the mansions of the city of his God. How his soul exults in view of the happy greetings of those members of his Father's family, from whom he has long been separated. Oh what joys are in store for him! He is to see Him who has ever been to his heart the "one altogether lovely."

Dear young friends! how I wish you might all have the hope of the Christian! Then when the voyage of life is over, it will be sweet to enter the harbor of eternal rest.

Youth's Cabinet for May.

A Story for Boys.

A Paris correspondent of the Courier des Etats Unis relates an anecdote of Mr. M——, a rich but eccentric individual in Paris. He had retired from business with a yearly income of one hundred and fifty thousand livres. He was careful to preserve his principal untouched, but was in the habit of spending all the interest. His ordinary expenses were managed with method and economy—but the amount which he disposed of in charities was quite large—and he always kept on hand a considerable sum to be expended in any emergencies which might occur—and sometimes he found no little embarrassment in getting rid of this reserved fund.

Not long since, he found he had on hand one thousand crowns, which he was anxious to dispose of. While he was debating with himself how he should expend it, one of the chimneys of his hotel took fire. The alarm was given—the firemen were first called—afterwards the chimney-sweeps, to sweep the other chimneys. Among them was a little bright-looking Savoyard, (a native of Savoy, among the loftiest Alpine mountains) who, ragged and soiled as he was with soot, gaily sung his song. Mr. M——regarded him with interest. The song was amusing, and caused him to smile—and his heart warmed towards the little sweep.

"My little friend," said Mr. M——, "I think I must make you a new year's present."

"Many thanks, my good sir," replied the Savoyard, showing two noble tiers of polished ivories, "I shall be pleased to receive it."

"You seem to be perfectly happy," continued Mr. M——, "you sing in excellent spirits. You are of course contented with your condition."

"Yes, sir, I am contented—but I should be much better contented if I could have remained in my own country, with my dear mother and sisters."

"And what hinders you from returning?"

"Oh," said the little sweep, "it is very easy to talk about it—but I cannot quit the business of chimney-sweeping until I have made a fortune."

"How! a fortune? How is that?"

"A great deal! No less than two thousand francs, which will require at least ten years. Yes, ten years must pass before I shall be able to see again my mother and my dear native mountains!" said the boy, while a tear glistened in his eye.

"You shall go to-morrow, if you like," said Mr. M——.

"Are you joking with me, sir?"

"No—I tell you, you may leave Paris as soon as you like. Your fortune is made!"

"What! my two thousand francs!"

"Yes, and more—I will give you three thousand. Go, find your master—and bring him here."

The master was found, the whole matter was arranged, and the bright little Savoyard, weeping with joy, and clad in neat and appropriate costume, departed the next day for his native mountains to embrace his mother, and carry happiness into her humble cottage.

Singular and affecting incident at Sea.—Through the kindness of one of our friends at Scarborough, we are enabled to communicate to our readers a singular and affecting incident at sea. On Sunday afternoon, the 4th inst. three little boys of the names of Davis, aged 15, Carlisle, 14, and Foster, 12 years—the two former fishermen's sons, were amusing themselves with an excursion on the sea, at Scarborough, in a small boat about thirteen feet long, having with them only one oar and a small sail. The little fellows sculled themselves out to a distance of a few miles from land, when thinking they perceived some other boys coming out in a boat to fetch them back again, they hoisted their small sail, and the wind blowing out from the shore, the boat was unfortunately carried out a further distance to sea. To their inexpressible grief, the land at length entirely disappeared, and, after making several fruitless attempts to regain the shore, darkness put a stop to all further endeavors, and a strong gale of wind forced them to a still greater distance into the ocean. When morning returned, not a speck of land could be discerned, and no sail hove in sight. The situation of the three boys now became dreadfully distressing, not one of them knowing how to make land, and not a single mouthful of provisions on board their frail bark. To add to their distress, the oldest boy, Davis, fell sick, and continued in that state the whole of the day. The sun again set, leaving them no prospect of a rescue from a watery grave. The feelings of their poor parents and friends on shore all this time were heart-rending while endeavors to discover them proved futile. Tuesday morning dawned, and after straining their eyes the whole of the day in search of a sail, or land, and wearying themselves with fruitless toil, night came on, and the poor little fellows, overcome with fatigue, hungry, and benumbed with cold, laid themselves down at the bottom of the boat, and left themselves at the mercy of the winds and waves. On awakening in the morning, they were horror-struck to find their companion, Davis, dead. The little distressed mariners described this as the worst of all. Fortunately, the sea all this time was tolerably calm, but the third day passed over with still less hopes of deliverance. Wednesday night approached but no friendly hand was stretched out to save the two youthful mariners who, with the lifeless corpse of their companion, continued to float upon the bosom of the waters duriug the fourth night. In the afternoon of Thursday, they descried a sail in the distance, and with eyes filled with tears they beheld a ship bearing down toward them. She proved to be a Dutch vessel, bound for Amsterdam. The captain immediately took the two boys on board his own vessel. They were in a dreadful state of suffering, having never tasted food from Sunday afternoon. While the poor little fellows were being received into the Dutch vessel, they perceived some of the sailors about to throw the body of their companion overboard. With affecting accents they besought their deliverers to let them have the dead body of Davis to take back with them to Scarborough to his friends; but their entreaties were followed by a heavy splash in the water, and the body of the poor unfortunate fisherman's boy was lost from their sight. The captain of the vessel, and the whole crew, behaved with the greatest kindness to the boys; and upon the vessel's reaching Amsterdam, they forwarded their charge to London, from whence the two adventurous youths set out for Hull, and to the inexpressible joy of their distressed and agonized parents, they arrived in Scarborough on Wednesday evening last.

What Faith is.

"Father, my teacher said this morning, that all the little boys must try and please God, but we could not do it without faith: what is faith?"

"That's an important question, Charley; I must think awhile, before I answer you."

"Well, father, can't you tell me now?"

"I'll try. What is that white article on the mantel?"

"Alum, sir."

"Do you know what alum is made of?"

"No, sir."

"Do you know how it is made?"

"No, sir."

"How, then, do you know it is alum?"

"You told me so, sir; and mother calls it alum."

"You believe it is alum, then, because you have been told it was."

"Yes, sir."

"Now, bring me the Bible; this, you know, is the word of God; can you tell me any one thing God says of himself in this book?"

"Yes, sir. He says he loves all the works of His hands."

"What does He say of His Law?"

"That it 'is holy, just and good.'"

"What does he say about good people?"

"That in heaven, 'they shall shine as the stars for ever.'"

"What does he say about bad people?"

"That unless they 'repent, they shall all perish.'"

"Now, do you believe these things?"

"Yes, sir."

"You believe, then, that piece of alum is alum, because I told you so; and you believe what God says of himself and His Law because you hear it, and are told you ought to do so."

"Yes, sir."

"Then you have faith; for faith is believing what God says to us in his word."

"Then, father, if I read the Bible, and believe what it says, when I die, I will go to heaven, where grandmother is; will I?"

"Not unless you do what the Bible says, as well as believe it; there is a great difference between believing a thing and doing a thing."

"There is!"

"Certainly; listen, the Bible says, 'Thou shalt not steal;' now, you believe it wrong to steal, don't you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, suppose you were to take from some one something that does not belong to you, (that would be stealing,) don't you see, then, that at the very same time you believe what the Bible says to be right, you are doing what you know to be wrong."

"Yes, sir; I understand you now."

"Remember, then, that the Saviour has said, —not every one that merely believes what I say unto them, shall be saved; but he that does the will of my Father which is in heaven:' and this also—'he that knoweth his Master's will and doeth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes."

HOW TO BECOME WISE.

Seek all that may by man be sought,
Learn all that can by man be taught,
Trust God through faith for all the rest,
And you with wisdom shall be blest.

A YOUNG JEWESS OF TANGIER.

We find an interesting article on the Jews in the Missionary Chronicle copied from an "Appeal for the Jewish Nation," by E. L. Mitford Esq.

It appears that nothing more is required to make a Christian, or a Jew a Mahometan, by their law, than the deposition of two witnesses of their having pronouced the words, "There is no God but God, and Mahomet is the Apostle of God." Against this testimony the protestation of the Jews are vain, and the penalty of recantation is burning at the stake.

There was a young Jewess of respectable family residing in Tangier, summoned before the Cadi by two Moors, who deposed to her having pronounced their profession of faith. This she utterly denied, but in vain, and the Cadi decreed her conformity to Islamism on pain of death. But the affair became public and reached the ears of Mulia Abderaahman, to whose decision it was referred.

"Whatever might have influenced her accusers, there could be no doubt of the motives of the Sultan in enforcing the decree, which was to obtain another plaything for his hareem; in fact, so well known was his character in this respect, that from the moment of her being ordered to his presence, no one expected any other result—for few possibly imagined, nor did the Sultan himself, that she would have courage to brave the alternative rather than abandon the faith of her fathers. Such, however, was the case. She was first sent to the Serail, where every means were employed to shake her constancy; threats, blandishments, and the most brilliant promises were tried by turns, and were equally unsuccessful. Even her relations were allowed to see her, to endeavor by their persuasions to divert her from her resolution; but with a firmness which against such assaults could have been the effect only of the deepest conviction, this young and noble creature held fast her integrity, and calmly chose a horrible though honorable death, rather than the enjoyment of an ignominious existence of shame and infamy.

"The Jews came forward with offers of immense sums of money to save her, but her fate was irrevocably decided, and the only mercy the baffled tyrant could afford his young and innocent victim was, to allow of her being beheaded instead of her being burnt alive. I had an account of the closing scene by an eye-witness who was one of the guards at the execution, and although, as a body, there is nowhere a more dissolute set of irregular soldiery than the Morocco Moors, yet he confessed to me that many of his vice-hardened companions could not restrain from their tears, and that he himself could not look with dry eyes on a sight of such cold blooded atrocity.

"This beautiful young creature was led out to where a pile ready for firing was raised for her last couch; her long dark hair flowing disheveled on her shoulders, she looked around in vain for a heart and hand that could succor, though so many eyes pitied her: for the last time she was offered—with the executioner and pyre in all their terror before her—her life, on condition of being false to her God; she only asked for a few minutes for prayer, after which her throat was cut by the executioner, according to the barbarous custom of the country, and her body consumed on the fire."

LETTER FROM MISS P. T. YOUNG,

Teacher at the Free Baptist Mission in Haiti.

PORT AU PRINCE, Jan. 18, 1846.

Dear Brother,—I will occupy a space in bro Jones' sheet, to manifest, if no more, that the same interest in the cause of Missions, and in the spread of the glorious gospel of our Saviour, which actuated me in offering myself to your Board, renders me still willing and desirous to remain among, and labor for this needy people. But my mind is frequently distressed by fears that my feeble labors will not benefit them, and that my coming to Haiti will be in vain. Many obstacles are in the way of reforming this people. They look upon a white man, especially an American, with much contempt. They remember, with disgust, that the United States of America refused to recognize their independence, and they despise (les blancs) the whites.

Catholicism is deeply rooted here. A sister of the church told us yesterday, that if one Catholic attends a Protestant church, "forty Catholics pitch upon him the next day, and he won't go again," to use her expression. Intoxicating drinks are extensively used in all classes of society. Masonry is a prevailing evil in Port au Prince. There are several Masonic Lodges in the city. Plassading or residing together, a male and female, in an unmarried state, is practised by thousands. This union is abandoned by the will of either party, and the female, without means of supporting her children, allows them to grow up as near like the beasts as you can imagine a human being, usually without clothing, feeding upon yams, bananas, sugar-cane, &c., and of course without education. I think that one thing which has led to this deplorable practice, is, that before persons can enter into the marriage state, the law requires that they first pass through certain church ceremonies—and farther, a lawful wedding is attended by more cost than many poor people are able to meet. They therefore justify themselves in such a course, and say that it is necessary to be rich in order to get married. On the other hand, you already know that those who do marry, often have several wives. Add to this the practice of Sabbath breaking, and deceiving. If there are any moral restraints here, they are very feeble upon the mejority of the people. They can have no idea of virtue, of honesty—and especially disinterestedness. They cannot appreciate the motives of missionaries. but suppose that they come among them for selfish and designing purposes.—They have no confidence in themselves, and how can they have in others? I do not say all this to discourage you, but to show you why I sometimes have discouraging thoughts. But, my brother, the Lord knows how to bring about his own righteous purposes. There is one thing about it, if any are ever converted, and live a consistent Christian life, surrounded by all these counteracting influences, no person need doubt the reality of the change. Let not this work cease. May the Lord encourage your heart. My love to your family and inquiring friends. I must close, by subscribing myself, yours in the Lord,

MISS FIDELIA COBURN.

We copy the following extract from a letter published in the Liberty Standard for this self-denying Missionary among the colored people in Canada.

"My school is very large, and in the same house where I live, which contains but one room. The Sabbath meetings are here also, which makes my labors much harder than though we had a school-house. beside it brings me considerable company, and thereby increases my family expenses.

I have seven in family all the time, beside the company. We have writing benches all around the room, but at one corner in which is a bed, and a stove in the middle with movable seats to fill up the centre. Thus you see that I cannot have much waste room. However, I do really think there is not a more quiet, peaceable, happy group in the world than my family, and a very interesting family too! The County Commissioner called on me a few days since. He remarked, 'You have a very interesting family!' The youngest is about 5 years old, and the oldest about 12. One, is a boy about 8 years of age, and all the man we have about the house.

Often cases occur when it seems really necessary to take children into my family and take the care of them. This, together with the importance of having some where they may obtain such an education and moral training as shall qualify them for teachers of primary schools among us, lead me to lay the following proposition before the public, as one method of benefiting the people.

I propose to take as many as it will be convenient to have in a family, if the public will aid in sustaining so many, at $10 a year in cash, and clothing found beside. Several female Anti-Slavery Societies have paid over the money already, which has been acknowledged in the Standard, and by which means I am enabled to support my present family."

SECTION IV. [Concluded.

The Sabbath in Patriarchal Ages.

But this argument may be carried much farther. For it is not merely from the few incidental notices or allusions which the Scriptures contain of the observance of sevens and the notation of weeks by the patriarchs and other individuals in early ages, that we are led to believe the knowledge of the sanctifying and blessing of the Sabbath to have been carried down to them. That its sacred character was known, and in some manner observed, in the earliest ages universally, among nations not possessing the written revelation of God's will, nor deriving their religious observances from the Israelites, is attested by heathen as well as by Jewish and Christian authors. Not only was there a veneration expressed by them for the number seven, in cases for which there is no divine appointment, but the seventh day itself was regarded as a festival, and that under circumstances which we can only account for, by believing the fact of the divine institution having descended by tradition to nations by whom it came afterwards to be grievously corrupted. Thus we find Balak, King of Moab, repeatedly erecting seven altars, and offering thereon seven sacrifices, (Num. 23: 1—30;) and in the earliest history, and from the oldest traditions, of nations far separated from each other, we find the division of time into weeks of seven days. Not only the Assyrians, Egyptians, Arabians, Indians, and other nations of the east, but ancient Romans, Gauls, Britons, Germans, and nations of the north, have all been named as affording distinct evidence of this. Manifold direct quotations have been adduced from authors of antiquity, in proof even of the known and acknowledged sanctity of the seventh day, in cases where it must manifestly have had its origin at an earlier period than that of the giving of the law to Israel, and have been derived from a different source than from that people, with whom they were so often at enmity. The religion of the Israelites was not so esteemed by their idolatrous neighbors, that they would readily copy observances peculiar unto them, and which were celebrated, avowedly, in obedience to the God of Israel, and declared to have relation to His glory. Yet some of the quotations from Greek poets bear a decided similarity to the language of Moses in his history of the creation, and indicate an acquaintance with the orgin of this world's affairs by those from whom their traditions and observances were derived, perhaps less perfectly known, if not nearly forgotten, by their descendants more remote from the time to which they relate.

The evidence on this part of the subject, relative to different nations, and concerning different ages, has been presented by many authors. We quote first from one who has been at considerable care in collecting the testimony, as more enlarged than by many others.

"It is true," he remarks, "the Gentiles a thousand ways depraved the use of the Sabbath, by keeping holy day to their idols, saith Aretius; they also wrested the name to a wanton and ridiculous signification, in which, notwithstanding, there hath remained some footsteps of the ancient origin al, to which at length the Gentiles, though late, ought to return. To omit their depravations, see in them the footsteps of every particular:—*

"First, the Gentiles set apart certain and constant days, not moveable and wandering.

"Macrobius saith, there are four kinds of public holy-days, Feriaum, (that is, days vacant from pleading and labor,) Stative, Conceptive, Imperative, and Nundinative; and the Stative are common to all the people on certain and set days and months, and noted with standing observations in their calendars.

"Secondly, they observed a certain day of seven, and particularly the seventh.

"Hesiod saith, the seventh day is a holy day.

"Lampridius telleth of Alexander Severus that, on the seventh day, when he was in the City, he went up to the Capitol, and frequented the Temple.

"Homer saith, the seventh day is holy, and that it was the day in which all things were perfected, and on which we depart from the banks of hell.

"Callimachus saith the like, and that it is the birth-day, chief and perfect.

"Clemens Alexandrinus showeth that not only the Hebrews, but the Greeks also, knew the seventh day holy.

"Eusebius affirmeth that almost all, as well philosophers as poets, knew that the seventh day was more holy.

"And Philo, the Jew, saith, Who doth not honor that sacred day which returneth every week?

"The seventh day holidays were wont to be granted to children in school among them. Certain of the Ethnick doctors were wont only to dispute on the Sabbaths.

"Seneca, in his ninty-fifth epistle, shewing that exhortations are not enough, but we need obliging precepts, yea, the decrees of wisdom, he reckoneth up the Sabbath as the festival day for religion, but condemneth their manner of observing it, when he saith, Let us forbid any one to light a candle on the Sabbaths; for neither do the gods want light, and men themselves are not delighted with the smoke; he worshipeth God who knoweth him.

"Macrobius sheweth, that Saturn, (of whom was the name of Saturday,) was honored with candles lighted at his altars, and wax tapers offered on his days.

"Aretius hath these words, The Greeks and Latins call the Sabbath, the day of rest, which the Gentiles called Saturday; and the same also they consecrated also to rest, for civil actions and warlike affairs, and fit for contemplation; and therefore on this the divine patronage was to be implored against dangers and misfortunes.

"Thirdly, they observed a whole day.

"Macrobius bringeth in one Vetius thus speaking, We truly, that we may both honor the sacred holy-days, and eschew also the slothful numbness of resting, and might turn our leisure into employment, we come together to spend the whole day in learned fables to be conferred upon, as out of some dark riddle.

"Fourthly, they observed their festivals with severe exactness from all work.

"The custom of the heathen in this kind, I find in Macrobius lively set forth, wherein the very manner of a true Sabbath rest, and what works may and may not be done, are not amiss defined. His words are these: The priests affirmed, that the holy-days were polluted if any work were done on the solemn set days; besides, it was not lawful for the king of the sacrifices, and the Flamines, (that is their chief priests,) to see a work done on the holy-days; and therefore by a crier it was proclaimed that no such thing should be done, and he that neglected the precept was fined; besides the fine, he that did aught unawares on such days was to offer sacrifice for expiation. And Scævola the high-priest affirmed that the willful offender could have no expiation; but Umbro denieth that he is polluted who doth work about holy things, and things pertaining to the worship of God, or any thing which had respect to an urgent commodity of life. Scævola, lastly being asked what might be lawfully done on the holy-days, answered, that which would hurt if it were left undone. If an ox fell into a pit, and the master helped him out, he profaned not the holy-day; nor he that preserveth his house from ruin by putting a prop to a broken beam; whence also Maro, learned in all discipline, knowing that a sheep might be washed to cure the scab, so pronounced, that in such a case it was lawful to dip the sheep on the holy-days, if it were done for the medicine sake:

'To lead the bleeding flocks of sheep,
To wash in healthful waters deep.'

For by adding the word 'healthful,' he sheweth that it was granted them only in case of a disease to be cured in the sheep, not for gain's sake.

"The Gentiles were so exact about sacred things, that nothing was omitted that might conduce to their solemnity, that it grew into a proverb, when they would express a care of omitting nothing, to say, Holy things are to be finished. Upon their feasts to Saturn, full liberty and freedom was granted to servants. And Lucius Actius, in his Annals, relates that all, through cities and countries in Greece, and chiefly in Athens, before Rome was built, celebrated the day to Saturn, and every one saw to his household herein; and this was their custom, received by tradition, that the servants and the masters alike feasted together.

"Philo Judæus calleth the seventh day a general festival to be observed of all people for ever. And again he saith, that the divine law admonisheth all of duty; Barbarians, Grecians, inhabitants of main continents, as well as of islands; the Westerlings, the Easterlings, the Europeans, and the Asians; the whole habitable world even to the uttermost coasts. For who doth not honor that holy day, returning every week, bringing remission of labor and holy vocations to the master of the family with his household, not only to freemen but also to servants, yea, moreover, to the beasts under the yoke?

"Josephus, in his second book against Appian, also saith, Neither is there any city of the Grecians, or Barbarians, nor any nation, to whom the custom of the seventh day, in which we rest, hath not come." *

To these we add, from another author, two or three additional testimonies:

"Porphyry says, The Phœnicians consecrated one day in seven as holy.

"Linus says, A seventh day is observed among saints or holy people.

"Tibullus says, The seventh day, which is kept holy by the Jews, is also a festival to the Roman women.

"The several nations here referred to, cannot, it is plain, have fallen upon this practice by chance. It is certain they do not derive it from the Jews. It follows, therefore, that they received it by tradition from a common source, and that source must have been Noah and his family." †

But although, instead of these important and numerous testimonies, there had been no evidence of the fact, nor reason to conclude, that among Gentile nations, without a written revelation, the Sabbath was in some way held sacred, at times and in circumstances which lead us to believe that their observances were derived from the immediate descendants of Noah, and which make it impossible for us to suppose that they owed their origin to an imitation of the Israelites—even supposing that there was not the shadow of regard to God's own appointment at creation—this would not, surely, invalidate the authority of its original institution. And if disregard of the authority by which it is enacted would not annul the obligation, still less should the want of evidence, were there even less than there is, both of a direct and inferential kind, be so esteemed. The practice of others was not needful as a reason for the sanctification of the Sabbath, by any to whom the will of God on the subject was known; and the inspired narrative of the spirit and conduct of the patriarchs, brief though that narrative be, impresses us with the conviction, that those who obeyed God's voice, and kept His charge, His commandments, His statutes, and His laws, were neither ignorant of, nor inattentive to, that blessed institution which weekly testifies for Him who made and moves the universe.

* We have not deemed it necessary to insert the multiplied references to the various works cited by the author from whom we quote; and we have, in one or two instances, omitted Latin quotations where the translation is given.

OBJECT OF THE MISSIONARY.

The Christian Watchman contains some account of a meeting of the missionary Judson with the students of Waterville College, Me. It was in one of the recitation rooms, which, though crowded to excess, was hushed into the most death like stillness, in order that not a syllable should be lost to any ear. The missionary began with manifest signs of deep feeling, and said:—

"Upon an occasion like this, dear brethren, a multitude of thoughts crowd upon me, so that I know not where to begin or what to select. Probably many of you have the ministry in view, and some perhaps look forward to a missionary life. You will expect me to speak of missions and missionary life. I have seen so much of the trial and responsibility of missionary labors, that I am unwilling to urge any one to assume them. The urging must come from a higher source. One important thought just occurs to me. You have but one life to live in which to prepare for eternity. If you had four or five lives, two or three of them might be spent in carelessness. But you have but one. Every action of that one life gives a coloring to your eternity. How important then that you spend that one life so as to please the Saviour, the blessed Saviour who has done every thing for you.

"If any of you enter the gospel ministry, in this or other lands, let not your object be so much to 'do your duty,' or even to 'save souls'—though these should have a place in your motives—as to please the Lord Jesus. Let this be your ruling motive in all that you do. Now do you ask how you shall please Him? How indeed shall we know what will please Him, but by His commands? Obey those commands and you will not fail to please Him. And there is that 'last command' given just before He ascended to the Father, 'Go ye into all the world an preach the gospel to every creature'—it is not yet obeyed as it should be. Fulfill that, and you will please the Saviour.

"Some one asked me not long ago whether faith or love influenced me most in going to the heathen. I thought of it a while, and at length concluded that there was in me but little of either. But in thinking of what did influence me, I remembered a time, out in the woods back of Andover Seminary, when I was almost disheartened. Every thing looked dark. No one had gone out from this country. The way was not open. The field was far distant and in an unhealthy climate. I knew not what to do. All at once that 'last command' seemed to come to my heart directly from heaven. I could doubt no longer, but determined on the spot to obey it at all hazards, for the sake of pleasing the Lord Jesus Christ.

"Now, my dear brethren, if the Lord wants you for missionaries, He will set that command home to your hearts. If He does so, neglect it at your peril."

TRADITIONS OF NATIONS.

The nations of the earth which have longest possessed a knowledge of letters, have given to the world the most distinct traditions of the great facts in Bible history.

The Chaldeans, several years before the Christian era, talked and wrote about the flood—the destruction thereby of the primitive race of men—the new peopling of the earth by the only family which was preserved. They spoke of the father of this family as having been warned in a dream, concerning the destruction which awaited the world, and that he built a ship, and went into it with his family—that when the flood began to abate, this man, whom they call Xisuthrus, let out birds, which at first returned to the ship, finding no resting place—that when the flood was fully abated, the ship rested on a mountain, when he went forth to offer sacrifices, and strayed from the rest of the company or family, who went and settled in Babylon. The Xisuthrus of the Chaldeans, was evidently Moses'-Noah. The Chaldeans reckoned ten kings before the flood: while Moses counts ten generations.

The Chinese traditions, if they do not absolutely refer to the same person, under the name of Fohi, as Moses' Noah, are indeed most singular. They describe their first king as having lived at a time which would make him a cotemporary of Noah, or so nearly so, that the difference is a matter of no real moment.

They connect with the life of their first king Fohi, so much that Moses connects with Noah, that it appears among the greatest singularities that two nations so disconnected and so unlike, should have preserved the same matter of history or tradition from the ancient date which they had, if indeed no such peculiar circumstances as they relate had taken place.

The Chinese say their first king had no father; that his mother conceived him encompassed with a rainbow, which is an evident allusion to the rainbow's appearing to Noah: with other circumstances similar to Mosaic account. The Chinese history supposes the residence of Fohi to have been in the north-west province of Ararat, where the Ark rested after the abatement of the waters.

The fact that the Chinese may claim to be descended from Noah, or to have had him for their first king, by no means militates against the Mosaic account; inasmuch as all living have descended from Noah.

The Greeks, in ancient times, maintained a belief in the fact of a flood, which had long before destroyed the human family for its wickedness, with the exception of one man, whom they called Deucalion, who, on account of his piety, was preserved and became the father of a new race.

They reported that Deucalion had a large chest into which he put his family and numerous beasts, and floated safely on the water, until the flood was over.

On the first settlement of Mexico by the Spanish, they were surprised to find in the Mexican manuscripts which they obtained, an account of the fall of the mother of mankind, accompanied by a serpent, together with an idea of the flood, with a single family escaping on a raft. Among them, the observance of every seventh day was maintained.

Similar traditions have been found among other nations where the Scriptures have never been known, where the Gospel has never been published. Upon what imaginary ground these traditions can be accounted for, except upon the acknowledgment that the grand items of Bible history had their origin in facts, is not known.

The Hindoos and others have like traditions, while the Bible alone gives a distinct history. Its credibility, and the united origin of the human race, is very strongly sustained by these facts of existing traditions.

REUNION OF SAINTS.

If the mere conception of the reunion of good men in a future state infused a momentary rapture in the mind of Tully—if an airy speculation, for there is reason to fear it had little hold on his convictions, could inspire him with such delight, what may we be expected to feel who are assured of such an event by the true sayings of God? How should we rejoice in the prospect, the certainty rather, of spending a blissful eternity with those whom we loved on earth; of seeing them emerge from the ruins of the tomb, and the deeper ruins of the fall, not only uninjured, but refined and perfected, with every tear wiped from their eyes, standing before the throne of God and the Lamb, 'in white robes, and palms in their hands, crying with a loud voice, Salvation to God, that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever.' What delight will it afford to renew the sweet council we have taken together, to recount the toils of combat and the labor of the way, and to approach, not the house, but the throne of God, in company, in order to join in the symphonies of heavenly voices, lose ourselves amid the splendors and fruition of the beatific vision. [Rev. R. Hall.

THE MOTHERLESS.

How interesting he appears to every feeling mind. A child robbed of his mother, excites universal commiseration and affection from every bosom. We look forward with anxiety to every future period of his life, and our prayers and hopes attend every step of his journey. We mingle our tears with his on the grave of her whose maternal heart has ceased to beat, for we feel that he is bereaved of the friend and guide of his youth! His father would, but cannot supply the loss. In vain the whole circle of his friends blend their efforts to alleviate his sorrows, to fill the place occupied by departed worth; a mother must be missed every moment by a child who has ever known and rightly valued one, when she sleeps in the grave. No hands feel so soft as hers—no voice sounds so sweet—no smile is so pleasant! Never shall he find again in this wide wilderness, such sympathy, such fondness, such fidelity, such tenderness, as he experienced from his mother! The world is moved with compassion for the motherless child, but the world cannot supply her place for him.

"HOPE THOU IN GOD."—When the traveler Park, sinking in despondency in the deserts of Africa, cast his eye on a little plant by his side, he took courage: "I cannot look around," said he, "without seeing the works of the providence of God." And thus asks every Christian: "Will God feed the young ravens? Does he number the hairs of the head? Does he suffer the sparrow to fall to the ground without his notice, though two are sold at a farthing?" Should not I then hope in God? God has but to speak, and it shall be done; to command only, and it shall stand fast; but to speak again when it stands fast, and it shall be broken in pieces. With him are power and might: "None can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" Hope, therefore, in God, because he is almighty, and he will supply all thy wants. [Cecil.

PIOUS WIVES.—A short time ago as I was conversing with a pious old man, I inquired what were the means of his conversion. For a moment he paused—I perceived I had touched a tender string. Tears gushed from his eyes, while with deep emotion he replied, "My wife was brought to God some years before myself. I persecuted and abused her, because of her religion. She, however, returned nothing but kindness; constantly manifesting an anxiety to promote my comfort and happiness; and it was her amiable conduct, when suffering ill treatment from me, that sent the arrow of conviction to my soul." "Temper," added he, "is every thing."

A GREAT TRUTH.—In vain do we seek to awaken in our churches zeal for missions as a separate thing. To be genuine, it must flow from love to Christ. It is when a sense of personal communion with the Son of God is highest, that we shall be most fit for a missionary work; either to go ourselves, or to stir up others. If we allow it to become a business of dollars and cents, we shall see no results. "Find preachers of D. Brainerd's spirit," said John Wesley, "and nothing can stand before them; but without this, what can gold or silver do?" Let gushing affection to the Lord Jesus Christ become the ruling passion, and it communicates the thrill of evangelical zeal to every member of the electric chain. A church of such ministers, of such members, would be an apostolic, a heavenly church. [Dr. Alexander.

MISSIONS AND SLAVERY.

The following letter from a missionary among the Karens, contains a solemn reproof to the American churches. Who can read it without grief and shame for the unholy alliance of religion with slavery which is countenanced among us?

MERGUI, Oct. 27, 1845.

Messrs Editors:—Will you or some of your valuable correspondents, tell me how to meet the following objection, which I have to meet wherever I go among the wild Karens? "If we become disciples, when you get a large number of us, you intend to entice us away and make slaves of us in your own country." This objection is often urged with as much seriousness and confidence as though they were actually acquainted with the system of American slavery. Did these ignorant, but slave hating heathen, churches—would they not say to our faces, "Go back, thou hypocrite—Go back, and teach the heathen of your own country, and give them the Bible, before you come here to impose upon us." I am fully pursuaded, that did they know it this would in substance be the language of many a wild Karen.

Will not the Karens become acquainted with the history of American slavery? I see not how it can possibly be avoided.

Some of their young men are learning our language; becoming acquainted with our books, papers, &c. And when they once begin to get the idea, they will not cease their importunities until they know its history. And when it is once known, it will spread like wild-fire among the people. Sometime since, I noticed in a public paper the following remark, as coming from brother Kincaid: "If the heathen were aware of the slaveholding character of our churches, by whom the missionaries are sent out, the usefulness of the missionaries would be at an end." Now I should not be willing to go so far as this, and say that their usefulness would be at an end But I most sincerely believe, that the strength of the missionary's arm would be sadly paralyzed.

I thought I felt interested for the slave before I left my native land; but during the eight years since I left and came to this heathen country, I have been witnessing the amount of men and money employed in behalf of the heathen of these provinces, and how small their number compared to the slaves of the United States of free and independent America. According to the census of Government in 1840, the whole population of these provinces, including Malay—Chinese—Siamese and Toungthoos, (who never have any missionary,) was 115,000, not one-twentieth the number of oppressed heathen in that land of boasted freedom and Christianity. And what is the amount of means used in behalf of this population? There are on the ground at present thirteen missionaries and their wives, and one single female. According to what statistics I have before me, the whole expense cannot be less than $20,000 a year, and I believe it must be considerably more than that. Don't understand me to convey the idea that we have a superabundance of labor and money. No! indeed. Almost every department of labor among us is suffering for want of reinforcement. In many instances we cannot employ assistants and have schools for the want of money. Had we twice the amount of men and money, there would be an abundance of work to be done. But when I think of it, in connection with American slavery, and think of the slaveholder holding the Bible from his own people, and yet apparently anxious to give the same to the heathen, my heart sickens, while it seems as though I had been dreaming over the subject of American slavery. Would that we might all awake, and wash our hands from this awful pollution! D. L. BAYTON.

CONVERSION OF AN ESQUIMAUX.

It was in the last days of December, 1803, that a discourse was held on the words of our Saviour, 'The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost;' (Luke xix. 10,) and it was shown that precisely those who feel themselves to be the worst, and are most afraid of being lost, have the nearest right to the Saviour, since he seeks them, knowing that they cannot seek him. The Lord opened the heart of a young widow of bad character to attend to what was spoken, and she thought, 'What is that? Can it be that He is come to seek and save the worst and the vilest? I am the vilest of all who are here assembled.' Immediately after the meeting she hastened to a solitary glen, and, falling on her knees, cried aloud to Jesus, 'If what I have just heard be true, that thou hast come to save the vilest, O save me, for I am the vilest of all, and must otherwise perish.' She received on the spot an assurance that her sins were forgiven her, and returning home, she related to her companions, with tears of joy and gratitude, what God had done for her soul, and how her heart was filled with such an unspeakable love to Jesus, who had thus comforted her, that she could no more serve sin as aforetime. This account, and the happiness which beamed in her eyes, made a powerful impression on three other women who lived with her, and who had never before heard of such an experience. They were all greatly moved, and were likewise awakened to new life, making the same joyful experience as the poor widow. Hitherto they had lived in constant disharmony and strife—now they manifested the greatest love for one another, and their mouths overflowed with praises to Jesus for the mercy he had shown them. This fire of love soon spread to every house. Men and women, old and young, were laid hold on by divine grace.—United Brethren's Missionary Intelligencer.

NOBLE REVENGE.—When I was a small boy, there was a black boy in the neighborhood, by the name of 'Jim Dick.' Myself and a number of my play-fellows were one evening collected together at our usual sports, and began tormenting the poor colored boy, by calling him "blackamoor," "nigger," and other degrading epithets; the poor fellow appeared excessively grieved at our conduct, and soon left us. We soon after made an appointment to go a skating in the neighborhood, and on the day of the appointment I had the misfortune to break my skates, and I could not go without borrowing a pair of Jim Dick. I went to him and asked him for them. "O yes, John, you may have them in welcome," was the answer. When I went to return them, I found Jim sitting by the fire in the kitchen, reading the Bible. I told him I had returned his skates, and was under great obligations to him for his kindness He looked at me as he took the skates, and with tears in his eyes said to me, "John, don't never call me blackamoor again," and immediately left the room.—These words pierced my heart, and I burst into tears, and from that time resolved not to abuse a poor black in future. CONSTANTINOPLE.—The latest intelligence (Feb. 7th,) from Constantinople is of the most interesting and afflictive character. Ecclesiastical persecution against the evangelical Armenians has broken out afresh and with great violence. The public excommunication of an evangelical priest was the signal for the unslaught. Numbers of serious Armenians have since been driven from their shops, manufactories, houses and friends, and not even the aged have escaped the violence; various methods have been adopted to annoy and distress the pious Armenians. The missionaries write, that such a persecution never before occurred at any of our missionary stations.

There are probably one hundred devout Armenians now driven forth from their means of daily subsistence, and from their homes and friends, by this ecclesiastical persecution; and yet, so far as they know, only two of the men—and these weak minded, though apparently good men—had even attempted to compromise with the Patriarch. They take joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and are cheerful and happy under their sufferings. But this persecution for conscience sake, instead of diminishing the interest of the people in the instructions of the missionaries, has greatly increased it; their houses are the resort of multidudes for religious instruction, and their public meetings were never more fully attended. OBSTACLES TO THE CONVERSION OF THE JEWS.

Many persons think of the Jews as a distinct and united people, set apart from every other nation by their peculiar religious opinions, and anxiously waiting for the coming of the Messiah. Hence they express not a little surprise, that only here and there an individual is brought to believe on Christ, notwithstanding so much exertion has been made on their behalf. But this surprise would be greatly modified by a familiar acquaintance with the real condition and feelings of the Jews. In one sense, it is true, they are distinct and united. Through all the changes which have marked their history, they have retained the same features, and the same bold national peculiarities; and, though scattered in every quarter of the globe, yet, instinct with cohesive power, they have ever claimed affinity for each other, and ever shown a readiness to amalgamate. At the same time, there are minor differences among them, which have at times been the occasion of coolness towards each other, if not of utter strife. But the great obstacle to their reception of Christ is deeper and more difficult to remove. Many of them are so engrossed with the cares of the world, and so successful withal in their worldly schemes, that they neither think of nor care for the Messiah. Others—and their number is very large—are exceedingly skeptical in respect to all the promises of Scripture, or have fallen into downright infidelity. When the Gospel is presented to men of this stamp, it of course meets not only with that kind of opposition which is common from all worldly men, but, in addition, it is opposed by a profession of confidence in what is regarded as another form of religion. Hence the obstacles to its reception are of the most formidable character, and such as require in an especial manner the interposition of the Spirit of God for their removal.

There are, however, among the Jewish nation, many sincere inquirers, who are not only free from skepticism, but remarkably accessible to the truth. Such persons are generally ready to hear the claims of Christianity, candid in their investigaton of them, and frank in presenting their objections. These objections are of a nature to have great influence over the minds of those who raise them. They ought therefore to be understood by those who have given occasion for them. Let us look at some of the most common, which will be met by every person who attempts to hold a controversy with an intelligent Jew.

The course which has been pursued towards the Jewish nation by the representatives of Christianity, has perhaps done more than any other one thing to prejudice them against the Gospel. Christians have always professed that their doctrines were derived from and consistent with the sacred oracles given to the Jews. Yet at a very early period in the history of the church, a deliberate attempt was made to set Christians apart from the Jews, and to secure legislation in favor of the one and against the other. The ruling motive of this movement was clearly enough expressed by Constantine the Great, when he said, "Let us have nothing in common with that odious brood, the Jews, who crucified the Lord." A wicked and revengeful spirit led him to represent them as unworthy of confidence, and to exert all his influence for their injury. Thus were they set apart from those in whom they had a right to expect friends. The work which was commenced by Constantine has been carried forward by his successors. In one form and another efforts have been made to create a distinction between Jews and Christians, and to stigmatize as mean and contemptible whatever could be regarded as in any degree Jewish. The consequence has been, that in lands called Christian, not less than in pagan lands, they have been subjected to oppression, spoliation, derision. Their property and persons have often been violated, and they have been hunted fiercely as a prey from shore to shore. France, Spain, and Germany, have at different times been stained with Jewish blood; and even in England, on several occasions, havoc has been made of this devoted people. They have been outlawed and murdered; or, robbed of their possessions, they have been sent forth homeless, hopeless wanders. It is true that the day of such things is past. But the influence of this treatment at the hands of Christians will never be wholly obliterated. While the remembrance of it is fresh in their minds, they will find in it an occasion to reject Christianity.

Again, in our familiar conversations with intelligent and pious Jews, we shall often meet with an objection drawn from the idolatries of the Christian church. The Jew has always been noted for the tenacity with which he clings to the doctrine of the Divine Unity, and the supreme contempt with which he looks upon every form of idolatry. To him the skillfully-graven image of the Virgin Mary differs in no essential respect from the coarsely-wrought image of a pagan deity. To worship the one is as wicked and degrading in his view as to worship the other. To do penance in a Christian church, he deems no more praiseworthy than to tear one's flesh at a heathen festival, or sacrifice one's life under the car of Juggernaut. Hence when he sees incense and prayer to saints or the Virgin, offered in nominally Christian churches, and under the sanction of nominally Christian teachers, he very naturally questions whether the system which they profess to believe can be legitimately derived from that which he has been taught.

Another objection, and one which is so common that it ought to be considered, is drawn from the rejection among Christians of the Sabbath of the fourth commandment. The Sabbath has ever been sacred to the Jews. They know the solemnity with which it was instituted in Paradise, when the Creator rested from all his works. They have inferred, from the time of its institution, what we have learned from the language of our Saviour, that it was made for all men. They have seen it introduced among the commandments of the Decalogue, which from their nature they suppose are binding to the end of time. They have seen proof of the Divine regard for the institution, in the fact that throughout their nation's history the richest blessings have followed its observance and the severest curses have followed its neglect. They have been told by the Christian, that Jesus Christ came not to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfill them. Yet, knowing all these things, they see the Christian church trampling upon the day which God has sanctified for a Sabbath, and hallowing a day in which he has commanded them to work. While they look upon this fact, without inquiring in regard to the time when the change was made, but taking for granted that it was done by the authority of Jesus Christ, they feel authorized in concluding, that this cannot be the long-expected Messiah, who should come to fulfill the law and the prophets, and to do the Father's will.

Such are some of the objections raised by intelligent and pious Jews when the claims of the Christian religion are urged upon them. They regard every member of the visible church as carrying out the spirit, and living up to the precepts, of the Lord Jesus Christ; and when they compare the facts among Christians upon which these objections rest, with the prophetic descriptions of the state of things which should exist under the Messiah's reign, they hesitate about throwing away Judaism, with the many proofs that it is from God, to adopt Christianity, with its persecutions, its idolatries, and its neglect of the Sabbath. Of course these objections furnish no good reason for the unbelief of the Jews. They are, however, real obstacles in the way of their conversion—obstacles which will continue to be felt while the facts continue to exist. They ought, therefore, to be understood by all Christians, especially those who are laboring for the benefit of the children of Israel.

Incendiary Newspaper.—In Wood Co., Va., they have a curious way of showing how much they prefer darkness to light. It seems that there are in that county several subscribers to the Western Christian Advocate, a Methodist paper published at Cincinnati. The Grand Jury, fearing the influence of that paper, have presented it as incendiary, asserting that the editor has avowed himself an abolitionist, and that his paper inculcates doctrines denying the right of masters in their slaves, denouncing slaveholders as monsters, and calculated to lead to insurrection and rebellion on the part of the slaves. By this decision, the paper is brought within the reach of a law which sentences it "to be burned in the presence of a magistrate." Nor is this all; to read or even receive the paper by any public or private conveyance, is "deemed an act of felony," and the person convicted thereof is liable to be "punished by imprisonment in the Penitentiary for a term of not less than two years nor more than five years." If such things are done in a State bordering on free soil—the State which has furnished this country with so many Presidents, and high civil and military officers—what may we not expect from those darker and more southern regions where slavery holds undisputed sway?

Millerism.—The last phase and present whereabouts of this ism, are presented in a paper published at Boston by J. B. Cook, entitled "The Advent Testimony." He teaches that the Adventists were mistaken, not as to the time, but as to the manner, of Christ's coming, they having looked for it literally instead of spiritually. His theory is explained by the parable of the virgins, and he says that we have already passed the preparation of the virgins, the going forth to meet the bridegroom, the tarrying at the door, the midnight cry, the coming of the bridegroom, the going in of those that were ready, the shutting of the door; and now is the confusion at the door. The next event, according to Mr. Cook, will be the answer of the Lord to those who insist on entering, "I know you not."

War Prayers.—The Archbishop of Canterbury, in compliance with instructions from e proper officer, has prepared a form of prayer and thanksgiving to Almighty God for the victories lately vouchsafed to the British arms,' "over a host of barbarous invaders who sought to spread desolation over fruitful and populous provinces enjoying the blessings of peace under the protection of the British Crown." Prayers have also been offered up in all the Anglican Churches throughout Great Britain for the success of the war against the Sikhs. There are many persons who will doubt the policy and good taste of such a movement, thinking that to connect the name of the Great Ruler of Mankind with the slaughter of His creatures, is neither Christian-like nor philanthropic.

England and Rome.—From the following statement, it would seem that the conversion of all England to Popery is by no means despaired of at Rome:—"At the feast of St. Gregory, which was celebrated on the 12th March, in the Church of Montecello, in the Convent of the Benedictines, a triduo had been ordered on the occasion, to demand from the Almighty the conversion of England. A number of English Catholics had joined in the pious ceremony, and the remainder of the month of March was to be devoted to prayer for that intention."

☞ The following article, from the Michigan Christian Herald, speaks our mind exactly. But we do not understand how the writer of it, if he believes what he says, can justify his own practice respecting one of the oldest moral and "positive" institutions revealed in the word of God. It is written, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." Now how to reconcile that positive command to do no work on the seventh day, with the common practice of making the seventh day the busiest day of the week, without violating the principles laid down in the article below, is what puzzles us. Will the editor of the Herald throw some light upon the question?

POSITIVE INSTITUTIONS.

The emphasis with which positive institutions are marked in the revelation of God's will, and the peculiar approbation which is bestowed upon the due observance of them, is worthy of remark. Why are such weight and importance attributed to what seems in itself to possess no moral value? Why are the leading promises and blessings which are peculiar to every dispensation of divine truth made to depend apparently more upon these arbitrary enactments than upon the more valuable dictates of the moral law. God was pleased to test the obedience and fidelity of man in innocence by such a command. And this recorded fact has often been made the object of unbelieving cavils. The reason of it, however, is profound and important. The moral duties arising naturally out of our relation to each other, would be of force independent of God's express command, and might be, nay they often are, discharged irrespective of His will. But positive institutions have no reason or force, and cannot be obligatory, except upon the express command of the sovereign authority. Consequently our observance of them is the best possible proof of our regard to that authority. Such was the command given to Adam, that he should not eat of the fruit of the tree in the midst of the garden—that given to Abraham and his descendants, that they should circumcise their male children on the 8th day, and that given to believers under the gospel, that they be baptized—and that they commemorate the Lord's death in the breaking of bread. These all rest on the simple and express institution by God. And from the nature of the case, our obedience must be simple and implicit. We have nothing to do with the reason of the thing, Adam must not ask "why am I forbidden the fruit of this tree more than of any other?" Abraham must not ask, "might not something else have done as well as circumcision? Is there not as much virtue, as much sanctifying power, in the point of a needle as in the edge of a knife?" We must do the very thing which God has commanded; we must do it, simply because He has commanded it, and then we give the best possible proof of our reverence of His authority, and most emphatically avow our allegiance to Him as our rightful sovereign.

The World's Convention.—It seems probable from present indications, that the American churches will be numerously and ably represented at the great Convention to be held in London in August next. The Synod of New York and New Jersey has appointed no less than six clerical delagates, most of whom expect to attend. The Eastern Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, has also appointed six delegates. Other denominations are making appointments with equal liberality. Although we have no very high hopes from the Evangelical Alliance or Union which it is proposed to form or consolidate, we think much good may be expected from the opportunity which will be afforded influential religious men to become personally acquainted with each other. It will do more than diplomacy to promote peace and brotherhood among the nations.

One sided Liberality.—In the western part of the State of Maine there are many churches usually known as "Bullockits," from the name of their leader, who was some years ago excluded from the Free-will Baptists. They have been somewhat notorious for discarding all sectarian trammels, and holding to the greatest liberality. Recently, however, one of their ministers proposed to his quarterly meeting a question concerning the subject of temperance, to which he insisted upon having an answer. But instead of an answer, he received a notice of his own exclusion. It seems, therefore, that the members of this "liberal" ecclesiastical body, while they claim for themselves the liberty of being intemperate, will not grant to others the liberty of talking against intemperance. This is what we call one-sided liberality.

English Baptist Anniversaries.—The annual meetings of the various benevolent societies among the Baptists of England, took place last week. From a document received in this country, it appears that Sunday, April 28, was selected as a day to take collections for the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society. Arrangements had been made for the preaching of no less than one hundred and forty sermons on that day in London and its vicinity, each sermon to be followed by a collection for foreign missions.

A New Movement.—A new class of fanatics has just sprung up in Pennsylvania, claiming to be the forerunners of Elijah. They are followers of Sidney Rigdon, who is believed by them to have received an immediate revelation from heaven. An ecclesiastical government has been organized under a board of directors, called the Board of Twelve. This Twelve have published an epistle, in which they say:—

"In obedience to the revelation of heaven, we hasten to communicate to you the joyful intelligence that the land pointed out by the Lord for the gathering of his people, has been purchased, and the deed secured. The land is situated in Cumberland Valley, Franklin Co., Pa., one mile from Green Castle. The word of the Lord, through our President and Prophet, is, 'that the door is now open for the gathering of my people, and the less delay the better for them, verily, verily, thus saith the Lord.'"

Praiseworthy.—In Philadelphia, a plan has been started, and will probably be carried out, for the physical relief and moral instruction of the poor, irrespective of sex, color, religion, or place of birth. It is proposed to erect a building capable of sheltering two thousand persons, where employment will be furnished to those who are taken in, giving to each a fair compensation for his or her services. To allay the apprehensions of the working classes, that a combination of labor may lead to the lowering of prices, committees from the different trades are to regulate the sale prices of the articles manufactured. If this plan can be carried out, it will do more than indiscriminate alms-giving ever can do to improve the condition of the poor.

Protests.—Three hundred and sixty gentlemen of Bangor, (Maine,) have signed and published a Protest against allowing a steamboat to arrive at that place on Sunday. If such protests were of any use, a good occasion might be found for issuing one from New York. For, strange as it may seem after what has been said in newspapers and conventions against the desecration of Sunday, we have never known a time when it was so common for steamboats to start from this city on Sunday as during the present season.

Special Providence.—Cassius M. Clay, speaking of the men who were foremost in persecuting him during the hour of his prostration and weakness, says that the misfortunes of some of them, particularly Mr. Marshall, have stripped him of whatever resentment he felt at liberty to indulge. He has only had to sit still, and see the startling denunciation of Scripture, "Vengeance is mine, and I will repay," literally fulfilled. The following are his words:—

"Not one year has passed since the mob of the 18th, and yet we have lived to see some of its most prominent advocates drinking the bitter cup which they would have thrust upon us. Some have been publicly disgraced; some have suffered the loss of friends and family—some have been reduced to poverty—some have gone to that bourne whence no traveler returns; and some are now walking about among men, in the full tide of reason and strength, with the horrid image of inevitable death before their eyes daily, with haggard countenances, showing their consciences are bloody with the crime of proposed murder!—living over the four days and more, which they inflicted on a supposed dying man! However much we attempt to dispel the idea of a special Providence, when men see these things, reflection will seize on the mind—remorse upon the soul—and we venture to say, that not one of all those triumphant thousands, who in August perpetrated the foulest crime known among men, will pass away, without bitterly regretting that day."

The Conscience of the Duelist.—Upon this subject the editor of the Baptist Register has the following remarks, which deserve the consideration of those who think lightly of the subject of dueling:—

"Ritchie who killed Pleasants has been tried and acquitted, and the seconds also. To be acquitted by an earthly tribunal is one thing, and by conscience is another:—and that the conscience of Ritchie will ever be pacified without deep penitence, we do not believe, even in that sad section where the spirit of dueling is cultivated. We remember well the duel between Acker and Hamilton, the latter the son of Gen. Alex. Hamilton, and both young men of great promise. Hamilton fell from the ball of Acker, as did his father shortly after from that of Burr. But Acker never recovered from the wound he had inflicted on his own soul. He immediately withered under its corroding influence, and sunk into an early grave. Burr's conscience was too much seared to feel any thing; but for years he was a vagabond on earth; and when he ventured back to the city of New York, the world looked on him as a murderer, and he never rose above the gradation of infamy. The duelist who kills his antagonist, if a harrowing conscience does not hasten him to a speedy grave, universal odium will rest upon him until he reaches it. Honor is the object of the conflict, and if death ensue honor is the very last thing secured. No one can go over even in part the duels that have disgraced our nation, and not find that public reproach has invariably followed those who have engaged in them."

Expensive Doctrine.—The following calculation gives some idea of the cost of the doctrine of purgatory to the members of the Catholic Church. If a single "bank of piety" does such an immense business, what must be the sum paid to similar institutions throughout the world?

"It appears from a calculation made by the editor of the Calendar, that the price for praying a soul out of purgatory is between eight and nine-tenths of a mass, and from thirty to thirty-eight francs. The calculation is based upon a public statement, which has for some years past been posted in the churches of Madrid, which declares that 'The sacred and royal bank of piety has, since its foundation in 1721, to Nov. 1826, delivered from purgatory one million thirty thousand, three hundred and ninety-five souls; eleven thousand four hundred and two souls from Nov. 1829 to Nov. 1837. The net cost of delivering all these souls from purgatory, was upwards of forty-three millions of francs; and a little over half a million of masses. So it seems that a great many more francs than masses are required to get a soul out of suffering. These forty-three millions francs, it will be recollected, are only what are paid into the royal bank of piety for the liberation of souls from purgatory; and are but a mere trifle in comparison to what the Romish priests fleece out of their ignorant followers in the way of pardons, indulgences, and numerous other inventions of the mother of abominations.'"

Caution.—A correspondent who recently visited New York, says: "The traveling public should be cautioned against the swindlers in your city who pretend to engage conveyances westward on the canal with cheapness and dispatch. They are a set of cheats and liars. Travelers should purchase tickets only for one stage at a time."

The New Volume—New Subscribers.—Six numbers more will complete the second volume of the Sabbath Recorder. We are making arrangements to bring out the third volume in an entire new dress, and under circumstances which will greatly increase the interest and value of the paper. No pains shall be spared on our part to render it all that its warmest friends desire. And now we have one request to present to those who would see the Recorder live and flourish, which is, that they will make an immediate effort to increase the number of our subscribers and readers. It is a hard task, at best, to sustain a denominational paper; and that task is greatly increased when the friends of the enterprise fail to give it their hearty and active co-operation. But if each person who ought to feel the same interest with ourselves in sustaining the paper, would make a little exertion for that object, there would be no difficulty. Brethren and Friends, will you do it? We hope to hear from you before the commencement of the new volume.

DeRuyter Institute.—The Summer Term of DeRuyter Institute opened on Wednesday of last week, April 29. It will be seen that Mrs. Lucy M. Carpenter, whose qualifications are well known, is for the present to occupy the responsible station of Preceptress. An accomplished teacher of Music has also been engaged, who will give instructions upon the Piano. Farther particulars may be learned by reference to the advertisment in another column.

The Chronotype.—Elizur Wright, Jr., the translator of La Fontaine's Fables, and author of an interesting series of letters from England which went the rounds a year or two ago, has been for some time past editing a daily paper in Boston called the Chronotype. We are glad to learn, that his daily has succeeded so well that he now proposes to issue a weekly, to contain all the reading matter of the daily, including the Gropings in Great Britain. Price $2 a year in advance.

A Speech of the Right Stamp.—The New-Jersey Methodist Missionary Society held its anniversary in Newark last week, at which appropriate speeches were made by several persons. While the contributions were being made, Dr. Bond of New-York, begged the privilege of making a short speech, which he assured the audience, should be more practical than any they had heard. Being requested to proceed, he related the anecdote of several literary gentlemen being together with Lord Dorset and the poet Dryden; when it was agreed that each, (with the exception of Dryden,) should write a composition, the comparative merits of which Dryden was to decide. Lord Dorset wrote a sentence and threw it on the table for the consideration of the umpire, while the others produced their labored articles. Dryden arose and said, "Gentlemen, you have all done well, but the preference is due to Lord Dorset's His reads, 'I promise to pay John Dryden, £500.' Here, now, said Dr. B. is my speech—it is borrowed, to be sure, but it reads, "I promise to this missionary cause $200." The Dr. held up the $200 notes, and the contribution went on with increasing interest, and about $4,000 were secured —3,600 toward a new Methodist Mission for China.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

Congress was in session only a part of last week, having adjourned over from Thursday to Monday to allow time for cleansing the Houses, and preparing them for summer.

The most important business was the passage of the bill to establish the Smithsonian Institute. The following synopsis of it is taken from the National Intelligencer :—

Sec. 1. Provides that the President, the heads of the Executive Department, the Chief Justice, Commissioner of the Patent Office, and the Mayor of Washington, with such other persons as they may elect honorary members, shall be constituted an establishment by the name of "the Smithsonian Institution," and to have perpetual succession.

Sec. 2. The principal of this bequest ($515,-169) is loaned in perpetuity to the United States, at 6 per cent, from the first of September, 1838; and the interest which has already accrued ($242,120) is appropriated to the erection of buildings and other expenses.

Sec. 3. The business to be conducted by a Board of Regents, to be composed of the Vice-President, the Chief Justice, the Mayor of Washington, three Senators, and three Representatives, with six other persons, two of whom shall be members of the National Institute in the city of Washington, and the other four residents of the States. The Regents to appoint one of their number as Chancellor, who shall be the presiding officer; also a Secretary and other neeessary officers.

Sec. 4. A site to be selected by the Regents for the necessary buildings; which site may be taken out of the public grounds lying between the Patent Office and Seventh-street, if the President and the Heads of the Executive Departments assent to such selection; if not, then to be taken from any public grounds within the city.

Sec. 5. Provides for the erection of the buildings, in which accommodation is to be made for the reception and arrangement, upon a liberal scale, of objects of Natural History, including a Geographical and Mineralogical Cabinet—a Chemical Laboratory, Library, Gallery of Arts, and necessary lecture rooms—which buildings, if on the Patent Office square, may so connect with the Patent Office building as to form, in appearance, a wing to that building.

Sec. 6. All articles of art and curious research, all objects of natural history, plants, geological and mineralogical specimens, belonging or to belong to the United States, which may be in the city of Washington, to be delivered up to the Institution, and the books, manuscripts, minerals, cabinet, &c. of Mr. Smithson to be also delivered up and deposited in the building.

Sec. 7. The Secretary to be librarian and keeper of the museum, and to employ assistants.

Sec. 8. From the interest of the fund an appropriation, not exceeding an average of $25,000 annually, is made for the gradual formation of a library, to be composed of works pertaining to all departments of human knowledge.

Sec. 9. Any accruing interest not herein appropriated, or required for the purposes specified in the act, may be disposed of as the Regents may deem best for the promotion of the purposes of the testator.

EIGHT DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Steamship Cambria, which left Liverpool on the 19th of April, was run ashore near Cape Cod, on Saturday night last. It is believed, however, that she will be got off without much delay or damage. On Sunday morning two passengers were landed, who came on to Boston, arriving at 4 o'clock P. M.

News had been received, that on Thursday, 16th ult., Louis Philippe, king of France, was fired upon while taking his ride in the front of Fontainebleau, by a man seated on the wall. The Queen, Princess Adelaide, the Dutchess of Nemours, the Prince and Princess of Salome, were in the carriage with the king. Three balls cut the fringes but no one was hurt. The Queen picked up a piece of the wadding. The assassin was immediately arrested. His name was Lecompie, and he was an old general, guardian of the forest of Fontainebleau.

Cotton has advanced half a penny to a farthing a pound, in consequence of the news by the the Hibernia, confirming the previous accounts of defect in the amount of the crops.

Business of almost every description was still in an uncertain and stagnant state.

The corn and iron trade remained about the same as at last accounts.

Matters in Ireland were growing worse and worse. The accounts of the famine in that country are truly deplorable.

The printing establishment of Messrs. Stevenson & Co., printers to the University, in Edinburgh, has been destroyed by fire. This establishment was remarkable for its rich collection of characters in all the Asiatic tongues, especially the Chinese, and the estimated amount of loss is large.

Sir Robert Peel had taken an opportunity in Parliament, to claim credit for Government for having ordered a supply of Indian Corn to meet the necessities of the starving people in Ireland and England. He said his only regret was that Government had not ordered more, but it had been deterred by its unwillingness to interfere with the regular course of business.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

West Indian Yams.—A small importation of three tons of this nutritious root has just been received from St. Kitt's, to ascertain its availability for the purpose of food in this country, and a great many have found their way to the shops at the West End, where they are being sold as luxuries for the table. When cooked, either by roasting or boiling, the root is much more nutritious than the potato, nor is it possessed of any unpalatable flavor, the peculiarity being between that of rice and the potato. Dressed in milk or mashed they are absolutely a delicacy; and, from the abundance in which they are cultivated in the West Indies and other parts, they promise the most economical and nutritious substitute for the potato.

A Tobacco Speculator.—The Courier Francais says: "We learn that M. de Rothschild has arranged an affair that will ensure him the monopoly of tobacco, not only in France, but throughout the continent of Europe. He has for some time had agents in America to buy by anticipation the growth of all the plantations for a great many years to come. Thirty millions of francs have been appropriated to this vast speculation. The news has spread alarm among the capitalists who have entered into contracts with the Royal Tobacco Manufactory, as it will soon be impossible for them to supply their tobacco at the first stipulated prices."

Chimpanzee or African Ourang Outang.—Among the numerous articles of curiosity which go out by the "Great Western," is a living Chimpanzee, or African Ourang Outang—said to be now the only living specimen in England, and is universally pronounced the finest and most extraordinary animal of the kind ever seen. Its hands, face, and feet, possess as fair, soft, and white skin, as those of any child living. Its laugh, cry, and actions are as much human as if it indeed was a child six or eight years old. It is the property of Mr. P. T. Barnum, for which, we are informed, he paid 3,000 dollars.

The tide of emigration to America from Ireland, has set in this year earlier than usual. The quays at Cork are crowded to inconvenience with passengers and luggage. Already one vessel has sailed with a full compliment of passengers; and twenty-three others, with nearly four thousand emigrants, are preparing at that port for sea.

The Emperor of Russia has just made known by an Ukase, that the right of all property acquired from the produce of the fine arts is fixed during the whole life of the artists, and for twenty-five years after their decease, for the benefit of their heirs.

On Sunday, the Agerma, 500 tons, arrived at St. Katharine Docks from Boston, with 25 cases of turkeys, geese, and capons; also, six boxes of red reindeer of superior quality. They were packed in ice to preserve them. We believe this to be the first importation of the kind.

Thirteen pictures, from the collection of the late Joseph Bonaparte, ex-King of Spain, have been brought from his palace at Bordentown, U. S., and are being exhibited in London, prior to being sold by auction.

It is said that the line-of-battle ships in England, and all steamers on the home station that are not specially employed, will be assembled together in about a month, as an experimental squadron.

Marrying in Jest.—The Legislature of this State has refused to annul the marriage of Miss Lillie, who, it will be recollected, stood up and was married during a sleighing frolic. It is hard, but just. A ceremony of such importance is not a fit subject for mockery. As she married at haste, she must repent at leisure.

The facts of the case are simply these, and they should operate as a caution to all in future not to practice such jests on a very serious subject. The parties were on a sleighing frolic with several friends, and in going out, a marriage was proposed between the two parties in a jocose manner, when they arrived at the public house, but the lady was cautioned, that if she stood up to be married it would hold good in law, and she replied, "why of course." A Justice of the Peace was called in, and informed that his judicial services were required, but finding all the parties were so full of mirth and glee, he admonished sobriety becoming the occasion, and they promised to behave more decorously. The parties thereupon got up again on the floor, and Mr. Hill said to Miss Lillie—"Are you willing to get married?" She said "yes." They stood on the floor, and Mr. Diamond and Miss Robbins stood up with them. The justice said to the whole company, "If I marry you, there is no undoing, I think." He then asked Miss Lillie the following question; "Miss Lillie, are you willing to get married?" "Perfectly willing," she answered. He then said to Mr. Hall, "Are you willing to join in matrimony?" Mr. Hall hung his head and did not answer. The question being repeated, he replied, "yes sir." The justice then, after again asking Miss Lillie the question before propounded to her and receiving the same answer, pronounced them man and wife. Mr. Hall, the gentleman married, asked for a certificate, and Miss Lillie said she thought she was entitled also to one, which were made out, the marriage regularly published in the papers, and the justice receiving six dollars for his trouble. The parties, on arriving home, separated, and the next morning Mr. Hall called on Miss Lillie, and she desired him to get her out of the scrape, as she was assured they could not live happily together. The Senate Committee, on hearing the facts, unanimously reported against the bill; so the lady must be content to stay married.

The Temple at Nauvoo.—The St. Louis Republican of April 16th, says: We are gratified to learn that there is a prospect of converting the Temple, recently erected by the Mormons, to a useful and most charitable purpose. A wealthy gentleman from the South arrived here a few days since, en route, to purchase the Temple, if it can be bought for a reasonable price. His object, we understand, is to convert the Temple into an asylum for destitute widows and females, and to purchase lands and town lots, and endow it out of the rents of them. The scheme is not only a magnificent one, but is conceived in a spirit of liberality and munificence which should hand the benefactor's name to the latest posterity. The author of this liberal proposition, we understand, is a bachelor, far advanced in life. If he is successful in his project, he will contribute much to the improvement and development of that section of our country. We hope, for the cause of humanity, that he may be successful.

A Three Mile Painting.—A Mr. Bouvard has been industriously engaged in Louisville for several years in designing and painting a grand panorama of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, on a canvass covering an extent of three miles. He has now completed, it is said, the Mississippi river from New-Orleans to Vicksburg, giving views of all the towns, islands, and sugar and cotton plantations, between those places. Every thing is given with truth and accuracy, and with the finest scenic effect. Beautiful moonlight scenes, magnificent forests, the richest shrubbery, steamboats majestically ploughing their way through the water, or taking in freight and wood; "broadhorns" quietly floating down the stream, and all the features which characterize the Western rivers, are portrayed by Mr. Bouvard with wonderful force. The Mississippi will be completed in two or three months, when Mr. B. designs bringing it East.

Breach of Promise.—During the session of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, which was begun at Lowell, April 13, two cases for breach of promise of marriage have been tried. In the first, Caroline Frost sued Wheelock Newton for breach of promise of marriage and seduction, claiming $2,000 damages. The Jury gave the plaintiff a verdict for $2,500—$500 more than she claimed. She can avail herself of only $2,-000, the amount claimed. Por Newton got badly frost-bitten. Both of the parties belonged to West Cambridge, Mass., and are very young; and their connections are highly espectable. In the other case, Lucella Pearl sued Philander Chesswell for breach of promise of marriage and seduction, and the jury gave a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $2,000. The girls of Massachusetts are not to be trifled with.

A New Female Sect.—A new female sect has just appeared in a part of Ohio, called "The Female Kings," who assert that the order of nature has been reversed—that the time has now arrived when "the last shall be first"—consequently that woman is the lord of creation, and man her servant. They sit in judgment upon the saints; are endowed with eternal life; are proof against injury; and are under the special care of the Lord—fed, clothed, and preserved by his power. They have succeeded in making a great many converts, and the infatuated creatures have left their families, and are wandering about without scrip, and without purse, taking no thought for the morrow, led, as they think, by the Spirit, "to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth."

Curious Law.—In the records of South Reading, Mass., the following entry is found, under the date of 1662:

"This year the town ordered that no woman, maid, boy or gall, shall sit in the south alley of the Meeting-house, upon the penalty of paying twelve pence for each day they shall sit in the alley after the present day. It was further ordered that every dog that comes to the meeting, after the present day, either of Lord's or lecture days, except it be their dogs that pays for a dog whipper, the owner of those dogs shall pay six pence for every time they come to the meeting."

Punishment of Death.—It is ascertained that those countries where the population are generally characterized by a readiness to resort to violence, are the very countries where the example of capital punishment is most frequently set forth. Thus in Spain, "that wretched land where assassinations abound in the streets, on the mountain sides, on the high roads, in the cottages, and in the palace itself," there were from 1832 to 1837, yearly executions in the proportion of one to every 122,000 inhabitants. The proportion in Sweden being one in 172,000; in Ireland, one in 200,000; in England, one in 250,000; in Baden, one in 400,000; in France, one in 470,000; in Norway, one in 750,000; in Austria, one in 840,000; in Prussia, one 1,700,000; in Bavaria, one in 2,-000,000; and in Belgium, since 1830, not one.

SUMMARY.

On Saturday night last the incendiaries did a great business in New-York. No less than thirteen fires were kindled between 10 o'clock in the evening and 5 in the morning. The damage was not very great in any instance.

The recent election for delegates to a Convention to revise the Constitution of the State of New-York, resulted in the choice of 77 democrats, and 51 whigs.

A girl about 19 years of age, while crossing the Bowery near Third-street, about 9 o'clock Saturday morning, was knocked down and run over by one of the Harlem Railroad cars, and instantly killed.

The Legislature of New-Jersey, on the 30th of January, 1845, chartered the "Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Co.," with a provision that the Legislature may at any time amend or repeal the charter, and that it shall continue in operation twenty years and no longer. Of course all those who insure in that office must calculate to die before January 1865.

The overland mail from London to India, now carried through Belgium and Austria, via Trieset, once in three weeks, usually contains 40,000 letters, which, with the newspapers, make a total of 50 cwt.

It is stated in the Fayettville Observer, that a Mr. William Aridgen died lately in Bladen County, N. C., in the one hundred and twenty-fourth year of his age. He was in the Army of the Revolution, and served through it as a volunteer, then an old man. He has left great grand-children over forty years of age.

An English paper says that on a Saturday evening the Rev. W. H. George, rector of Spaxton, Somerset, was preaching from Ecclesiastes, 12, 7, "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return to God who gave it," and had just observed that he would divide his subject into two parts, when he reeled, fell back insensible, and in two hours was a corpse.

As I approve of a youth that has something of the old man in him, so I am not less pleased with an old man that has something of the youth. He that follows this rule may be old in body, but never can be so in mind.

Somebody says that there are more lies told in the brief sentence, 'I am glad to see you,' than in any other single sentence in the English language.

The Royal Printing Office in France possesses fonts of type in upwards of a hundred different languages, twenty of which are Oriental dialects. To this splendid collection has recently been added the Egyptian Hieroglypics.

It is the custom in Russia for a soldier who happens to meet an officer standing in the street, to come to a halt, and not to move forward until his superior starts, if he should stand still twenty-four hours.

It is estimated that sixteen millions of people have visited the remains of Napoleon since they were entombed at the Invalides, at Paris.

In the Institution at Hamilton, lately incorporated as the Madison University, there is a student who is a native of Hindostan—his name is Samuel I. Smith. He expects to return to his native land. There is also in the theological department a native of Germany, who expects to labor among his countrymen in America.

Dr. Joseph Maull, acting Governor of Delaware, died May 3d, after a short illness, aged 58 years.

The loose manner in which some social organizations make their officers, is illustrated by the fact, that a Mr. Gifford, late of Sandwich, Mass., has been annually elected a vice president of the A. S. Society, though he has been dead for several years.

The New-York Evangelist almost wishes that the negotiation respecting Oregon, could have been transferred to Mrs. Polk and Victoria.

The Methodists in Texas have upwards of 1000 negroes in their connection.

Every father and mother should provide themselves with a library of interesting books, taking care to add to it from day to day, according to their means, such new productions as are really of value. A few dollars thus laid out will bring them a better interest, if they can look for it in the advancement of their offspring, than if invested in the most gainful of stocks.

Mr. N. Emmons Ide, of Boston, a brother of Mrs. Torrey, went to Baltimore last week, to take in behalf of the family, a last leave of Mr. Torrey, in the hospital of the Maryland penitentiary—Mrs. Torrey's health being so feeble that she was unable to visit her dying husband. Mr. Ide, on his return, represents Mr. Torrey to be drawing near the close of life. He would not be surprised any day to hear of his decease, and thought it hardly probable he could survive another week. He must die—a martyr to his love of liberty and justice.

A chap from the country, stopping at one of the hotels, being asked by the waiter whether he would have green or black tea, replied, 'he didn't care what color it was, so as it had plenty of sweetnin' in it.'

The following notice appeared on the west end of a country meeting-house: 'Any person sticking bills against this church will be prosecuted according to law, or any other nuisance.'

His Excellency W. Ferguson, Governor of Sierra Leone, died on his passage to England on the 19th of February. He had only held his office a few months.

Professor Olmstead has been injured in the eyes and face, by the bursting of a glass tube, while preparing it for experiments on gas, in Yale College.

Livingston and Wells have received part of the money stolen by Harrington Hatch and others; and last week paid over to the parties interested fifty cents on the dollar for the respective amounts forwarded for them, say some $10,000 or $15,-000.

The Sun says that letters by the Great Western from high sources, say that the Oregon question is settled—and give the details, viz. 49 to the Straits of Fuca, and then through said Straits to the Pacific, leaving the whole of Vancouver's Island to Great Britain, the navigation of the Columbia for a term of years, &c.

The Boston Courier says, Money has been decidedly easier a few days past, and the mercantile community have nearly recovered from the panic which was caused by the recent agitation of the Oregon and Sub-Treasury schemes.

The Apalachicola (Florida) Advertiser records the destruction of a large panther, which was shot at the distance of three miles from that place. He had been frequently heard and occasionally seen last summer, prowling in the neighborhood, and had caused quite an excitement. He was found to measure ten feet from the nose to the tip of the tail, and had claws and tusks from an inch and a half to two inches long.

The Canal tolls at West Troy for the first six days of navigation were $27,270 against $27,841 same time last year. The clearances were 333 against 301 and the merchandize cleared 19,369,-300 lbs. against 15,068,500 lbs.

A negro was whipped to death at Vienna, Illinois, a few days ago. He was suspected of having robbed Mr. Kersey during the night previous, of $100, and it was to extort a confession of the crime from him.

The Washington Copper Mine near Somerville, N. J., has been sold for a large sum to a Boston company; the old Bridgewater mines are being cleared out; a mine at Griggstown is pronounced rich; one near New-Brunswick is exciting attention; and companies with capitals of four millions were chartered the last season of the New-Jersey Legislature. So says the Telegraph.

The Mormons are leaving Hancock County, Ill., so rapidly, and in such numbers, that military force has been deemed entirely unnecessary, and, accordingly, the troops have been disbanded, and affairs are once more assuming a quiet aspect. If the influx of those who are to occupy the deserted farms of the Saints is as great as is expected, this will hereafter be one of the most prosperous counties in the Union:—that is, provided the new inhabitants are sober, and honest, and industrious.

The Indians of Florida having been in the habit of extracting a valuable oil from the Alligator, equal to the best Sperm, the white settlers have gone into the business by wholesale. An expedition has left St. Augustine for the river of St. Johns, and the dark tributary stream of Black Creek, swarming with these hideous creatures, with the view of killing them to obtain their oil.

We understand, says the European Times, from an authority on which we can rely, that we are likely to have large supplies of sugar from China. In fact, it is said that the Chinese can supply an unlimited quantity, and that already 20,000 tons have been shipped. The quality is rather white and crystalized, and including first cost and expense of transit, it will stand in about 30s per cwt,; being the produce of free labor, it will be admitted in England at the low duty.

The immense clock for the spire of Trinity Church will be put up in about a month. It weighs about 7,000 lbs., and will cost $1,000. The pendulum is twenty feet long, weighs two hundred pounds, and vibrates twenty-four times in a minute. The clock is built by Mr. Rogers, and is the largest ever constructed in the United States.

The receipts of the exhibition of Inman's paintings were about $2,000, which the Committee have invested for the benefit of the widow and family of the deceased.

The Cleveland Herald says: "On Friday morning we observed a wagon passing up Superior-st. in front of our office, with three men and six women, and seats for more. One of the men stood up with his head uncovered, and proclaimed in a loud voice that rung through the streets—"Oh yes! oh yes! oh yes! the kingdoms of this earth are at an end, and time shall be no longer!"

News has just been received from the Sandwich Islands of the loss by fire of the American whaler Helvetia, Capt. Porter, of New London, Ct. She was lying in port ready for sea, where she was fired probably by an incendiary.

The bill for the abolition of capital punishment, has been rejected in the Massachusetts Senate, by a vote of 17 yeas to 19 nays.

A bet made to decide a dispute, is a proof that the parties are more willing to pay for their folly than to confess it.

Southern papers state that Thomas F. Marshall has determined to renounce politics, and give his whole attention to the Temperance enterprise.

The American Agriculturalist says that a pound of lean, juicy mutton, can be raised for half the cost of the same quantity of fat pork.

There were received at the N. Y. City Alms-House in 1845, from June to January 1846, one hundred and forty-nine foundlings.

Seven States and one Territory border on the great lakes, making the extent of lake coast about 5,000 miles.

DIED,

In Westerly, R. I., on the 19th of January last, Arnold Saunders, in the 83d year of his age. He was confined to his bed about seventy days with a broken limb. Much of this time he was in severe pain, which he bore with Christian fortitude. He was a member of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton for more than fifty years, and adorned his profession by a meek and quiet life.

Also, on the 22d of April, after a short illness of about six hours, Hannah Vars, wife of Charles Vars, in the 26th year of her age. She has left a deeply-afflicted husband and four children to mourn their loss; but they mourn not as those without hope. C. C.

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 22d ult., of fever, Horace F., son of Franklin and Lydia Barber, in the sixth year of his age. The fairest flowers bloom to die.

SOLILOQUY OF A HORSE,

In the Treadmill of a Beer-Brewing Establishment.

From day to day I tread this wheel,
And pull with all my might—
While from my head to hoofs, I feel
The work my spirits blight.

Would I could travel in the street,
Or run, as others, round—
Or that my aching, swollen feet,
Might rest the cooling ground.

But uplift here, I'm doomed to go
Upon this cursed thing—
To rack good wheat for human woe,
And make grim devils sing.

I hear the organ cogs I play,
And spirits of the choir—
And often to myself I say,
Your lay is "quenchless fire."

Then sick at heart I slack my pace,
But soon the Leader screams—
"Come up, you devil!" give to grace
Your saint-like idle dreams.

'Tis false! a devil I am not,
I have no heart of steel—
I only turn—as I would not—
A sort of devil's wheel.

Horse as I am, and called a thing
Of monied worth alone—
Your work makes every hair a sting,
A blade of every bone.

I'd rather on my naked back
Trot death without a pad—
Than God's good grain for brewers crack,
Nor should I feel so bad—

To have my cousins Bob and Bill,
And horses in this place,
Call me "a beer-brewing mill"—
O what a deep disgrace!

So I'll kick out, and off, away—
Whiffle tree, traces, door!
Stand off! my heels now briskly play,
As you ne'er saw before.

"Woa! woa! Charley, woa, woa I say"—
Ah, sir! why don't you yell,
"Go on, you devil?"—Sure you may,
And bid yourself where devils dwell.

Growth of Holiness.

If a person is holy, how can he be more holy? If he is perfectly holy how can he increase his holiness? These are questions, which are frequently asked, and which it is desirable satisfactorily to answer.

That a thing may be perfect in its nature, and yet be susceptible in its growth of advancement in degree, is, I suppose, a matter of common observation. An oak when it first rises above the surface of the ground, is so small and weak, that it may be easily trodden under foot; and yet it is as really and truly an oak as when it subsequently stands forth in the strength and age of an hundred years. A human being is in his nature as much a human being in the period of infancy, as in the subsequent expansion and growth of manhood. And so consider a man in relation to any intellectual power of the mind, or in relation to any appetite or affection of the mind, and the same view may very properly be taken. A person is a reasoner, for instance; he understands perfectly the principles and process of reasoning, and he may be able to apply the principles and process perfectly in a given case; and yet under the favorable influence of the law of habit, he may much increase the promptness and facility, and consequent perfection, in the operations of this mental faculty. Again, an intemperate man may become perfectly temperate, and yet we all know the general fact, that one, who is thus entirely reformed from intemperance, is more likely to be overcome by temptation in the earlier periods of his reformation, than when subsequently the temperate principle has acquired growth and strength.

And we may not only say in general terms, that there may be a growth in perfection, but may assert further, that the thing which is most perfect, if it be susceptible of growth at all, will have the most sure and rapid growth. Which grows most and in the best manner, the flower which is whole and perfect in its incipient state, or that which has a canker in it or otherwise injured and defective in its parts? Which will grow the most rapidly and symetrically, the child which is perfect in its infancy, or one which is afflicted with some mal-formation? Illustrations and facts of this kind seem to make it clear that the spiritually renovated state of mind, which is variously called holiness, perfect love, and sanctification, may be susceptible of growth or increase. It is not only evident that there is no natural or physical impossibility in it, but, as has been intimated, we may go farther, and lay it down as a general truth, that perfection in the nature of a thing is requisite to perfection in degree. And accordingly, although it is possible for a person who is partially holy to grow in holiness, a person who is entirely holy, although he may be assailed by unfavorable influences to growth in holiness will not only be much less in the latter case than in the former; but that inward vitality, which is necessary to the great expansion and progress, will possess a positive and effective power, unknown under other circumstances.

These views not only commend themselves to common observation, and the lights of human reason, but we remark, in the second place, that they are also fully in accordance with what we are taught in the Scriptures. We learn in relation to John the Baptist, that he was filled with the Holy Ghost from his birth, and that consequently he was sanctified from that early period. But when we contemplate him in after life, in the temptations and labors he underwent, in his faithful preaching, in his stern rebukes of wickedness in high places as well as low, in his imprisonment, and in the general growth and expansion of his matured and consecrated powers, can there possibly be any difficulty in ascribing to him a growth in holiness? Does not the opposite idea, viz, that in the degree of holiness he was not more advanced than at the period of his birth, carry an absurdity upon the very face of it? And we may remark further, that it is expressly said of him, "And the child grew, and waxed STRONG IN SPIRIT." The Saviour also was holy from the very beginning of his existence. There was no one power, either of body or mind, that was not fully sanctified. But it was said of him, in terms similar to those applied to John the Baptist, Luke 2: 40: "And the child grew, and WAXED STRONG IN SPIRIT, filled with wisdom, and the grace of God was upon him." And again it is said of him in the same chapter, "And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." What is the meaning of this increase of strength in spirit? And how could he increase in the favor of his heavenly Father, if, with the increase of his expanding powers, there was not only a corresponding growth in holy love? The Scriptures every where speak of growth. They do not recognize the idea of standing still; and all those passages. which require growth in grace and religious knowledge, as applicable after the experience of sanctification as before. "Let us, therefore, as many as be PERFECT, be thus minded."—Philip. 3: 15. Be thus minded, in what respect? The answer is found in the preceding verse, viz., to "press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." "Be ye therefore, perfect," says the Saviour, "as your Father in heaven is perfect." This remarkable and most impressive command evidently implies two things. The first is, that we should be perfect in our sphere; that is to say, in our perceptions, our feelings, our purpose, and to the full extent of all our powers. Ann the second is, that we should continually expand in accordance with that law of increase which is a part of the nature of every rational being, our capacity of feeling and of knowledge, whatever it may be. And in doing this, (that is to say, on the supposition of its being done,) we fulfill the command absolutely, so far as the nature of our mental exercises is concerned: and fulfil it by approximation, or continual expansion and growth, so far as relates to their degree. It is thus with the angels in heaven. They are holy; but are always growing in holiness. In the nature of their exercises they are like their heavenly Father, and perfect as he is perfect, but in relation to the degree of their exercises, they can be said to be perfect only in availing themselves of every possible means of approximation and growth.—Growth, therefore, continual advancement, is the unalterable law of all created, holy beings. And hence it is further said in the Scriptures, in expressions that are full of weighty import, "For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath." Matt. 13: 12.

Some persons may admit the fact of growth in holiness after the experience of full sanctification, and still be in some degree of perplexity as to the manner of it. We proceed, therefore, in the third place, without promising to remove this perplexity altogether, to enter into some explanations upon this topic. Evangelical holiness, it will be recollected, is nothing more or less than perfect love.—Love is based in part, upon knowledge, and is necessarily based upon it. It is entirely evident, that we can never love an object of which we have no knowledge; and it is equally so, that, in proportion as our knowledge extends, we have a wider intellectual basis for the action of this principle. And accordingly every new manifestation of God's character, every new exhibition of his attributes, every additional development of his providences, will furnish new occasions for accessions of love. It is the privilege, therefore, of a person perfected in love, and consequently a holy person, to increase in holiness in exact proportion with his increase in knowledge.

Again, it is well known that there is a great law of our mental nature, termed the law of HABIT. The law is, that increased facility and strength of mental action, results from repetition of practice. There does not appear to be a power of the mind, either intellectual or sensitive which may not feel the influence of this law. And according to this law, every exercise of love, when the exercises are continuously successive, will give place to another, which is increased in strength. And hence a holy being, (not one who is holy to-day and sinning to-morrow, and so on alternately,) but a holy being, who continues to be so, will necessarily go on from one degree of strength to another. And we may add, by way of illustration, that it seems to be the same here, as it is in regard to depravity. Our theologians assure us, that man is by nature entirely depraved. But they also agree in asserting, that entireness of depravity does not preclude the idea of growth in depravity. They admit that the law of habit strengthens the intensity of the depraved element. A depraved man is more depraved than a depraved child; and a depraved devil is more depraved than a depraved man. If theologians generally propound as sound doctrine the idea of growth in the matter of depravity, when the depravity is entire, it would be difficult to show its unsoundness in the matter of holiness.

And there is another important consideration. There are grounds for the remark, that we may indirectly increase the strength of holy emotions and desires by a removal of the various obstacles, which oppose and obstruct their exercise. The speed of a vessel or of a railroad car depends not only upon the amount of the propelling power, whatever that power may be, but also, in part, upon the number and greatness of the obstacles to be overcome. If the obstacles are many and great, the speed will be less. Now the sanctified person is continually acquiring knowledge, not only in relation to the great and adorable object of his perfected love, but also in relation to his own physical and intellectual infirmities, the nature of temptations, and the subtle arts of the adversary of souls. In these infirmities, temptations, and evil arts, he finds very serious obstacles to his progress in holiness. But every day's experience, under the instructions and guidance of the Holy Spirit, teaches their nature and diminishes their power. He learns where his weakness is, and understands better than he did at first how to counteract it. He knows the artifices of the adversary, the insidious manner of his approaches, and the way in which he can be resisted and defeated. And the result of this knowledge is, that many serious obstacles which existed before and which perplexed his progress, are removed. His increased knowledge of the character of God, the influence of the law of habit, the imparted influences of the Holy Spirit, have their natural and unobstructed effect, and accelerate, as they would not do under other circumstances, the ascendant flight of the soul.

These considerations evidently show that the idea of growth in holiness, when the heart is already sanctified to God, is not an unreasonable one. On the contrary, it would seem on any principles of reason applicable to the case, that the growth of a sanctified soul in holiness would be much more rapid than that of a soul but partially sanctified. The testimony of those, who have arrived at the state of assurance of faith and perfect love, confirms these views. Their testimony is, that, after having reached this state, their growth in grace is much more rapid and sure than it was before. They are conscious of increased power against temptation, and of an increase of union with the divine will, to an extent unknown in their previous experience. What growth, then, must there be in angel minds, which are neither obstructed by inward nor by outward evils in their progress! What expansion with each revolving day! What increased intensity of desire! What higher and more triumphant energies of love!

In conclusion, we exhort those, who are santified to the Lord, to grow abundantly in holiness. Of two persons, both of whom are sanctified persons, one may grow in holiness more rapidly and surely than another. This is an important fact, and one that is often overlooked. The difference of growth in holiness, after the experience of sanctification, seems to us to depend, next to believing and earnest applications for divine assistance, upon growth in knowledge. Little claim has any one to the character of a holy person, who is willing to be ignorant. We have not reference in this remark to the mere knowledge of natural things, which oftentimes perplexes rather than promotes the inward life, but to religious knowledge; to anything and every thing which throws light upon the character, providences, and the will of God; and to whatever illustrates the character relations, and moral and religious duties of man. Holiness, considered in its full extent, is a great study, and he only, who is willing to be a diligent and faithful student, will understand it. Hence we are told in the second epistle of Peter that God hath given us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, "through the knowledge of him that has called us to glory and virtue;" and are directed in the same chapter to "add to our faith virtue, and to virtue KNOWLEDGE."

THE LITTLE PILGRIM.

Young as I am, with pilgrim feet,
Father, I travel to thy seat;
And, leaning on my Saviour's hand,
Prepare to leave this barren land.

My cradle was beset with fears,
My infant eyes o'erflowed with tears,
Ere I could good or evil know
My little heart was filled with woe.

Soft sickness shades a mother's eyes,
And many a friend around me dies;
And oft I feel oppressed with care—
A stranger as my fathers were.

While through the desert world I roam,
Teach me to seek a better home;
Unstained by woe, unchanged by years,
Unlike this gloomy vale of tears.

STUDY OF AGRICULTURE.

I had occasion to visit the son of a friend of mine, at a school of great respectability, in a wealthy agricultural district. The master, a very intelligent person, showed me the details of his well arranged establishment, which was certainly a pattern in every respect.

On entering the well filled school room, he observed that most of his scholars were farmer's sons. Glancing at his library, I inquired what books on agricultural subjects it contained?—The master seemed struck with surprise, (as if the thought of such books had never occurred to him,) and replied, "With shame I acknowledge not one; but send me a list of such as you recommend, and I will immediately procure them."

Now I apprehend this case might be multiplied by a thousand or more. Can we wonder, then, that a youth who never heard the word agriculture at school, and who is seldom or never sent into different districts to be taught agriculture as a science, should go home to his parent's, and follow his plan of farming, be it good or bad, or indifferent. In all other trades and professions, an apprenticeship is considered essential to the acquirement of knowledge; but farming, the most necessary of all trades, is to be left to chance, or rather to mischance. A system of uniformity is essential in making a hat, coat, or shoes; there are established educated rules for the church, the bar, and the senate; but agriculture, the greatest interest of all, on which our very existence depends economically and politically, is to be like a ship without a compass, tossed about by the ever-varying gale of individual opinion, without a hope of reaching the port of perfection.

Were a youth ever so much inclined to furnish his mind with comparisons and observations of the various systems of culture in our own different counties, as in foreign climes, there is under the present school system no opportunity for his doing so; and no doubt he would be surprised if told that we are a century at least behind the Chinese in agricultural practice.

I hope we shall soon see every school, and in fact, every farmer's parlor, possessing a few sound practical works on agriculture. I presume no man will consider he knows every thing in agriculture—if he does, it is unfortunate for him. Little as I am acquainted with the subject, I am fully convinced that it is full of interest, and of such extent that a life-time of study and practice would find us on the wrong side of perfection. Bury my Influence with Me.

Not long since a young man, blessed with wealthy and respectable parentage, who might have been useful and honored, had he improved his opportunities, but who had run a short career of vice and dissipation, and by his example enticed others to ruin, was stretched upon his dying bed. The lamp of life was burning feebly in its socket, weeping relatives were gathered around him. The dying youth, as if arousing his last energies of exhausted nature, called upon his attending friends, "I am about to be launched into eternity. Bitterly, O bitterly, do I regret my former sins and follies. I have one request to make before I leave you for ever. Soon you will commit me to the open grave. O gather up my influence and bury it with me." He died, and was buried, but his influence lives, and not only to the latest generation of man, but through eternity to come it will continue to operate.

THE ANGEL'S VISIT.

The earth was at rest, and the evening air
Seemed like the breath of an infant sleeping,
And the stars stole forth, like fancies fair
That come in the light of the mother's prayer
When love is her vigils keeping.

But the mother felt in her trembling breast,
That the angel's presence was o'er her;
And she shook with a nameless fear distressed,
As she bowed like a reed by the dews oppressed,
To guard the dear babe before her.

The clouds gathered as dark as the funeral pall,
The midnight winds were sighing.
And the mother's tears like the rain drops fall;
She hath heard the soft notes of the angel's call,
And she knows that her babe is dying.

The sun was bright as the morning sky,
As when the first smile was given,
And the angel soars to his home on high,
While faith reveals to the mother's eye
That he bears her sweet child to heaven.

CHOOSING A WIFE.

Grant Thorburn, of New York—an old married man and one who ought to understand what he writes from experience, in a series of articles directed particularly to the young merchants of his own city, gives the following advice concerning the choice of a bride, and the husband's conduct to his wife after marriage. We have been requested to publish it by a gentleman of the old school who declares to us that he has seldom found so much truth and conscientious advice presented in so small a compass:—

In choosing a wife, let her be of a family not vain of their name or connections, but remarkable for their simplicity of manners, and integrity of life. Let her be alike free from deformity and hereditary disease; neither fix your eyes on a celebrated beauty—she is apt to be too proud of her pretty face, and afraid to soil her delicate hands. The woman who washes her own silver spoons, China cups, and platters, and performs other light services in the family, is always the most healthy, the most happy and the most contented—for thus she gains the approbation of her husband and her own conscience. The woman who leaves her family four or five hours every day, running from shop to shop, and making calls, is always unhappy; for her conscience says—you have been sowing the wind, you shall reap the whirlwind. Beauty is a very desirable ingredient in choosing a wife; you will be proud of your handsome wife when you introduce her to a friend; but by all means find out if you can, whether or not she is vain of her beauty. If you find she is daily washing her (already) pretty face with milk of roses, and patent cosmetics—that she is daily pouring water and Macassar oil on her (already) glossy hair—if this is the case, it is rather an alarming symptom. A handsome woman never looks so well as when she don't know it.

Good nature is another necessary virtue in a wife. This, though, is not essential, as a man must be a consummate blockhead if he cannot lead, (not drive,) a woman by fair words. A good manager is another indispensable qualification After marriage, if a woman does not pique herself on her knowledge of family affairs, and laying out money to the best advantage, let her be ever so sweet tempered, gracefully made, or elegantly accomplished, she is no wife for a man of business. When people are harnessed in the yoke matrimonial, they must draw together. It's a man's duty to give to his wife; it's the wife's duty to use it with the most scrupulous economy.

Having now resolved to get married, do not distinguish your wedding with too much ostentation, nor suffer it to pass without proper acknowledgments. Let it wear a sober smile, such as would become you and your partner for life; not to be convulsed with riotous laughter, that leaves tears in your eyes, and heaviness at the heart as soon as the fit is over. Moderation in all things is the very essence of life; neither fly to the mountains nor linger about the springs; the money thus foolishly spent would pay for all the coal you would burn next winter; proceed in the usual tenor of your way, prosecuting your regular business with all the sober realities on your back, for remember that the harvest lasts not all the year. Continue to treat your wife with the same cheerfulness on your brow, the same tenderness in your eyes, the same obliging turn in your behavior which you were wont to treat her in the days of courtship; if you do this, her love will never change. Above all things, never let her imagine it a penance for you to stay at home or that you prefer any company whatever to hers; let her share with you in all your pleasures. By these and similar acts of kindness, you will secure her love and gratitude at once, and she will say she is the happiest woman upon the earth:

BAD BOOKS.

At a late meeting of the New-York Colporteur Association, the Rev. Mr. Kirk, of Boston, said, he had sometime since put "bad books" on his docket for the pulpit; and he would throw out a few thoughts, hoping it might lead ministers present to investigate the subject, which would afford a theme for many discourses. The character of the country was formed by its thinking, and the thinking in a great degree by the reading.

He would like to trace the analogy of the influence of bad books to that of intemperance. The subject of intemperance had been investigated, so must that of bad books be. Once the design of the adversary was to keep people in ignorance; but now he finds they will read, and had therefore undertaken to poison their literature, and be "printer's devil" with a vengeance. He was glad the young men of his native city were uniting themselves in a total abstinence society from bad books, and inducing others to join them. He knew that the consciences of some of the respectable makers and venders of these books troubled them. Alas, friends, you print and sell many "a line, which, dying, you could wish to blot."

We had calculated the dreadful waste of time, and money, and energy, and the amount of crime, caused by intemperance—he would like to estimate each item as related to books. Did not the record of murders and crime daily meet our eyes, and were not bad books a leading cause? This was an anti-capital-punishment Society—to stop hanging, not after but before the crime was committed. He here alluded to the case of a young man of a family of rank, whose ignominious death was known to all, and it was a well attested fact that while under serious impressions in college—at that delicate point when the mind in prepared, like a daguerreotype plate for the impression which may remain for eternity—he read "The Pirates' Own Book," that led him away from God, and at length to attempt the crime for which he was executed. TWELVE EXCELLENT RULES TO PROMOTE

HARMONY AMONG CHURCH-MEMBERS.

1. To remember that we are all subject to failings and infirmities of one kind or another.
2. To bear with, and not magnify each other's infirmities. Gal. 6: 1, 2.
3. To pray one for another in our social meetings, and particularly in private. James 5: 16.
4. To avoid going from house to house, for the purpose of hearing news, and interfering with other people's business.
5. Always to turn a deaf ear to any slanderous report, and to lay no charge brought against any person until well founded.
6. If a member be in fault, to tell him of it in private, before it is mentioned to others.
7. To watch against a shyness of each other, and put the best construction on any action that has the appearance of opposition or resentment.
8. To observe the just rule of Solomon, that is, to leave off contention before it be meddled with. Prov. 17: 14.
9. If a member has offended, to consider how glorious, how god-like it is to forgive, and how unlike a Christian it is to reveuge. Eph. 4: 2.
10. Remember that it is always a grand artifice of the devil, to promote distance and animosity among members of churches; and we should therefore watch against every thing that furthers this end.
11. To consider how much more good we can do in the world at large, and in the church in particular, when we are all united in love, than we should do when acting alone, and indulging a contrary spirit.
12. Lastly, to consider the express injunction of Scripture, and the beautiful example of Christ, as to these important things. Eph. 32. I Peter 2: 21. John 13: 5, 35.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE

Will be opened for the reception of Students, Wednesday, April 29.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, Principal, and Teacher of Languages and Moral and Intellectual Science.
GURDON EVANS, Teacher of Mathematics and Natural Science, and Director of the Primary Department.
J. R. HARTSHORN, M. D., Lecturer on Anatomy and Physiology; Illustrations with a MANIKIN, in the Fall or Winter Term.
Mrs. LUCY M. CARPENTER, Preceptress, and Teacher of Modern Languages and the Fine Arts.

The Academic Year will be divided into three Terms of 14 weeks each. The First commencing April 29, ending Aug. 5. The Second, Sept. 16, ending Dec. 23. The Third, Jan. 6, ending April 14.

TEACHERS' CLASSES, for the special benefit of those designig to teach, will be formed at the commencement of the Fall Term, and continue seven weeks, with daily Lectures, and Model Classes.

Tuition, to be arranged at the commencement of each Term. Primary Department, $2 00 Academic, from $3 00 to $5 00. Music on the Piano $5 00 per term of twelve weeks. No Extra Charges for Drawing, Painting, Lectures, or Incidentals. Convenient Rooms for study, or private board, at moderate prices. Board in the Hall, or in Private Families, from $1 00 to $1 50.

W. C. KENYON, Principal, and Professor of Languages.
IRA SAYLES, Associate Principal, and Professor of Mathemat
GURDON EVANS, Professor of Natural Sciences.
J. R. HARTSHORN, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology.
O. STILLMAN, Professor of Vocal and Instrumental Music.
Miss C. B. MAXSON, Preceptress, Instructress in French, Italian, Drawing and Painting.
Mrs. M. B. KENYON, Assistant in the Female Department.

From the very liberal patronage extended to this Institution during the past seven years, the Trustees have been induced to make arrangements for greatly increasing its facilities. The Chemical, Philosophical, Astronomical, and Mathematical apparatus is amply sufficient for a full illustration of the different departments of those Sciences. The apparatus will be farther increased at the commencement of the ensuing Fall Term, by the introduction of whatever may be necessary in other Sciences than those above mentioned, especially, by a MANIKIN of the most approved structure, now being imported from Paris, expressly for this Institution. This will enable the student of Physiology and Anatomy to pursue his studies with advantages nearly equal to those afforded by an actual subject, having this farther advantage of being divested of all those revolting circumstances ever attendant on the dissecting room.

THE TEACHERS' CLASSES, as usual, will be exercised in practical teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective Instructors. Model Classes will be formed at the commencement of each term. Daily Lectures will also be given during the Fall and Winter Terms; and the public may be assured that this department of the Institution shall be conducted upon the principles of the best regulated Normal Schools, in this, or any other country.

Finally, the proprietors pledge themselves, that the reputation of this Institution shall be sustained by the introduction of whatever may be necessary to meet the demands of an intelligent public.

The Institution is liberally endowed and subject to the visitation of the Regents.

Its Library is choice and extensive, and accessible, also to all the students gratis.

THE ACADEMIC YEAR for 1845—6 consists of three Terms, as follows:—The First, commencing Wednesday August 13, 1845, and ending Thursday, November 20. The Second, commencing Wednesday, November 26, and ending Thursday, March 6, 1846. The Third, commencing Wednesday, March 25, and ending Thursday, July 2.

EXPENSES.—Tuition, per term, from $3 50 to $5 00. Board, per week, $1 00. Piano, (extra,) per term, $10 00. Washing, lights and fuel, per term, from $2 00 to $5 00. The entire expenses for an Academic Year, including board, washing, lights, fuel and tuition, (except on the Piano,) need not exceed $70 00; and may even be reduced much below this, where individuls board themselves, either separately or in clubs. For the convenience of such as choose to board themselves, rooms are furnished at a moderate expense. SAMUEL RUSSELL,

A FARM FOR SALE,

IN the township of Piscataway, State of New Jersey, lying north-east from New Brunswick, half a mile from the Bridge, half a mile from Snyder's Mills, and in full view of the railroad car-house. Said farm consists of about ninety-five acres of land, in a good state of cultivation, and well adapted to raising grain and vegetables. It has a good variety of fruit trees, considerable wood, and five acres of salt meadow. The house is in good repair, and has a well of water at the door. There is also a new barn, sheds, &c. For farther particulars call on Dr. NELSON STELLE, No. 146 Grand-st., N. Y.—Mr. Burris, No. 1 Oliver-st.—or on the premises of JONATHAN S. DUNHAM.

THE CHIP-GATHERERS.

Well, says one, on perusing the title, what can be said of this class of our city denizens? Much might be said—but wishing this sketch should be read attentively, I will condense as much as possible.

Accompany me in imagination to the corner of Avenue D. and —— street. Cast your eye on the group approaching us; see, there are five girls with bags of chips on their heads, sauntering with a reckless gaiety toward their homes. Their ages vary from fourteen to twenty. Listen to their remarks, watch their glances as they pass groups of idle lads and men congregated about the doorways of the porter houses and groceries on their route—don't blush, don't refuse to notice them, they are women! Ah, but say you, I feel disgusted, annoyed, and what good can I do them? Perhaps none, but attend—it will give you a subject for thought at least. Well, they have passed by us with their loads, but here are other specimens of the class nearing us. Yes, three women, one with grey hairs and palsied limbs, at least seventy years of age, one of perhaps fifty-five or sixty, and the other somewhat under thirty. The two eldest seem like vagrants of the lowest order; but the younger woman is neat and tidy in her appearance, and judging from her faded mourning dress and rusty black shawl, she is a widow; and by her carrying her bag of chips in her arms rather than upon her head, she is an American woman. Let us speak with her.

"You have a heavy load to carry; may I ask why you go yourself for these chips? have you no children you could send for them, if you must have them?"

"I prefer to go myself, for my children are girls, and I am trying to bring them up to school, instead of running about the ship and spar yards, to hear bad language, and see bad actions."

"Are you a widow?"

"Yes, and have an infant at home tied down in her cradle, and must hurry," and she picks up her burden, and hastens away.

Come, we will walk up the Avenue a little, lest people wonder at the attention we are bestowing upon the chip-gatherers. See, here are some children whose parents care less about them, than the widow cares for hers. We will observe them for awhile.

The group of several girls and boys are noisily insisting on the right of some of them to a particular ship-yard, and threatening to expel by force any child that shall dare fill basket or bag at their depot, unless they have given permission. They appear to be waiting the appearance of some one who has infringed upon their territory. The boys are preparing to fight, having placed their property under the care of the largest girls. Ah, here come the depredators—two puny little boys whose looks would lead one to suppose they had never had a full meal. Hark to the oaths and curses of the attacking party as they fall upon the poor little fellows. See! their baskets are rifled by some, and themselves kicked and beaten by the others, but their sole anxiety seems centred in retaining their hold upon the baskets, and they plead earnestly to be permitted to retain them.

Now the girls interfere, but listen! they swear the boys of their party ought to keep the baskets, but for once they're willing they should give them up—and away scud the little chaps, heartily glad to get off thus.

Here comes a little fellow alone. He is about eight years of age, and is gazing anxiously around at the areas and windows. We will address him.

"What makes you look round so, my little boy?"

"Why, I want to sell my chips."

"What do you ask for your basket full?"

"Three cents, but I'll let you have them for two, if you'll take them now, for the carpenter has promised me another lot as soon as I get rid of these."

"But why do you sell them? why don't you take them home to your mother?"

"Mother has enough to last a day or two; she wants money most."

Let us pass on now, and see where the chips are obtained. Don't say you cannot climb up the side of that ship by that uncouth ladder. All that we have seen pass us loaded, both women and children, have clambered up that way.

"What, and carried their chips down?"

"Certainly; they would not dare pitch them over lest some one should steal them ere they could descend."

"But the men at work are swearing at being annoyed by them; let us look from where we stand."

Hark those shrill agonizing screams! they seem to proceed from the inner part of the ship. What can be the matter?—there! again and again. Now all is still. There must have been some one badly hurt; but look! see that man hurrying a little girl down the ladder; the child seems scarcely conscious that he holds her hand, or that she is moving a step. See, he cuffs her ears soundly as he leaves her safe on the ground.

"Man, what was the matter? who screamed so on board the ship just now, and why do you beat the child?"

"The little hussy, I beat her for frightening me so. I happened to look off my work just before she gave the first scream, and saw her falling where it seemed she must be crushed to pieces, but she clutched with one hand at the coping of the hatch, and there hung till I could get to her. I boxed her ears to make her remember and not go into such danger again. The little reprobates tease us so much, and run such risks, if I had my will I would flog them all out of the yard. The other day a boy fell off the ship, and was carried off senseless."

The man returns to his work, and the little young one, seemingly still somewhat bewildered, remains sitting where he left her, rubbing her shoulder, and gazing at her bloody hand. Here they are hewing a spar for some stately vessel. See how the broad axe glistens in the sun. Let us go near enough to see what the workman is pushing with his foot away from the side of the spar.

"As I live, it is a child! She is crouched down almost as close as she can get to the spar, leaving barely room for the axe to ply; and were it to vary a hand's breadth from a true stroke, it would lay her scull open. But he has got her away now."

I am obliged to you, kind reader, that you have allowed your imagination to go with me among the chip-gatherers thus far, and beg you now in fancy to go with me to their homes. Homes! Yes, for they have homes. Some live in houses tenanted by eight and ten families; in cellars, damp, dark and miserable; in attics accessible only by filthy ricketty stairs, that threaten to give way beneath the tread, and where the elements find a ready entrance. The furniture of such places usually consists of a table, one or two broken chairs, a bedstead with an apology for a bed, two or three dilapidated cooking utensils, a few bits of crockery, and it may be in some instances a Bible. I have seen, however, many of their abodes where a barrel supplied the place of a table, some straw for a bed, a piece of rag carpet for bed covering, a tea kettle to cook in, and a tin basin for table service! But when so destitute as this, they rarely have a Bible. I remember but one such tenement where I saw one, and that an antiquary would have been delighted to possess, it being one of the first edition in the sixteenth century. It had been in the family nearly two hundred years, and by various data inscribed upon its sacred pages, its former owners must have passed through great vicissitudes of fortune. I asked its possessor if she derived any spiritual comfort from its perusal, and after some equivocation she acknowledged that she seldom looked at the quaint spelling of the printed matter, but busied herself mostly in decyphering what her ancestors had written therein, and said she, "When any body looks down upon me, or insults me, I can proudly tell them I have in my possession a book that I would not part with for a thousand dollars." Oh, had she but known that the pearl of great price was within its pages, how might her aged heart have been gladdened. Are there not many equally benighted? In some of these wretched apartments I have found praying, humble Christians, communicants at God's table; His poor. The question often arises in my mind whether God will hold any body of Christians guiltless, who permit such squalid poverty to eat into the very vitals of those who have given, and continue to give evidence of a saving change, and the enjoyment of God's presence? —Adv. Moral Reform.

AN EXTRACT FROM D'AUBIGNE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION—WITH COMMENTS.

"The Reformation was accomplished in the name of a spiritual principle. It had proclaimed for its teacher the Word of God; for salvation, Faith; for King, Jesus Christ; for arms, the Holy Ghost; and had by these very means rejected all worldly elements. Rome had been established by the law of a carnal commandment; the Reformation, by the power of an endless life. Heb. 7: 16.

"If there is any doctrine that distinguishes Christianity from every other religion, it is its spirituality. A heavenly life brought down to man—such is its work; thus the opposition of the spirit of the Gospel to the spirit of the world, was the great fact which signalized the entrance of Christianity among the nations. But what its founder had separated, had soon come together again; the church had fallen into the arms of the world; and this criminal union had reduced it to the deplorable condition in which it was found at the era of the Reformation.

"Thus one of the greatest tasks of the sixteenth century was to restore the spiritual element to its rights. The Gospel of the Reformers had nothing to do with the world and with politics While the Roman hierarchy had become a matter of diplomacy and a court intrigue, the Reformation was destined to exercise no other influence over princes and people than that which proceeds from the Gospel of peace.

"If the Reformation, having attained a certain point, became untrue to its nature, began to parley and temporize with the world, and ceased thus to follow up the spiritual principle that it had so loudly proclaimed, it was faithless to God and to itself.

"Henceforward its decline was at hand. It is impossible for a Society to prosper if it be unfaithful to the principles it lays down. Having abandoned what constituted its life, it can find naught but death.

"It was God's will that this great truth should be inscribed on the very threshold of the temple He was then raising in the world; and a striking contrast was to make this truth stand gloriously forth.

"One portion of the Reform was to seek the alliance of the world, and in this alliance find a destruction full of desolation.

"Another portion, looking up to God, was haughtily to reject the arm of the flesh, and by this very act of faith secure a noble victory.

"If three centuries have gone astray, it is because they were unable to comprehend so holy and solemn a lesson."

There are "thoughts that breathe" in the above paragraphs. Truth that the Christian should study and engrave on the heart's tablet. Read and contemplated in connection with the History in which it is found, it arrests the mind as a towering eminence in a variegated landscape. By the way, those who have read the three first volumes of D'Aubigne should not fail to read the fourth, and those who have not read either, should read all. The advanced Christian needs to read this invaluable history to increase his sense of personal obligation, and refresh his memory relative to the origin of our religious liberty, the sacrifices made to obtain it, and the struggles, privations, and sufferings of the early Reformers. The young Christian should read it for the valuable information it cannot fail to impart.

The thoughts in the above extract that struck us most forcibly, were, 1st. The power of the true Gospel; 2nd. The necessity of a firm and unwavering adherence to right principle; 3rd. The danger of an attempted Christian alliance with a wicked world; 4th. The analogy between the principles and purposes of the Reformation of the sixteenth century, and those that now claim the adherence and support of every true Reformer. Let us contemplate for a few moments these several points.

1st. The power of the Gospel. Well is it said "the opposition of the spirit of the Gospel to the spirit of the world was the great fact which signalized the introduction of Christianity among the nations." This is truly THE great fact that has stood out in bold relief, and been at the foundation of every aggressive movement made upon the kingdom of darkness down to the present era.—This fact has appealed so forcibly to the human heart, that it has not been in the power of men or of spirits lost, to counteract its influence. Said an infidel to us once, when writhing under the conviction that after all the Bible must be true, "Well, if I should embrace Christianity, there is one command I can never obey. It is this—'Love your enemies.' The human heart," he continued, "is so made, that this is impossible." It was easy to meet him on his own ground, and pleasant to refer him to the source whence the command came, and the example of its glorious Author. Why, it may well be asked, has the Christianity of the present age so much less practical power over the hearts of men, than when Paul stood on Mars Hill, and when Luther, Zwingle, and their coadjutors and early converts, bore testimony to the truth as it is in Jesus? Is not the solution of the question to be found in this, that it "has again fallen into the arms of the world" in such a sense that its strength is comparative weakness? If not, why do we hear of many churches which, while they number a few devoted living Christians, embrace a mass of worldly, time-serving, God-dishonoring professors, parents who encourage their children to mingle in the giddy dance, and even suffer the waltz to be introduced within their own doors at a fashionable party!! "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord." What testimony do such witnesses bear for their Redeemer? Look at much that is called Christianity now-a-days, and mark on what principles it is based. True, it discourses much of "love," and goodness—of human kindness, sympathy for the race, benevolent and high aspirings—but does it in reality proclaim for its Teacher the Word of God? for salvation. faith? for King, Jesus Christ? Its sympathy for the fallen and guilty is well, so far as it is genuine; but would it reclaim and save by convincing of sin, of righteousness, and a judgment to come? "By their fruits ye shall know them." "Men do not gather grapes of thorns, nor figs of thistles." Does it practically admit the power of the Gospel to sway the human mind? to impart peace and joy and love, where other resources prove futile, to elevate the affections and feast and fill the soul with foretastes of uncreated good? Is it willing to abase self, to become of no reputation, to put on the whole armor of the Gospel—in a word to render a cheerful obedience to all the Divine precepts? (John 4: 1.) Is not this the only type of Christianity that can be made instrumental in producing the great reforms so much needed in our sin-cursed world?

2d. The necessity of a firm adherence to right principles. Truly this constitutes the life and strength of all reform. Where a principle is clearly understood and embraced under the conscious teachings of the Word and the Spirit, departure from that principle must bring darkness and moral death upon the soul, and prove fatal in its results. Why was the blood of the martyrs shed, and why was it the seed of the church? Manifestly because they counted principle dearer than life—and when the one or the other must be sacrificed, the suffering and torture of the stake could not induce them to yield the former. Their example was a living epistle—men's hearts did it homage—Conscience affirmed it to be right—and the TRUTH had free course and was glorified. Volumes might be written on this important topic, but we must pass to others.

3rd. The danger of an attempted Christian alliance with a wicked world. There has been no period since the fall when this has not proved a deadly snare. Take the case of nations, of churches, or of individuals, who for sordid ends have courted such an alliance. The breath of Omnipotence has cursed them. Blasting and mildew have been in their borders. The God of our salvation will not give his glory to another, nor his praise to graven images. The sentiment of the texts, "What communion hath light with darkness?" or "what fellowship hath he which believeth with an infidel?" and "ye cannot serve God and mammon," remains unchanged. There is no middle ground. True, the professed Christian may conform partially to the world, and in alliance with the devotees of fashion may engage in this or that reform, this or that work of benevolence, and run well for a time, but unless the root of the matter is in him, and the love of Christ the ruling motive, an hour is at hand when he will fall beneath the power of temptation, and fully disclose the true springs of action that have governed his conduct—"the day shall try every man's work of what sort it is."

4th. The analogy between the principles and purposes of the Reformation of the sixteenth century and those that now claim the adherence and support of every true Reformer. Do we err in supposing we discern this analogy? Was the spirit of Reform buried in the grave of the last martyr, and destined to know no resurrection? Has our holy Religion made such rapid strides during the last three centuries, that the soldier of the Cross may dare to look abroad, and sound the clarion note of victory?

Reader, behold our world—according to the latest published statistics, of the 1,000,000,000 inhabitants that dwell upon its surface, but 70,000,000 are found in Protestant countries, and of this number but 10,000,000 are supposed to be even nominal Christians.

What doom will most of these 190,000,000 fellow beings inherit who are to stand at the Judgment in less than thirty years? As they pass away unrepentant and unforgiven, does echo bring back no appeal touching the chords of compassion in truly Christian hearts—and pleading that the continued influence of a pure Christianity may bless the world more widely than it has ever done?

Behold the opposition to vital godliness among gospel-hardened sinners. Behold their cherished vices. How are they blinded and led captive by Satan at his will? Is this much less to be dreaded than the vain trust reposed in the form of godliness by the devotees of the Romish Church? Behold the Christian churches of our Lord—how many tares grow with the wheat! How many of the precepts of God's word are practically set at naught? Might we not in view of this adopt the language of the Prophet, "O that my head were waters, and my eyes a fountain of tears." Is there not as much need of the martyr spirit and the martyr faith now as in the days of the Reformation? Need of it, not to nerve the true disciple to endure the thong, and wear a heavenly smile amid the burning faggots, but to enable him to do and dare, endure and suffer, all that Gospel obedience, love to truth, and love to souls may require, in the full discharge of the high responsibilities that every Christian of the nineteenth century is privileged to sustain? Christian reader, do we feel our need of this faith? Do we ardently desire it in order to be made useful in the highest degree to the age in which we live—and may we not have it?

"Why that look of sadness,
Why that downcast eye,
Can no thought of gladness
Lift thy soul on high?
O, thou heir of heaven,
Think of Jesus' love,
While to thee 'tis given
All his grace to prove."

Adv. Moral Reform.

When Darius offered Alexander ten thousand talents to divide Asia equally with him, he answered, The earth cannot bear two suns, nor Asia two kings.—Parmenio, a friend of Alexander's, hearing the great offers Darius had made, said, Were I Alexander I would accept them.—So would I, replied Alexander, were I Parmenio.

Nobility is to be considered only as an imaginary distinction, unless accompanied with the practice of those generous virtues by which it ought to be obtained. Titles of honor conferred upon such as have no personal merit, are at best but the royal stamp set upon base metal.

TWELVE INCONSISTENCIES.

Mr. Editor:—There are twelve things which so far outrage every principle of propriety, good sense, and religion that I cannot endure to see or hear them.

1. To hear a Christian man say, he very much desires to know how matters are going on in the religious world, and yet he will not take a religious newspaper.

2. To see a Christian man of a family, with a large plantation, and extensive stock; one of a good trade or lucrative profession, and not take a religious newspaper.

3. To see a Christian man at every monkey show, or farcical exhibition of every wag who may advertise that he will make people laugh for the cheap sum of one, two, or even four bits, and yet too poor to pay for a religious newspaper.

4. To see a Christian man lay by money, in order to catch a good bargain which may chance to come in his way, and still too poor to pay for a religious newspaper.

5. To see a Christian man dress his children in fine or superfine clothing, and still plead too poor to pay for a religious newspaper.

6. To see a Christian man take a half-dozen, or even one newspaper, filled with all sorts of trash and falsehoods, and yet be too poor to take a religious newspaper.

7. To see a Christian man spend time enough in one week in gossiping, and things as bad or worse, if industriously employed to pay for, and yet he can't take a religious newspaper.

8. To see a Christian man of wealth, read regularly a poor man's, and what is worse, a minister's paper, and hear him say he is too poor to take a religious newspaper.

9. To see a Christian man's family reading novels and miscellanies, and attending parties at great (or even no) expense, and have no religious newspaper for them to read.

10. To see a Christian man lay up money and property for his children, and plead too poor to pay for a religious newspaper.

11. To see a Christian man exhibiting to his friends and visitors, his fine farm, stock, orchards, his new and splendid assortment of goods—his well-furnished office or store, as the case may be, and have no religious newspaper to exhibit.

12. I cannot endure to hear a Christian man boasting of his liberality to the church and not pay for a religious newspaper.

And finally, for a "Baker's dozen"—I cannot above every other inconsistency, endure to see a Christian man take, and regularly receive, but never PAY for a religious newspaper.

These things are so obviously inconsistent, that when I approach such men, to try and convince them of the wrong, I feel that I almost offer an insult to their intelligence and Christian fidelity, But I must never mind that. I must be faithful to God and my brethren.—Cumberland Presbyterian.

CHRISTIAN PARENTS.

Yours is a post of responsibility, with which few others on earth can compare. Yours is the mighty influence which is forming the characters of your children for an everlasting state. The combined agency of ministers, Sunday-school teachers and books is feeble in comparison with yours. These can be but assistants and helpers in a work, the burden of which must ever be yours. It even remains with you to say how far these shall be permitted to assist in the formation of their characters. It is yours to keep them from temptation, yours to instruct them, yours to watch for them, yours to pray for them, yours to direct their opening minds to God; nay, there is a sense in which it is yours to say whether they shall be saved or lost. Oh fearful responsibility! It cannot be declined. The decision cannot be evaded, it cannot be deferred.—And is it a case to be supposed that a Christian parent should decide against the salvation of his own child? In this case, as in that of the personal acceptance of Christ, he who does not decide for decides against. It is a practical case, and is to be decided by a series of acts and influences; and he who does not exert these in a manner which he conceives most conducive to the salvation of his child practically decides against it. Let the question come home to the parental heart.—Shall I, either by sins of commission or omission, be the cause of the everlasting destruction of my own child? It seems that the thought would embitter heaven itself, that if I could know that my own offspring must suffer forever in hell the consequences of my sin, not all the songs of the new Jerusalem could console my spirit.

It is not unlikely that these lines will be read by parents whose children are under the influence of the Holy Spirit. Truth, by the power of this divine agent, has assumed such distinctness in their view as to involve the necessity of a decision. And if this decision should be against the acceptance of the terms of salvation, either literally by a direct resolution of the mind, as is sometimes the case, or virtually by procrastination, there is much reason to fear that the decision will be final, whether they so intend it or not. When Felix sought relief from conviction by a promise of future obedience, it is probable that he felt as he had never felt before, and as he never felt afterward. And so of your children now convicted, by the same Spirit, if they take the same course you may expect the same termination.

And now while so awful a case is pending must you stand idly and silently by, deprived of all power to influence the decision? First, reflect upon their sad condition, and then you will be prepared to show them in ways which they cannot mistake, that you regard this world and all it can give as lighter than vanity, in comparison with their immortal interests—that you regard their salvation as infinitely transcending all earthly objects. Let them see that you are afflicted and oppressed in spirit on account of their disobedience to God, and their exposure to everlasting death. Carry their case to the mercy seat, confess all their guilt, and plead for their pardon on the same ground on which you would ask it for the vilest of the vile—the infinite merits of the Redeemer. Pray for them. Prayer is the mighty instrument which God has put into your hand to accomplish the object which you profess is of all others most dear to your heart. He has exhorted you to use it, assuring you of its power.—Ask and ye shall receive.

"Wrestling prayer can wonders do,
Bring relief in deepest straits,
Prayer can force a passage through
Iron bars and brazen gates."

It has stayed the pestilence, cast out devils, raised the dead, stopped the sun. It "moves the hand which moves the universe," and which alone can snatch your children from the verge of hell. PRAY FOR THEM. Have no [illegible] spirits while they are liable every moment to be eternally separated from God. Their case is doubtful, extremely doubtful, and so you are to regard it, remembering that brighter hopes than yours for them have ended in despair.

Rest not securely in the belief that their present conviction will have a happy issue. Deeper convictions than theirs have been lost. Rest not too securely in the hope that God will spare you the trial of a separation from your dear children. Eli has parted with his sons for ever, and Samuel with his, and David with his. To part with the hope of meeting can be endured, but O, to part to meet no more, this gave the sting to paternal anguish. When Absalom died in his sins the king was much moved and went up to the chamber over the gate and wept, and as he went thus he said:—Oh my son Absalom, would God I had died for thee. Oh Absalom, my son, my son!—Episcopal Recorder.

IN TIME OF PEACE PREPARE FOR WAR.

Few maxims, human or divine, have commanded such veneration of Christian Governments as the one that heads this article. To such an extent have Great Britain, France, and the United States followed the teachings of this doubtful proverb, that their preparations for war in time of peace, cost more than the entire profits of their united commerce. As the venerable name of Washington is made to father this maxim, let us refer to him as the true expounder of it, during his administration. Let us see how he "prepared for war in time of peace." When that illustrious man acceded to the Presidency, the country had just emerged from a long, wasting war. The age was warlike, and the moral power of commerce, and of inter-national intercourse, facilitated by steam, had hardly come to be felt as a ligament of brotherhood between nations. The Democratic principle had hardly been acknowledged as a fixed fact in human government, and was never more exposed to be crushed out of existence, under the heel of European despotism, than during the first years of American independence. The people were peeled and few, and scattered over a vast territory. They numbered scarcely four millions, young and old, bond and free. Powerful tribes of disaffected Indians surrounded the republic with a cordon of dangerous foes. If military defences render a nation secure from foreign invasion; or if a nation is most exposed when least able or prepared to resist a foe, then at no period of our national existence should there have been greater preparations for war in time of peace, than during the administration of Washington. And we may assume that none could have been more deeply impressed with the importance of such preparations, than he and his compatriots of the Revolution. Nor can we suppose they withheld a dollar in their expenditures for this purpose, from any reluctanee of the people to vote adequate defences for their country. We have no reason to believe that the Government under him would have appropriated a larger sum to the Army and Navy, if its revenue equalled that of the present time. How did he prepare for war in time of peace, "so precarious?" During the eight years of his administration, and while surrounded by perils which have long since ceased to exist, the whole amount appropriated to the Military and Naval Establishments, was $10,925,470. This sum in his view, met all the necessities of preparing for war in time of peace. He asked no more to put the country in an attitude of defence, at a time when it was most exposed to invasion, if the principle be true, that a nation is most exposed when least able to resist.

Now let us turn to another chapter of our national history and see how this maxim, attributed to Washington, has been carried out. During the eight years ending with 1843, a period of profound peace in the civilized world, this Government expended $163,336,717 on the Military and Naval Establishment!!! Taking the average population of the country during these eight years, it must have been nearly 16,000,000—four times the number of the people under Washington's administration. Can his example, then, sustain the present course of this Government in preparing for war in time of peace? Is a rapidly increasing population an element of weakness; or is a country more exposed to invasions in proportion as the number of its men and means for defence? It would seem so from the course of our Government; for while the population of the country has multiplied itself by four, the appropriations for their defence have been multiplied by sixteen!—thus $10,000,000 for a population of four millions, and $160,000 000 for a population of sixteen millions, during a period of eight years. At this ratio when the people of this country shall number sixty-four millions, then the appropriations for their defence, for eight years, will amount to $2,560,000,000!

Is it not time for the people to think of these things? E. B.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, May 14, 1846.

OUR PETITIONS FOR LEGAL PROTECTION.

In three States of the Union—New-York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania—petitions have been presented to the Legislature during the past winter, for laws to protect Sabbath-keepers in the enjoyment of the Sabbath, and in the pursuit of their ordinary avocations on the first day of the week. These petitions differed very widely from the petitions which had been presented from time to time for laws in favor of the first day of the week. They did not ask that our fellow-citizens who differ from us, should be required to observe the day which we regard as sacred. Nor did they ask the Legislature to express any opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of our practice. They simply asked, in one case, protection against the annoyance of answering to civil suits or discharging civil duties on the Sabbath; and, in the other cases, protection against laws which forbid us to work on a day which our consciences require us to devote to labor. They asked nothing, therefore, but what might have been granted with perfect safety to the State, and without infringing to the least extent upon the religious opinions and privileges of any other body of men. Yet these petitions, so inoffensive to the interests of others, and so important to our own interests, have been either evaded or denied by each of the Legislatures to which they were addressed. Thus Sabbath-keepers are left precisely in the position which they have occupied heretofore—exposed to annoyance on the Sabbath, and liable to penalties for working on Sunday.

In view of this result, some of our friends may think there is little encouragement to exert themselves, while some of our opponents may think they have occasion to rejoice. If so, we beg leave to differ from them entirely. For our part, we think we see in the history of this movement for a few months past, great encouragement for renewed exertion, and much reason to hope for future success. It was not to be expected, that men who had from their youth been taught to reverence the Sunday as a sacred day, would readily grant to an organized body of men, be they never so religious, the privilege of working on that day. Nor was it to be expected, that they would be ready at once to pass laws for the protection of those who openly differ from them. The discussion of the subject, however, has exerted an influence, and brought to light facts and principles, which must prepare the way for securing, sooner or later, the result which we desire. Let us look at this matter a little.

Nobody can deny, that the influence of our petitions has been to bring the claims of the Sabbath before the public mind. We have for a long time directed our efforts mainly to the religious portion of the community, and been content to furnish them with the arguments by which our practice is sustained. But they, instead of listening to us, have closed their ears against our appeals, have shut us out from their pulpits and newspapers, and done all in their power to prevent the discussion of the subject. When, however, the matter was brought before the different Legislatures by numerously-signed petitions in favor of granting Sabbath-keepers the privilege of working upon Sunday, the political papers took it up, and, without designing to do us any good, actually did more to enlighten the public mind than was ever done by all the religious papers in the land. From the political newspapers the subject soon passed to the mouths of politicians, and became a theme for more or less discussion in public and private—in railroad cars and steamboats, not less than in neighborhoods and families. The influence of such discussion cannot be lost, and it can hardly fail to be useful. Only let our arguments be known, and they challenge the approval of unbiased minds, and find not a few advocates, even among those who, while they acknowledgedge their soundness, are unwilling to deny self sufficiently to put them in practice.

Again, the presentation of our petitions has brought to light facts of great importance. It is but a few years since Sabbath-papers were represented, or rather *mis*represented, as being unsound in their doctrines, and by no means praiseworthy in their practice. But in the course of the discussions growing out of their petitions, this calumny has been once and again denied, by men who had no other reason than a sense of duty for speaking in our favor. Such men have pronounced the observers of the Sabbath a most upright, consistent, and religious people, whose character would stand a comparison with those of any other denomination on the face of the earth. Indeed, scarcely a single individual has been found, who has dared to express a doubt on this point. The great mass of legislators have been unbounded in their expressions of confidence. Thus they have given their testimony that we deserve protection, notwithstanding they have been deterred by fear of a corrupt public opinion from granting it.

Nor is this all; the discussion of our petitions has developed principles extensive in their application and most salutary in their influence. In Pennsylvania, for instance, the ground was taken, that if Seventh-day Baptists are allowed to work on Sunday, then there is no propriety in dictating by law on what day any man shall work or rest. This we believe to be the true doctrine. It is no more the business of legislators to dictate what day a man shall keep, than it is to dictate what church he shall attend, in what way he shall be baptized, or how often he shall partake of the communion. It is God's prerogative to decide what day men shall set apart for the Sabbath, and it is the duty of the Legislature to protect them in carrying out this decision, each man in view of his own accountability. We know that many persons will demur at this doctrine. They have been so long accustomed to regard the statute laws in favor of Sunday as right and useful, that to doubt it seems to them almost sacrilegious. We believe, nevertheless, that if all laws compelling men to observe one day in seven were abolished, and the command of God was made the rule of duty, and pressed home upon the consciences of men, Sabbath-keeping would be altogether more general and acceptable. But as it now is, the law of God and the law of the State clash with each other; hence men take occasion to deny the binding authority of both, and so release themselves from all sense of obligation. This principle, to the discussion of which our petitions have given rise, will, in due time, be acknowledged and allowed to exert its proper influence.

We say then, with all confidence, that the course pursued by the Legislatures of the different States in regard to our petitions, affords no good reason for discouragement, but ought to increase our exertion. If legislators refuse to grant our acknowledged rights, because they do not know the wishes of their constituents, let us bring our claims before those constituents, and secure their voices and their aid. If they will not act on our behalf, because we are so few, let us show them that though feeble in numbers, we are strong in the truth. Let us, on no account, cease to agitate the question, until our rights are acknowledged, and our religious privileges guarantied. In this way only can we ensure our own safety, and justly expect the blessing of God.

RELIGION IN THE SOUL.

The religion of Christ in the soul, is represented by its author to be progressive and perpetual in its nature. He compares it to a "well of water springing up into everlasting life;"—to a shining light, which increaseth in brightness to the perfect day;—to a plant disclosing "first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear;" and to an exceeding small seed, which gradually becometh a great tree. 'Tis not a stream from which issueth pure and healthful waters to-day, and anon dryeth up or sendeth forth poisoned waters; but 'tis a pure and living stream, and they who drink of it never thirst. 'Tis not the light of the flaming meteor, discovering a momentary blaze, and then waning to eternal night; but a reflection of the rays of the Sun of Righteousness, constant and increasing. 'Tis not a hot-house plant, living and flourishing only in the sunshine of popular favor, but an evergreen of more than earthly beauty, strength, and fragrance. The coldness of popular contempt cannot blight it, nor storms of persecution destroy it. It flourishes in all its freshness amid the raging of the elements, gathering strength from the storm, and beauty from the whirlwind, and living in glorious contrast with the desolation which surrounds it.

The possessor of this religion will grow in grace and in the knowledge of his Saviour. He will "add to his faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." He will study to "know Christ and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, and to be made conformable unto his death."

How dissimilar is the character of the true Christian as exemplified in Christ and portrayed by him, to the character of many who call themselves Christians. For a little time they seem to run well, to be fruitful in good works, and manifest a commendable zeal for Zion's welfare; and then they turn to the world, and labor as arduously to secure its honors, wealth, and pleasures, as the veriest worldling, and God, if in any of their thoughts, holds a subordinate place. Many of them have set times to be religious. The leisure of winter affords, as they suppose, a very favorable opportunity to renew their religious zeal, and to make amends for their neglect of God and his proffered salvation three-fourths of the year; but the winds of March, or showers of April, are quite certain to extinguish the flame which they have kindled. These, with all the ungodly, God compareth to "wells without water," to "trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots;" to "wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever."

GORDON.

Stonington, Conn., May 4th, 1846.

American Baptist Publication Society.—The Anniversary of this Society was held in Philadelphia, on Tuesday, April 28, when an appropriate sermon was preached by Rev. John Dowling. The Treasurer's Report showed that the pecuniary affairs of the Society were in an encouraging condition. During the past year $23,728 had passed through the Treasury, of which $19,833 had been in the appropriate business of the Society. About 50,000 volumes, of various sizes, have been put in circulation. The plan of operations is to employ missionaries and colporteurs, whose duties embrace both preaching to the destitute, and circulating books and tracts to all classes, especially the members of Baptist churches. These men are supported by a small salary and a percentage upon the books they sell. A plan was introduced at the Anniversary meeting, to raise $10,000, as a special fund, to be invested in the publications of the Society, and the interest to be appropriated annually in donations of libraries to poor ministers, destitute Sunday Schools, and needy individuals. Five persons present put down their names in sums amounting to $2,000; and there is little doubt that the plan will be carried out.

"IN THE SPIRIT ON THE LORD'S DAY."

Many of the objections to the principles and precepts of the gospel are so unreasonable, and so obviously the offspring of a caviling spirit, that some of our most able Christian writers do not condescend to notice them. Of this nature is the objection of the Lord's day, founded on the plea that all days are the Lord's. True, all our time and all our services every day belong to the Lord. But Jehovah is a God of order. He made every seventh portion of time the most appropriate season to lay aside worldly business, cares, recreations, and thoughts, to meditate on his word, and to examine our prospects for the world to come.

If any should doubt whether John by the expression, 'the Lord's day,' referred to the Sabbath, we ask, to what then did he refer? What other day or time could so appropriately be termed the Lord's day? It is the Lord's day, not only as set apart for our worship, but also as a time when the Lord visits his people with peculiar mercy. On no other day does he so often pour out his Spirit to convince the world of sin, and to comfort his people. On no other day is he so often manifestly present by the refreshment of his grace. Those who, on each returning Sabbath, are visited by the refreshing and guiding influence of the Holy Spirit, have the best kind of evidence that this is the day the Lord has made—and that he hath made it a Sabbath—a day of natural and spiritual rest.

☞ The above is taken from an editorial column of Zion's Advocate. We fully agree with the editor, that no other day "could so appropriately be termed the Lord's Day" as the Sabbath. Now it is well known, that the passage here quoted is the only instance in which the term Lord's Day is used in Scripture, and that at the time this was written, no day was spoken of as the Sabbath but the seventh day of the week. Hence we conclude, that when St. John the Revelator said he was in the Spirit on the Lord's Day, he meant that he was in the Spirit on the seventh day of the week. If we are right, then another conclusion naturally follows, which is, that to call the first day of the week the Lord's Day, and to represent the Lord's Day as different from the Sabbath, is unscriptural and wicked.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

The present week in New-York is by general consent appropriated to the Anniversaries of the various Benevolent Associations of the country. We give below some account of the principal meetings held up to the time of our going to press. Farther accounts we hope to give next week.

The New-York Bible Society held its Anniversary at the Tabernacle, on Sunday evening, May 10, when a sermon was preached by Dr. Kennedy of Albany. The Doctor commenced by referring to the precious character of the Bible, and the inestimable advantages enjoyed by those who possess it. He then dwelt upon the characteristics of the Bible, as adapted to the lowly and ignorant, as well as the elevated and intellectual; and more particularly as adapted to the condition of man in his social, political, and religious relations. The discourse was eloquent and instructive. It was followed by some remarks from the President, who stated that this Society covered the whole field of operations in this city, supplying the poor, the emigrants, the shipping, and all who have not the Sacred Word.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions held a meeting on Sunday evening, when the Annual Discourse was preached by Rev. Dr. Murray. An abstract of the Annual Report was read, from which it appears that the receipts of the year have been $91,764 28. The Board has four missionaries in Texas, four among the Choctaw Indians, five among the Creeks and Seminoles, six among the Sacs and Iowas, and four among the Chippewas and Ottewas. It has also thirteen missionaries in Liberia, thirteen in India, two in Siam, one at Canton, two at Amoy, and ten at the Ningpo Mission. A missionary to the Jews has also been engaged, who will soon enter upon his work. Besides the labor of these missionaries, much has been done through the press, several million pages having been printed and circulated within the year.

The Foreign Evangelical Society was addressed on Sunday evening by Rev. Dr. Cheever. His discourse was founded upon the text, "And then shall that wicked be revealed," and was aimed at the evils and abominations of the Romish hierarchy. He maintained that the great question of our age is the practical distinction between the principles of Romanism and those of Protestantism. From this he passed to a lengthy review of the tendencies of Romanism, showing its love of darkness, and the certainty that it will be destroyed by the brightness of the Lord's coming.

The American Seamen's Friend Society held its eighteenth anniversary at the Tabernacle, on Monday evening. The building was densely crowded. Speeches were made by Rev. E. E. Adams, Seamen's Chaplain at Havre, by Messrs. Clark and Leech, sailors, and by the Rev. Dr. Tyng, of this city. The receipts of the Society for the past year, have been $28,930 30.

Perhaps no field is now yielding a richer harvest of moral improvement than the sea. At the foundation of this improvement is the establishment of some fifty temperance boarding houses for seamen along our sea-board, and the various Marine Temperance Societies, numbering about 60,000 members. The Sailors' Home in New York has had, within the year, 3826 sailor boarders, and in four years, 14,837; at least one-third pledged temperance men. Five times as many seamen attend church now as were present ten years ago. The moral phenomena of the sea are among the greatest wonders of the present age.

Expulsion of Baptist Missionaries.—It is generally known, that a Baptist mission was established some years ago on the Island of Fernando Po, as a point from which to carry on efforts for the civilization and evangelization of Africa. In the year 1843, the mission purchased such lands and tenements on the island as were necessary for its purposes. Towards the close of 1845, however, one Don Adolfo de Guillenardo arrived on the island, in the character of Royal Commissioner or Consul General of Spain, with full powers to carry out the instructions of his government, one item of which was immediately to expel the Baptist missionaries from the island. He has been faithful to the spirit of his instructions; and it is arranged that the missionaries shall quit the island before January 1, 1847, and that without one farthing's compensation for the loss of property estimated at about $15,000. The occasion of this hostility to the Baptist mission is not definitely stated. It is generally thought, however, to be two-fold—1st. To get rid of an obstacle to the slave trade, which the Spanish government is not particularly desirous to suppress; 2d. To subserve the design of the Pope of Rome, by extinguishing the light which Protestants have kindled on the dark shores of Africa.

Missions.—At a recent missionary meeting in New-York, the Rev. Dr. Armstrong stated that "twenty odd years ago, two vessels sailed from this country, each with a company of missionaries. They continued the same track to the Equator, when they separated; one went Eastward, around the Cape of Good Hope, landed her missionaries at Ceylon, among an ancient, proud and superstitious people, where they have preached Christ with great success. The other vessel proceeded Westward around Cape Horn, and thence Northward, and landed her missionaries at the Sandwich Islands, among an ignorant, savage and deeply degraded race. There they began to make known the gospel. Now, said Dr. A., I have just received a letter from the Sandwich Islands, with a draft from the Church of Molakai, the contribution of the natives, derived from the sale of mats, &c. of $100, to be paid to the Ceylon mission for the education of pious natives there for the ministry. Is not this indeed a wonder? Christians of the Sandwich Islands, twenty years ago in thickest darkness, now raising funds to educate the youth of Ceylon!"

Influence of an Ignorant Ministry.—There has been a very great diminuition of the churches of the Christian denomination within a few years past. Twenty or thirty years ago, it is said, large sections of the State of Maine were dotted over with their churches, scarcely one of which now remains. A writer in one of the papers of that denomination is attempting to account for this unprecedented falling off. His opinion is, that it is the legitimate result of a lack of knowledge among the ministry. This, he says, has driven away from the churches those intelligent and educated laymen who should have been their strength, and has also given occasion for internal quarrels and divisions without number. There is no doubt a great deal of truth in what he says. Christians are represented as the light of the world and the salt of the earth. But when they allow themselves to be notoriously ignorant, they ought not to be surprised that their enlightening and saving influence is but little felt.

Number of Bibles.—The number of Bibles distributed in one year by the three principal Bible Societies—the British and Foreign, the American, and the American and Foreign—was 1,414,945. The whole number distributed by these three Societies since their organization, is not far from twenty-one millions. Of course this would do but little more than to furnish one Bible to each inhabitant of the United States. When we consider that there are nearly one thousand million inhabitants of the world, which is fifty persons to every Bible printed by these Societies, there seems to be a plenty of work yet to be done in the printing and distribution of Bibles.

Baptist Missions.—The Baptist Missionary Magazine says that the receipts of the Board for the year ending April 1, 1846, exclusive of the grants of the United States Government for Indian Reform, and also of sums received from Bible and Tract Societies, exceed one hundred thousand dollars. The pecuniary condition of the Board is better by at least $30,000 than it was a year ago. Should the pledges which have been so generously given, be promptly redeemed, the Board will soon have extinguished its debt, and be in a condition not only to meet existing engagements, but also to forward speedily reinforcements to several of the suffering missions.

Eastern Association.—The Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association is to meet with the Church in Marlboro, N. J., on fifth day, the 23d instant. A letter from Eld. David Clawson informs us, that at a special meeting of the church on the 5th inst., a resolution was passed, assuring the delegates and friends that they will be cordially welcomed, and that a number of brethren will be at Salem when the Philadelphia steamboat arrives on fourth-day, with carriages to convey them from that place to Marlboro, a distance of some twelve miles. The steamboat for Salem leaves Philadelphia every day at 10 o'clock A. M., from Arch-Street Wharf.

"The Churchman"—the organ of the high-church Episcopal party in New-York—comes to us this week in an enlarged form, in a new dress, and greatly improved.

Death of Mr. Torry.—Rev. Charles T. Torry departed this life at three o'clock on Sabbath afternoon, May 9th. His friends who visited him in prison near the close of the scene, found him cheerful and happy. He spoke of his death in view with faith and resignation. He spoke also of the kindness of Jesus, in making "sick and in prison" the climax of his specifications when he noticed the positions in which his disciples might administer to his wants. "He may have thought of me," said he.—On Monday his remains passed through New-York on their way to Boston, where a funeral is to be held.

Another Delusion.—A new delusion has just sprung up in Avon, Oakland Co., Mich. A man named Uri Adams has established himself there, and claims to be the Lord Jesus Christ come to the earth a second time. He has fitted up a room which he calls the "Sanctum Sanctorum," where he spends much of his time, apparently in great dignity. All who approach him are required to put off their shoes and bow down and worship him. His followers, about thirty in number, do this.

The American Tract Society is about to take down the building at the corner of Nassau and Spruce streets, now occupied as the Tract House, and erect a larger and more substantial building in its place. This was erected about twenty years ago, but its walls spread soon after they were put up, on which account it has not been considered safe to do much press work on its floors. The building will be paid for principally by subscriptions raised in New York for that express object. When it is completed, the Society will do its own printing exclusively.

Shipwreck and Loss of Life.—The Philadelphia Correspondent of the New-York Tribune, under date of May 11, says:—"The bark Swan, Capt. Snell, arrived at our port this morning in 17 days from New Orleans. Capt. S. reports that on the 4th inst. lat. 25 11, long. 79 42, he fell in with a large cutter containing 17 persons, who stated they belonged to the Swedish corvette Carlsoronie, from Havana, bound to Sweden, which vessel had been capsized in a violent gale on the 1st inst. when only a few days from port, and out of 137 souls on board 120 perished at the time of the disaster. Capt. Snell took the survivors on board, and brought them to this port."

A Teacher for Burmah.—It is stated that Miss Lydia Lillibridge, now a teacher in the Female Seminary at Utica, has devoted herself to the work of teaching in Burmah, and expects to go out, in company with Dr. Judson, and reside in his family.

HINDOOISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Rev. E. Noyes, late a missionary at Orissa, has just published a little work on Hindoo Mythology, which shows some of the immense difficulties presented by this system to the conversion of the Hindooo to Christianity. Thy following extract is a fair specimen:

"Hindooism is strong on account of its deeply exciting subjects. Their books abound with topics which are calculated to keep the passions of the soul constantly boiling over. The most tragic examples of self-sacrificing and suffering recorded in our books are ordinary occurrences compared with the penances of their gods and sages. We can tell them how Sampson slew the thousand men with the jaw bone of an ass, but they can tell us how Doorgo wounded a mighty giant, and that each drop of blood that issued from the veins became a monster as powerful as himself, and while she went on slaying the number still increased, till at length becoming discouraged with her slow progress she opened her mouth and swallowed them all. Who would think of Jonah and the whale after such an account? Sampson upset the temple of Dagon, but their sages and gods have long been accustomed to tossing mountains at each other as easily as did even Milton's supernatural warriors. We can tell them how the Saviour wept, but they can as an offset point us to sages who have wept tears of red hot iron; or if we point to his agony in the garden and to his death on the cross, they can tell us of their own divines, who for centuries have rolled on red hot plates of iron, and have lived and fattened upon melted lead and brass.

"What can we do with people whose sympathies have been steeped to such an extent? What corner of the heart is left for the reception of common sense? By what avenue shall the reasonable, the philosophic truths of Christianity enter the Hindoo mind? The missionary may indeed exhaust his store of eloquence—he may destroy his lungs with loud declamation, and weary his hands in thrashing the atmosphere, but make no more impression upon the Hindoo mind than he has made upon the idle wind. The Hindoo stands unmoved before him, and his countenance seems to make the cold reply, 'We have been used to all this and more too.'

"The missionary now begins to feed himself a little man. His youthful enthusiasm begins to cool, and his neck becomes accustomed to the yoke. He begins to feel confident that neither he or any other mortal has any magic strength by which to batter down the strong holds of Hindooism. He exclaims over and over again, what can I do! O how STRONG is this system of abominable idolatries! To form this ingenious plan for the destruction of souls, surely all the resources of hell must have been calledin to action; devils must have racked their ingenuity to the utmost, and the GREAT DRAGON himself must have become insane with deep meditation.

"But while the missionary is almost discouraged, and is ready to give up the work as unfeasible, a still, small voice whispers in his ear, 'Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord.'"

A bill has passed both branches of the Legislature of Michigan, abolishing capital punishment for murder.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The SENATE was in session only a part of last week, having adjourned over from Thursday to Monday for the purpose of allowing the Chamber to be put in order for summer. Not much else than private business was done, except to pass the Revolutionary Pension Bill received from the House.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES passed the Post Office Appropriation Bill. Also a Bill to retrocede the County of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, to the State of Virginia. A Bill was reported for the benefit of the Blind. It proposes to set apart for that class of persons, a quantity of land equal to three townships, to be selected from any public lands in the United States, the proceeds from the sale of which shall go to procure the printing of a Library of Books for the use of the Blind, which books shall be distributed among the States and Territories in the ratio of the number of blind persons in each.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

From papers received in New York on Saturday evening last, it appears that a war with Mexico has actually begun, and that fourteen men have been killed, and forty-six more have been taken prisoners. The Galveston News, Extra, of April 3d, says :—

"On Thursday morning, 23d ult., a Mexican came into General Taylor's camp and reported 2,000 Mexicans crossing the river some twenty miles above. The same afternoon Captains Hardee and Thornton were sent with two companies of cavalry, 63 men in all, to reconnoitre. On Friday morning they fell into an ambush of the enemy, when Lieut. Cairn and thirteen men were killed, Captain Thornton missing, and Captain Hardee and 46 men prisoners. On Saturday afternoon the Mexicans sent in a wounded man who made the above report. These Mexicans, it is stated, were commanded by Canales and Carabajal. After the fight, the Mexicans on this side of the river were largely reinforced, and have surrounded Gen. Taylor's camp, cutting off all communication with Point Isabel, at which place is the train and all the stores belonging to the army—Gen. Taylor not having on hand over ten days' provisions. There are at Point Isabel 90 artillery men, 20 dragoons, about 250 teamsters, and about 150 citizens and laborers ; and the entrenchment not half-finished."

The editors of the Picayune having been favored with a personal interview with Colonel Doane, bearer of dispatches, that paper gives an account of the events somewhat fuller than that from the Galveston News. We copy from it as follows :—

"Capt. Thornton fell in with what he considered to be a scouting party of the enemy, but which proved to be the advance guard of a very strong body of the enemy, who were posted in the chaparral, immediately in the rear of Gen. Taylor's camp. Capt. Thornton, contrary to the advice of his Mexican guide, charged upon the guard, who retreated toward the main body, followed by Capt. Thornton, when in an instant he found himself and command surrounded by the enemy, who fired upon him, killing, as it is supposed, Capt. Thornton, Lieuts. Cairn and Mason, and some twenty-six of the men, and taking Capt. Hardee and the remainder of the command prisoners."

Gen. Taylor has called upon the Governors of Texas, Louisiana, &c. for 8000 troops, and the Governor of Louisiana has issued a requisition for 2,500 volunteers, who were all ready in the streets of New Orleans on the morning of May 2d, actively preparing to depart. The Louisiana Legislature appropriated $100,000 for the service.

ACTION OF CONGRESS.—On Monday morning, May 11, the President communicated to Congress a message in relation to the Mexican affairs, in which he says that a state of war exists and that open hostilities have already commenced. He recommends Congress to recognize a war, and to give him authority to call a large body of volunteers into the service of the United States, to be enlisted for twelve months, and that liberal provisions be made for the requisite supplies. In the Senate, Mr. Calhoun argued that the position taken by the President was incorrect, and that no such state as war exists in the sense implied by the Constitution. It was voted, however, by both Houses, to authorize the enrolling of 50,000 volunteers, and to appropriate ten millions of dollars to defray the expenses of a war with Mexico. Of course this is equivalent to a declaration of war.

THE ANTI-RENT BILLS.—The Assembly of New-York has passed the three Anti-Rent Bills reported by Mr. Tilden. The first abolishes distress for rent—the entire operation of which is expressed in its title, and will at once be understood by all. The second bill is to equalize taxation. It subjects the reserved interest or rents of landlords to taxation, the same as mortgages or any other charge on lands. This taxation reaches a vast amount of property in this city, superadding to the tax already levied on real estate an additional tax on the revenue which that real estate yields. But the most important bill of the three, and the prominent measure of relief urged in behalf of the manor tenants, is the bill in relation to Devises and Descents and the extinguishment of Certain Tenures. This bill prohibits the leasing of agricultural lands for a term longer than ten years, and provides that leaseholders in perpetuity, or any number of them, may unite in an application to the Court of Chancery, for a commutation and extinction, on the death of their landlord, of the interest of the heirs therein, paying the actual value of such right at 7 per cent.

A SINGULAR SUICIDE was committed at Gaston, N. C., last Monday night, by a tailor named Palmer who worked in Raleigh. Just before the hour for the arrival of the freight train of cars for Petersburg, he went on the track, laid himself down between the rails crosswise, his neck on the iron bar, and his feet firmly braced against the opposite rail! In this awful situation, he awaited the approach of the locomotive, having attached thereto twenty-five heavily laden cars —all of which passed over his neck, producing, of course, instant death. He had placed his hat at a convenient distance, in which was found a letter, announcing his determination to "shuffle off this mortal coil," and asking certain gentlemen named therein, to make some provision for his destitute wife and three children. This is the same man who, last year, jumped out of the third story window of the Bollingbrook Hotel, Petersburg.

MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE.—We learn from the Rome (Oneida Co.) Citizen, that much concern is felt in that county in consequence of the mysterious disappearance of one of the most distinguished citizens. It appears from the Citizen, that Benjamin P. Johnson, Esq., of Rome, left that village on the 30th March, by railroad for Albany, from whence he left for Newburgh, but came on to this city the same night. The clerk of the boat recollects that on her arrival at the foot of Warren street, about two o'clock on the morning of the 1st of April, Col. Johnson went ashore with his carpet bag, (the only baggage he had with him,) in his hand. Since that time, nothing has been heard of him. When he left home, he informed his family and others, that he should only be absent a few days. His continued absence is very mysterious, and has involved his family and friends in the greatest distress.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—The Supreme Court of Ohio decided against the validity of every title acquired at the great sale of lands in that State, forfeited for non-payment of taxes in 1843. The Legislature, for the purpose of getting rid of the vast amount of tax arrearages which had accumulated, had resorted the session previous to unusual efforts to fortify the sales, and inspire purchasers with confidence. The sales were consequently very heavy. The Court has pronounced the proceedings entirely unauthorized, by reason of an informality in the absence of the signature of the Auditor of the State to the warrants authorizing the county auditors to sell.

QUANTITY OF BREATH IN MAN AND WOMAN.—The French are the most experimenting race, and their discoveries in the arts and sciences proverbially in advance of other nations. By experiments made at the Paris Academy of Sciences, and arrived at by an ingenious species of mask being placed over the face of the person whose breath was to be examined, it was ascertained, that man gives out a larger quantity than woman, and that this difference is most striking between the ages of sixteen and forty, at which latter period the quantity of carbonic acid given out by the male is double that of the female. In the male, the quantity goes on increasing from the age of eight to thirty, after which it begins to diminish ; and, as a man becomes older and older, the diminution goes on in an increased degree. In old age, the quantity is not greater than it was at the age of ten.

WASH FOR FRUIT TREES.—Lye that will bear an egg will kill all the vermin and the moss that gather on young trees. Apply it in May or June, when the vermin are to be seen. It will do more service than in cold weather. One pound of potash, dissolved in one gallon of water, will form a lye that will be strong enough for the vermin and not injurious to the bark.

SUMMARY.

Luther Pool, jr., a young man 22 years of age, was accidentally shot in the neck at Walnut Grove, Morris county, N. J., on Saturday the 25th ultimo, by one of Cochran's six-barrel pistols, in the hands of a friend who was adjusting a cap. He expired in ten minutes.

As the brig Will, Collins master, was warping out of the Eastern packet pier at Boston on Saturday morning, the first mate of the brig, (James Lorty,) fell from the main stay upon deck, and was instantly killed. He belongs to Philadelphia, and has a wife and two children.

In the single county of Mercer, Penn., there are now erecting fourteen new iron furnaces, and one thousand miners are now wanted to mine iron and coal in the valley of the Chenango. Men that have some experience in mining are most needed, yet all are sure of employment, and in a region proverbial for its healthfulness.

Among the passengers by the Columbiana, from Boston for Liverpool, are six boot and shoe makers, who are about to establish themselves in Manchester, England, to make "pegged soles" for John Bull. What next?

It is stated in the Newfoundland Times that the whole of the island in and about the neighborhood of Conception Bay, very probably the whole island, is rising out of the ocean, at a rate which promises, at no distant day, to materially effect, if not to render useless, many of the best harbors. It seems on a part of the coast that rocks, over which schooners could pass forty years ago, are now approaching the surface, and there is scarcely enough water over them for a small skiff.

The work on the Girard College buildings, is going on with great rapidity, so that within a year, the institution will probably be ready for the reception of orphans.

There was a destructive fire in Morristown, N. J., on the 4th inst., which burnt Gibbons' Hotel, originally built at a cost of $120,000.

The two bills before the Assembly of New-York, known as the Anti-Rent bills, were passed by that body May 4.

A bill has been introduced into the Assembly of New-York, making provision to submit the question of Abolishing Capital Punishment to the direct votes of the people.

The Steamship Cambria, which went ashore at Truro, on Saturday night, May 2d, was relieved from her perilous situation without much injury, and arrived at Boston on the Tuesday morning after the accident.

The last news received from the American army in Texas, was, that Lieut. Taylor and four men had been killed by the Mexicans. The Mexican Commander denied all responsibility for the outrage, and his denial was received as an excuse by General Taylor.

McCook, for an attempt to bribe a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, has been sentenced to pay a fine of $600 and the costs of the prosecution.

There will be a handsome office created by forming Oregon into a State. The "mileage," at the present rates, will be about $12,000, as it is 15,000 miles, via Cape Horn, to that most delightful country.

The Marlborough (Md.) Gazette, noticing the death of Mr. Ashcom, says:—It was found impossible to extract the ball from his head, it having entered at the back part and worked round the skull, and lodged just above the nose. The pressure upon the optic nerve caused blindness some days before his death.

The whale ship Manhattan, Capt. Budd, of Sag Harbor, lately visited the port of Jeddo, in Japan, for the purpose of restoring to their homes 22 Japanese who had been picked up on board a wreck, and on a desolate island. They were, contrary to the usage of the Japanese, treated hospitably, but enjoined not to come there again.

A man named Barron, living at the Community in Northampton, killed his wife on Sunday morning, by beating her brains out with a hammer, as she lay in her bed. He then attempted to drown himself, but was rescued and committed to jail, and was found dead in his cell on Monday morning, having hung himself with one of his suspenders.

A Cape of Good Hope paper of March 13, announces, with great rejoicing, what it declares to be an ascertained fact, that copper ore of rich quality exists in several places—six at least—in South Africa ; that it can be worked easily and cheaply, lying near the surface, and that the land carriage to the shipping post, less than one hundred miles, is over a level and easily traveled region.

The last Skaneateles Democrat says :—The Skaneateles Community has ceased to exist. Mr. Collins, who stood at the head of the Community so long, retires, and Samuel Seliers, a gentleman who has been with them, we believe, from the beginning, assumes the liabilities of the Community and receives all the property belonging to it. Mr. S. is a plain, practical man, was educated a farmer, and no doubt will make a profitable establishment of it.

The Wire of the Magnetic Telegraph, in Lancaster city, Pa., was struck by lightning several times during the thunder storms of last week. No damage was done, nor is it believed that, in case of a recurrence of the accident, any injury could be sustained, the wire being too small to contain a sufficient quantity of fluid to produce any serious consequences. The sound produced by the stroke, in the interior of the Telegraph Office, was similar to that of the report of a pistol, which was accompanied by the emission of a few sparks.

A correspondent of one of the newspapers, writing from Baltimore, tells us that the trial of four young men, charged with knocking down and violating a German girl who had been only a few days in the country, was postponed to next October, after one or two continuances already granted, that their bail was reduced by the Court, without a hearing, from $5000 to $3000, and that the principal witness, the victim of the outrage, was again remanded to prison for six months as a witness!! If this statement be true, it discloses a degree of judicial profligacy which might challenge the world for a parallel.

An important case has just been decided in the U. S. District Court of Louisiana, by which Rice Garland and Thomas Curry establish their claim (against the United States) to about 40,000 acres of land on Black River, derived under a grant to Louis Bringler, in 1796. A portion of the land having been sold by the United States, it is decided that plaintiffs are entitled to scrip for such portions. Judge Garland, one of the plaintiffs, it will be recollected, recently fled from New Orleans under very painful circumstances. When last heard from he was in Texas.

The Hon. David Yulee, late Senator from Florida, has married a white woman. Yulee's grandfather was an officer of one of the petty monarchs of Africa, who emigrated to Cuba and took the name of Yulee.

The annual consumption of milk in London, amounts to $5,200,000, the supply of which requires 40,000 cows.

John Jacob Astor has lately made a donation of $350,000 for a library in New-York, limiting the cost of the edifice to contain it to $60,000.

Madame de Witt, of Hanover, has just completed, after twenty-two years' arduous labor, a globe of the moon, in which all the discoveries that have been made in the lunar planet, are set forth with the minutest particularity. The globe has excited the admiration of the scientific world, and of the King and the aristocracy. It has been purchased for the Royal Astronomical Society of London.

The Austrian censorship has placed the whole stock of a Leipsic bookseller under sequestration, and forbidden the Viennese booksellers to purchase any part of the same. The cause of this extreme measure is a pamphlet issued from the shop of the above publisher, and circulated clandestinely in Hungary, containing, as is alledged, seditious language.

The city of Naples is the most thieving place on earth. The population is 400,000, viz: 100, 000 thieves, 100,000 beggars, 100,000 soldiers and priests, and the balance decent people, who are made up of foreigners, (chiefly English,) respectable persons and shopmen, with the nobility and fishermen, who rank as the most honest of the Neapolitans.

When honest industry raises a family to opulence and honors, its very original lowness sheds lustre on its elevation ; but all its glory fades when it has given a wound, and denies a balsam to a man as humble and as honest as its ancestor.

On Wednesday evening of last week a New-York merchant took the steamboat Traveler Eastward, and was in Providence at 4 next morning, transacted business there till 8 ; took the cars for Boston, arriving at 10 ; did business there till 2 ; took the cars for Worcester ; where he arrived at 4 ; did business there till 7 ; took the Norwich cars for New-York, and was home again at 7 next morning, having been one day away from his business, traveled nearly 500 miles, and spent eleven hours in transacting business in three different places, each forty miles from both the others.

At a meeting of the New-Jersey Historical Society last week, among other interesting relics exhibited for the inspection of the members, were the original parchment deeds from the Duke of York to Wm. Penn and his memorable associates, and the parchment volume of "Concession" which they, as Proprietors of the territory, subsequently issued under that title, inviting settlers, containing their own proper signatures, and dated August 6th, 1680. These valuable old papers belong to the Surveyor's General's office, and are in a good state of preservation.

A late English paper says that a farmer has demanded compensation from the Cork and Brandon Railway Company for injury which would be done to the milk of his cows, by reason of the noise, steam and smoke of the locomotives in their transit!

It is said that the Post Office Committee in the House of Representatives will report in favor of making the same amount of postage payable on one fourth of an ounce as now payable on half an ounce. They will also report in favor of creating an additional rate of postage, or fifteen cents for all additional distance over 600 miles, to continue during the existence of the mail contracts already made. It is as yet impossible to say what the rate of these proposed changes will be.

The Cambria has been thoroughly examined by experienced persons in every part, to ascertain if she was damaged, and they cannot find that she sustained even the slightest strain. The inner planking was taken off for that purpose, and it is found that she is in as perfect condition as when she first came off the stocks. She will not even be obliged to go into dock for any, the most trifling repairs.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

ORPHAN HYMN.

He to whose side we fondly stole,
And sate upon his knee,
When infant pleasure filled our soul,
Our father! where is he?

She, too, who bore us on her breast
With unremitting care,
And on our cheek warm kisses pressed,
Where is that mother?—where?

O ye who fain with angel-skill
Our suffering lot would aid,
And strive that fearful chasm to fill
That in our joys is made;

Who for our orphan wants provide,
And with protecting arm,
Still shield us from the world's neglect,
And from the tempter's harm—

God be your strength in trouble's day,
And from his heavenly throne,
The bounty and the love repay
That ye to us have shown. L. H. S.

A True Story from History.

Rome was a war-like nation, she was brought into existence by war, lived by war, and died by war. Yet all her rulers were not equally fond of blood; Antoninus, the seventh Emperor of Rome, prefered peace to war, yet the martial spirit of the people and repeated disorders among tributary provinces often forced him into the field against his will and his better feelings.

One hundred and seventy-four years after the birth of Christ, this best of Roman Emperors was called to the field with his army, to suppress a rebellion near the banks of the Danube. He found himself surrounded by wild tribes in a wild country, where it was difficult to procure food and water for his men and their horses. There was no rain for a long time, and the brooks and streams were dried up, so that man and beast were likely to perish. The enemy closed them in to prevent their approaching either fountains or rivers, and pressed upon them to force them to battle.

The Romans stood in their ranks, with parched lips, and enfeebled frames.—They were almost suffocated with dust, and consumed by thrist and famine, beneath the rays of a burning sun. When the Emperor saw the fierce barbarians drawing nearer and nearer, he had no resource but to apply to his heathen gods. Advancing to the head of his army, he spread forth his hands and cried, "By this hand which taketh no life away, I desire to appease thee: and I pray unto thee, Oh, Giver of Life."

This was as good a supplication as this heathen emperor knew how to make. His faith had never been taught to rest on the true God, and the blessed Redeemer. A child in one of our Sunday Schools might know better how to pray in time of trouble, than did this wise prince. He indeed held a high rank among Stoic philosophers, but "the world by wisdom knew not God."

It was told Marcus Aurelius, that in the camp was an Egyptian, who said that the Gods of his country could give rain. Hastily summoned, the swarthy man came forth, and, at the Emperor's commaud, commenced his rites of devotion. Bowing his turbaned head to the earth, he invoked Isis, to pour water from her overflowing urn. Becoming excited, he used strong incantations and wild cries, till his features became convulsed with demoniac expression. But in vain. 'For can all the vanities of the heathen give rain?—or can the heavens give showers?'

In that Roman army was a legion of soldiers that were called Christians, and though it may be thought they were engaged in a bad business for Christians, they knew better how to pray than their heathen Emperor, or the blind Egyptian who succeeded so poorly. Falling on their knees, they with one consent, implored the Almighty for the sake of their dear Saviour, to hear and grant relief. Solemnly rose up the voice of their prayers, in that time of great adversity. All around was despair,—yet in their lowly hearts was a trust in Him who is mighty to save.

The hour of battle could no longer be delayed. The barbarians rushed on, exulting to see the Romans worn almost to skeletons, and faint with thirst.

Suddenly the skies grew black. A few large drops fell. Then, the precious rain came in torrents. The Romans catching it in their helmets and the hollow of their shields, were inspired with new strength. While they were moistening their parched lips, the foe attacked them and blood was mingled with the water that allayed their thirst.

The tempest became terrible, with lightning and thunder echoing from cliff to cliff. The affrighted barbarians, exclaiming that the gods were fighting against them, with fire from heaven, turned and fled.

Marcus Aurelius received this unexpected deliverance with gratitude. Connecting it in his heart with the Christians he caused the persecutions of that sect to cease. The events of that day with other historic memorials, were sculptured on a beautiful marble pillar still standing at Rome and known as the Antonine column.

We do not relate this story to prove that it is right for Christians to fight, we do not think it proves any such thing, yet it does prove two things. It proves that war is dangerous and leads to much suffering. It also proves that it is better to trust in God than in the strength of arms, and that prayers are better than swords.

Joseph and Josiah.

"Mary," said Albert one day when he and his little brother Charlie were with their sister in the parlor, "I believe Josiah Hale is the most generous boy in the world."

"Do you," said his sister, "I think I know one more generous, even in our village."

"A boy in our village as generous as Josiah Hale! Why I don't see who he can be. What is his name?"

"His name is Joseph Page. You know him very well. He lives in the little old house, at the lower end of Penny lane."

"Joseph Page," repeated Albert, his countenance expressing a great deal of surprise, "Joseph Page more generous than Josiah Hale? Why sister, you are making fun of me!"

"No," replied Mary, "I am quite serious. Joseph Page is the most generous boy of my acquaintance."

"But Mary," said Albert, "Joseph Page has nothing to give. His mother is very poor. His clothes are all over patches, and I have seen him without stockings in very cold weather."

"And I remember," said little Charlie, looking eagerly up in his sister's face, "when you gave him some of Albert's stockings to keep his feet warm. What can he have to give away? But, perhaps," said he, turning towards Albert, and his countenance brightened as if he had caught a happy thought, "perhaps sister means that he would be generous if he had anything to give."

James laughed a little at the self-satisfied tone with which his little brother spoke, and Mary smiled as she replied,

"No, Charlie, that is not my meaning. I suppose that if Joseph Page was rich he would do more good than he can at present, but he gives more now than any boy whom I know. I will relate something about him, which I am sure is true, and then you can judge yourselves of his generosity. He sometimes does errands for Mr. Hill, the store-keeper. The money which he obtains in this, and in various other ways, he carries directly to his mother, nor will he accept from her a single cent to purchase any little thing for himself, though she often urges him to do so. Sometimes Mr. Hill on pay day, will give him two or three apples, or a gingerbread cake, but he never eats them himself.—Sometimes his mother will refuse to eat the cake, or an apple, unless he will share it with her, and then he will put his arms about her neck, and coax her so affectionately, telling her how much happier he shall be to see her eat it, than to eat it himself.

"Once when his mother had persuaded him to take part of a gingerbread cake, he put it in his pocket, and she supposed that he afterwards eat it. Instead of that, however, he carried it to Old Katie, who you know lives in an upper room of the same house. And she says that he often brings her a rosy-cheeked apple, which no doubt his mother has obliged him to take for himself. The giving up of an apple, or of a gingerbread cake, may not, my dears, seem to you like much of a sacrifice, for you have enough of both, besides many other luxuries; but if, like Joseph, you had very seldom anything but potatoes, and a little salt to eat, you would understand how much self-denial he practises. Josiah Hale gives cakes, fruit, marbles, and other things of which he has more than enough. His allowance of pocket-money is large, and he makes no sacrifice by his gifts." The boys had listened with much interest, and as soon as Mary had finished, James exclaimed: "Yes, that's the true generosity," and little Charlie, with the tears standing in his large blue eyes, said, "That's a real good boy, and I mean to ask father to let me give him my quarter of a dollar."—*Ch. Maxims for Youth.

None more impatiently suffer injuries, than those that are most forward in doing them.

By taking revenge, a man is but even with his enemy; but in passing it over he is superior.

To err is human: to forgive, divine.

A more glorious victory cannot be gained over another man, than this, that when the injury began on his part, the kindness should begin on ours.

The prodigal robs his heir, the miser robs himself.

We should take a prudent care for the future, but so as to enjoy the present. It is not part of wisdom, to be miserable to-day, because we may happen to be so to-morrow.

To mourn without measure, is folly: not to mourn at all, insensibility.

Some would be thought to be great things who are but tools and instruments; like the foo who fancied he played upon the organ, when he only blew the bellows.

Though a man may become learned by another's learning, he can never be wise but by his own wisdom.

It is ungenerous to give a man occasion to blush at his own ignorance in one thing, who perhaps may excel us in many.

No object is more pleasing to the eye, than the sight of a man whom you have obliged; nor any music so agreeable to the ear, as the voice of one that owns you for his benefactor.

The coin that is most current among mankind is flattery; the only benefit of which is, that by hearing what we are not, we may be instructed what we ought to be.

The character of the person who commends you, is to be considered before you set a value on his esteem. The wise man applauds him who he thinks most virtuous; the rest of the world, him who is most wealthy.

The temperate man's pleasures are durable, because they are regular: and all his life is calm and serene, because it is innocent.

A good man will love himself too well to lose, and all his neighbors too well to win, an estate by gaming. The love of gaming will corrupt the best principle in the world.

An angry man who suppresses his passions, thinks worse than he speaks; and an angry man that will chide, speaks worse than he thinks.

A good word is an easy obligation; but not to speak ill, requires only our silence, which costs us nothing.

It is to affectation the world owes its whole race of coxcombs. Nature in her whole drama never drew such a part; she has sometimes made a fool, but a coxcomb is always of his own making.

It is the infirmity of little minds, to be taken with every appearance, and dazzled with every thing that sparkles; but great minds have but little admiration, because few things appear new to them.

It happens to men of learning, as to ears of corn; they shoot up, and raise their heads high, while they are empty; but when full and swelled with grain, they begin to flag and droop.

He that is truly polite, knows how to contradict with respect, and to please without adulation; and is equally remote from an insipid complaisance, and a low familiarity.

The failings of good men are commonly more published in the world than their good deeds; and one fault of a deserving man shall meet with more reproaches, than all his virtues praise; such is the force of ill-will and ill-nature.

It is harder to avoid censure, than to gain applause; for this may be done by one great or wise action in an age; but to escape censure, a man must pass his whole life without saying or doing one ill or foolish thing.

Rammohun Roy

Here is a strange looking man, with his ample turban and folding robes. Are our young readers anxious to know who it can be? Perhaps they cannot make out what the name is—or if, with their mother's help, they can spell it, perhaps they never have heard of such a being, and cannot imagine why his portrait should be presented in the Recorder.

Well, read on a little, and you will see. His name is RAMMOHUN ROY. He was a Hindoo, and one of the learned priests of the Hindoo religion, called a Brahmin. He was born in Bengal; and from very early life manifested an ardent love of knowledge. When he was but a boy, he could speak the Arabic and Persian languages—which are very difficult to learn. He also studied mathematics—became very versed in Euclid, and in the logic of Aristotle. We are apt to think that all the heathen are very ignorant and benighted—so they are in respect to the highest and best kind of knowledge. But they are not ignorant of what we call learning. Some of these Brahmins are exceedingly learned. They know how to reason very acutely; and they are well taught in all the branches of their learning, some of which is very difficult. Rammohun Roy was the son of a wealthy trader, and on the death of his father became very rich. By his study and inquiry he became convinced that the idolatrous religion in which he had been brought up, was not true. That religion teaches that there is a number of Gods, and inculcates some of the worst vices men can commit, as parts of relious worship. This he saw at once could not be right. He saw everywhere the evidence that there was but one God, and that he was holy and good. He had no Bible to teach him this. He had never heard the name of the true God, or of Jesus Christ—but his own conscience and good sense told him it must be so.

As soon as he became convinced of the falsity of the Hindoo religion, he began to write against it. His first work was against the "idolatry of all religions." It was written with such great force, and was so clear and conclusive in its reasonings, that it produced great effect, and made the Hindoos very angry. It nearly cost him his life. Even his own mother threatened to kill him. This is the way the wicked heart treats all truth.

But he was not frightened from his purpose. The rage and malice of the Hindoos only convinced him the more that what he said of the falsity of their religion was true. He fled away from his persecutors, and began to write again.

About this time, he came across a portion of the Bible. It was only a small part that was translated into a language he could read. How eagerly did he read it! How pure and beautiful did it appear to him, in contrast with the vile and false books of the Hindoo religion! He drank it in like water. And in order to be able to read the whole of it, he commenced studying the English language, and soon mastered it. Soon he published another book, which he called "The instructions and precepts of Jesus Christ, the guide to peace and happiness." In this he says, "he found the Christian doctrines more conducive to moral principles, and better adapted for the use of reasonable beings than any other which had come to his knowledge." There may be many essential errors in his book, but considered as the work of a Pagan, who had no acquaintance with Christianity but what he received from the perusal of the Bible, it is a remarkable production.

Every body must admire the independence, impartiality, and love of truth which the Brahmin showed. He reasoned honestly and fearlessly, and then told what he thought. He was not deterred by personal dangers, or losses, by the reproaches of his friends, or any earthly consideration, from doing what he thought was right. He had a noble mind, and an honest heart, and affords an example which many a person born in Christian lands may well follow.

What a proof this affords of the Christian religion. It commended itself with such force to the mind of an honest pagan, that he could not resist its claims. And how does his conduct reprove those who hear and know the gospel all their lives, yet never obey it! Surely he will rise up in judgment againt them.

Rammohun Roy visited England in the latter part of his life out of curiosity, and died there.

Soldiers and War.

My young readers have often been delighted to witness the military parade. They are pleased with the sound of soul-stirring music, the glitter of bright guns and swords, and the tramp of the war horse. They follow the company on its march through the streets, and hasten to the muster-field to see the sham-fight. They wish they were old enough to train, that they might have a drum or a gun. They see nothing in all this show and parade that appears wrong, or that can do any harm. But think, reader, what are the soldiers learning? Are they not practising the art of war? And what is this but learning to kill men? What are the guns and swords for but to kill and murder others? John is proud to follow the company in which his father and brother trains. He wishes he were old enough to march with them. But suppose tomorrow that same company should be called out to go to the battle field, where they must kill others and probably be killed themselves. How would John feel as he heard the music, and saw them leave their happy homes, their children, their wives, their farms and their dearest friends, never to see them again? Would he run after them and shout and wish he could be a soldier? If other soldiers from other countries should come and kill his mother, and murder his brothers and sisters, and burn his house and village, would he think it a fine thing to be a soldier? No. But this is their business. They march, and exercise, and fire, that they may learn all this.

See an army marching to meet their enemy, with powder and balls, with cannon and swords, to kill and conquer. Would you like to be with them? Would you like to have your father or brother among them, and hear that they had died on the bloody field and been trampled to the earth by the fierce war-horse? Think before you choose and pursue any course, what it will lead to, and whether God will be pleased with it.

What does the bible say? How should we feel and act towards all men? How should we treat our enemies? What is gained by war? What is lost? Does it prepare men for heaven? What feelings have those who wish to fight, or wish to have others fight? The Saviour came to save men, to do them good. We should be like him. [S. S. Treasury.

Filial Motives to Piety.

"A foolish son is the heaviness of his mother."

"A foolish son," says another proverb, "is a grief to his father."

"You have a power over the happiness of your parents."

You can by your folly outdo all common forms of trouble. You can, by your folly, pierce your mother's heart, and send into it a pang, even worse than the agonies of death. And by your mere continuance in folly, you can embitter every day, and even her whole life, while she is daily surrounded with prosperity; you, yes you, can hide comfort from her soul, while nature smiles around her, and while the bounties of Providence are poured lavishly upon her. And had she not a refuge, a very present help in every time of trouble, your folly could make her wish that she were not a mother, could drive her to despair.

All this you can do, because she loves you. Could she cease to love you; could she break the tie that binds you to her heart; could she suffer you to break that tie; could she forget that you were her son, she might be eased of her heaviness; but now she must be doomed to daily, unchanging sorrow, if she loves a foolish, hardened, accursed son, the heaviness of his mother.

A vicious and abandoned son is the heaviness of his mother, a grief to his father. In a mere worldly point of view, how unhappy his case and how afflicting to his parents! He has broken the restraints which bound him to them; he is becoming every day more careless of right and wrong; he fears neither man nor God; his evil passions wax stronger and stronger, and one vice and folly succeeds rapidly to another. He is pursuing his swift way to all the ruin of which man is capable in this life. He bids fair to be poor and wretched; to destroy his bodily health; to have a disturbed and unhappy mind; to be an example of all that is evil, and an injury to all that is good. There are such children. Yes, and I could point you to a mother, whose heart dies within her, when she hears the horrid oath; or fixes her eyes upon the bloated face and drunken staggering of her son. Yes, and I could walk with you to a grave, where a mother lies, whose eyes sometimes wept for hours, and sometimes could not weep, for depth of agony, and who sunk in sorrow to the grave killed—yes, KILLED, by the daggers which the son's vices planted in her heart."

SONG OF THE SUMMER WINDS.

BY GEORGE DARLEY.

Up the dale and down the bourne,
O'er the meadow swift we fly;
Now we sing and now we mourn,
Now we whistle, now we sigh.

By the grassy-fringed river,
Through the murmuring reeds we sweep;
'Mid the lily leaves we quiver,
To their very hearts we creep.

Now the maiden rose is blushing
At the frolic things we say,
While aside her cheek we're rushing
Like some truant bees at play.

Through the blooming groves we rustle,
Kissing every bud we pass,
As we did it in the bustle,
Scarcely knowing how it was.

Down the glen, across the mountain,
O'er the yellow heath we roam,
Whirling round about the fountain
Till its little beakers foam.

Bending down the weeping willows,
While our vesper hymn we sigh;
Then unto our rosy pillows
On our weary wings we hie.

There of idlenesses dreaming,
Scarce from waking we refrain,
Moments long as ages deeming
Till we're at our play again.

The Good Boy and Wicked Father.

In the city of New York lived a little boy, who appeared to take little or no interest in learning, so that he was pronounced by his teacher a very dull scholar. He learned to read but very slowly, and finally neglected the school thinking he should never succeed. There was a Bible class organized, which he was induced to attend. And here he soon began to manifest an interest in the study of the Scriptures. He learned to read very well, which much astonished his father, who was a very wicked man. One Sabbath his father took some nails and a hammer, to nail up a fence, when he was reproved by his little son, who spoke about working on the Sabbath day, and invited him to attend public worship. The enraged father drove him from his presence, and threatened to punish him if ever he talked so again. The child went away sorrowful. Not long after this, as the little boy returned from public worship, he went and looked over his father's shoulder, and observed that he was reading Hume's History of England. He went into the middle of the room, and said, "Father, where do you expect to go when you die?" Such a question from such a boy could not be borne. "Away," said he, "from my presence immediately, or I will whip you." The child retired, but the father was troubled. He went out to take a walk, but still a load was pressing upon his agonized soul. He thought of attending public worship, for nothing else seemed so likely to soothe his troubled feelings. He entered while the minister was at prayer, and that day was the beginning of better days to him. He sought from God the forgiveness of his sins, and soon obtained the hope of eternal life.

A few years passed away, and the old man was on his dying bed. His son attended him, constantly ministering to his spiritual wants. To a Christian minister the father said, "I am dying, but I am going to heaven; and my son has been the instrument of saving my soul." Soon his spirit was released, to be welcomed, as we have no reason to doubt, into the mansions of glory. Happy child! to be the instrument of saving his father from death. Happy parent, to be blessed with such a child.—Facts for Boys.

The Little Missionary.

A very profane and profligate sailor met a pious little girl in a street of New York, and tried to injure her feelings by using vile language. The little girl, looking earnestly in his face, solemnly warned him of his danger, and reminded him that he must shortly meet her at the bar of God! The sailor was greatly affected at this unexpected reproof. 'It was,' said he 'like a broad-side raking fore and aft, and sweeping by the board every sail and spar prepared for a wicked cruise.' He returned, confounded, to his ship. The little girl's language and look were constantly in his mind. In a few days his heart was subdued, and he became a consistent disciple of the Saviour.

THE BIRDS AND BOYS.

Spring is here, with its warbling throng,
And the Robin is on the tree;
She sweetly sings her morning song,
As small birds chipper on the lawn,
And seek their summer home with thee.

Spring is here, with its sports and glee,
And children sport as well as birds;
So come, my lads, and promise me,
For sure that boy will crue be
If he one little nest disturbs.

Wickedness, condemned by her own witness, is very timorous, and being pressed with conscience, always forcasteth evil things; for fear is nothing else but a betraying of the succors which reason offereth.

He who wants good sense is unhappy in having learning; for he has thereby more ways of exposing himself.

HEAR BOTH SIDES.

The first of the following letters is from a Baptist minister in England to one of his former parishioners, now in this country, who has recently embraced the Sabbath. The second letter is by a person who formerly belonged to the same church in England, and is now known as a decided Seventh-day Baptist. We bespeak for both of them a careful perusal, without commenting upon either, and only stopping to suggest the possibility that the Baptist doctrines taught by the English clergyman, may have paved the way for his parishioners to become Sabbath-keepers. Whether his objections to the Sabbath are consistent with the doctrine that "the Bible only is the religion of Baptists," we leave the reader to decide.

Letter of the English Clergyman.

O... , Eng., January 12, 1840.

DEAR FRIEND,—You ask my opinion on the subject of the Seventh-day Baptists. I am somewhat surprised that you should feel so much difficulty on that subject. The authority for observing the first day of the week, is the practice of the apostolical churches at the time they were under the personal superintendence of the apostles themselves,—the knowledge of that practice being ascertained, not by tradition, but by the sacred records. There is full evidence that those churches kept the ordinances on the first day of the week, Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Some things which are recorded may be accounted for as national customs, observances of the synagogue, &c., such as washing of feet, selling property for the distribution of alms among the poor, community of goods, exhortation of the brethren, &c. But here is a practice at variance with all their customs, against all their prejudices; for which, therefore, no reason can be given but that it was done in obedience to the apostles. Attached as the Jews were to their own customs, hostile as they were to all innovation, would they have dared to establish a practice contrary to their customs, if they had not been convinced of its divine origin? The argument appears to me unanswerable. You alledge that there is no command; but the practice of the first churches, under the direction of the apostles, is the same as a command. Were they inspired only while they held the pen in their hands, and were indicting epistles to the churches? Were they not inspired in the oral directions which they gave to the churches? Were a Quaker to use your argument, I should not be surprised. But the argument comes with an ill grace from a Baptist. If example is not equal to command, what becomes of the argument, which the Baptists have been in the habit of triumphantly advancing, namely, the example of the baptism of men and women, and the total absence of the baptism of infants? This is after all the stronghold of the Baptists. The command to baptize is easily explained—(I do not say truly, but easily and plausibly)—so as to consist with the baptism of infants. But what are our opponents to do with the examples recorded in the New Testament? It is pure assumption to say, that those persons would have been baptized in their infancy if their parents had been Christians But if the practice of the churches while under the personal direction of the apostles is not equal to a command, your great baptismal argument falls to the ground. The exhortation of the brethren was a custom of the synagogue, which will account for its being practiced by the first Christians; and therefore a command was necessary in order to turn it into a standing Gospel ordinance. So of the community of goods, and many other things. But the keeping of the first day of the week was not a national custom; nay, it was an infringement of national custom, and could have had, in the first churches, no other origin than apostolical injunction. You will say, this is establishing the point by reasoning, inference, &c. I answer, if we must reject what can be fairly established by reasoning and inference, we must reject the greater part of revealed theology. We cannot establish the doctrine of justification by faith, nor that of the real influence of the Holy Spirit, nor many others equally important, without reasoning from the Scriptures. It is the will of God, that a great part of divine truth should appear in this form; partly to exercise our active faculties; partly to make divine truth more interesting; partly as a proof of our sincerity, and of the simplicity of our faith, in following the light when we see that it comes from God. Furthermore, the abundance or paucity of the evidence of any truth, is in proportion to its importance. Baptism and the Lord's Supper are significant of the more vital truths of the Gospel; and consequently are infinitely more momentous than the day of the week on which the ordinances shall be observed. Yet that is of some importance, since the first day was the day of our Saviour's resurrection—the day when he rested from the labors of the new creation.

It has been said, that the apostles observed the seventh day. This is not correct. When they traveled into cities where the Jews were assembled in their synagogues on the seventh day, they met with them, because it gave them an opportunity of preaching the Gospel to their brethren. They would have done the same had it been on the Tuesday or the Thursday, just as ministers traveling among our churches preach to us when it is convenient, whether it is Monday night or Wednesday evening. These examples, it is clear, must go for nothing. They do not bear on the point. It ought to be shown, that the apostles met Christian churches, to observe Christian ordinances on the seventh day.

The argument between the Sabbatarian Baptists and others appears to me to stand thus. First. Neither can cite the command of the apostles for their practice. 2d. The English Baptists can cite the custom of the apostolical churches in their favor, while the Sabbatarian Baptists cannot quote any such authority. 3d. The Seventh-day Baptist is obliged to go back to the old dispensation, just as the advocates of a national establishment go back to the theocracy of the Jews. But here the argument, allowing its authenticity, as it appears to me, quite breaks down. For religious ordinances, in the former dispensation, were not kept on the Sabbath more than any other day. The passover, the pentecost, the day of the great atonement, the feast of tabernacles, and all the rest, as far as my recollection serves me, were not celebrated on the Sabbath day. The seventh day was set apart as a day of rest by divine command, and as such was holy; that is, consecrated to a particular use. Nor is there any evidence even that it was used for public worship until after the captivity. At any rate it is certain that the public ordinances were not confined to that day more than to any other. That the patriarchs before Moses offered their sacrifices on the seventh day, cannot be proved either by command or example. The Sabbatarian, therefore, has no authority, either from the New Testament or from the Old. But it will be inquired, Did not our Lord meet for worship in the synagogue on the seventh day? We answer, He did. But he did not observe the ordinances of the Gospel on that day, and that is the point to be investigated. The question is, what authority has the Sabbatarian for observing the ordinances of the Gospel on the Jewish Sabbath? He cannot quote the example of Christ, or the apostles, or the primitive churches, or any command of either Moses or Christ. The weight of evidence, even though it may not appear so great as some have desired, is prodigiously on the side of the Particular Baptists.

I will conclude by saying, I have never seen any argument in favor of Sabbatarianism which is satisfactory, while Acts xx. 7, and 1 Cor. xvi. 2, affords sufficient authority for our practice. I would say, Si erro erro cum Paulo et cum ecclesis suis. Can the Sabbatarian say the same? Can he prove that Paul celebrated the ordinances of the Gospel with a Christan church on the seventh day? Unless he can do this, he does nothing. I challenge him to the proof. But if, as I suspect from the strain of your letter, you wish to unite with the Seventh-day Baptists from sympathy with their character and spirit, I would say, I should feel no difficulty in worshiping with them, for if it is lawful to worship God on the Monday or Wednesday, it is equally so on the Saturday; only, I would maintain the authority of the first day by observing the ordinances of the Gospel on that day in so far as I had the oppportunity.

I remain yours fraternally,

JAS. S***.

Reply to the Foregoing.

To the Rev. Jas. S.....:—

DEARLY BELOVED PASTOR,—Your letter on Sabbatarianism, to our mutual friend and brother in Christ, G. R. W., was handed me a few days ago. I have ventured to write this answer to it, because I suppose that the "challenge to the Sabbatarian," contained in the closing paragraph, was intended for me. I choose to reply through the public press, because a circle of family connections are interested in the question between us on the one side, and them and you on the other, and because the subject is increasingly important in the eyes of the religious public. The profit I received from your ministry in early life, has greatly endeared you to me; and the soundness of your theological sentiments, and the clearness of your judgment, in most that I have heard from your pulpit ministrations, and seen from your pen, has led me to entertain a very high respect for your talents and learning. And I can account for the manner in which you have written upon this subject only by supposing that it is one which you have not heretofore thoroughly examined. Permit me, therefore, while I retain my long-cherished respect for your character and attainments, to point out the unsound positions and palpable mistakes into which I think you have fallen.

Your letter contains two natural divisions. First, The authority for observing the first day of the week. Second, The objections to the arguments for Sabbatarianism.

The authority for observing the first day of the week, you say, is, "the practice of the apostolical churches at the time they were under the personal superintendence of the apostles themselves—the knowledge of that practice being ascertained, not by tradition, but by the sacred records." You cite us to Acts xx. 7, and 1 Cor. xvi. 2. But it seems never to have entered into your mind, to question whether those two texts teach that the apostles did religiously observe the first day of the week as a sacred day. Hence you assign not a single reason for such an opinion, but labor to account for an observance which, as it appears to us, never existed in the apostolic churches. A moment's reflection will enable you to see that this is what you used familiarly to call, "Begging the question"—rather a disreputable way certainly to establish a favorite position. When that position is established, however, I shall have something to say as to whether it is "unanswerable" or not, and for what reason the customs you mention became observances of the Christian church. Had you proved or given the passage which stated, that the first churches did so observe the first day, "under the direction of the apostles," it would not only have been "the same as a command," but it would doubtless have contained the command itself; just as 1 Cor. xi. 23, does for observing the Lord's Supper; and then the Seventh-day Baptists would never have disputed the authority.

Unhappily, there is no question of this more unsatisfactory on the point at issue, than Acts xx. 7. There are several reasons for this; but I will mention only two, viz: the time and the circumstances. With respect to time, you know well enough that the word day is not in the original; and "the first of the week" is obviously a very indefinite expression, which might mean the first night as truly as the first day. Be that as it may, it is certain, that when Paul preached on this occasion at Troas, it was at night, and that he continued his speech until midnight, and that the breaking of bread there mentioned took place between midnight and daybreak. Now, whether this was on the night following the Sabbath, or on the night following the first day, it is equally unfortunate for the sanctification of the first day of the week. If it was on the night following the Sabbath, then, on the morning of the first day of the week Paul went on foot to Assos to take ship for Jerusalem. If it was on the night following the first day, then, by both Jewish and Roman reckoning, this breaking of bread belonged to the second day, and not to the first. Take whichever horn of the dilemma you please, and it will gore your "unanswerable" argument to death. But the circumstances related, and the occasion, are equally against the observance of the day as sacred time, even though it had been between daybreak and midday, instead of between midnight and daybreak; for while Paul held this parting meeting with his friends at Troas, Luke and seven other traveling companions, mentioned in another verse, sailed unto Assos, and it must have required some hours to sail round the cape from Troas. Here, then, we have eight of Paul's traveling companions, among whom were the evangelists, Timothy and Luke, sailing away from this Gospel ordinance, and that on the Christian Sabbath, celebrated at Troas. Si erro erro cum Paulo et cum ecclesis suis," when I travel on the first day of the week.

The argument founded on 1 Cor. xvi. 2, is alike unsatisfactory. There is not even a religious meeting, or worshiping assembly, mentioned; but a secular transaction, with a religious object, which no more sanctifies the day than the selection of the passover lamb on the tenth day of the first month sanctified that day. Here, then, all your argument drawn from the baptismal controversy, even if I could allow its soundness, (which I cannot,) quite falls through; because you have not yet established such a religious observance of the first day of the week by the apostles and primitive churches as you suppose.

As this is the only question now at issue between us, I pass by other exceptionable points in this part of your letter, to notice what you say of the resurrection of our Saviour. You say, "The first day was the day of our Saviour's resurrection." Of this we want the proof. All which the Scriptures say about it is, that on the morning of that day he was risen, and during the day he showed himself to his disciples. It appears to me far more probable, that he rose at the same time of day at which he was buried, and then the three days and three nights which he lay in the heart of the earth, may be exactly completed. You say farther, that on that day, "he rested from the labors of the new creation." What new creation? If you mean the renewal of fallen man, then you are in error; because, through infinite mercy, this work is now going on. If you mean the creation of new heavens and new earth, whether visibly or spiritually, this is not correct; for, the heavens and the earth that were before his resurrection, still remain, standing out of the water and in the water. And surely the new heavens and the new earth of the Apocalypse is yet to be. As to sufferings, he said on the cross, "It is finished." But even if it were all as you say, it would not afford authority for substituting the first day for the seventh day without a divine command. The Papists have reasoned away the second commandment of the Decalogue to honor to the nativity and the crucifixion. Would you reason away the fourth commandment to honor the resurrection? Which is the more justifiable of the two, let casuists decide. But until you bring better proof of apostolical practice, your argument falls to the ground.

I come now to the second part of your letter, which may fairly be entitled, "Objections to the arguments for Sabbatarianism." They are not Sabbatarian arguments, however, to which you object; hence you here appear to very great disadvantage before all intelligent Seventh-day Baptists. You beat the air, because you suppose Seventh-day Baptists to rest their practice and sentiments upon considerations to which they never resort. You may have been led into these mistakes by some cursory observations made in refutation of the arguments of the observers of the first day. We never consider the Sabbath as a mere worshiping day; but we believe, to use your own language, that "the seventh day was set apart as a day of rest by divine command, and as such was holy; that is, consecrated to a particular use." This setting apart of the seventh day took place before other religious ordinances were instituted, and before there was any occasion for religious assemblies. Of course, therefore, the use of the seventh day was independent of religious assemblies. It was a memorial of Jehovah's rest, and is the most essential institution of primitive religion, which has come down to our times. Where the Sabbath of Jehovah is observed, it is impossible that the work and government of the great Creator should be forgotten. Thus Jehovah says, (Ezek. xx. 20,) "Hallow my Sabbaths, and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am the Lord your God."

But you say, "The Seventh-day Baptist is obliged to go back to the old dispensation." Do you make a distinction between the Old Testament Scriptures and the old dispensation? I believe you do; you certainly so preached twenty years ago. The Old Testament Scriptures were given us for instruction in righteousness; and this view of them was inculcated upon Jews and Gentiles by Christ and his apostles. But the former dispensation waxed old and vanished away, to [illegible] 10. With this distinction, it is no reproach to the Christian to learn of the Old Testament Scriptures; nay, it is positively enjoined by Christ and his apostles. Your accusation, therefore, is not true, "that we go back to the old dispensation, just as the advocates of a national establishment go back to the theocracy of the Jews." We hearken to the instructions of the Old Testament Scriptures, both to Jews and Gentiles, as a part of the whole counsel of God, just as Christ and his apostles exhorted primitive believers to do; and this is what I have heard you enjoin hundreds of times, when the Sabbath question was not thought of. Again, you affirm that "the Sabbatarian has no authority either from the New Testament or from the Old." Yet the Old Testament inculcates Sabbath-keeping upon Gentiles as well as upon Jews; and that with precious promises. See Isaiah lvi. 3—8. The evangelist Luke commends the piety of the women who were first at the sepulchre, because they had previously rested on the Sabbath day according to the commandment. Luke xxiii. 56. Our Saviour likewise recognizes the Sabbath as a divine institution of continuing obligation, by saying, "The Sabbath was made for man." "The Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath day." Surely he does not claim lordship over an obsolete institution. We feel the obligation to obey the fourth commandment, because Christ and the apostles enjoined obedience to the Decalogue, without an exception of any one of its precepts.

But I must bring this letter to a close by noticing the particular point on which you "challenge the Sabbatarian." "Can the Sabbatarian prove that Paul celebrated the ordinances of the Gospel with a Christian church on the seventh day? Unless he can do this, he does nothing." Well, what will be done if he does prove it? Gospel ordinances do not receive any validity from the day on which they are performed; nor does the day receive any holiness from Gospel ordinances. I have seen you baptize and administer the Lord's Supper at other times than on the first day. It is certain, that the Supper was not instituted on the first day. And it is likewise certain, that the apostle Paul, or his companions, baptized on the seventh day. At Philippi, for instance, Lydia was baptized on the Sabbath day. And there is presumptive evidence, that both of the Gospel ordinances were administered at Corinth to Jews and Gentiles, on the Sabbath day; for the Scripture informs us that he reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath day, that many of the Corinthians believed and were baptized, and that Paul continued these labors there for a year and six months, working at tent-making on the week days, and teaching on the Sabbath. It was to this church that he said, "I have received of the Lord that which I delivered unto you." That these Sabbath-day meetings were not in mere compliance with Jewish customs, is manifest from what is said of his labors with the Gentiles at Antioch in Pisidia. Acts xiii. 42, 44. "The Gentiles besought that these words might be spoken unto them the next SABBATH DAY. And the next SABBATH DAY came almost the whole city together, to hear the word of God." Yet after all, this is not the principal ground of our faith and practice. We plead not the custom of even primitive churches, but the commandment of God our Saviour, and his inspired apostles; and we dwell on the customs of the apostolical churches only to answer our opponents. You will perceive that I have passed by some things in your letter, because, "these, it is certain, must go for nothing. They do not bear on the point."

Wishing you all Christian blessings,
I remain yours affectionately,
SAMUEL DAVISON.

GROAN HONESTLY.—One of our agents visited and addressed a colored church in Kentucky. When the collection was about to be taken, the pastor, himself a colored man, arose and said, "My dear brethren, when we have our meetings for prayer, you are generally present, and I am pleased to see this house filled. Whenever, at such times, any thing is said about the wants of the heathen, and the duty of praying and giving for the conversion of the world, you give me groans of approbation. Now I wish you to come forward with your money, or I shall conclude that you did not groan honestly."

WESTERN HOSPITALITY.—'I have not been charged one cent for lodging or horsefeed during the last ten months,' writes a colporteur in Missouri. I have sometimes suffered with severe cold, but my heart has been warmed while conversing with, or reading my books and tracts to, the families on whom I called. This colporteur has traveled about 3400 miles in ten months, and visited 233 families, 120 of which had no Bible.

Yong Seen Sang, an accomplished Chinese scholar, and now a preacher of the Gospel, who is on a visit to this country with Rev. Mr. Shuck, "is astonished by the sights which surround him in this distant land,—most of all by the relations of the sexes to each other. To see ladies the equals of gentlemen, and even treated with greater courtesy, is to him quite a marvel. It is Christianity which raises woman from servitude, and makes her the companion and equal of man."

LABOR.

BY MRS. FRANCIS OSGOOD.

Pause not to dream of the future before us!
Pause not to weep the wild cares that come o'er us!
Hark, how Creation's deep, musical chorus
Unintermitting, goes up into Heaven!
Never the ocean wave falters in flowing;
Never the little seed stops in its growing;
More and more richly the rose-heart keeps glowing,
Till from its nourishing stem it is riven.

"Labor is worship!" the robin is singing;
"Labor is worship!" the wild bee is ringing;
Listen! that eloquent whisper upsringing,
Speaks to thy soul from out Nature's heart.
From the dark cloud flows the life-giving shower,
From the rough sod grows the soft-breathing flower,
From the small [illegible]
Labor is life! 'Tis the still water faileth;
Idleness ever despaireth, bewaileth;
Keep the watch wound, for the dark rust assaileth!
Flowers droop and die in the stillness of noon.
Labor is glory! the flying cloud lightens;
Only the waving wing changes and brightens;
Idle hearts only the dark future frightens;
Play the sweet keys would'st thou keep them in tune.

Labor is rest—from the sorrows that greet us;
Rest from all party vexations that meet us;
Rest from sin-promptings that ever entreat us;
Rest from world-syrens that lure us to ill.
Work—and pure slumbers shall wait on thy pillow;
Work—thou shalt ride over Care's coming billow;
Lie not down wearied 'neath Wo's weeping willow!
Work with a stout heart and resolute will.

Droop not tho' shame, sin and anguish are round thee!
Bravely fling off the cold chain that hath bound thee!
Look on that pure heaven smiling beyond thee!
Rest not content in thy darkness—a clod!
Work—for some good—be it ever so slowly!
Cherish some flower be it ever so lowly!
Labor! All labor is noble and holy:
Let thy great deeds be thy prayer to thy God.

A MOTHER'S SPIRIT IN HEAVEN.

The following extract is taken from a little work by the Rev. C. T. Torrey, entitled "Home! or the Pilgrim's Faith revived." It is but one among many touching incidents.

One of these, a beautiful flower, in all the sweetness of its bloom, was cut down before the Christian character was matured, though not before intimate friends had learned to love it, and hope much from its fruit. Blessed mother! thou art among the holy ones, who stand in the presence of the Lord! If thou dost ever stop praising, and cease to strike the harp in the heavenly choir, is it not to pity human wo, to succor thy tempted child, to wipe away the penitent tear from the burning cheek, the cold sweat of remorse from the brow, and pour consolation into the broken heart? Are not these the work of the ministering spirits? Did not the eye of boyhood feast on the spiritual beauty of thy face, the beauty of death, when the eye, filled with rapture, saw "within the veil," and the spirit tasted heavenly manna to give it vigor for its upward flight? Once thou didst recall the mind from the heavenly vision. Calling the little, the only son to thy couch, the thin, wasted hand, whose soft touch is never forgotten, parted his light hair; and with many a murmured prayer, thou didst invoke the orphan's God to be his father. "Mother, I give him to you, train him up for God," broke from thy dying lips. And then thou didst leave the body of death to put on immortality. Mother, is thy son forgotten amid the blaze of the glory of the celestial city? Does not the glorious One still wear our nature? Is he not still "touched with the feeling of our infirmities," and alive to human sympathies? And when the circle of earth's worshippers bow before him, does he not bid them cherish every pure emotion of our nature? Is a mother's love banished from heaven? Art thou not saying to thy child, "Hasten, put on the robes of holy light the Lamb giveth thee, and come up hither?" And when the Lord revealed himself in mercy to thy child, and said his sins were forgiven, wert thou not there? Was it not thy form, thy face, thy smiles, that formed a part of the cloud of glory that surrounded Him when his word of peace was spoken? Aye, and thou wilt welcome him, with all a mother's holy heart, when perhaps thine own gentle hand does death's office, to open before his eyes the glory on which thou didst look when thy dying lips blessed him. Blessed mother, thy son will come! He longs to meet thee!

PULL IT UP BY THE ROOTS.

A father was passionately commanding his son to pull up a dead bush by the roots. He stood over him with a rod. The little fellow tugged away at it in no very pleasing mood, eyeing his father as if he expected a blow. 'I can't,' said the boy. 'You shall,' replied the father. We came up just at that moment, and, seeing the old man was about to strike, asked him 'who owned the corner lot?' 'I do!'—'Is it for sale?' 'Yes, if I can get enough for it,' and we went into a long palaver—for he was keen enough about a trade—as to the increase of the city, &c. We found him a well meaning, intelligent man, and when his passion cooled, ventured to say to him, 'That's a fine son of yours, (and his father's pride kindled quickly.) and if you had tried kind means, I think you would have succeeded—suppose we try.' 'Well, my son,' said we to the boy, 'we thought you were stronger than you are; why we know smaller lads who could pull up that bush.' 'I can do it,' said the little fellow, and he was as good as his word, for up came the bush at his first effort. And why was not this done at first? The father's voice and manner wanted kindness; he took it for granted his son wanted to foil him, and he spoke angrily. The boy, finding himself treated in that way, resisted.—How much do parents lose of authority and of respect by this want of kindness. If they could pull up these bad passions or habits by the roots, their children would pull up dead bushes by the roots easy enough, when bid, and as a general rule be as docile, as they are obedient, when directed to do anything. Kindness is better than the rod; a soft word wiser than harshness.

MISSIONS AND MISSIONARY ORGANIZATIONS.

Most of those who deserve the name of Christians are free to acknowledge an obligation to labor for the spread of the Gospel, or in other words, to engage in the work of missions. In making them acquainted with the truth, and giving them ability in their appropriate spheres to make it known, as well as by commanding them to go into the world and preach the Gospel to every creature, God has imposed an obligation from which it is vain and wicked to endeavor to escape. The early disciples evidently felt this obligation. Hence wherever they went, whether fleeing before the face of their persecutors, or pursuing their ordinary business operations, they exerted themselves to promulgate the doctrine of salvation through a crucified Redeemer. In many instances their efforts were attended with such success as to preclude the works of supererogation uncalled, or performed of his approbation upon their labors, showing that they only did what it was their duty to do.

Notwithstanding the approval which was given to this example of the early disciples, there are not wanting those who profess to be Christians, and yet practically deny their obligation to labor to make known the Gospel to others. Some do it by limiting the Saviour's last command, and making it apply only to those who were around him. Others do it by throwing the responsibility upon the Churches with which they are connected, thus relieving themselves from the feeling of individual responsibility which it would be troublesome to entertain. And there are still others, who do it by accustoming themselves to think and speak of missionary organizations as having voluntarily assumed the responsibility, and therefore become accountable for the discharge or neglect of the duty. But these views are directly opposed to the teachings of Scripture and the spirit of the Gospel. They strike at the foundation of missionary effort, by transferring responsibility from individual Christians to organized but comparatively irresponsible bodies. They ought not, therefore, to be entertained for a moment by those who would discharge their duty to the world in such a way as to secure the approval of Heaven.

Undoubtedly there is a duty resting upon each church, in its church capacity, to do something in the missionary work. The church was organized to carry out the plans of its Great Head. Foremost among those plans should be placed the preaching of the Gospel to the destitute. It matters not where they may live, in whatever clime, or whatever outward circumstances, if ignorant of Christ they are destitute, and have a claim for instruction. Now it is the duty of each church to hear this claim, to make inquiry as to the promptness of its members to meet it, and to provide the means therefor when that is necessary. Too long have the churches been contented simply with peace and prosperity among themselves. In many cases they have seemed to forget, that they were established for any higher purpose than self-gratification or self-improvement. Yet who soberly doubts that the churches planted by the apostles felt other and higher obligations pressing upon them? Who doubts that they felt responsible to devise and execute plans for the improvement and salvation of those who were sitting in darkness? No enlightened Christian, surely. Yet if the obligation rested upon the apostolic churches, it rests upon the churches of the present day. Of course we do not pretend to say in what precise mode this responsibility shall be met—whether by a church appointing each of its members to perform certain missionary duties for the benefit of others, or by raising the means to send out one or more of its members to labor exclusively in the work, or by supplying funds for other and more extensive organizations to carry forward their plans for the upbuilding of Christ's kingdom. In which of these ways, or whether in either, individual churches shall act, we do not pretend to say. But we do say, that the church which is contented to look no farther than its own borders, and to neglect the multitudes without who are perishing in their ignorance, is recreant to its trust, and unlike the model churches planted by the apostles.

There is a work also appropriate to missionary organizations. They are useful as a central medium through which individuals and churches may act. They are useful, because they can take an enlarged view of the various fields of labor to be occupied, and having the means at their command can so distribute them that one part shall not abound while another part suffers want. They are necessary, because to carry on extensive missionary operations there must be some concentration of effort, and much practical knowledge and business skill brought into use. But it should be distinctly understood, that such organizations are only the machinery—the instruments with which churches and individuals are to work. They have no life in themselves independent of the churches. They are composed of individuals who do not claim to be wiser or better than their brethren, but who have been chosen to their places simply because they are supposed to be possessed of the requisite skill for this kind of service. Of course all their movements ought to be open, straightforward, and above-board. They ought to be able to adopt the language of Him who said, "I ever spake openly, and in secret have I said nothing." Pursuing such a course, they ought not to be looked upon with suspicion, or spoken of as having interests separate from the interests of the whole people. They are the servants of the people, chosen to an honorable and responsible trust, for the faithful discharge of which they must give account not only to their constituents, but to God the Judge of all. Theirs is not an easy post, but one which a conscientious man will only accept from a sense of duty, and can only fill by frequent self-denials and great faithfulness. Now it is a very easy thing to find something objectionable in the doings of almost any such organization. It cannot of course follow the advice and carry out the plans of every body. Indeed, its active members will sometimes differ among themselves about questions of expediency, and will be called upon to exercise much forbearance towards each other. Hence the difficulty of conducting its affairs acceptably to all, and the duty of looking upon it with leniency. Its members ought to be thanked for doing their appropriate work of dispensing what is committed to them as well as are for not doing the work of others.

If what we have here said is true, then there is no chance for Christians to escape responsibility to the missionary work. Whatever course may be pursued by the churches with which they are connected, or the missionary organizations to which they are accustomed to look, still there is responsibility resting upon each individual. If the church is not doing what it ought to do, it is the Christian's duty to make efforts to bring the church up to the right standard. If the existing missionary organizations are not doing their work, they should be improved until they become what they ought to be. The responsibility of individuals will never cease because churches or missionary organizations fail.

ENCOURAGING LETTER—CHURCH ORGANIZED.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I thought it might be interesting to the readers of the Recorder to hear of the success of Christ's kingdom in any part of the country, and of the growing interest manifested in the cause of God's holy Sabbath. On the 9th inst., Elder Wm. Green and myself visited the town of Diania, Lewis Co., N. Y., for the purpose of organizing a church. A number of families in Diania and places adjacent have lately embraced the Sabbath of the Lord. These, with a few that have for fifteen or sixteen years been faithful Sabbath-keepers, were organized into a church, to be known as the First Seventh-day Baptist Church of Diania. Sixteen united together in church covenant, and it is thought there are others who will soon join them.

The history of this little band of Sabbath-keepers is quite interesting. There are a few in Pitcairn, who moved from Brookfield a number of years ago, and have been deprived of church privileges, except as they have visited their friends in different places. These brethhave been faithful to their profession, while their tears and prayers for the success of "the truth," have witnessed to the sincerity of their practice. Years rolled around, and their prayers were not answered. Still their faith failed not. They believed that God would vindicate his own cause in due time. But when he tarried long, and gave them no signal of his coming, they were almost ready to think that they must live and die as the only witnesses for the Sabbath of the Lord in that country. But the Lord had heard their prayers, and in faithfulness to his promise, suffered them not to despond. A Baptist minister, in speaking of them, admitted that they have considerable Scripture for their Sabbath. A worthy member of the church heard the remark of the minister with a good deal of surprise, he supposing that they had no Scripture for their practice, and readily perceiving that if they had any they had all, since the Bible taught but one Sabbath. From that moment he resolved to investigate the matter. He read his Bible attentively, and was soon convinced that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord." The result was, that he and his family embraced it. About this time a little tract entitled "The True Issue," fell into the hands of the acting Deacon of the same Baptist church, which induced him to examine the Bible, which teaches that "the seventh day is the Sabbath." He and his family soon embraced the truth joyfully, though in tears. Soon after this, brother Solomon S. Coon, a licentiate of Truxton church, visited that place, and in connection with the Baptists and Methodists, held a series of evening meetings, which, with the blessing of God, resulted in a revival. Several more embraced the Sabbath, and, as before stated, they were all organized into a church on the 9th inst. Others are investigating the question with a good deal of interest, and there seems to be a general inquiry on the subject in that vicinity. May the Lord direct their minds into the truth, and add to the church of such as shall be saved.

On our way to Diania we called at a place named Quaker Settlement, in Jefferson county, where brothar Green preached a Sabbath discourse. Brother Coon had been there before us, and the Lord had blessed his efforts in the conversion of souls, and a few had embraced the Sabbath. Among them a very worthy and substantial member of the Methodist Church. There is an increasing interest in that place on this subject, and with proper efforts a Seventh-day Baptist church might, under God's blessing, be soon reared there. Truly the fields are whitening for a harvest. Error is sickening and dying under the care of its most skillful nurses, while the truth is thriving in the hands of the feeble. Let us arise, beloved brethren, from our slumbers, for God is giving us the signal to labor. He is even in the field before us, and with courage we may well follow.

Yours in Christ,

G. M. LANGWORTHY.

THE BILL OF EQUAL RIGHTS.

The Legislature of the State of New Jersey having now adjourned, there no longer remains a doubt as to the result of their labors in behalf of that portion of their constituents who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath, who so respectfully petitioned for an exemption from the penalties and restrictions of the law regulating Sunday-keeping. For the purpose of granting them the desired exemption, the Bill of Equal Rights was introduced. It received the approval and support of two distinguished members of the House; but when brought up for a second reading, it was re-committed with instructions to amend. The Committee, after duly considering its import, returned the bill back to the House without amendment, it being in their opinion as little as the petitioners could ask for or be satisfied with. Here it was suffered to remain uncalled for until the time fixed for adjournment had come. Thus it was literally smothered. Among the reasons assigned for this course, it was said that admitting the seventh-day people to equal liberty with others, would destroy the religious restraint upon community, induce men to disregard the holy Sunday, and thus turn the world upside down. This flimsy excuse shows the state of feeling towards the Truth which distinguishes us from the rest of the Christian world. While our friends are quietly and peaceably submitting to this unchristian treatment, let them not be disheartened, but trust in God who hath said, "The seventh day is the Sabbath," and who "will not give His honor to another, nor His glory to graven images." THE ANNIVERSARIES IN NEW-YORK.

Report concluded from last week.

The American Anti-Slavery Society held its Twelfth Anniversary at the Broadway Tabernacle, on Tuesday morning, May 12. Wm. Lloyd Garrison presided. After some introductory remarks, he gave opportunity for vocal prayer, but none was offered. The Treasurer's Report showed that the receipts of the Society during the year had been $6,769, while its expenses had been $6,159—leaving in the Treasury $610. Extracts from the Annual Report were read, representing the cause to be in a highly flourishing condition, and expressing great confidence in the soundness of the principles and the wisdom of the measures of the Society. Speeches were made by Charles C. Burleigh, Mr. Garrison, Parker Pillsbury, and Mrs. Abbey Kelly Foster, —all of which were in a strain of denunciation against the Church and Government of this country, as unchristian in their spirit, and pro-slavery in their influence.

The American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society held a meeting at the Tabernacle, on Tuesday afternoon. Arthur Tappan presided, and Rev. A. A. Phelps read a part of the Annual Report. The Report states, that there are now thirty-five papers published and sustained by the Liberty Party; besides which there are seventeen others devoted to the anti-slavery cause; making fifty-two anti-slavery papers published in the free States. Resolutions were passed, expressing satisfaction at the establishment of anti-slavery papers in Slave States, recommending the establisment of one at Washington, &c. The principal speakers were Rev. Mr. Ward, a colored man, Rev. Mr. Rolfe, from Canada, and Alvan Stewart, Esq. Mr. Stewart spoke on the subject of the melancholy death of Rev. Charles T. Torrey. The audience were moved to tears by his touching remarks.

The American Tract Society celebrated its Twenty-First Anniversary at the Tabernacle, on Wednesday morning, May 13. The Society has now 1,207 publications on its list, having added 73 stereotyped works during the past year. It has circulated within the year 366,006 vols.; 5,158,898 publications; 123,643,593 pages. The receipts have been $153,916, of which $82,784 was the proceeds of sales, and $71,132 donations. Much of the Society's work is done through the agency of colporteurs, who travel in destitute districts, distributing books, and preaching the Gospel. Beside this, liberal grants of publications are made for distribution by others, both in foreign and domestic fields.

American Female Moral Reform Society.—A large audience assembled on Wednesday evening in the Allen-st. Church, to celebrate the Twelfth Anniversary of the Society, Alvan Stewart, Esq. Chairman. After prayer by Rev. Mr. Stow, the choir sung a piece of music composed for the occasion. Lewis Tappan, Esq. read the Treasurer's Report, from which it appeared that the subscriptions during the past year, for the Advocate amount to $4,190. The sales of Tracts, Books, &c. amount to $339.

Mr. Tappan then read the Annual Report. There are now 778 members. The Report stated that 685 adults had applied to the Society for employment during the year—nearly one-third had found places.

Rev. Dr. Dowling begged to be permitted to congratulate the ladies of the Society on their perseverance in the work of faith and labor. He was more than ever satisfied that the Society was entitled to confidence and respect. Dr. D. then spoke of the Legislative action on this subject—deprecated the probable defeat of the bill to punish seduction, but the Society have great cause for courage—the public's eyes were being opened. He drew a graphic picture of the enormous depravity of our city, and thought that laws should be enacted to punish all crimes alike. The man who stands at the corner of the street, and stabs his unsuspecting victim, expiates his offence upon the gallows. And shall the blackest crime on earth go totally unpunished and unwhipped of Justice? The address of Dr. Dowling was able and eloquent. He is a very interesting speaker.

Rev. E. Weed here made a few remarks on Improvement and Reforms generally. The order of the day is improvement, and the world would soon see the benefit of many things now hooted at.

Rev. Dr. Ludlow of Poughkeepsie, had that very afternoon heard this subject introduced in one of the most influential and respectable families in the city. This Society has more influence than is apparent at first sight. Dr. L. urged mothers to guard the youth of their children from contaminating influences—he was of opinion that more had the seeds of vice planted in them before leaving the magic circle of home, than at any time afterward. He stated some startling facts. His address was too ultra for the mass, but it suited us.

The choir here closed the exercises by singing a Hymn composed for the occasion by Mrs. Sigourney.

The American Home Missionary Society held its Twentieth Anniversary on Wednesday evening. The receipts for the year have been $125,124, exceeding those of the preceding year by $3,178. The expenditures have been something more than the receipts. There are now calls upon the Society for one hundred additional laborers. It appears from the Annual Report, that during the year there have been employed 971 ministers in the 26 States and Territories. The congeregations supplied have been 1,453. The number of missionaries has been increased by 28, and 208 more congregations visited by ministers. There have been added to the churches under their charges 5,311 members, being an excess of 282 over the number added last year. The report alluded to the new responsibilities imposed upon the friends of missions, by the accession of Texas to the Union, with territory enough to make seven States as large as Pennsylvania, and containing already 300,000 inhabitants. It is also proposed to send out, with as little delay as possible, two missionaries to Oregon, as a preliminary measure, having in view the moral welfare of the great numbers who have gone and are going thither to found a new empire.

The American Bible Society met at the Tabernacle, on Thursday morning, May 14. From the Reports read, the Society appears to be in a prosperous condition. The period since the last report only includes eleven months; yet during that time the receipts have been $197,367; had the financial year extended over twelve months, the receipts would probably have exceeded $200,000. The whole number of Bibles printed in the course of the year, has been 482,000 copies, being an increase over the amount of the previous year, of 64,750 copies. A new edition of the Bible for the Blind, has been printed during the year. It is found that it can be printed on a steam power press as other books are printed. The whole number of Bibles printed by this Society since its organization, is 4,497,265. The reading of the reports was followed by addresses from several distinguished individuals, among whom was the Rev. Mr. Milburn, of Illinois, one of the chaplains of Congress, a blind man.

The American and Foreign Bible Society met in Dr. Cone's church, on Friday morning. The Treasurer reported the total receipts of the year at $36,971. The number of volumes published by the Society during the year is 24,438. 316 life members have been added since the last report, making the whole number 1,920. The reports having been disposed of, several addresses were made. Among the speakers were Mr. Dean from China, Mr. Kincaid from Burmah, and Mr. Judson.

The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions met at the Tabernacle on Friday morning. It was stated that the Board have missions in Western and Southern Africa, Greece, Armenia, Syria, China, and the Sandwich Islands. The receipts for nine months past have exceeded those for the same period last year by $19,000. From April 30, 1845, to April 30, 1846, the receipts have been $272,000. Twenty new missionaries have been sent out during the year.

Exhibition of the Blind.—The anniversary exhibition of the New-York Institution for the Blind, took place at the Tabernacle on Wednesday afternoon, May 13. One hundred and twenty pupils were present, about seventy of whom were males. The exercises consisted chiefly of an examination in the various branches of study pursued at the Institution, and recitations in music. Questions in reading, geography, history, astronomy, arithmetic, and geometry, and the theory of music, were answered in a manner doing great credit to the instructors, and exhibiting a proficiency in the several branches almost incredible. The performances by the band were received with great satisfaction; also that of the young pupils, about fifteen in number, who sang a charming hymn accompanied on the piano by one of the pupils.

Exhibition of the Deaf and Dumb.—The anniversary of the New-York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, took place at the Tabernacle, on Thursday afternoon, May 14. Mr. Peet made some preliminary remarks, observing that the pupils, before entering the Institution, were scattered over an extensive region of country, having no language but that of signs of their own invention, and consequently their means of mental improvement were very limited. When brought to the Institution they were at first taught to make their letters, next to form words, and learn their application to objects, actions, &c. The number of pupils amounts to about 200, and they are divided into different classes. These remarks were followed by interesting exhibitions of the various classes of the Institution.

New York Colonization Society.—We are indebted to the New York Tribune for the following report.

The Annual Meeting of this Association was held at the Tabernacle on Tuesday evening. The House was well filled at an early hour, and in consequence of there being so many speakers to occupy the time, the Annual Report was not read. The Secretary (Dr. Reese) however read an abstract from it, from which we learn that the receipts of the Society for the past year are $56,458 60, of which $20,000 has been raised by special subscription to be appropriated to the purchase of farther Territory for the use of the Colony at Liberia.—$14,000 of this sum was raised in the State of New-York, and $7,000 has been paid into the Treasury of the Parent Society at Washington. A ship was chartered and sent out to Liberia on the 1st. inst. at an expense of $5,000, laden with provisions, clothing, &c. for the relief of the 756 Africans re-captured in the slaver Pons. Mr. Ray of Ohio and Mr. Cornish of this city, a couple of young colored men of talent and worth, accompanied this expedition.

By the Census recently published by order of Congress, it appears that the total population of the Colony in 1843 was 2390, of whom 1474 were communicants of churches. 469 were converted natives, and 116 recaptured slaves. The total number of immigrants up to 1843 was 4,456; of whom the American Colonization Society sent out 4,170 and the Government of the United States 286. Of these 2290 were emancipated slaves; 97 purchased their own freedom, and 1687 were born free. There were at that time in the Colony 16 day schools, with 5625 scholars, 192 of whom were native Africans. There were also 23 churches, 13 of which were Methodist, 8 Baptist, and 2 Presbyterian. Three of these are native Chapels belonging to the Methodist Missions.

These statistics do not include the Colony at Cape Palmas, which is said to be in an exceedingly prosperous condition, and is sustained by the State of Maryland.

The inhabitants of Liberia are said to be a very temperate people and nearly all belonging to Temperance Societies. A license for the sale of ardent spirits is fixed by law at $500, which in fact amounts to a prohibition. Hence the general state of morals in the Colony is good, and the influence exerted over the neighboring Tribes is very wholesome. Many of the Chiefs have placed themselves and people under the protection of the Colony, and Missionaries are now welcomed among them.

There are eleven settlements in the Colony, (beside the one at Cape Palmas, of which Monrovia is the largest, and is the seat of Government. Here the Legislative, Executive and Judicial Departments of a Representative Government similar to our own, are fully organized, and Courts of Law, &c, are sustained with dignity. The officers of government, Judges, Lawyers, Doctors, and Clergymen, are all colored men, and most of them Emancipated Slaves. There are indeed no white persons in the Colony except two Missionaries and their families, and one female teacher. Two papers are published at Monrovia, and edited with ability by two black men. They have a High School, a Manual Labor School, Lyceums, and various Literary and Benevolent Societies. Their Military force is well trained and efficient. Gov. Roberts, an Ex-Slave from Virginia, is Commander-in-Chief, and has shown himself to be a Soldier as well as a Statesman, in which latter character his official Messages and Correspondence are an honor to his race.

Mr. Seymour, a young mulatto who has spent four and a half years in the Colony, appeared before the audience in the costume of a native Chief or King. He gave an interesting account of affairs in the Colony, and of the manner and customs of some of the neighboring tribes. He also introduced a small negro boy of the Mungo Tribe, recently from Monrovia. The boy was 5 or 6 years old and had been recaptured from a slave factory by the colonists. Mr. S. stated that such boys were sold on the Coast of Africa for $10 and would sell in Rio or Cuba for about $250!

Dr. Lugenbell, late Colonial Physician, briefly addressed the audience.

Rev. Dr. Winans, of Mississippi, spoke with great earnestness for about three-quarters of an hour in defence of African Colonization. He was an Anti-Slavery man by nature and by education, and would shout Hosannahs to see every slave in the country emancipated, but they must emigrate—the black and white races could never live together on terms of equality. In the course of his address he stated that the condition of the slaves was as good or better than that of our free laborers. This remark brought down a storm of mingled hisses and applause which lasted several minutes.

After Dr. W. had concluded a collection was taken up, and short addresses were made by Rev. Drs. Tyng and McAuley of this city, Hon. Mr. Latrobe, President of the Maryland Colonization Society, and Rev. Mr. Parker, of Philadelphia.

A Christian is like the firmament, and it is the darkness of affliction that makes his graces to shine out. He is like those herbs and plants that effuse their odors when bruised.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

We stated in our last that a bill had passed both Houses of Congress appropriating ten millions of dollars to carry on a war with Mexico, and authorizing the President to raise fifty thousand volunteers. That bill has since received the signatures of the proper officers, and is being carried out as rapidly as possible. There was but little else of general interest done in Congress last week.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

Various and conflicting reports from the seat of war have reached New York since the publication of our last. At one time it was reported that the missing Capt. Thornton and Lieut. Mason, with two dragoons, had reached the American camp. At another time it was reported that Point Isabel, (where our provisions and ammunition were stored,) had been taken by the Mexicans. Both of these reports, it is now said, were without foundation. They served, however, to keep up the excitement, and help the sale of extra newspapers.

There was another disastrous conflict, between Point Isabel and Metamoras, on the 28th ult., in which seventy volunteers, under Captain Walker, attempting to reach General Taylor's camp from Point Isabel, were routed and cut to pieces by an overwhelming Mexican force. Nearly all of them were killed or taken prisoners.

There are now probably about five thousand Mexicans on the American side of the Rio Grande, one half above and one half below General Taylor's camp.

The latest arrivals from the South show that it is dull business raising volunteers. It is now settled that Louisiana's quota of soldiers called for by Gen. Taylor cannot be raised by voluntary enlistment, and the order has already gone forth from Head Quarters at New Orleans, to 'cause an accurate enrollment to be made of all persons subject to military duty within the State with a view to an immediate draft of troops.'

A company of about 200 men has been organized in Baltimore for the Rio Grande. Captain James E. Stewart has been chosen temporarily to the command, and will probably be elected Captain. Between sixty and seventy have enrolled themselves in Richmond, Va., and elected Edward Carrington as their Captain.

Public meetings have been held in New York, Philadelphia, and other cities, to respond to the proclamation of President Polk, and to encourage volunteering for the conflict with Mexico.

Gen. Scott has been placed at the head of the Army, and 22,000 of the Volunteer Force about to be raised is to be sent into the field as soon as possible. The remainder of the Volunteers will be held in reserve.

The President's War Proclamation.

Whereas, The Congress of the United States, by virtue of the constitutional authority vested in them, have declared by their act, bearing date this day, that by the act of the Republic of Mexico, a state of war exists between the two Governments: Now, therefore, I, James K. Polk, President of these United States of America, do hereby proclaim the same to all whom it may concern; and I do specially enjoin on all persons holding offices, civil or military, under the authority of the United States, that they be vigilant and zealous in discharging the duties respectively incident thereto. And I do moreover exhort all the good people of the United States, as they love their country, as they feel the wrongs which have forced on them the last resort of injured nations, and as they consult the best means under the blessing of Divine Providence of abridging the calamities, that they exert themselves in preserving order, in promoting concord and maintaining the authority—the efficiency of the Laws, in supporting and invigorating all the means which may be adopted by the Constitutional Authorities for obtaining a speedy termination and an honorable peace.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents.

L. S.

Done at the City of Washington the 13th day of May, 1846, and year of the Independence of the United States the seventieth.

JAMES. K. POLK.

By the President:

JAMES BUCHANAN, Secretary.

Ampudia's Proclamation.

This Proclamation is said to have been extensively circulated in the Camp among General Taylor's Army.

The Commander-in-Chief of the Mexican Army to the English and Irish under the orders of the American General Taylor:

KNOW YE: That the Government of the United States is committing repeated acts of barbarous aggression against the magnanimous Mexican Nation; that the government which exists under the "flag of the stars" is unworthy of the designation of Christian. Recollect that you were born in Great Britain; that the American Government looks with coldness upon the powerful flag of St. George, and is provoking to a rupture the warlike people to whom it belongs. President Polk boldly manifesting a desire to take possession of Oregon, as he has already done of Texas. Now, then, come with all confidence to the Mexican ranks, and I guarantee to you, upon my honor, good treatment, and that all your expenses shall be defrayed until your arrival in the beautiful capitol of Mexico.

Germans! Poles! French! and individuals of other Nations! Separate yourselves from the Yankees and do not contribute to robbery and usurpation which, be assured, the civilized nations of Europe look upon with the utmost indignation. Come, therefore, and array yourselves under the tri-colored flag, in the confidence that the God of Armies protects it, and that it will protect you equally with the English.

PEDRO DE AMPUDIA.

FRANCISCO R. MORENO,
Adjt. of the Commander-in-Chief.

Head Quarters, upon the Road to Matamoros,
April 2, 1846.

LATER AND IMPORTANT.—On Tuesday morning, May 19, news was received in New York of a great battle on the Rio Grande, which resulted in General Taylor's coming off victorious, burning Metamoras, killing 700 Mexicans, saving Point Isabel, and ordering a blockade of all the Mexican ports. The following is the account:

An engagement took place between the United States and Mexican Forces. Gen. Taylor, on the evening of the 3d instant, made a sortie with a detachment of United States troops for the purpose of opening a communication between Point Isabel and the intrenchment.

On the morning of the 4th inst. the Mexicans, taking advantage of his absence, at daybreak opened a heavy cannonade on the intrenchments, which was gallantly returned by the U. S. troops, and in 30 minutes they silenced the enemy's batteries, reducing the city of Matamoras to ashes.

The slaughter among the Mexicans was tremendous—upwards of 700 dead on the field of battle, and the number of houses left in Matamoras not sufficient to accommodate the wounded Mexicans.

In and about Matamoras 5,000—reinforcements daily expected. General Taylor was to leave Point Isabel on the 6th inst., with troops to open a communication between Point Isabel and the army opposite Matamoras, which has been for some days cut off. Major Ringold of the artillery commanded the American camp during the engagement.

NEW-YORK LEGISLATURE.—The Legislature of New-York closed its 69th Session at 2 P. M. on Wednesday, having been in session 128 days, and passed 337 Acts, though two-thirds of them are of local and personal interest only. The measures of principal interest matured were the Militia Reform, whereby every citizen subject to military duty is authorized to commute therefor during peace by paying seventy-five cents per annum in advance to the proper authority, and the money raised by such commutation is to be used in paying the Uniform Volunteer Companies for their time. The Anti-Rent grievances have been very plenteously admitted and regarded in words and professions, but sparingly enough in acts. Of the bills on this subject two only have passed—that which subjects the Reserved Interests of Rents of Manorial Landlords to Taxation the same as Mortgages and other property rights, and that whereby distress for rent is abolished. The State Printing has been most satisfactorily arranged for the future, so as to save at least $30,000 per annum to the State Treasury, and asmuch more to individual citizens.

NEW RATES OF POSTAGE.—Mr. Hopkins, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported to the House on Monday a bill establishing the following rates of postage:

For every letter or packet of one quarter of an ounce or less, conveyed three hundred miles or less, 5 cents; over 300 and less than 600 miles, 15 cents; and for every additional quarter of an ounce, or fraction less than the quarter of an ounce, an additional postage, except when a letter is written on a single sheet of paper, weighing over a quarter of an once, or less than half an ounce, the single postage to be charged; the rate of 15 cents to be discontinued from and after the first of July, 1848, if in the opinion of the Postmaster General the revenues of the Department equal its expenditures, and in that case 10 cents shall be charged for all distance over 300 miles.

Section 2 provides the rate on newspapers, viz:

Newspapers sent by publishers to subscribers or agents less than 100 miles, 1 cent; over 100 miles, 2 cents; pamphlets, &c. per sheet, less than 100 miles, 1 cent; over 100 miles, 2 cents.

REV. CHARLES T. TORREY.—It was stated at the meeting of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, by the Secretary, Rev. A. A. Phelps, that the body of Mr. Torrey had been transported to Boston, to be delivered to his friends—that funeral obsequies would be performed in Faneuil Hall, and an Oration delivered on the occasion by Rev. Joseph C. Lovejoy, brother of Elijah P. Lovejoy, who fell a victim to the liberty of the press at Alton, Ill.; that it was the intention to provide for the dead a suitable resting place at Mount Auburn, and that an appropriate monument would be erected. He also stated that the funds provided to obtain his release, would by permission of the donros, be bequeathed to Mr. Torrey's children, his family to have the use thereof until the children's majority.

FIVE DOLLARS FOR A WIFE.—A man named John Brandt, was taken before Alderman Crowell, of Philadelphia, under the following circumstances. A short time since he engaged the service of Phillip Blunder Nagle to procure him a wife, for which service he promised to pay him five dollars. Brandt said he had no time to court, and that he would trust Mr. Nagle in the selection of a woman who would make a good wife. In the course of a half hour Nagle returned with a woman, and in three days she became the lawful wife of Brandt, and both lived happily together since that time. The promise, like some other "promises to pay," that we know of, was not fulfilled. A suit was instituted, and the case being made out clear, judgment was rendered in favor of the prosecutor.

TO CURE A BURN.—A lady, preacher of the Society of Friends, in New-York, was so successful in curing burns, that many supposed her possessed of the power of working miracles. The following is the receipt for the medicine: Take one ounce of beeswax, with four ounces of Burgundy pitch, simmed in an earthern vessel, together with as much sweet oil as will soften them into the consistency of a salve when cool—stir the liquid after taking from the fire until quite cool. Keep it from the air in a tight box or jar. When used, spread it thinly on a cloth and apply it to the part injured. Open the burn with a needle and let out the water till it heals.

SECRET FOR A FARMER'S WIFE.—While the milking of your cows is going on, let your pans be placed in a kettle of boiling water. Strain the milk in one of the pans taken hot from the kettle and cover the same with another of those hot pans, and proceed in the like manner with the whole mess of milk, and you will find that you will have double the quantity of good rich cream, and that you will get double the quantity of sweet, delicious butter.

The Steamship Cambria sailed from Boston for Liverpool on the 16th inst., with the semi-monthly mail, and 82 passengers.

The Commissioners of the New York Canal Fund have given notice that they will receive proposals until the 2.1 of June next for a loan of $300,000 at 5 per cent. redeemable after 1864, for arrearges to contractors and others on the public works.

Rev. ORVILLE DEWEY, has tendered his resignation of the pastoral charge of the 'Church of the Messiah,' on account of ill health. He has intimated a willingness, if the Society should decide not to accept his resignation, to preach one-third of the time and receive but one-third of his salary.

The U. S. Gazette says that a Philadelphian has sent to the National Fair at Washington, the furniture for a bed chamber valued at thirty thousand dollars. The material is rosewood, and the workmanship the perfection of cabinet making at the present day.

The Newark Daily Advertiser announces the death of PETER B. DUMONT of Somerset Co. in the 88th year of his age. Mr. D. was a soldier of the Revolution.

It said that the packet which should have sailed last week from New-York for Havre, France, was detained several days for the purpose of obtaining a double list of men, and the necessary guns for self-defence in case they should be attacked by privateers.

An order was taken at the last meeting of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives for the construction of twelve iron steamers and one sixty gun ship of iron. The steamers are to be of 1500 tons burthen, and to carry 6, 10 or 12 inch guns, equal to a battery of 32 pounders. Hon. T. B. King has the subject in charge and will present a report. The whole will prove to involve an expenditure of about $7,000,000.

The trial of Johnson, charged with the abduction of a woman in Chenango County, last fall, has been going on for some time past at Binghampton. The Albany evening Journal says that Johnson was acquitted.

The Cincinnati Gazette of May 10th, says that on Wednesday night last, in consequence of repeated heavy rains, Mud Creek, a small stream in Ohio Co., Ia., rose to an extent never before known. The freshet carried off a log house occupied by Mr. Elias Greathouse, his wife, and three children, all of whom perished in the flood.

The rate of fare on the Utica and Schenectady Railroad was reduced from $3 to $2 on the 16th of April, notwithstanding which the receipts this year, during the month of April, exceeded those of last year by about $3,000. This speaks well of the low fare system.

Two patriot prisoners, Gideon Goodrich, an old resident of Salina, and another man from Madison Co., returned, having left Van Dieman's Land a year ago last January. Mr. G.'s constitution appears to be somewhat impaired by the hardships of a foreign trip. He was taken at Windmill Point, and had a son also taken at the same time, who was, after several months confinement in Canada, released.

Fanny Smith, a young girl employed in the Washington Mills, at Gloucester, (N. J.) wove, week before last, in three looms, nineteen cuts, "No. 40" yarn, into fine printing cloths, and received therefor $6 86 wages, at 35 cents per cut.

A Western paper suggests the propriety of growing artichokes as a substitute in some degree for potatoes—and on the authority of Ellsworth's reports, states that they are better spring feed for hogs, cattle and sheep, than the potato, at a diminution of cost in production.

The Philadelphia U. S. Gazette says:—"We understand Messrs. Severy & Co., iron founders of this city, have received an order from Government, to supply at once one hundred tons of cannon balls."

Mr. Thomas Noble of Stark county, Ohio, in a letter to the Ohio Cultivator, says: "My sheep consist of 1600 head, and so far I have lost none; all in fine order, and by close attention we intend to keep them so. We cut their feed, and the saving thereby is at least one third."

The expenses of the city of New-York in 1845 were $5,483,624; receipts from all sources $4,624,329. The city debt, chiefly for Croton water, is about 12,500,000.

Two members of Congress were a few nights ago confined in the county jail, and manacled hand and foot. And what, think you, was the cause? Maniapotu. Yes, sir! two States of this Union—Pennsylvania and Missouri, were thus represented in the county jail by delegates of their own selection, whom they had better kept at home in their own work-houses.

We learn, says the St. Landry (La.) Whig, that the whole face of the country bordering on the Mermentow River and Gulf, near its mouth, has been entirely overflown. The late South winds on the Gulf brought in a tremendous tide, which added to the swollen state of the river from the recent rains, have submerged the whole country. So sudden was the flood that fifteen families are said to have perished in it.

Near the town of Pine Grove in the county of Schuylkill, Pa., hangs before a hotel its sign, having the following painted thereon:—

Interpreted it reads thus: "Entertainment for Man and Horse. Pay to-day and trust to-morrow. By Thomas Reed."

If you desire to be remembered and honored by posterity, plant a few trees around your premises. It is the sine qua non of patriotism—a "good" that will survive when you are dead and gone. Like a fragrant incense it will embalm your memory.

The persecutors of Galileo apprehended danger to religion, from the discoveries of a science, in which a Kepler and a Newton found demonstration of the most sublime and glorious attributes of the Creator.

Granite is an aggregation of grains, or masses of quartz, feldspar, and mica, adhering to each other without any cement, that is by adhesive attraction.

An exchange paper states that an excellent liquid cement is made of glue two parts and vinegar two parts. Dissolve the glue by placing the vessel containing the ingredients in hot water, and then stir in one part of alcohol.

The New-Orleans Delta of the 5th inst., in proof of the patriotism of printers, says that they have been prompt in volunteering for the defence of the country. Out of a body of less than 200, nearly 50 have already dropped the 'composing stick' and shouldered the musket. Patriotism has made a strong draft on the offices; in fact, so great is the enthusiasm of the craft, that the question is not "Who will go?" but "Who will remain?"

A correspondent of the New-York Tribune, under date of Petersburg, Va. May 16, says:—I learned yesterday, in a very direct way, that Dr. Collins of Madison Co., Mi., had been killed by his brother-in-law, Lowrie. Mr. L.'s father had left him heir to the principal part of his estate, and he was thought to be squandering it. Dr. Collins had taken a course at law to get it out of his hands, and was likely to fail in his attempt, and so determined to kill Lowrie—told his wife so, and loaded his pistol for that purpose. Mrs. C. sent a note privately to her brother that he might be on his guard. Lowrie armed himself, and when Dr. C. was approaching the Court House, L. met him in the yard and shot him, and also stabbed him in sundry places. Dr. C. lived but a few minutes after.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN SABBATH UNION.—The Rev. Albert Barnes delivered a discourse before this Society at the Tabernacle in New-York on Sunday evening, May 17. His subject was, "The Importance of the Christian Sabbath to Young Men." He spoke first of the design of the Sabbath; then of the characteristics and dangers of young men; and lastly of the adaptation of the Sabbath to their protection against the peculiar temptations by which they are beset. The discourse was highly finished, and in some parts eloquent. But it struck us, that a better effect would have been produced if more importance had been given to the divine command for the observance of the Sabbath, and less to the arguments drawn from mere expediency.

METHODIST MISSIONS.—The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, have determined to establish a mission in China. They organized, it will be remembered, about one year ago, since which time they have collected sixty-eight thousand dollars for missions—a pretty good beginning in the way of raising money.

The Roman Catholic Bishops of the United States have been holding a Provincial Council in the city of Baltimore. There were twenty-two Bishops, each attended by a Priest as theologian. Archbishop Eccleston presided over the council.

DIED,

In Verona, N. Y., on the 26th ult., of consumption, FANNY DAVIS, wife of George Davis, and daughter of Henry Williams, in the 26th year of her age. Sister Davis was a devoted Christian, a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Watson, Lewis county, and died resigned and happy.

In Verona, N. Y., on the 4th inst., of consumption, JANE SAUNDERS, wife of William Saunders, and daughter of Deacon Crosby of Adams, aged 25 years. Brother and sister Saunders were united in matrimony on the 4th of May, 1845, at half-past 4 o'clock P. M., and she died on the same month, day, and hour of 1846. Although called thus singularly and unexpectedly to meet death, her mind was stayed on God, and her death triumphantly happy.

In Genesee, Allegany county, N. Y., April 29th, of consumption, SALLY ANN WELLS, wife of Daniel Wells, in the 36th year of her age. Sister Wells united with the 1st S. D. B. Church, in Genesee, when 18 years of age, and remained a worthy member until called to join the church triumphant. During her protracted sickness, she manifested the most perfect reconciliation to her lot, and died in the full triumphs of faith in a Redeemer's blood.

SLANDER.

BY FRANCES S. OSGOOD.

A whisper broke the air—
A soft light tone and low,
Yet barbed with shame and woe:—
Now, might it only perish there!
Nor farther go.

Ah, me! a quick and eager ear,
Caught up the little meaning sound!
Another voice has breathed it clear,
And so it wanders round,
From ear to lip—from lip to ear—
Until it reached a gentle heart,
And that—it broke.

It was the only heart it found,
The only heart 'twas meant to find,
When first its accents woke;
It reached that tender heart at last,
And that—it broke.

Low as it seemed to other ears,
It came—a thunder-crash to hers.—
That fragile girl so fair and gay,—
That guileless girl so pure and true!

'Tis said, a loving humming bird,
That in a fragrant lilly lay,
And dreamed the summer morn away,
Was killed by but the gun's report
Some idle boy had fired in sport!
The very sound—a death blow came!

And thus her happy heart, that beat,
With love and hope, so fast and sweet,
(Shrined in its lily too—
For who the maid that knew
But owned the delicate flower-like grace
Of her young form and face?)
When first that word
Her light heart heard,
It fluttered like the frightened bird,
Then shut its wings and sighed,
And with a silent shudder—died!

WATCHING FOR A TIGER.

The spot I selected, (says the writer,) was the edge of a tank where a tiger used to drink. There was a large tamarind tree on its banks, and here I took my post. A village shikaree accompanied me; and, soon after sunset, we took up our position on a branch, about twelve feet from the ground. I should first mention that we fastened an unfortunate bullock under the tree for a bait. Well, we remained quietly on our perch for a couple of hours, without any thing stirring. It might be eight o'clock, the moon had risen, and so clear was the light, that we could see the jackalls at the distance of a half a mile, sneaking on towards the village, when a party of Brinparries, passing by, stopped to water their bullocks at the tank. They loitered for some time; and, becoming impatient, I got off the tree with a single rifle in my hand, and went to them, saying, I was watching a tiger, upon which they started off immediately. I was sauntering back to my post, never dreaming of danger, when the Shikaree gave a low whistle, and at the same moment a growel rose from some bushes between me and the tree. To make my situation quite decided, I saw his, (the Shikaree's) black arm pointing nearly straight under him, on my side of the post. It was very evident, that I could not regain the tree, although I was within twenty paces of it. There was nothing for it but to drop behind a bush and leave the rest to Providence. If I had moved then, the tiger would have had me to a certainty; besides, I trusted to his killing the bullock, and returning to the jungle as soon as he had finished his supper. It was terrible to hear the moans of the wretched bullock when the tiger approached. He would run to the end of his rope, making a desperate effort to break it, and then lie down, shaking in every limb, and bellowing in the most piteous manner. The tiger saw him plain enough; but suspecting something wrong, he walked growling around the tree, as if he did not observe him. At last he made his fatal spring; with a horrid shriek rather than a roar, I could hear the tortured bullock struggling under him, uttering faint cries, which became more and more feeble every instant, and the heavy breathing, half growl, half snort of the monster, as he hung to his neck sucking his blood. I know not what possessed me at that moment, but I could not resist the temptation of a shot. I crept up softly within ten yards of him, and kneeling behind a clump of dates, took a deliberate aim at his head, while he lay with his nose buried in the bullock's throat. He started with an angry roar from the carcase when the ball hit him. He stood listening for a moment, then dropped in front of me, uttering a sullen growl. There was nothing but a date bush between us; I had no weapon but my discharged rifle. I felt for my pistols, they had been left on the tree. Then I knew that my hour was come, and all the sins of my life flashed with distinctness across my mind. I muttered a short prayer, and tried to prepare for death, which seemed inevitable. But what was my peon about all this time? he had the spare guns with him! Oh, as I afterwards learned, he, poor fellow, was trying to fire my double rifle; but all my locks have bolts, which he did not understand, and he could not cock it. He was a good Shikaree, and knew that this was my only chance; so when he could do no good, he did nothing. If Mohadeen had been there he would soon have relieved me; but I had sent him another direction that day. Well, some minutes passed thus. The tiger made an attempt to come at me; a ray of hope cheered me; he might be dying. I peeped through the branches; but my heart sank within me when his bright green eyes met mine, and his hot breath absolutely blew in my face. I slipt back upon my knees in despair, and a growl warned me that even that slight movement was noticed. But why did he not attack me at once? A tiger is a suspicious, cowardly brute, and will seldom charge unless he sees his prey distinctly. Now, I was quite concealed by the date leaves; and, while I remained perfectly quiet, I still had a chance. Suspense was becoming intolerable. My rifle lay useless by my side; to attempt to load it would have been instant death. My knees were bruised by the hard gravel, but I dare not move a joint. The tormenting musquitoes swarmed round my face, but I feared to raise my hand to brush them off. Whenever the wind ruffled the leaves that sheltered me, a hoarse growl grated through the stillness of the night. Hours that seemed years rolled on; I could hear the village gong strike each hour of that dreadful night, which I thought would never end. At last the welcome dawn! and oh, how gladly I hailed the first streak of light that shot up from the horizon! for then the tiger rose, and sulkily stalked away to some distance. I felt that the danger was past, and rose with a feeling of relief which I cannot describe. Such a night of suffering was enough to turn my brain, and I only wonder that I survived it. I now sent off the poen for the elephant, and before eight o'clock old Goliah had arrived. It was all over in five minutes. The tiger rushed to meet me as soon as I entered the cover, and one ball in the chest dropped him down dead.

OLD TIMES.

We cut the following literary notice from the Boston Recorder. It may interest some of our readers to have a peep at the times and customs of the good old pilgrim fathers. We really wish that while present customs exclude some of the errors and superstitions of the fathers, they really retained all their virtues.

REV. MR. KIMBALL'S SERMON.

This discourse was delivered February 22, 1846, the last Sabbath that public worship was attended in the old meeting house in Ipswich. It was built in 1794, having been occupied as a house of worship ninety-seven years, and was the fourth meeting house that had been erected since 1634. Several curious things are stated. Churches were built by assessing taxes on the parishioners, and they were seated according to the taxes paid. The complaint was not, "they have taxed me too high," but too low. "Gentlemen of the committee," says Mr. K., "you ought in justice to have given me a higher seat." "But, sir, you must consider that Esq. A. B. and C. all pay higher taxes than you." "Ah! but they ought to have taxed me four times as much as they have done." Other things that belonged to "olden times" are mentioned.

Several aged and venerable men were seated directly in front of the pulpit. Next to them were the deacons in their proper place, facing the assembly, and like Aaron and Hur, holding up the hands of the minister. And if the good men were either sleepy themselves or thought others so, they arose from their seats, stamped with their feet, and smote the bannister with their fist, and commanded attention. One of the deacons sat near the hour glass, ready to turn it up the instant the text was named. And though ministers in those days ruled their people as well as served them, and did both faithfully, a minister seldom presumed to pronounce the amen, before the last sands in the glass were run down; and if he ever did it, it was at the hazard of being cut short in the measure of grain, granted by his hearers for his support. But the minister as often overrun his hour as he fell short of it, and then, tradition says, though I do not find it in the records, the minister would call on the deacon for a second glass, as I should have occasion to do this afternoon, if the glass were in its place, and the deacon at his post. The people filled the seats in the body of the house, the men on the west and the women on the east side of the broad aisle; tythingmen being stationed, with stipulated salaries, well paid, to keep the boys and girls in order, as sentinels in earlier days were placed without our sanctuaries to prevent the interruption of public worship by the Indians. Nor was the office of tythingmen confined to boys and girls, nor to the interior of the house, for the trustees, by vote of the parish, were desired to treat with the tythingmen and use their influence with them, that all boys, and all persons whatever, that should play on the Sabbath in the meeting house or about it, or be abroad at the time of divine service, should be complained of to authority, that they might be punished as the law directed. On Monday morning, the boys who had been disorderly on the Sabbath were put into the stocks near the whipping post on the common.*

ARE THEY WELL TREATED?

We often hear people remarking that the slaves are treated well enough, and that there is no cause of complaint; but I am well assured that could their proximity to the slave's 'whipping-post' be equal to that of the room which I occupied in one of our Southern cities, they would start with horror, while their preconceived notions would pass forever into the shade.

No person with any feelings of humanity, can listen to the piercing shrieks of the poor African being lacerated with the whip of his persecutor for some trivial offence, (perchance, being in the street ten minutes after the time had expired that he should have been at home,) and not feel indignation for the white man and sympathy for the slave.

How often have I sat and contemplated the rising sun, tinging the adjacent hills and all surrounding objects with streaks of gold, distributing its beams alike to all, while my ears were filled with the hollow moan of the poor, suffering slave. O how, thought I, can man assume the form of a fiend, and gaze upon that glorious orb of light, and treat so barbarously beings that were made in the image of its great Author. But their trials do not end here. We will follow them to the abode of their task-masters. There they are often treated inferior to the very dogs, kicked and whipped round as though they had sinews of steel and flesh of iron. Without the least provocation, men, in many instances, when they buy one of these crushed beings, give them forty lashes to initiate them and let them know whom they have to fear. But I will close, by relating an incident of which I was an eye-witness.

A slave was sent out one morning with a basket of bread for sale. Some person (as was supposed) purloined a loaf. When he returned, his master counted the money and discovered the loss. After closely questioning the negro, he ordered him up stairs to a small room, and told him to prepare for a 'sound thrashing.' He then procured six whips and started to perform his threat.

The poor negro, well aware from experience what awaited him, when he heard his master coming up stairs, jumped out of the window, and ran for the river. Spectators crowded round, and the negro, having reached the edge of the stream, ventured to look round, and met the demoniac face of his master with his whips. At one bound, he was far in the river. Efforts were made for his rescue, but the master, with fiend-like threatenings, bade them desist and let the dog die. For a moment, the crowd stood paralyzed before his menacing aspect. They at length took the poor, drowning slave from the water, but would not deliver him to the owner. He was afterwards sold, and sent to New Orleans.—Christian Reflector.

OF AFRICAN BLOOD AND DESCENT.

It seems to be settled at last, that the Hon. David Yulee, late Levy, U. S. Senator from the new State of Florida, is of African origin, his grandfather having been a high officer of one of the monarchs of that continent. It is said by a correspondent of the Richmond Enquirer, that the senior Yulee was Grand Vizier of the Emperor of Morocco, but being driven from office on the death of his master, he found refuge at Gibraltar, whence he soon emigrated to Cuba and changed his name to Levy. The present senator was born in Cuba, but came to Florida just before its transfer to the United States, whereby he became an involuntary citizen of this republic. The only difference between his paternity and that of other descendants of Africa, that he should be in the Senate while they are thrust from all social privileges, seems to be in the fact that his ancestor was driven from Africa against his will, while the ancestors of the others were carried from Africa against their will. We do not know whether Mr. Yulee is married. If not, this important peculiarity in his case, distinguishing him from other persons of African descent, may aid some anxious papa or mama in answering the question—Would you let your daughter marry a nigger? The correspondent of the Enquirer slips a little in his geography, in locating the empire of Morocco "near the deserts of Arabia." Otherwise, his remark in regard to the case is quite pertinent, and will be still more so, when equal liberality shall be shown to all the descendants of the continent from which Senator Yulee derives his ancestry.

"To my mind, instances such as this go strongly to prove the soundness of the principles upon which our government is based, casting its shield as it does, around all who choose to partake of its blessings, and admitting all alike to an equal participation in its privilege, which ensures to the country at large the benefit of character and talent, accompanied by energy sufficient to make itself felt, whether generated on the Alps, in Siberia, or near the Deserts of Arabia, as in the case of Mr. Y."

METHODISM IN ENGLAND.

It appears that Dr. Campbell, editor of the Christian Witness, (a Congregational Magazine) has lately been showing the declining state of the Nonconformist bodies in England. The following is his sad account:

The New Connection Methodists adopted at their last Conference, the following resolution:—"That the Conference deeply deplore the decrease in our numbers during the past year, and feels that the event ought to be regarded as a source of deep abasement and sorrow before God. The Conference having directed its anxious attention to the painful subject, deems it expedient that our respected superintendants should as early as possible, bring the matter before the Leaders and quarterly meetings, for their searching inquiry and prayerful consideration; and the Conference would also especially and affectionately exhort the officers of our churches cordially to co-operate with their ministers, in devising and carrying out such measures as, under the Divine blessing, will restore the prosperity of our Zion, and cause both ministers and people to rejoice together."

Of the WESLEYAN METHODIST ASSOCIATION the cautious and faltering language of the following resolution but too plainly indicate the real condition:—"The assembly took into careful consideration the state of the connection, as indicated by the number of members returned from the respective circuits. It appeared that in thirty-two circuits there has been some increase in the number of church members, and that in thirty-three circuits the number of members have decreased. The representatives from circuits in which the societies had decreased, were severally called upon to state what were the causes which had in their circuits hindered the prosperity of the work of God. Inquiry was also made as to how far the recommendations of the preceding annual assembly for improving the spiritual state of our Connection had been carried into effect."

We are inclined to believe that it fares no better with the most laborious people, the PRIMITIVE METHODIST Connection: first, because they are wholly silent on the subject, a fact not likely to have occurred had they been able to publish anything to the praise and glory of God; second, because one of the ministers of the body, in an article in our number for April, states the number at 'about 90,000,' but the Conference which met in June, sets them forth as 87,585, and the deaths on the year as 1,132. On these grounds we sorrowfully conclude that this section deeply shares in the common affliction.

Of the DISSENTERS we can say nothing with confidence, having, as we have said, no statistics. We rejoice to know that we have a considerable number of prosperous churches, and many more in a state of tolerable health; but we should betray our trust if we did not frankly confess that we have a large number that are weak and sickly, and not a few that are 'ready to die.' We speak it in sincerity, although in much sorrow, that we have not to look upon ourselves as in a more satisfactory condition than our sister-communities, while at the same time we have no cause to conclude that we are worse.

The great WESLEYAN CONFERENCE reports the nett increase of that body for the year, to be 3,180 upon an aggregate of 338,598. This, however, is far from a satisfactory state of things in so important a community. This sum, divided by the number of the Societies, would give a very small result as the increase of each. Again let it be remembered, that this is the ascertained fruit of the labors of no fewer than 1685 holy and faithful men, all, with the insignificant exception of the supernumeraries, highly efficient, and most laborious.

Again, dividing the converts by the ministers, we have a result of only two and a fraction to each. Poor work this for Methodism! But there is the noble army of local preachers; have they no claim to any share of this fruit? Again, there is a countless host of class-leaders; are they to be allowed nothing? Lastly, there is the mighty machine of the Wesleyan Sunday School; is it to be considered wholly unproductive? In a word, considering the stupendous agency employed, the result is most lamentable!

Such, then, is the unvarnished statement of facts. But who can contemplate them without dismay? To what quarter shall the man of God look for comfort? Will he find it in the Established Church? No, verily! There is the utmost reason to believe that the power of God, to a fearful extent, has ceased to accompany the ministration of the state-church clergy. Indeed, the stream of pure evangelism which formerly fertilized many a barren corner of our land, is now being rapidly lost in the Dead Sea of Puseyism. The evangelical clergy, as a class, are fast passing away. This fact exceedingly enhances the importance of Evangelical Dissent—if that shall fail, all is lost. The conclusion, then, to which we are led, is, that the present state of things is painful and alarming in the extreme.—Whether we look at our own land or at heathen climes, the fact is equally distressing. Small increase to the numbers of saved is bad; the simple maintenance of our ground is worse; but to be driven from it, absolutely to decrease in numbers, is worst of all!

At this rate, when shall the world be converted to God? Or rather, how long would it require till the churches should have died away, and the kingdom of Christ once more have given place to the kingdom of Satan, the God of this world? Under such circumstances the extension of the gospel, whether at home or abroad, ceases to be a question. The streams must ever share the fate of the fountain. When the trunk dies, woe to the branches! The ark of the Lord is in jeopardy. Something must be done. What shall it be? Where lies the spring of the evil? Is it with the ministry? Or with the people? Or with both? Or with neither? It must be somewhere. Where is it?"

The above is a melancholy statement. Nor is it to be alleviated by a consideration of the United States and Canada; for the churches of these countries also complain of the fearful decline of vital piety. What can be done?

THE JEWS.

Dr. Durbin, in his 'Observations in the East,' has a very interesting chapter on the restoration of the Jews—the prophecies in relation thereto—and the 'signs of the times' which indicate their speedy fulfilment. Our object in reference to this chapter is, to make some extracts which we consider of interest, as they will tend to remove a prejudice too common amongst the unreflecting. Dr. Durbin says:

'The Jews are scarcely less remarkable for zeal for religion and hatred to idolatry, than for their dispersion, unity and sympathy.—For eighteen hundred years they have been plundered, trodden down, banished, and put to death in a thousand forms, all of which evils they might have avoided by renouncing their religion. Yet, as a people, they have never wavered in their national faith.'

'To their dispersion, their unity, their sympathy, their religious zeal, and their hatred to idolatry, is to be added the very little observed fact of their literary and political as well as commercial influence throughout the world. We are used to consider Jews only as pedlers or money jobbers; we have not been accustomed to think of them as occupying professorships in the first universities of Europe; as being members of national senates, as leading on national armies to victory, and as sitting in the cabinet of kings. Annihilate them, their property, their influence, and their relations with society, and the world would receive a shock from which it would not recover for centuries. The following passages, quoted from B. D'Israeli, himself a Jew, and a member of the British Parliament, may require a little abatement on the score of national bias, and the manner in which the facts are put, but in their great outlines they are true. It is the language of a Rothchild, under the title of Sidonia, to Coningsby:

'You never observe a great intellectual movement in Europe in which the Jews do not greatly participate. The first Jesuits were Jews; that mysterious Russian diplomacy, which so alarms Western Europe, is organized and principally carried on by Jews; that mighty revolution which is at this moment preparing in Germany, and which will be, in fact, a second and greater Reformation, and of which so little is yet known in England, is entirely developing under the auspices of Jews, who almost monopolize the professorial chairs of Germany. Neander, the founder of Spiritual Christianity, and who is Regius Professor in the University of Berlin, is a Jew. Benary, equally famous in the same University, is a Jew. I think there are more than ten professors in this University who are Jews.

'A few years back we were applied to by Russia. I had resolved to go myself to St. Petersburg. I had, on my arrival, an interview with the Russian minister of finance, Count Cancrin—I beheld the son of a Lithuanian Jew. The loan was connected with the affairs of Spain. I resolved on repairing to Spain from Russia. I traveled without intermission. I had an audience immediately on my arrival with the Spanish minister, Senor Mendizabel—I beheld one, like myself, the son of a Nuovo Christiano, a Jew of Arragon. In consequence of what transpired at Madrid, I went straight to Paris to consult the President of the French Council—I beheld the son of a French Jew, a hero, an imperial marshall, and very properly so, for who should be military heroes if not those who worship the Lord of Hosts?'

'And is Soult a Hebrew?'

'Yes; and several of the French marshals, and the famous—Masseua, for example; his real name was Manassah; but to my anecdote. The consequence of our consultation was, that some northern power should be applied to in a friendly and mediative capacity. We fixed on Prussia, and the President of the Council made an application to the Prussian Minister, who attended a few days after our confer. Count Arnim entered the cabinet, and I beheld a Prussian Jew. So you see my dear Coningsby, that the world is governed by very different personages to what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes. * * * * * * *

D'Israeli also claims that 'almost every great composer, skilled musician—almost every voice that ravishes you with its transporting strains, spring from our tribes.' 'Rosini, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn—the three great creative minds (says he) are of Hebrew race.' He continues—Little do your men of fashion—your 'musicians' of Paris and your dandies of London—as they thrill into raptures at the notes of a Pasta or a Grisi, little do they suspect that they are offering their homage to the sweet singers of Israel.'

Many of the most intelligent, influential and patriotic citizens of Baltimore are of the Hebrew race. The time was, when by the Constitution of Maryland, they were precluded from holding office under the State; but the restriction was wisely withdrawn, and under a more liberal and just policy, they have become entitled to the same privileges as other citizens. We trust that the time will arrive when all civil distinction between the Jew and Gentile will be abolished throughout the world; and when every man shall be permitted to worship God according to his own inclination, unrestrained by the fear of persecution.—Baltimore Clipper.

Lay Sermon.

"If ye fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, ye do well. But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors." James 2: 8, 9.

My text is the language of an inspired apostle addressed to his brethren of the twelve tribes, which were scattered abroad. And if the instructions given, were binding on Christians in that age of the world, it follows of course, that they are equally, at the present time. The author of my text informs us, that to fulfil the royal law according to the Scripture, we must love our neighbor as ourselves. Then warns us of the consequences if we violate this duty. We commit sin. There is nothing of more importance to us, than to know our duty, and to do it, for endless consequences are involved. I will therefore notice,

1st. The duty enjoined on the followers of our Lord in the text.

2nd. The consequence of disobedience,

And close by urging an inquiry; do the professed followers of our Lord in this age of the world, live in accordance to the royal law?

St. James illustrates the Christian's duty, by exhorting his brethren not to have the faith of our Lord Jesus, with respect to persons, and not to have any more respect to persons wearing good apparel, than those in vile raiment. And that they were not justified in saying to the one, sit thou here, or to the other there, when they went to church; if so, they were partial and judges of evil thoughts. So it will be discovered that no outward appearance will justify in having a respect to persons, in a religious assembly. For if vile raiment is not a sufficient cause, a difference in complexion ought not, for this is given by the Creator, and we certainly are not justified in treating His works with disrespect. "For there is no respect of persons with God." "But in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him." The Author of the royal law gives a general test by which the action may be known to be correct before it is committed, and from this fact it may truly be called the royal law. This test is referred to a law written in man's nature, or in the mind, and every act in reference to our brother should be tested by it, and the question asked, would I have him do so to me? If not, and I then act so toward him, I am a sinner.

2nd. The consequence of disobedience.

"If ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are" convicted "of the law as transgressors." "The wages of sin is death." This may seem hard to the transgressor; but it is just that the penalty of the law should be inflicted on the impenitent, because he knew his duty, and did it not.

The inquiry—Do the professed followers of our Lord live in accordance to the royal law? Go and visit the different churches of this land, and you will then, and there learn the sad truth, that a majority of them have respect to persons; not so much on account of difference in apparel, but because a brother is found "guilty of a skin" not like their own, and on that account, he is ordered to sit here, or there, (if allowed to enter the assembly at all,) and the difference in outward appearance, is urged as a plea to "enforce the wrong,"

And worse than all, and most to be deplored,
As human nature's broadest, foulest blot,
Chains him, and tasks him, and exacts his sweat
With stripes, that Mercy with a bleeding heart,
Weeps when she sees inflicted on a beast.
Then what is man? And what man seeing this,
And having human feelings, does not blush,
And hang his head, to think himself a man?

And call himself a Christian, an expounder of the royal law, a light to the world, and living in violation of the law! It cannot be, for "whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." I know of a circumstance of a minister's being appointed to a circuit, and in his family there was a young lady whom he had raised, and she commenced attending Church in the place where they lived, but a difficulty soon rose on account of her sitting in the congregation, and it increased until a degraded seat was set apart, and she requested to sit there. And that seat still remains as a witness against that Church, that she has "respect to persons." If my text is not a fable, that Church is convicted of the law as a transgressor. And her ministers may call around her altars, and say lo here, or there is Christ; believe it not, for she is convicted of sin until she repents of that ungodly act. This is plain preaching, but

Shall I for fear of feeble man,
The Spirit's course in me restrain.

God forbid that the truth should be covered up for fear that some professing sanctification should be convicted of sin, or the word of God be concealed to make a Church consistent, or

Awed by a mortal's frown shall I,
Conceal the word of God Most High?

There is nothing more plain, if there is any meaning in language, that if respect is shown by a religious assembly on account of outward appearance, than it is partial in itself, and becomes a judge of evil thoughts, and commits sin.

THE ORIGINAL SABBATH UNCHANGED.

SECTION V.

The Observance of the Weekly Sabbath enjoined upon the Israelites.

In a former section we have glanced at the various Sabbatic rests appointed to the Israelites. Of those which "are beside the Sabbaths of the Lord," the origin and purpose of some is peculiar to the house of Israel, being commemorative of events in their history, and could not have been observed previously. But, independently of these, they had also an interest, as creatures of God, in God's own Sabbath, the commemoration of His rest, an event the interest of which extends to every human being. "The works were finished from the foundation of the world;" and to all the inhabitants thereof "the seventh day was sanctified and blessed." Ere Egypt's first-born were destroyed, in connection with which the first of the purely Israelitish Sabbaths was appointed, the patriarchs, even from the foundation of the world, had God's own rest. It is peculiar to no land, and depends on no local circumstance. There is indeed little said in the Word of God from which we can assuredly ascertain in what manner, or with what degree of fidelity, the Sabbath was observed by the Israelites during their sojourn in the land of Egypt. We have every reason, however, to believe, that all the descendants of Israel had been carefully instructed, in the first instance, to obey the voice of God,—to keep His charge, His commandments, His statutes, and His laws,—and, among these, the duty and the blessedness of observing the day of sanctified rest. Of the Father of the Faithful, "the Lord said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do; seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him? For I know him, THAT HE WILL COMMAND HIS CHILDREN AND HIS HOUSEHOLD AFTER HIM, and they shall keep the way of the Lord." Gen. xviii. 17—19. And although the force of this remark applies most strongly to the Patriarchs, the heirs with him of the same promises, its influence extends also to his posterity of later ages. And if the Sabbath was observed by Joseph, of whose uncorrupted fidelity in other respects we have ample evidence, being recognized even by Pharaoh himself as "a man in whom the Spirit of God" was, the honor in which he was held as "a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his house, and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt," would, in the first instance, be favorable to his kinsmen in their general and open sanctification of it. But it is equally probable, whatever may have been their knowledge and primary observance of the Sabbath, that before the expiration of the predicted four hundred years of oppression of the seed of Abraham and Israel, under the later Pharaohs who held them in bondage, their opportunities of outward respect to its sacred character by the intermission of labor, would be greatly diminished, even if their masters, the Egyptians themselves, by tradition knew, and in some way observed, the seventh day. God, indeed, expressly charges against the Israelites afterwards, the serving of false gods while there; (Josh. xxiv. 14;) and the loss of the Sabbath sanctification and blessing under the oppression they endured, may have been the righteous dealings of God with them, when they liked not to retain Him in full acknowledgment.

Besides, if the Scriptures give us no direct intimation that the Sabbath was observed by the Israelites' sanctifying the seventh day in the land of Egypt, it is to be remembered, that except the mere declaration of their oppression, we have actually no account of them at all while there, from the time of Joseph's death till the Lord began to make preparation for their rescue. For a long period prior to the Exodus, it is not improbable that the Sabbath did not obtain among the Israelites the place which God designed it to have, as announced at the creation of the world. But although its sacred character may have been in a measure effaced from the minds of the majority, while under the oppression of the Egyptians, and even if it could not then, in open acknowledgment, have been duly observed by any.

But should we even be constrained to believe that as a people they were greatly chargeable with departure from the love and ordinances of God, still we cannot suppose all trace of the Sabbath to have been then obliterated among them. However low the state of religious feeling generally may have been, there were yet men of faith among them, by whom the remembrance of former better days, and of their fathers' God, would be cherished with reverence and devotion.

Occupying a distinct and separate locality for their dwellings, the Israelites, where disposed, might even join in a Sabbath's nightly meeting for social worship, when the eye of the taskmaster was withdrawn, and the voice of authority disturbed them not. If without the aids of a regular priesthood, or other class of men specially set apart to the office of instruction, we yet know from the account of Moses' intercourse with his brethren, that in their very lowest state they had their "elders," the recognized leaders of the people, to whom at the commencement of his mission, God commanded him to intimate the divine purpose of immediate deliverance. (Exod. ii. 16.) These Elders may have been in no inconsiderable degree helpful to them in recalling and preserving the knowledge of the grace and power of Jehovah, and of His acknowledgment of the faith of their fathers. Indeed, as the history of former ages was recounted, we can scarcely imagine that the important events of the creation in six days, and God's resting on the seventh, could by them be forgotten; or that, in the hours of retirement with their families, at least, there would not still be cherished some regard for the day which God had then set apart, and on which He had pronounced His blessing.

Perhaps we should not be in error, did we even much more confidently express a belief that the Israelites did publicly observe the Sabbath of the Lord before they left the land of Egypt, if not during all the time they remained in it. It seems in no degree improbable that when Pharaoh reproached Moses and Aaron concerning their brethren, (Exod. v. 5,) "Behold the people of the land now are many, and ye make them rest from their burdens," that he does refer to encouragement given them by these servants of the Lord to cleave to Him, and with increased fidelity to sanctify the Sabbath. For it is worthy of note, that of the numerous Hebrew verbs which in our English version are translated "to rest," Shabat or Shavath, the one used in expressing Pharaoh's displeasure is that most generally employed in the sense of Sabbatizing. In a few instances it is indeed used in a different sense, but far more frequently with reference to sanctified rests. It is, in the Hebrew, the same verb used for resting in the following texts: "And on the seventh day God ended His work which he had made; and He rested on the seventh day." Gen. ii. 2. "And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it; because that in it He had rested." Gen ii. 3. "So the people rested on the seventh day." Exod. xvi. 30. "Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest." Exod. xxiii. 12. "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day He rested, and was refreshed." Exod. xxxi. 17; and in the same sense in Exod. xxxiv. 21 (twice); Lev. xxiii. 32; xxv. 2; xxvi. 34, 35 (twice).

But, however this may be, we know that such as truly sanctified the Lord God in their hearts, could not, by any rigor of their bondage, be wholly deprived of the blessing of its observance; and if, in the very depth of their degradation and oppression, when their infant seed were doomed to death, we find that the faith of Amram and Jochabed led them to conceal their son, the future deliverer of Israel, "And they were not afraid of the king's commandment, (Heb. xi. 23,) we may not doubt that such as they would find occasions of seeking the blessed face of that God in whom they trusted, nor would they be easily prevented from doing so, at the time and in the manner He himself had appointed. And if at length, when under the bondage of the oppressor, and they had no help of man at all, they were led to cry unto the mighty God of their fathers, we may believe that they would also give more heed to His commandments and His statutes.

In the very first reference to it by the Lord after their deliverance, the Sabbath is spoken of as a day with the name and nature of which they were already familiar. The oppressor's power being now overthrown, and his hosts and his chariots sunk in the depths of the sea, this obstacle to a faithful witness for God was removed, its sanctity is anew declared, its full recognition demanded, and farther directions are given by the God of Israel as to what is implied in the divine requirements concerning it.

Let us now attend, then, to the next special intimation that we have in Scripture of the Sabbath as observed by the descendants of Jacob. On the fifteenth day of the second month after their departing out of the land of Egypt, the children of Israel reached the wilderness of Sin, between Elim and Sinai, having just journied from the former of these places. Exod. xvi. 1. Here, finding themselves in an unproductive desert, and remembering the bread and flesh of Egypt, they began to murmur against Moses and Aaron. "Then said the Lord unto Moses, Behold I will rain bread from heaven for you; and the people shall go out and gather a certain rate every day, that I MAY PROVE THEM; whether they will walk in my law or no. And it shall come to pass, that on the sixth day they shall prepare that which they bring in; and it shall be twice as much as they gather daily. And Moses and Aaron said unto all the children of Israel, At even then ye shall know that the Lord hath brought you out from the land of Egypt; and, in the morning, then ye shall see the glory of the Lord, for that He heareth your murmurings against the Lord; and what are we that ye murmur against us." Ver. 4—8.

This, it is to be observed, is the first allusion to the Sabbath since their coming out of Egypt, and was at least fourteen days before the promulgation of the law from Sinai—before the people had at all reached it in their journeyings. Now, let any man read this chapter carefully, and then judge whether the account is given as declaring a matter till then wholly unknown. Does the Lord address Moses as one ignorant of the nature of the Sabbath?—as one who was an entire stranger to the obligation and nature of the day of rest? Quite the reverse. So far does God proceed upon the assumption of Moses' acquaintance with the design of that institution, that while "the sixth day" and its double supply are referred to, neither the words seventh day nor Sabbath are even mentioned in this the first statement given concerning its sanctification. The impression made of the object of the divine mind rather is that of the making provision for the sanctification of the acknowledged day of rest, thus taking away all excuse for its neglect,—to prove them whether "they will walk" in the law which God had already given from the first—and for this end He promises a double supply of food on the sixth day, leaving it to Moses to observe to the people that there is to be no gathering on the seventh,—the reference to "the sixth day" itself proving their previous division of the week as given at Creation.

"And they gathered it every morning, every man according to his eating; and when the sun waxed hot, it melted. And it came to pass, that on the sixth day they gathered twice as much bread, two omers for one man; and all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moses. And he said unto them, This is that which the Lord hath said, To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord: bake that which ye will bake to-day, and seethe that ye will seethe; and that which remaineth over lay up for you to be kept until the morning. And they laid it up till the morning, as Moses bade; and it did not stink, neither was there any worm therein. And Moses said, Eat that to-day; for to-day is a Sabbath unto the Lord; to-day ye shall not find it in the field. Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, which is the Sabbath, in it there shall be none. And it came to pass, that there went out some of the people on the seventh day for to gather, and they found none. And the Lord said unto Moses, How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws? See, for that the Lord hath given you the Sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days; abide ye every man in his place; let no man go out of his place on the seventh day. So the people rested on the seventh day." Ver. 21—30.

"How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws?—See the Lord hath given you the Sabbath!" is a connection which intimates that the sin charged has special reference to the profanation of the Sabbath; and if so, that they already knew it, though they sanctified it not. "How long refuse ye?" It is not a complaint of their present conduct only, but of previous long-continued neglect or despite of the holy day blessed as the Sabbath, and revealed for their sanctification,—the observance of which formed part of those "commandments" and "laws" which had been given them to keep. Their breaking of God's commandment was an evil which grieved Him; and these they were now, therefore, again charged to keep. But as this complaint is expressed in regard to the Sabbath, it proves that its observance was part of those "laws" and "commandments" which they ought previously to have kept, before they reached the wilderness of Sin. The Lord would now prove them, and provision being thus made miraculously for their support, by a double supply of food on the previous day, no excuse could be offered if they did not sanctify the Sabbath of the Lord. Whatever they might have plausibly urged with regard to the time of their Egyptian bondage, the profanation of the Sabbath even in the desert, was now wholly without excuse or palliation; for their very going out to obtain food was rendered unnecessary by this arrangement of a previous supply of the necessary manna.

And this the Lord says He did, that He might prove them whether they would walk in His ways or no. "Where no law is, there is no transgression;" but Sabbath law had been previously given—obedience to it was now re-enjoined with this advantage in their favor, of all temptation to its violation having been taken away. And here we may notice that, even when they were at Marah, God had enjoined their giving ear to His commandments and statutes. Exod. xv. 25, 26. Farther, as already noticed, when the Lord declares His purpose to Moses, He does not speak as if addressing one who, for the first time, heard of the Sabbath, so also, when Moses informs the Israelites of the divine arrangement with regard to the manna for the more perfect sanctification of the day, neither does he appear as one telling them of a new institution with which they had not hitherto been acquainted. As reminding them of what they had already known, he only calls attention to the time; "To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath." Ver. 23. He declares which is the day, but enters not into explanation of what the Sabbath is, or is designed to commemorate. He does not even say that to-morrow a Sabbath will be kept as something extraordinary or only occasional, but "to-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath," as that which had previously existed, and the stated time of which could be easily distinguished. And again he calls it "the seventh day, which is the Sabbath," not which shall henceforth be so, by virtue of an appointment now made, but "is the Sabbath," by previous sanctification and blessing still continuing. Nor do the people receive Moses' communication as if it were an appointment of which they had hitherto been ignorant, and the nature and meaning of which require to be explained. Of the manna they asked, "What is it? [marg.] for they wist not what it was." But they do not ask concerning the Sabbath, "What is it?" The very inquiry in the one case warrants the belief, that if, in the other, information had been needed, it would have been equally sought. The whole transaction proves that, to the Israelites, before the promulgation of the Law from Sinai, the Sabbath was not a new or unknown institution.

THE SIN AND FOLLY OF SCOLDING.

"Fret not thyself in any wise to do evil."—Psalms xxxvii. 2.

1. It is a sin against God.—It is an evil and only evil, and that continually. David understood both human nature and the law of God. He says, "fret not thyself in any wise to do evil." That is, never fret or scold, for it is always a sin. If you cannot speak without fretting or scolding, keep silence.

2. It destroys affection.—No one ever did, ever can, or ever will love an habitual fretter, fault-finder, or scolder. Husbands, wives, children, relatives, or domestics, have no affection for peevish, fretful fault-finders. Few tears are shed over the graves of such. Persons of high moral principle may tolerate them—may bear with them. But they cannot love them more than the sting of nettles or the noise of musquitos. Many a man has been driven to the tavern and to dissipation by a peevish, fretful wife. Many a wife has been made miserable by a peevish, fretful husband.

3. It is the bane of domestic happiness.—A fretful, peevish, complaining fault-finder in a family is like the continual chafing of an inflamed sore. Woe to the man, woman, or child, who is exposed to the influence of such a temper in another. Nine tenths of all domestic trials and unhappiness spring from this source. Mrs. D. is of this temperament. She wonders her husband is not more fond of her company. That her children give her so much trouble. That doinestics do not like to work for her. That she cannot secure the good will of young people. The truth is, she is peevish and fretful. Children fear her, and do not love her. She never yet gained the affections of a young person, nor never will till she leaves off fretting.

4. It defeats the end of family government.—Good family government is the blending authority with affection, so as to secure respect and love. Indeed this is the great secret of managing young people. Now your fetters may inspire fear, but they always make two faults where they correct one. Scolding at a child, fretting at a child, sneering at a child, taunting a child, treating a child as though it had no feelings, inspires dread and dislike, and fosters those very dispositions from which many of the faults of childhood proceed. Mr. G. and Mrs. F. are of this class.—Their children are made to mind; but how? Mrs. F. frets and scolds her children. She is severe enough upon their faults. She seems to watch them in order to find fault. She sneers at them; treats them as though they had no feelings. She seldom gives them a command without a threat and a long-running, fault-finding commentary. When she chides, it is not done in a dignified manner. She raises her voice, puts on a cross look, threatens, strikes them, pinches their ears, snaps their heads, &c. The children cry, pout, sulk, and poor Mrs. F. has to do her work over pretty often.—Then she will find fault with her husband because he does not fall in with her ways, or chime with her as chorus.

5. Fretting and scolding make hypocrites.—As a fretter never receives confidence and affection, so no one likes to tell them anything disagreeable, and thus procure for themselves a fretting. Now, children conceal as much as they can from such persons. They cannot make up their minds to be frank and open-hearted. So husbands conceal from their wives, and wives from their husbands. For a man may brave a lion, but he likes not to come in contact with nettles and musquitos.

6. It destroys one's peace of mind.—The more one frets the more he may. A fretter will always have enough to fret at. Especially if he or she has the bump of order and neatness largely developed.—Something will always be out of place. There will always be some dirt somewhere. Others will not eat right, look right, talk right; he will not do these things so as to please them. And fretters are generally so selfish as to have no regard for any one's comfort but their own.

7. It is a mark of a vulgar disposition.—Some persons have so much gall in their disposition, are so selfish that they have no regard to the feelings of others. All things must be done to please them.—They make their husbands, wives, children, domestics, the conductors by which their spleen and ill-nature are discharged. Woe to the children who are exposed to such influences. It makes them callous and unfeeling, and when they grow up they pursue the same course with their own children, or those entrusted to their management, and thus the race of fretters is perpetuated. Any person who is in the habit of fretting or sneering, taunting their husbands, wives, children, or domestics, shows either a bad disposition or else ill-breeding. For it is generally your ignorant, low-bred people that are guilty of such things.—Congregational Journal.

MISSIONARY EFFORTS.

Let all your missionary efforts be carried on in the spirit of religion. Let them be founded in religion, and be carried on in religion. He who engages in this work in any other spirit, is like Uzzah of old, and should fear lest he expose himself to a similar punishment. I do not think that our zeal for the salvation of the heathen, possesses all the characters it should have. We are not yet like the angel, who had the everlasting Gospel to preach to all nations, flying in the midst of heaven; rising so high that the smoke and dust of these lower regions cannot settle on his wings. We need to soar much higher than we do,—to live nearer to God,—to have more of the influence of the divine spirit. When I see missionary societies taken up as a sort of exchange for employments that have palled and satiated; when I see persons thronging to missionary meetings in the same spirit that they would resort to a ball-room, or a theatre; when I see congregations calculating and comparing collection with collection, and exertion with exertion; when I see toy-shops set up, and aquatic excursions resorted to, to support that cause for which the Son of God shed his blood; when I hear this or that man cried up, because he has been most successful in raising money, or in adding subscribers to the list; when I hear it told again and again, that 'money, money,' is the life-spring of our cause;—I say, when I hear and see all this, I have reason to fear that we are not yet what we should be, as it regards this sacred cause.—Call me not a reformer! I disclaim the title. A reformer! O, I wish I were! That I love the missionary cause, witness He who knows my heart! witness sleepless nights and anxious days! O, dearly do I love this cause, and anxious, indeed, am I, that it should be preserved pure! And when I see men, women, and children, rushing to the altar with strange materials, I cry, indignant, 'Off, off, ye profane! mingle not that with your sacrifices, which can but injure both the cause and you.'"

[REV. J. A. JAMES.

LOOKING UP THERE AND DOWN HERE.

The celebrated Matthew Wilkes was once in company with a young clergyman who was appointed to preach in the chapel formerly occupied by Whitefield. Having to look into the Bible in the pulpit, for some purpose connected with the services, before the congregation were assembled, Mr. Wilkes discovered the young minister's notes between the leaves. "What!" said he, "notes where Whitefield preached? What! are you going to read a sermon from Whitefield's pulpit?" "Ah!" said the minister, "the place is large, and is a new one for me, and I tremble at the thought of coming to the people without some written preparation."—"Ah, well, well," said Mr. Wilkes, "it may be so; but remember, (and here he looked up to heaven, at the same time laying his hand upon the manuscript sermon on the desk,) remember, the more you look up there, the less you'll find it necessary to look down here."

This was very striking. There is a great deal of heavenly meaning contained in this sentence of Mr. Wilkes. There is a great deal of instruction for every minister. "The more you look up there, the less you will have to look down here." The more you look to God, the less will be your dependence on yourself and on man.

The more you look to God, the more independent you will be of yourself and of man—the more superior you will be to the fear of man which bringeth a snare, and the more powerful you will be in yourself, by the grace of God within you. Look aloft! It is the only way to get safely down. Look aloft! Whether you have notes before you, or thoughts within you, or both, it is the only way to make them available, the only way to give them power over your hearers, the only way to speak them as from God, the only way to preach with comfort and happiness to yourself, with power and benefit to your hearers. Look up to God! It is the only way to make your hearers look thither also.—N. Y. Evangelist.

ELOQUENT EXTRACT.—"Generation after generation," says an eloquent writer, "have felt as we feel, and their fellows were as active as our own. They passed away like a vapor, while nature wore the same aspect of beauty as when her Creator commanded her to be. The heavens shall be as bright over our graves as they now are around our paths. The world will have the same attractions for our offspring yet unborn, that she had once for ourselves, and that she has now for our children. Yet a little while and all of this will have happened. The throbbing heart will be stifled, and we be at rest. Our funeral will wind on its way, and our friends will return, and we shall be left to darkness. And it may be for a short time that we shall be spoken of, but the things of life will creep in, and our names will soon be forgotten. Days will continue to move on, and laughter and song will be heard in the place in which we died; and the eye that mourned for us will be dried, and glisten again with joy; and even our children will cease to think of us, and will not remember to lisp our names."

DR. PAYSON, when racked with pain and near to death, exclaimed, "O what a blessed thing it is to lose one's will! Since I have lost my will I have found happiness. There can be no such thing as disappointment to me, for I have NO DESIRE but that God's will may be accomplished.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, May 28, 1846.

THE SABBATH.—The Seventh-day Baptists took the following mode to spread as widely as possible the doctrines of the sect, on the occasion of the "anniversary week." An immense crowd attended at the last of the anniversaries, viz: that of the "Sabbath Union," celebrated at the Tabernacle on the evening of Sunday the 17th, on which occasion, as it will be remembered, the Rev. Dr. Barnes, of Philadelphia, delivered an eloquent address in vindication of the Christian Sabbath, the first day of the week. As the thousands who had been listening retired at the close of the exercises, they were met at the door by proffers of a tract entitled the "Sabbath Vindicator." Of course no one refused the little messenger; but on reading the tract at home, the people found it to be an argument to prove that the Seventh Day was now, as it had been since the Creation, the true Sabbath.

The tract was issued by the "Seventh-day Baptist Association," and the distributor thus obtained for the work a more extensive attention, probably, than he could have procured by any other mode of procedure. We have heard, however, of no comments [converts] made by the book.

[N. Y. Express, Tuesday, May 19.

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND—SATURDAY OR SUNDAY.—At the lecture at the Tabernacle, on Sunday evening, on the Christian Sabbath, there was a great crowd, who, after listening to the remarks of the eloquent divine, went out. As they were passing out the doors, a genius was very busy distributing tracts among them, headed "The Sabbath Vindicator." The people thought it was all right, and great quantities of the tracts were distributed. But when the people got home, they found that the Sabbath Vindicator was a tract issued by the Seventh-day Baptists, and was an argument to prove that Saturday was Sunday, and consequently that the learned divine's argument was a false one. This is certainly an ingenious manner of doing business. In this case, the "children of light" were about as wise as the "children of the world."

[N. Y. Herald, Tuesday, May 19.

The foregoing articles, which we clip, the one from the Express, the other from the Herald, both daily papers of this city, have shown to the numerous readers of those journals, that there are people in the world who doubt the sanctity of the day so widely and popularly known as the "Christian Sabbath." Time after time it has been asserted that the sanctity of the first day of the week was a matter in which all Christians were agreed; ergo, Seventh-day Baptists are not Christians. Q. E. D. Happily, however, the true measure of our Chistianity is our conformity to the Scriptures, and not our conformity to the dominant sects of the day.

That the time is rapidly coming, when it will not be taken for granted that Sunday is the true Sabbath without a little investigation, it is not difficult to foresee. Puritan bigotry has so long arrogated to itself the right to fetter men's consciences, that he who dares to think beyond its little circle of orthodoxy, is even yet shunned as a dangerous man; and many a person is there, who would instinctively shrink with horror at the bare sight of a man who pursues his regular business on the first day of the week. Satan himself would hardly be more dreaded. What! work on Sunday? Children, take care; do not go near that man—he is an awful character!—And the little children shrink away, the good old mothers and grandmothers tremble till the dreaded man is out of sight, and the catechism—not the Bible—is studied with new diligence in order to fasten the conviction forever, that "from the beginning of the world to the resurrection of Christ, God appointed the seventh day of the week to be the weekly Sabbath; and the first day of the week ever since, to continue to the end of the world."

No wonder, therefore, that Sunday theology is inwrought with the whole framework of society. But the elements are at work to produce an explosion. This hoary-headed error, which has so long exerted its withering influence on the church and the world, is destined to be "made like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor." The world is beginning to see the cheat which has so long been imposed upon it, and Christians themselves are fast losing confidence in this time-honored, but man-made, institution, ycleped "Christian Sabbath." Nay, there have always been such large numbers of Christians, who, while they paid an outward regard to the festival, doubted its divine origin, that nothing but the culpable recklessness of party spirit, or sheer ignorance, would venture the assertion that all are agreed.

We have no apology to make in behalf of the brother who distributed the "Sabbath Vindicator" to the multitude. He wishes none made. He feels a peaceful satisfaction in having done what he could to provoke investigation. We are well aware, that of the thousands to whom these little sheets have been handed, there are many who will give them no higher honor than to convert them into waste paper; but we shall not be discouraged on that account. Our conviction of the truth of our doctrine is so strong, that we can afford to meet these discouragements. Dr. Edwards will find our little tracts traveling after his "Permanent Sabbath Documents," to teach the people the importance of observing the Sabbath for some other reason than because it is promotive of earthly prosperity. They will not pretend that a mill in good condition will grind as much corn in six days as in seven; but they will inculcate this—that the Sabbath is designed to be a standing memorial of God's wisdom, power, and goodness, as displayed in Creation, and so to serve as a testimony against Atheism and Idolatry till time shall be no longer. This is the great and primary end of the institution—an end which our first-day brethren seem for the most part to overlook. Bodily rest, and spiritual improvement, are, in their opinion, the great objects of the Sabbath. They are collateral objects, no doubt; but while they are insisted on as the chief ends of the institution, Dr. Edwards and his coadjutors will have as much as they can well do to manage those who have wit enough to see, that man needs rest when he is tired, and that one day is just as good as another for the mere purpose of worship.

BAPTIST GENERAL CONVENTION AND MISSIONARY UNION.—The Baptist General Convention for missionary purposes met in Brooklyn last week. The legislative acts which have been passed for the purpose of enabling it to assume the name of the "American Baptist Missionary Union," were accepted. The terms of membership of the Missionary Union were fixed at $20, and life-membership at $100. From the Annual Report read before the Board of Managers, we gather some interesting facts. The total receipts for the year, from donations and legacies, have been $100,219. The Convention has seven missions in Asia, one in East Africa, three in Europe, and five among the American Indians. There are connected with the Board in all 16 missions, 143 stations and out-stations, 99 missionaries and assistants, of whom 42 are preachers, 155 native preachers and assistants, 82 churches, 5,373 members of churches, including 64 baptized the past year, and 54 schools with about 2,000 pupils.

EASTERN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.

The Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association convened with the Church at Marlboro, West New-Jersey, on fifth-day, May 21. The delegation was not large, being somewhat affected, probably, by the approach of the Anniversaries at Berlin.

Bro. Lucius Crandall, who was appointed to preach the Introductory Discourse, did not attend; and Brother A. B. Burdick, his alternate, did not arrive until after the organization. In such circumstances, it devolved upon Eld. W. B. Gillett to preach the Discourse, who chose for his text 1 Cor. 12: 12—"For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body; so also is Christ."

The Association was organized by the appointment of A. D. TITSWORTH, Moderator, and Samuel Davison and W. B. Gillett, Secretaries. [Bro. Davison, however, was unwell; soon after the organization he was compelled to leave, and was confined to his house during the sessions of the Association.]

Letters were received from most of the associated churches; also from the Shiloh Church and the Sabbath-Keeping Church in the City of New-York, asking to be associated with them. From these letters it seems that there has been a small diminution of members since the last year's minutes were published. Only two or three of the churches reported revivals, and these were not attended with large additions. The contributions to the various benevolent operations, however, show a good state of feeling in regard to the advancement of religion.

After appointing the various Committees, delegates were appointed to attend the Anniversaries of the Missionary Association and the American Sabbath Tract Society. Elds. Samuel Davison and A. B. Burdick were also appointed the Associational Messengers; the former to visit the Eastern churches, and the latter to visit the churches in New-Jersey—both with instructions to make it an important part of their duty to present the various benevolent organizations of the denomination.

The afternoon of the second day, agreeably to the recommendation of the Committee on Religious Exercises, was devoted to the consideration of a report from the Committee on Resolutions, and notwithstanding the delegation in attendance was small, the discussions were spirited and the session exceedingly interesting. The following are the resolutions reported by the Committee, and unanimously adopted by the Association.

1st. Moved by Paul Stillman; seconded by Isaac D. Tittsworth:—

Resolved, That in all our missionary efforts for the spread of the Gospel, we ought not to overlook the aid of the PRESS; and that for the aid afforded us by the AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY, and by the SABBATH RECORDER, they are entitled to our generous support.

2d. Moved by Solomon Carpenter; seconded by A. B. Burdick:—

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Association, the great commission of Christ, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," looks beyond the salvation of ourselves and our neighbors; and therefore that we ought, so far as God has blessed us, to contribute our means, and to pray and labor, for the salvation of those who sit in darkness.

3d. Moved by Isaac West; seconded by David Clawson:—

Resolved, That our widely-scattered brethren who are destitute of Gospel privileges, have claims upon us for missionary labor which we ought not to overlook; and that, therefore, in view of the blessing of God which has so abundantly crowned our home efforts, we will continue in this field, offering up our prayers and alms for success.

4th. Moved by W. B. Gillett; seconded by D. A. F. Randolph:—

Resolved, That notwithstanding the general liberality of the government under which we live, and the privileges granted us by the Constitution, yet there have been several statutes enacted from time to time by the legislative bodies of this State, and other States, departing from and trampling under foot the Constitution upon which this Republic has been established, by setting up and distinguishing some denominations of Christians, to the unjust oppression of others, and particularly depriving us as a people of civil rights and privileges, to wit, of working at, or attending to our lawful and just vocations upon the six days devoted to work by our Creator; therefore, that we recommend all interested to make a united, vigorous, and untiring effort to have all such statutes repealed, that thus we may enjoy rights equal to and in common with other denominations of Christians.

5th. Moved by A. B. Burdick; seconded by W. B. Gillett:—

Resolved, That in view of the efforts contemplated for legislative redress in reference to Sunday laws, a publication discussing the demerits of Sunday legislation is imperiously demanded; and that we recommend to the American Sabbath Tract Society to provide and publish such a treatise as shall correctly present to the public our grievances, and our views in reference to such laws, and that we will increase our contributions to enable it to do so.

6th. Moved by I. C. Heritage; seconded by David Rogers 2d:—

Whereas, it is a fundamental principle of our religion to do unto others as we would that they should do unto us, and as we are instructed in Scripture to remember those who are in bonds as bound with them—therefore

Resolved, That we recommend to the churches of this Association, to use all reasonable efforts to abolish American Slavery, believing that while we refuse, we cannot vindicate ourselves from the guilt of enslaving our fellow men.

Moved by Eld. John Davis:—

Resolved, That in view of the wide-spread evils of intemperance, we recommend to the churches composing this body, that they make vigorous efforts to promote the cause of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks as a beverage.

The second, fourth and sixth of these resolutions were discussed with much feeling and animation. The fourth, particularly, was an engaging and animated discussion of the evils of Sunday legislation; and the churches of this State may be set down as ready to go to work in good earnest. I wish I could present a report of some of the speeches made upon that resolution, as well as some upon other resolutions, but time has not permitted.

Bro. Solomon Carpenter presented a communication stating that a meeting of some of our brethren had been convened during the past Winter, at the request of Eld. Davison, of whom he asked council as to the publication of the Hymn Book for which he had issued proposals, and to do which he had received considerable encouragement. He stated that Eld. Davison wished, in a matter of so much consequence, to have the best course adopted to secure an acceptable book; and that T. B. Stillman, T. B. Brown, and Solomon Carpenter, were then appointed to issue a Circular to the Associations, asking a committee of one or more from each Association, to meet with him and examine the compilation. Bro. C. said that in consequence of the failure of Bro. T. B. Brown to be present, it devolved upon him to present the request to this Association. The request was complied with, and T. B. Brown and L. Crandall were appointed to examine and present the subject at the next General Conference likewise for its approval.

The following resolution, in answer to a resolution of the last General Conference, was presented by Paul Stillman, seconded by several persons, and, after a full discussion, unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, That in the opinion of this Association, the continuance of the General Conference, under its present organization, is not advisable; yet the Association is not willing that there should be a total discontinuance of such convocations, and would therefore recommend a new organization of the Conference, to meet but once in three years, at the same time and place with the Missionary Association.

It was understood that the tri-annual Conference here recommended should partake more of the nature of a General Convention for advancing benevolent objects, leaving to the Associations exclusively the business now usually done by the Conference.

A Committee was appointed to make some necessary alterations in the Constitution and Rules of Business of the Association, to be presented at the next anniversary. After some other less important business, the Association adjourned to meet with the church at Rockville, R. I. (3d Hopkinton) on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in May, 1847, at 11 o'clock A. M. P. S.

TEMPERANCE VICTORY.—On Tuesday of last week, being the third Tuesday of May, an election was held throughout the State of New York, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the people in regard to granting licenses for the sale of intoxicating drinks. The law provides, that if a majority of the electors in any town shall cast their votes for "No License," it shall not thereafter be lawful for the Board of Excise to grant to any person license to sell intoxicating or spirituous liquors or wines, in such town, until such determination is legally reversed; and if any one shall sell intoxicating drinks, he shall be liable to prosecution, and subject to all the penalties now imposed for selling without license. The result of the election under this law was most encouraging to the friends of temperance. In a large proportion of the towns the "No License" ticket was carried by overwhelming majorities.

PREJUDICE AGAINST COLOR.—In the Pennsylvania Diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church, there is a rule which effectually excludes colored clergymen from seats in the Convention, and prevents such parishes from sending delegations. At a recent meeting the Rev. Mr. Stem made a motion to repeal the rule. After some debate the question was taken. But as both orders, the clergy and the laity, did not agree to it, the motion was lost. Of course black men, if they go into the meetings of the Convention at all, must "stand here or sit there" for a while longer.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder.

Not wishing to attach too much importance to small matters, or thinking it necessary to sustain "eternal truth" by the adventitious aid of the doings of frail man, still an advertisement like the following, which I cut from the Philadelphia Ledger, has some significance in estimating public opinion on a subject which cannot be chained by the fetters of legal enactments, and which cannot fail to attract attention in an enlightened community, where error has been saddled upon the unsuspecting mind by the common usages of mankind:—

NOTICE.—The House known as the MONUMENT COTTAGE, on BROAD Street, near the Cemetery of same name, will be opened for the reception of visitors on the FIRST DAY of NEXT week, May 3d, erroneously called the Sabbath. Persons visiting the Cemetery, and all walking in that direction, will find it a delightful place to rest and refresh themselves with the things provided. my2-1aw4w*

HEARTLESS WORSHIP.

"Wherefore the Lord said, Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their hearts far from me, and their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men; therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvelous work among this people, even a marvelous work and a wonder; for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid." Isaiah 29: 13, 14.

That spirituality is an essential to acceptable worship, is a truth taught so frequently and plainly in the Bible, that none but those who are disposed to pervert the obvious import of the word of God will deny the indispensable necessity of it. That it should be practically regarded as unessential in a part of Christian worship, by any church favored with a correct version of the Scriptures, is a matter so astonishing, that we could hardly be persuaded to believe it, did it not exist under our immediate observation. But the existence of this error at the present time, with its corrupting and palyzing influence upon the church, its deceptive influence upon the impenitent, and its offensiveness to God, are so apparent, that I need offer no other apology for calling attention to the subject.

The prominent sentiment of the words of the Prophet at the head of this article is this, That addresses to God, whether expressing prayer or praise, without corresponding emotions of the heart, are wrong, and merit the rebuke and judgment of the Almighty. A heartless rehearsal of sacred songs does in no degree fulfill our obligation to praise the Lord. Such worship is incompatible with the nature of Him to whom it is professedly rendered. It is a false address to Deity. God is the Creator of all things and "for his own pleasure they are and were created;" consequently he is the absolute governor and sovereign disposer of all beings and events; and being possessed of all true goodness and excellence, we are bound by every law of reason and propriety, as well as by the law which he in accordance with his rightful prerogative hath given us, to honor, love, and serve him. Praise is the offspring of admiration, reverence and love; we cannot praise that in which we discover no excellence. If we see no beauty in Christ that we should desire him—no efficacy in the Holy Spirit that we should seek it—no authority in God's Law that we should regard it—how can we sincerely praise the triune God?

"God is a Spirit," and that is the reason he gives why he requires spiritual worship. Were he a material being, possessed of limited perception and knowledge as man, then might he like man be deceived by a fair and false address. But he is a Spirit, omnipotent and omniscient. He sees every heart, and surveys minutely the secret springs of action. He knoweth every thought of every heart, and perfectly "understandeth them afar off." "From him no secret can be hid," and he requires of his intelligent creatures the homage of their hearts, and the first fruits of their affections. And it well becometh dependent creatures to honor and revere the independent Creator—to love and praise the source of all their enjoyments. How then must the great and glorious God regard those who say with their voices, "OLord, we praise thee," while in their hearts hatred to God and his law reign with unbroken sway—who with a playful profanity of his holy name, make mockery their amusement, or think to deceive Omniscience by false professions of reverence, or to charm the Almighty by musical tones and a fair exterior? The man who falsely compliments his fellow man by declarations of respect and friendship, while he cherishes bitter enmity against him, adds to the sin of hatred that of base falsehood; so the insincere worshiper fulfills in no degree his obligation to God, but enhances his guilt by lying to Jehovah. The blessed Saviour has said, "They that worship the Father must worship him in spirit and in truth;" therefore all addresses to God which are destitute of these characteristics, are not accepted by him.

"Tis not in artful measures, in the chime
And idle tinkling of a minstrel's lyre,
To charm His ear whose eye is on the heart!"

Again—Heartless worship is evil in its effects. it produces wrong sentiments in those who practice it. The impenitent man who is encouraged by Christians to conduct a department of public worship, and to express sentiments in that performance which are opposed to his known principles, is virtually taught that these externals comprise all that is essential to Christian worship. And as he is often commended or paid for these services, he imbibes the opinion that the main object of rehearsing songs of praise in the sanctuary, is to gratify the audience with harmonious sounds, and attract others who would not be attracted by an exhibition of the Gospel, and that this he can accomplish more effectually than Christians themselves. Its tendency is to substitute forms for spirituality, and manner for matter. Said Dr. Bacon, "Let the orchestra become the place for the exhibition of music, and the pulpit will be likely to become the place for the exhibition of eloquence, and the pews (why not say boxes?) the place for the display of elegance and fashion," &c. Although the evil results of this heartless worship abound among us, yet the moral blindness which it has produced has effectually destroyed the wisdom of the wise and hidden the understanding of the prudent, that they see not the evil, and so the words of the Prophet are fulfilled in us. GORDON.

Stonington, Conn., May 13th, 1846.

Rev. Dr. Hewett, son of Rev. Dr. Hewett, of Bridgeport, Conn., says the New-Haven Courier, has suddenly renounced his allegiance to the Episcopal Church in Maryland, and gone over to the Romish Church.

THE NEW VOLUME—NEW SUBSCRIBERS.—Three numbers more will complete the second volume of the Sabbath Recorder. We are making arrangements to bring out the third volume in an entire new dress, and under circumstances which will greatly increase the interest and value of the paper. No pains shall be spared on our part to render it all that its warmest friends desire. And now we have one request to present to those who would see the Recorder live and flourish, which is, that they will make an immediate effort to increase the number of our subscribers and readers. It is a hard task, at best, to sustain a denominational paper; and that task is greatly increased when the friends of the enterprise fail to give it their hearty and active co-operation. But if each person who ought to feel the same interest with ourselves in sustaining the paper, would make a little exertion for that object, there would be no difficulty. Brethren and Friends, will you do it? We hope to hear from you before the commencement of the new volume.

INFANT BAPTISM.—The Methodist New-England Conference, at a recent session in Boston, passed a preamble and resolution setting forth "that the practice of infant baptism is divinely authorized and attended with good to our children," but, that "there is a growing and painful neglect of this apostolic practice," therefore, "that the members of this Conference be respectfully solicited to preach upon the subject of infant baptism, and use their influence to revive this appropriate Christian practice by all available means." How very much this resembles some of the resolutions passed in favor of the "Lord's day."

FUNERAL OF MR. TORREY.—The funeral of Rev. Mr. Torrey was celebrated at the Temple in Boston on Monday of last week. The body was deposited in a lower room of the Temple, in a plain coffin, and was an object of interest to an immense crowd of visitors. The funeral services were held in the great hall, which was crowded to discomfort—every aisle of the floor and gallery, as well as every seat, being occupied. After the services commenced, a crowd was continually gathering to enter, while an equal number was ready to escape from the press and heat within. At the conclusion of the services, a procession of carriages was formed, which followed the corpse to Mount Auburn.

TRINITY CHURCH.—The ceremony of consecrating Trinity Church in this city took place on Thursday last. The bishop of Michigan (now acting in the place of Bishop Onderdonk) officiated on the occasion. From the accounts which we have seen, we judge that the ceremony was quite imposing. The music particularly is spoken of as very fine; and one who reads the newspapers of the day would be likely to think it decidedly the most important part of the exercises.

INQUIRIES.—Is the Church a divine institution, or a mere voluntary association of Christ's people? What constitutes one a member of the Church? Is it obligatory on all who believe the Gospel to belong to the Church? Has a member a right to withdraw from the Church whenever he pleases? Has the Church a right to sanction such withdrawal? Will some of your correspondents answer these questions?

A SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST.

A striking incident is related as connected with the exhibition of the Court of Death, which is now at Boston. Many years ago, when it was exhibiting at Albany, a Member of the Assembly, with some friends, went to see it. Upon his first entrance to the room, on casting his eyes in the direction of the fearful array of figures upon the canvass, he was seized with a sudden faintness, fell, and almost instantly expired. To him, indeed, the painting proved, with terrible reality, truly the court of death. How such a circumstance could occur no one can tell, as there is nothing frightful in the painting; on the contrary it is one of the most beautiful pictures ever seen.

Rev. Benjamin Hervey, a Baptist clergyman from Herkimer County, appeared at the Baptist Convention at Brooklyn, in good health, at the age of one hundred and eleven years. He is a long link between the present and the past, and must have been quite a curiosity among the young men of only three score years and ten.

Peter C. Brooks, father-in-law of Edward Everett, and the richest man in Boston, has sent a draft to the Government of Harvard College, for the sum of $10,000, to appropriate for building a new house for the residence of the President of the Institution. The house now occupied by President Everett is situated in a very dusty and noisy quarter of the city, and is very unsuitable for a Presidential mansion.

Robert B. Thomas, the veteran astronomer, who for a period of 54 years has published a popular almanac, under the title of the Farmer's Almanac, died at West Boylston. A copy of the next Almanac has been furnished to the publishers, who will publish it under an arrangement made with the author.

The people of Indiana have so modified the license law as to prohibit the sale of strong drink unless a majority of the voters in a township vote or petition for it. This throws the labor of sustaining licenses upon the rum-drinking part of the community.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

The most important business before the Senate last week related to the extension of jurisdiction over Oregon. The Committee on Territories made a report that it was not expedient to move in the matter at this session of Congress. This led to considerable discussion, in the course of which the whole subject of the Oregon Boundary was gone over. Mr. Benton was in the midst of a lengthy speech when the Senate adjourned until Monday. The bill repealing the limitation of the present naval force to 7,500 men was passed by the Senate. A remonstrance was presented from the people of the District of Columbia against the retrocession of Alexandria to Virginia.

In the House of Representatives, the Committee reported a bill for extending our laws over Oregon, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of that bill. Mr. King of Georgia, from the Committee on Naval affairs, reported a bill for building twelve iron war steamers and one iron war frigate; the steamers to range from 1200 to 1600 tons, and carry six guns of twelve inch calibre, and two or more smaller guns. The frigate to carry sixty heavy guns. The bill also recommended the acceptance of Bergen's proposal to build said vessels, and appropriates five millions for the purpose.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

The following important news from the seat of war was published in the New-York papers of Monday morning, May 25. The principal facts may probably be relied upon:—

There have been two engagements between General Taylor and the Mexican troops; the first occurring on the 7th inst., when General Taylor was returning from Point Isabel to his Camp opposite Metamoros, in which the Mexicans, numbering from 5,000 to 7,000, were repulsed. The spot where the Americans lay one night became a battle field the next day, and upwards of 200 Mexicans were found dead upon the same spot the next morning.

The second battle took place on the 9th inst., commencing at 3½ o'clock, P. M., within three miles of General Taylor's camp. The action was on the edge of a ravine, and one mile from the Chapporal, which was near twelve miles in width. The Mexicans commenced the action with their artillery, which was posted so as to sweep a narrow passge, through which General Taylor was advancing. There being a swamp on the other hand, General Taylor immediately ordered a charge in the teeth of the enemy's destructive fire, and the troops promptly responding, carried the enemy's guns at the point of the bayonet. So sudden and impetuous was the attack, that General Arista had not time to save his papers, which with all his correspondence, fell into the hands of General Taylor. The action lasted one hour and a half, in which time 600 Mexicans were killed or wounded, and the Americans took 300 prisoners and 8 pieces of artillery. The Americans lost in the action about 62 killed and wounded. Among the killed were Col. McIntosh, Lieut. Cochran by the bursting of a shell, Lieut. Inge, and one or two others, whose names are not given. Col. Kane, Lieutenants Gates, Verbank, Hore, Luther and others, were among the wounded.

We regret to say that Maj. Ringgold, who was wounded on the 6th inst., died on the 10th, and was buried with military honors.

The total loss of the Mexicans in both actions was at least 1200.

The Mexican forces amounted to at least 6,000 men.

An exchange of prisoners took place subsequent to the battle, by which Capt. Thornton and Lieuts. Hardee and Kane were released. Lieut. Deas was not demanded.

Among the prisoners taken by Gen. Taylor, was Gen. Vega. For him two American officers were offered in exchange, but it was declined to give him save in exchange for an officer of equal rank whenever one should be taken.

The Mexican Army were so confident of victory, that every preparation had been made to celebrate it, but all preparations fell into the hands of the Americans.

In their flight many of the Mexicans took to the river and were drowned in their attempt to swim it.

Farther information has been received that the American Consul and all the American residents at Matamoros have been arrest and sent to Saltill, a small town about 130 miles from Matamoros.

FARTHER WAR ITEMS.

A great War Meeting was held in the Park in this city on Wednesday evening of last week, at which resolutions were passed approving the measures which have been taken to carry on the war with Mexico, expressing thanks to General Taylor and those under his command, &c.

Official dispatches have been received at Washington from General Taylor, confirming the account of the great battle near Metamoras.

The town of Matamoras, destroyed by the Americans, is said to be about the size of Wilmington, Delaware.

Fifty-seven Volunteers at Columbia, Ga., with the name of J. S. Calhoun, Editor of the Enquirer, at the head of the list, have tendered their services to Gen. Gaines, to march to Mexico at a moment's warning.

The correspondent of the U. S. Gazette says that about fifty Members of Congress have applied to the President for appointments either for themselves or their relatives, in the army, and that there are an immense number of patriotic officers to serve the country, upon condition of having a commission.

It is said that there is an unusually large number of persons seen in the streets of the city of New Orleans with their arms in slings. The Picayune wonders if the drafting has anything to do with it.

The New Orleans Delta of the 13th inst. says: —"It is with no small degree of satisfaction that we are enabled to announce that volunteers are pouring in from all quarters, and the idea of resorting to a draft is abandoned. Yesterday no less than 347 volunteers came in from different towns in the State, and the full compliment of four regiments required from this State under the requisition of Gen. Taylor, will soon be filled up, and we doubt not double the number. The various recruiting officers in this city are also obtaining hourly accessions to their numbers."

We learn from Watervliet that the Government has 200,000 muskets at that place, now ready for shipment at a moment's notice; and that there are also 800,000 in the various depots, independent of the State armories, which contain from 300,000 to 400,000 more. There need not, therefore, be much fear of a scarcity of guns.

Applications continue to pour in upon the President from volunteers, who are anxious to serve their country. Among them is the Hibernia Jackson Guards, a company from the sixth division of Pennsylvania militia. Fayette Guards, from Brownsville, Pa. A full regiment, equipped fully, tendered by Gov. Shunk, of Pa. The President has also had an offer of one regiment of mounted Cherokees, tendered by S. Watie. A volunteer company from Fredericksburg, offered by Mr. Willis; and several other applications.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamer Britannia reached Boston on Thursday last, bringing Liverpool papers to the 4th inst.

The Cotton market stood firm; the Share market was recovering its tone; the Corn trade was in a very unsatisfactory condition, on account of the unsettled state of the Tariff, the House of Lords not having acted on the new bill; the Money market was easier. The Oregon Question remained in statu quo, the general opinion being in favor of a settlement on the parallel of 49°.

Large quantities of American Provisions find their way to England by almost every arrival. With an anticipated scarcity of bread stuffs, the records of the barrels of flour and of beef which cross the Atlantic at the present time are duly paraded in the columns of the daily press. They point a moral of gratifying character; for when the restrictions which have hitherto impeded that branch of commerce are removed—as removed they will be—it is impossible to guage the extent to which the provision trade between England and America will be carried. At present there are upward of 400,000 barrels under lock in Liverpool, all of which will be removed at the low duty when the Corn Bill becomes law.

The accounts from various parts of Ireland give painful evidence of the existing distress. Many of the districts are suffering the horrors of famine, and fever is on the increase. The Ballinasloe Advertiser states that the district hospital in that town is very crowded. There are many fever cases. The Galway Mercury gives an account of a relief meeting in that district, where the sum subscribed was totally inadequate to the emergency of the evil. In Mallow, fears of an outbreak have been general. In Clogheen, oatmeal and coarse flour had been distributed to above 1000 starving creatures. In Waterford the respectable sum of £850 had been subscribed in one day, and other sums had since been added. In Tralee, money had been raised and provisions distributed to the famishing populace. The accounts from the districts on the south and south-west are nearly uniform in their statements of the destitution, and apprehensive for the continuance of the peace.

Emigration from Ireland to the continent of North America is proceeding on a large scale. A vessel left Limerick a few days ago with 420 emigrants for Canada, 40 of whom had their passage paid by their landlord. Another vessel is about sailing from the same port with 120 emigrants for Quebec.

The North of Portugal has been the scene of an insurrectionary movement, originating with the wine-growers, who have risen against the exactions of the government. The country has been put under martial law. The insurgents numbered between 3,000 and 4,000; they showed some courage, but were imperfectly armed. The constitution was suspended on the 20th ult., the liberty of the press was suspended, and military tribunals or the trials of the disaffected had been instituted. If the movement had been more general, it would have seriously embarrassed, perhaps overthrown the government.

The attempt on the life of Louis Phillippe seems to have made that monarch more estimable than ever in the minds of his countrymen.

The Britannia brought out five Friendly International Addresses from different towns and cities in England to the same number of cities in the United States. The most remarkable of these addresses is one from the women of Exeter to the women of Philadelphia, signed by sixteen hundred of the fair country women.

The Prussian Government have stopped all proceedings against Ronge.

The winter which was so unusually mild in England, has been succeeded by a cold and dangerous spring.

The poor in the Highlands of Scotland are said to be in a state of great destitution.

Letters received from Algiers state that Abd-el-Kader had once more outwitted the French Generals.

The number of German emigrants on their way to the Atlantic ports this season had been estimated at 80,000.

Large quantities of Clover seed from the United States have been imported in Holland and other European countries.

DROUGHT AND FAMINE IN NORTHERN BRAZIL.—A letter received by a gentleman in this city, dated Aracaty, Feb. 20, gives a heart-rending description of the sufferings of the inhabitants of portions of Northern Brazil. At Aracaty, in consequence of the protracted drought, the trees were withering, and the people were famishing for want of food. The writer says—"Should the drought continue until May or June we shall have few persons left her. They have already begun to flock to Pernambuco, the capitol; and if opportunity offers, all that remain will immediately follow." The writer was at Ico Feb. 9, and he there saw families who a short time since enjoyed abundance begging from door to door. "They appeared," he remarks, "more like skeletons than any thing else. Many were dying in the streets, of want, daily; and the deaths were so numerous that the amount of mortality could not be estimated." Articles of first necessity had risen to an exhorbitant price. A quarter of flour (half a bushel) could not be obtained for less than 24 millreas, or $12; and biscuits, weighing half an ounce, sold for 30 reas, or one cent and a half each. Salt, which a short time previous was selling at 8 millreas, was held at 16 millreas. In the districts of Inhamum, Crato, the province of Parahyca, and the neighboring country, excepting the sea coast, the distress was great beyond description, and the inhabitants were perishing of hunger in all directions. [Baltimore American.

THE CHOLERA.—This destructive scourge of humanity seems once more on its way to ravage the continent of Europe, originating, as before, in the heart of Asia, Northern Persia being the first quarter in which it was noticed; it is gradually approaching the confines of Europe. The chief cities of Persia already count by thousands the number of their dead who have fallen victims to Asiatic cholera. The line of route taken by it appears to be almost due West, for it attacked in singular succession the cities of Bokhara, Herat, Meshed, Teheran and Ispahan, while recent accounts from Odessa state that two or three cases of Asiatic cholera had been observed at Tiflis. Should it continue to advance at its present rate, it may be looked for in Eastern Europe in a very short time. Indeed, it is stated from Riga that it has already broken out at Orenberg and Kasan, and that several persons at St. Petersburg have been attacked by the influenza, a disease that usually precedes the cholera; proper precautionary measures ought, therefore, to be taken to check the progress of the cholera in due time, for arriving as it will in the middle of summer, the season most favorable for its development and propagation, the consequence in the densely crowded towns and cities of the continent will be awful. VOLUNTEERS.—The following is the enrollment of troops ordered by the Executive in the several States, and mustering eighty-six regiments and a half. At the average of five hundred men in a regiment, this will give you the number of 43,250. If the companies are full, the force will be equal to and beyond the fifty thousand men ordered by Congress:

SUMMARY.

A Mr. Swartz, of St. Louis, has discovered a new varnish for oil paintings or paper, which may be laid on a dozen times, then rubbed down and polished like a mirror, retaining all the while its limpid and colorless translucency. The Chinese use something very similar.

Massachusetts has paid as bounty, $115,816 71, to the several Agricultural Societies in that State, since their formation. The number now incorporated is ten, viz. the Massachusetts, incorporated in 1792, the Middlesex Husbandmen and Manufacturers, in 1803, the Berkshire, in 1811, the Hampshire, Franklyn and Hampden, in 1818, the Worcester in 1818, the Essex, in 1818, the Plymouth, in 1819, the Bristol, in 1823, the Hampden, in 1844, and the Barnstable in 1844.

A letter from St. Petersburgh states that Professor Jacob, of the Imperial Academy, has just communicated to that body, the invention of an electrophonic telegraph, composed of ten keys, ten different words, and ten conducting wires, by which the letters of the alphabet and words can be expressed by means of sound. The academy has pronounced a favorable opinion of the invention.

A correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, writing from Austin, Texas, under date of March 30th, says butter is selling at 37½ cents, and cheese 40 cents per pound in that city. The profits of raising neat cattle in that region are described as very great. Austin is surrounded by fine mountain scenery, and is remarkably healthy.

The fossil remains of animals, not now in existence, entoombed in solid rocks, present us with durable monuments of the great revolutions which the earth has undergone at remote periods of time, and open to us a new page for our study and investigation in the great book of nature.

A prize of 50 Guineas, ($250,) which was offered in Great Britain for the best essay upon a branch of Agricultural Chemistry, has been awarded to Mr. John Pitkin Norton, of Farmington in Ct., a son of John T. Norton Esq.

The Boston Traveler states that a gentleman in Essex county has recently imported a kind of grass seed which is said to have yielded, in a single season, five clippings, an aggregate length of twenty-eight feet.

Major Jesse Buel presented the Albany Journal with an egg taken from the nest of a black Poland hen, which measures eight and a half inches by six and three quarters, and weighs four ounces.

The Mexican army on the Rio Grande is officered by many English, French, and other Europeans.

The remains of Dr. Houghton, State Geologist of Michigan, who was drowned in the Lake nearly six months ago, were recently found. Funeral services were held at Detroit, and attended by a large concourse of citizens.

A correspondent of the New-York Tribune, under date of May 21, says:—"The Great National Fair opened to-day at 12 o'clock, with the ringing of the great bell, which was raised for the occasion, the firing of cannon, the display of flags, and music by the band. The Fair realizes all that has been expected. The crowd of people visiting it is immense."

The Southern Methodist Conference has determined to locate its Book Concerns, one at Richmond, Va., and the other at Louisville, Ky.

The Chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in the Senate, declared, in his place on Tuesday, that no change was contemplated in the Rates of Postage. This announcement will be received with general satisfaction in every part of the country. Our Post Office Law, when next altered, will no doubt be so amended as to make Postage still cheaper.

On Thursday, May 7, the town of Grenada, Miss., was almost swept away by a terrible tornado. Eighteen persons were killed, and as many others wounded.

The Cherokee delegations to Washington have been singularly unfortunate this year. The National Intelligencer announces the death of another member, Captain John Looney, on Friday of last week, about 70 years of age. He is spoken of as a brave, honest, and good man, and a firm friend of the whites. He served under General Jackson in the Seminole war, and was wounded, for which he received a pension for life from the Government of the United States.

The Milwaukie Courier says, that at the recent Election, a very large majority of the people of Wisconsin declared in favor of a State Government. Wisconsin, therefore, will be represented in the next Congress by two Senators and two Representatives.

A large portion of the one dollar notes on the Albany Exchange Bank, now in circulation, are counterfeit. The only safety is in refusing all one dollar notes on this bank having for a vignette a female and a child standing by her side.

The telegraphic communication between New-Haven and Boston is now complete. A few days are needed to test the work, after the expiration of which the lightning will jump astride the wires and shoot back and forth between the two cities, entirely at the will of a single individual at each end of this "highway of thought."

Newfoundland papers state that the Seal Fishery had proved very unsuccessful this season; only 80,000 seals had arrived up to the 27th of April. Several vessels have been lost in the ice. The Insurance Offices at St. Johns had ascertained their losses to be $40,000 in that trade alone.

A private letter from Richmond, Va., dated 17th inst. says:—"We had a negro insurrection here a few days since, a few miles from the city. They were to march to the city and take the banks and all the cash, but they were not quite quick enough. About a dozen were arrested, and they will put a rope round their necks by way of a pattern."

Henry Boylard was seriously injured by being shot in the face by one of the cannon during the firing in the Park on Wednesday, at the great mass meeting.

A wretch named Wm. Hudson, living in Pendleton County, Va., recently murdered his wife and two children and maimed four others; the lives of two of the latter were despaired of. He surrendered himself soon afterwards, and, in reply to an inquiry, said that he committed the deed in a fit of passion occasioned by improper conduct on the part of his wife.

Mr. Devyr, Editor of The Anti-Renter, has had a verdict of $500 rendered against him at Catskill, for an alledged libel on the professional and personal character of Mitchell Sanford, Esq., who was one of the counsel for the prisoners in the Anti-Rent trials at Delhi.

Albert J. Tirrell, acquitted of the murder of Maria A. Bickford, has pleaded guilty of the crimes of adultery and lascivious cohabitation with her, for which the penalty is six years in the State Prison.

The notes of the White Plains Bank are 25 per cent. discount; and the Farmers' and Drovers' Bank of Buffalo, 10 per cent. discount.

A young man named Esta Brooks, a teacher of music, committed suicide at Binghampton, a few days since. He had become involved in difficulties in Pennsylvania, and was obliged to marry contrary to his will, to evade the punishment of breach of promise.

Letters have been received announcing the total loss of the brig Falco on the coast of New-Zealand, and an attack made on her crew, and the plundering of her cargo by the natives.

A New-Haven correspondent of the New-York Express says, that the Rev. Albert Barnes of Philadelphia, is the favorite candidate for the Presidency of Yale College.

Lavater says, 'He who sedulously attends, pointedly asks, calmly speaks, coolly answers, and ceases when he has no more to say, is in possession of some of the best requisites for man.'

Carriages built entirely of iron are becoming fashionable in Paris, France.

It is said that if a corpse when laid out is placed with the body nearly erect, or in an angle of forty-five degrees, the natural features may be much more effectually preserved than when left in the usual horizontal posture, and in this way the body may be carried a great distance without change.

Four-score Lowell girls have gone to the Washington Fair, where they will take part in exhibiting goods of their own manufacture. If Congress would only vacate the Capitol awhile, and let these girls take charge of the Government looms, the people's cloth would no doubt be better woven.

A gentleman recently returned from the Pacific by way of the Isthmus of Panama, states that 2,000 letters were lying in the Post Office at Panama, directed to various persons, merchants and others, on the Pacific, which could not be forwarded, as the transit postage was not paid.

The gigantic fossil reptile lately dug up in the state of Alabama, is now in Butler's Museum, Utica, N. Y. It is more than 114 feet long, without allowing for the cartilage between the joints.

The actual distance to be sailed from New-York to the mouth of the Columbia river, by way of Cape Horn, is estimated at 15,000 miles. A ship canal to Panama, to be cut through the Isthmus of Darien, which is only 37 miles, would save 8,000 miles or more than one-half the distance, reducing the voyage out and back to less than the time now required to make the passage out. The distance from New-York to the mouth of the Columbia river, by land, is about 2700.

The Chinese are fond of long finger-nails—they have been seen seventeen inches long. To preserve them they sometimes bind them up carefully between slips of bamboo.

MARRIED,

In Whitestown, Thursday morning, May 14, by Pres. Green, Mr. FLETCHER G. JELLIFF, of Newark, N. J., to Miss MARY W., daughter of Reuben Wilcox, Jr., of Whitestown.

In Alfred, N. Y., April 22d, by Elder N. V. Hull, Mr. AMOS MARYOTT, of Genesee, to Miss BETSEY STEVENS, of Alfred.

Also, by the same, May 4, Mr. WILLIAM H. MUROE to Miss SARAH ANN HUMPHREY, all of Alfred.

In Genesee, N. Y., April 26th, by Elder H. P. Green, Mr. JAMES R. GREENMAN, of Hebron, Pa., to Miss FANNY BABCOCK, of the former place.

In Clara, Potter Co., Pa., March 23d, by Elder Rowse Babcock, Mr. ANSON SMITH to Miss POLLY FOSMER.

In Charlestown, R. I., March 3d, by Elder A. B. Burdick, Mr. FRANKLIN COTTRELL, of Hopkinton, to Miss SARAH A. TAYLOR, of Charlestown.

Also, by the same, in Hopkinton, March 11th, Mr. BRADFORD H. BARBER, of Hopkinton, to Miss FANNY MATTESON, of West Greenwich, R. I.

DIED,

In the town of Oswayo, Potter Co., Pa., on the 9th inst., CHARLES BRIZZEE, about 30 years of age. He died with a firm hope in Christ. Text, "Set thine house in order," &c. R. B.

In Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., May 9th, 1846, of a cancer, LUCY GREENE, wife of Elder Henry P. Greene, in the forty-fifth year of her age. The deceased was a member of the First Seventh-day Baptist church in Genesee. For more than six months she endured much severe pain, which she bore with patient resignation to her Divine Redeemer. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the Sabbath, we trust her happy spirit took its flight to join the Church triumphant above. J. B.

In the town of Ulysses, Potter Co., Pa., on the 22d day of march last, THOMAS HALLOCK, in the 65th year of his age. Brother Hallock was formerly a member of the First-day Baptist Church; but having his mind called up to the subject of the Sabbath, he was one of the first in that town to embrace and practice upon the claims of God's Word. When the Seventh-day Baptist church in that place was organized, he enrolled himself with that little band, to obey God in all his commandments. He remained until death a faithful, consistent, and active Christian, adorning the profession which he had made by a godly walk and conversation, and an honor to the church and society of which he was a member, and a firm advocate for the "faith once delivered to the Saints." He has left a number of relatives behind to mourn their loss. In his last days he often requested his brethren not to pray for long life to be given him, as he had by faith the prospect of Heaven full in view. Sermon by the writer from 2 Timothy iv. 7, 8, "I have fought a good fight," &c. R. B.

CLING TO THY MOTHER.

BY GEO. W. BETHUNE.

Cling to thy mother; for she was the first
To know thy being, and to feel thy life;
The hope of thee through many a pang she must;
And, when midst anguish like the parting strife,
Her babe was in her arms, the agony
Was all forgot, for bliss of loving thee.

Be gentle to thy mother; long she bore
Thine infant fretfulness and silly youth;
Nor rudely scorn the faithful voice that o'er
Thy cradle prayed, and taught thy lisping truth.
Yes, she is old; yet on thy manly brow
She looks, and claims thee as her child e'en now.

Uphold thy mother; close to her warm heart
She carried, fed thee, lulled thee to thy rest;
Then taught thy tottering limbs their untried art,
Exulting in the fledging from her nest;
And, now her steps are feeble, be her stay,
Whose strength was thine, in thy most feeble day.

Cherish thy mother; brief perchance the time
May be, that she will claim the care she gave;
Passed are her hopes of youth, her harvest-prime
Of joy on earth; her friends are in the grave;
But for her children, she could lay her head
Gladly to rest among the precious dead.

Be tender with thy mother; words unkind,
Or light neglect from thee, will give a pang
To that fond, bosom where thou art enshrined
In love unutterable, more than pang
Of venomed serpent.* Wound not her strong trust,
As thou wouldst hope for peace when she is dust!

O mother mine! God grant I ne'er forget,
Whatever be my grief, or what my joy,
The unmeasured, unextinguishable debt
I owe thy love; but find my sweet employ,
Ever through thy remaining days, to be
To thee as faithful as thou wert to me.

*"How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is,
To have a thankless child!" [Lear.

OBLIGATIONS OF LITERARY MEN TO THE BIBLE.

BY REV. DR. SPRING.

English literature is no common debtor to the Bible. In what department of English literature may not the difference be discovered between the spirit and sentiments of Christian writers and those who have drawn all their materials of thought and of ornament from Pagan writers? In the language of an anonymous writer, "Not to say that antiquity furnishes an example of a philosopher who could think like Newton; or a moralist who could illustrate human obligation like Edwards or Johnson, we find a proof of the superiority of Christian principles even in those works of imagination which are deemed scarcely susceptible of influence from religion. The common romance and the novel, with all their fooleries and ravings, would be more contemptible than they are, did they not sometimes, undesignedly, catch a conception, or adorn a character from the rich treasury of revelation. And the more splendid fictions of the poet derive their highest charm from the evangelical philanthropy, tenderness, and sublimity that invest them. But for the Bible, Homer and Milton might have stood upon the same shelf, equals in morality, as they are competitors for renown. Young had been ranked with Juvenal; and Cowper had united with Horace and with Ovid to swell the tide of voluptuousness."

There is not a finer character, nor a finer description, in all the works of Walter Scott, than that of Rebekah in Ivanhoe. And who does not see that it owes its excellence to the Bible? Shakspeare, Byron and Southey, are not a little indebted for some of their best scenes and inspirations to the same source. At the suggestion of a valued friend, I have turned my thoughts to the parallel between Macbeth and Ahab—between Lady Macbeth and Jezebel—between the announcement to Macbeth of the murder of his family, and that to David of the death of Absalom by Joab—to the parallel between the opening of the Lamentations of Jeremiah and Byron's apostrophe to Rome as the Niobe of nations—to the parallel between his ode to Napoleon and Isaiah's ode on the fall of Sennacherib—and also to the resemblance between Southey's chariot of Carmala in the curse of Kehama, and Ezekiel's vision of the wheels, and have been forcibly impressed with the obligations of this class of writers to the sacred Scriptures.

May it not be doubted whether scholars have been sufficiently sensible of their obligations to our common English Bible. It is the purest specimen of English or Anglo Saxon to be found in the world. It was made by the order of James I. in 1607, by forty-seven of the most able and learned men of Westminster, Oxford, and Cambridge. It has stood the test of two hundred and thirty years experience, and is a noble monument of the integrity, fidelity, and learning of its venerable translators. Addison remarks, "There is a certain coldness in the phrases of European languages, compared with the oriental forms of speech. The English tongue has received innumerable improvements from an infusion of Hebraisms, derived out of the practical passages in Holy Writ. They warm and animate our language, give it force, energy, and convey our thoughts in ardent and intense phrases. There is something in this kind of diction, that often sets the mind in a flame, and makes our hearts burn within us." Nor has it been at all improved by American Philologists. Was it too much for a learned Commentator to say, "Our translators have not only made a standard translation; but they have made their translation the standard of our language. The English tongue in their day was not equal to such a work. But God enabled them to stand as upon Mount Sinai, and crane up their country's language to the dignity of the originals; so that after the lapse of two hundred years, the English Bible, with very few exceptions, is the standard of the purity and excellence of the English tongue."

SILENCE OF THE PULPIT.

Can the pulpit be silent in regard to any prevailing sin, and not share in the responsibility of that sin? Let the following fact, from the Indiana Freeman, answer:

Judge Stevens related, at the Westfield Convention, a conversation that he had recently held with a Virginian on the subject of slavery. After a pretty long argument the Virginian finally said: "Sir, I know you are mistaken—I know that slavery is not wrong—I know that it is sanctioned by the Bible, for I have been a member of a church for thirty years, and heard a thousand ministers preach, and although they preached against every conceivable sin, none of them ever hinted that holding slaves was unchristian."

THE BEAUTIFUL.

Come in the calmness of the twilight hour, when the zephyrs gently play among the branches of the waving trees—when the birds are carolling their evening songs—and muse upon earth's beautiful objects. All nature is lovely, from the blue sky above us, to the springing grass beneath our feet; from the mighty ocean, to the rippling streamlet passing gently by among the shrubbery. And charming, indeed, is the cool fragrant air of morn, and the gentle breezes of evening.—The sparkling rays of the sun, and the pale silvery beams of the moon and stars, as they lend their influence to illuminate our earth, are alike beautiful. Even the birds of the air, as they tune their sweet voices, teach us a lesson of cheerfulness—inspire within our breasts a love of the beautiful. The rosy dimple-cheeked child, enjoying its innocent plays—the ruddy, noble-spirited youth, and even the aged, with heads already blossomed for the grave, each feel that life has some sunny spots—some halcyon days. Some may tell of the disappointments, the partings, the bitter tears; they may tell of death, and the grave, but you who are good, say, is not this a happy world of ours, after all? Do you not remember some bright, joyous days, when the world seemed as one pleasant dream, and no cloud dimmed the clear sky of hope and prosperity? Does not memory recall the innocent sports of childhood, the happy hours spent with young companions, and the kind friends who hovered around us, strewing our path with the flowers of tenderness and affection? Think of the pleasant smiles, the hours of sweet communion with the loving ones of earth, and then join in the song of all nature, that beauty dwells in every path.—Ye who say it is a bitter, cruel word, think, O! think again—gaze on all life's attractive objects, taste the sweet pleasures of a well-spent life, and joyous will be your meditations, calm and serene your spirits. Life will pass as a pleasant dream, and death will only be a passport to a more genial clime—angels will waft your spirit, on their glittering wings, to the Elysian fields above, and there the soft strains of music shall forever fall in sweet accents on your ear!—Boston Star.

OLD AND NEW STYLE.

The Julian year, introduced by Julius Cæsar, 45 years before the birth of Christ, made every fourth year, without exception, a leap year. This, however, was an over correction; for it supposed the length of the tropical year to be 655 1-2 days, which is too great, and induces an error of 7 days in 900 years. Accordingly, as early as the year 1414, it was perceived that the equinoxes were gradually moving from the 21st of March and September, where they ought always to have fallen had the Julian year been exact. A new reform of the calendar was thus required; and it took place under the popedom of Gregory XIII., by the omission of ten nominal days after the 4th of October, 1582, so that the next day was called the 15th and not the 5th. This change was immediately adopted in all Roman Catholic countries, but tardily in the countries of Protestantism.

In England, the change of style, as it was called, took place after the 2d day of September, 1752, eleven nominal days being then struck out; so that the last day of Old Style being the 3d, the first of the new style, (the next day,) was called the 14th instead of the 3d. The same legislative enactment which established the Gregorian year in England in 1752, shortened the preceding year, 1751, by a full quarter. Previous to that time the year was held to begin with the 25th of March, and the year 1751 accordingly did so; but that year was not suffered to run out, being supplanted on the first of January by the year 1752, which it was enacted should commence on that day.

Russia is now the only country in Europe in which the Old Style is still adhered to, and the difference between the other European and Russian dates amounts, at present, to about two weeks.

LOVELINESS OF EARLY PIETY.

The loveliness of early piety is well illustrated in the composure with which the happy subject meets the approach of death. To see the elastic form of youth tottering to the grave, robbed by disease of the bloom of health, a sure prey to the destroyer of man, is a painful scene to look upon. It starts an involuntary pang in the bosom of friends. They mourn at the prospect of losing youth, beauty, and virtue, while the dying child of God rejoices in hopes of gaining immortal bliss. These thoughts are suggested by the recent death of a young female member of the Boston Wesleyan church.

Emiline Cobb, adopted daughter of William and Mary G. Felt, was 18 in February last. Another month passed away and she had ceased to live. One year previous she had been convinced of the need of a personal interest in the Saviour, and was blessed with the sense of the Divine favor and rejoiced in God's pardoning love. She was distinguished by a quiet demeanor; steady and consistent piety. She lived beloved. Her end was peaceful. Confined to her chamber for weeks she was enabled to testify to many friends how valuable is early piety, and how happy is the pious dying youth.

I attended her, with other Christian friends, at her request, and administered the Lord's supper for the last time, while weeping friends kneeled around her bed. O, it was a solemn hour. Approaching her bed side to take my leave, she looked up with an unnatural brilliancy gleaming from her eye, and said in a full but triumphant tone, "I am weak and growing weaker, but, Oh, I am happy, happy, happy!" When I called again she lay within her coffin, a silent clay cold corpse.

Absence from the city had prevented me from calling on her again after the solemn hour spent in the communion season. But I heard from those who hovered over her couch what were the breathings of her soul. The day she died she said while lying so quietly, that her foster mother thought she had expired, but on approaching her bedside and speaking to her, she roused up from a sort of lethargy and exclaimed, "Oh! I thought that I was gone. Why did you call me back? Oh such a sight as I have seen. Such a sight!" And as they wept she said, "Why weep, I'll not be gone long. You'll all come soon!"

A glance of the celestial city had been granted her, and she felt that to "depart and be with Christ is far better." The last words she uttered audibly were these, "Oh! I am going, going to be with Jesus, with Jesus!"

Reader, this youthful Christian was amiable and virtuous before her conversion. On these she dare not rely. You may not trust to your goodness for strength to meet your dying hour. Look to Jesus. Claim his friendship. Seek his blessing. L. C. MATLACK.

Boston, April 28, 1846.

"CONTENTED AND HAPPY."

Brother Houck has sent us the following advertisement with a request that we should publish it, saying a friend had just forwarded it to him from the South. This is a great country where "remarkably neat well looking" women are advertised after this manner. How perverse and ungrateful she must be to run away "without the slightest provocation?" More, how very benevolent this slaveholder must be to look after the interests of such an unthankful being, even offering one hundred dollars to secure her return to the enjoyment of that "kindness and humanity" from which she fled! [Tr. Wes.

ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS REWARD.

The above reward will be given for the apprehension and delivery to me of my servant woman Sophia. She left my residence, at Annapolis, Maryland, on Sunday evening, the 5th inst., and traveled in the Cars to the City of Washington, and went to the house of her mother, who is a free woman, named Margaret Lee, residing next door to a blacksmith shop, at the corner of L street south, and 3d street east, street near the navy yard. Sophia was at her mother's house until 4 o'clock on Monday, the 6th inst., at which time her mother states she left her house in a hack, alleging that she intended to return by the cars to Annapolis. She has not been since heard of, and is either secreted in the city of Washington, or has gone in the hack, in which she left her mother's house, towards the Pennsylvania line. I have no doubt that her intention is to go to some free State, as she left my house without the slightest provocation, and has always been treated with kindness and humanity.

Sophia is a remarkable neat well looking mulatto woman, rather under the usual size, of about 28 years of age, and converses with unusual ease and accuracy for a servant. She took with her a large trunk and a variety of clothing of the very best quality.

THOMAS G. PRATT.

Annapolis, April 7th, 1846.

GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE M. P. CHURCH.

A paper of instructions to the Indiania delegation in regard to slavery was decided by the President not to be a memorial.

A memorial from the South Carolina delegation, protesting against any change in the Constitution, especially in regard to the word white, and in regard to the Kane pamphlet, was referred to the Special Committee.

The judiciary committee also, through Mr. De Ford, reported against the memorial of the Michigan Conference requesting that the word white be struck out of the Constitution and the Book of Discipline. The amendment of the Constitution was above the power of the conference, and even in case it was in the power of the conference it would be an infringement of the conference rights.

Rev. J. Clark said that as one of the committee, he would present a counter report. He said that he did not consider the report that was read to be the report of any one else than Mr. De Ford. It was true that the main part of the report was in agreement with the sense of the committee, but the arguments used were not the sense of the committee. He reported that, since the required number of conferences had not joined in the request, the conference had no power to act. Signed by two members of the committee, Rev. J. Clarke, and Rev. R. B. Thompson of Virginia.

Rev. S. M. Short presented a resolution, that there should be a rule inserted making it sinful to buy and sell men, and moved to refer it to the Special Committee.

Rev. J. G. Whitefield of Virginia, moved to lay the whole on the table. He said that the resolution contemplated direct legislation on the subject of slavery, and any such attempt should be put down at once.

Rev. R. B. Thompson of Virginnia, was opposed to laying it on the table; this resolution was one which came exactly in the province of that Committee, add should be referred to it. Having once granted a hearing to the abolitionists, we should hear all they can have to say on every point.

Rev. W. H. Collins of Illinois was in favor of the laying on the table. The action contemplated in the resolution, was as foreign to the matter legally before the conference, as would be the buying and selling of horses, cattle or hogs.

Rev. Mr. Dobbins rose to correct a wrong impression that Charles and John Wesley ever made any such rule. It was an American rule. John Wesley never made any such thing.

Mr. Wesley Starr said that this very matter had been referred already to the committee in the shape of a memorial, and why should they not refer this.

Rev. G. Brown hoped that the committee would be permitted to have all the matter before them which they needed.

Mr. DeFord thought that the resolution was a mere trick. If the ground was already covered, what was the need of such a resolution. We ought to show them that we would suffer no such moves to agitate the conference.

The motion to lay on the table was finally carried, 32 to 29.

Mr. DeFord offered a resolution stringently condemning the course of the abolitionists. Laid on the table without debate.

EXTRAORDINARY FASTING.—We are informed through some of our exchanges of the case of a man in Alexandria, La., who, at last accounts, had for thirty days refused to permit a particle of food or a drop of stimulant to pass his lips. Water, and in small quantities, was the only nourishment taken by him, and he still adhered with great pertinacity to the resolve at first expressed by him, not to seek the benefit of medical aid. During the last few days his pulse has gradually declined in strength, and other marked symptoms presage an approaching dissolution.

The above case, if true, is quite remarkable, but we recollect one more singular than this, for the truth of which we can fully vouch. It is this: Some few years since, a Mr. M———, of Portersville, Conn., under the influence of religious excitement, conceiving it to be his duty to imitate the example of our Saviour and fast forty days, actually performed the same; the only thing which passed his lips during the whole period being cold water, in which a little salt had been dissolved. This, although a remarkable case, is strictly true, and has been attested to by his own family, friends, and by hundreds of individuals, and also by the resident physician of the village.

Although much weakened by protracted fasting, he retained all his faculties during the whole period. When the feat was completed, he commenced taking food in extremely small quantities, under the advice of his physician, and in two or three days was able to walk unassisted a distance of about two miles to the residence of his father. Mr. M——— is a remarkably healthy and abstemious man, unassuming, plain and truly pious; and when we see him, as we frequently do, hale, hearty, and portly, we cannot but remember his extraordinary fast.—Farmer & Mechanic.

AN EDITOR'S LIFE.

Many think the task of editors a very easy one, of mere pleasure and pastime. This might be the case, if they cared not what influence they exerted on their readers. But if they correct vices and follies, they will find much opposition from various quarters. It is not merely the writing of the leading article itself, but the obligations of writing it, whether inclined or not, in sickness or in health, in affliction, distress of mind, winter and summer, year after year, tied down to one task, remaining on one spot. "In itself," as Maryatt says, "it appears nothing—the labor is not manifest; nor is it the labor—it is the continual attention it requires." One number is no sooner corrected and printed, than another comes on. It is an endless drudgery, and is a continual wearing upon the intellect and spirits, demanding all the exertions of the faculties, with little interruption. Look at our weekly routine. While one number is going through the press, the matter for the next must be in process of preparation. On Wednesday, eight days previous to the date of our paper, we must hand in the matter for the first and fourth pages. Then the preparation for the inside is commenced. On Friday the whole of the outside is mostly in type, corrected on Saturday, and the form laid by till Monday and Tuesday. On Friday, or Saturday at furthest, the leading editorials must be handed in to the printer, and the outside matter furnished as far as possible. On Monday, the whole material is prepared and in the printer's hands, except sometimes a few small items of notices, or the like, which can be handed in on Tuesday. On Wednesday, the inside is put to press, and the folders and clerks are busy mailing papers. During the whole week the endless circle of the editor continues and enlarges from year to year."—*N. Y. A NEW DIAMOND MINE.—The rich stores of Brazil seem not yet to have been exhausted, and new discoveries are being made, developing the richness of her diamond mines. One of these has been recently opened, exceedingly valuable. A French paper published at Rio de Janeiro gives the following account of it:

"This mine, which already has produced 400,000 carats of diamonds, was discovered in October, 1844, by a negro shepherd. The man, struck with the resemblance of the ground to that of the mine of Tijuco, where he had worked, began to dig, and found some diamonds, which he carried to Bahia for sale. He was arrested and thrown into prison on suspicion of having stolen them, but made his escape. He was pursued by some Indians who were sent after him, and found digging again for diamonds, and thus the existence of the mine became known to the Government. It is said that the produce already realized amounts to eighteen millions of francs."—Farmer & Mechanic.

OLIVE OIL.—This article seldom reaches us in a perfectly pure state, and its effects, on that account, are often deleterious rather than beneficial. The following receipt for its purification may, therefore, be of service to some: "Mix with water; agitate it violently, then let it settle and turn off the oil. The mucilage which produces rancidity is separated from the oil, and remains in the water. Oils obtained by compression contain mucilage and other matters which may be separated by this simple process.

DIGNIFIED CONDUCT.—Eliza Embert, a young Parisian lady, resolutely discarded a gentleman to whom she was to have been married, because he ridiculed religion. Having given him a gentle reproof, he replied, "that a man of the world would not be so old-fashioned as to regard God and religion." Eliza started—but on recovering herself, said, "From this moment, when I discover that you do not respect religion, I cease to be yours. He who does not love and honor God, can never love his wife constantly and sincerely."

RARE DOINGS.—The St. Louis Republican of the 11th inst., says that the Abolition Convention which met at Peoria on the 7th, was completely broken up by the citizens of that place. In the evening of that day, the Abolitionists convened at the Court House, but before they had proceeded to business, a number of persons, who were opposed to their holding a convention there, went in and one of them advanced to the desk and declared that no Abolition speeches should be made. The ladies present were requested to leave, and the Convention ordered to disperse. Very soon after, a general row was kicked up, the lights were extinguished, and some of the Abolitionists most unmercifully pelted with eggs. The Convention was entirely broken up.

SING SING PRISON.—The bill passed by the Legislature for the relief of this Prison appropriates $10,000 to pay the debts already incurred; $10,000 to defray the expenses of bringing into the Pison the Croton water; $4,000 for repairs; $4,000 for building shops and completing the walls of the Prison. The same act also provides that children born of convicts in the Female Prison may be sent to the Poor House in the County of Westchester and there supported on such terms as may be agreed upon between the Inspectors of the Prison and the Commissioners of the Poor—the expenses to be paid out of the funds of the Prison. Courts are required when passing sentence upon prisoners to cause convenient inquiry to be made into their former trade or business, instead of relying as heretofore, upon the unsupported oath of the prisoner himself; and if a convict has been in a State Prison before, he may be employed in the same kind of labor in which he was employed during such imprisonment, without reference to the certificate of the Judge, if the Agent shall deem such a course best for the interest of the State.

PROSPECTUS OF THE

LITERARY EMPORIUM,

A Compendium of Religious, Literary, and Philosophical Knowledge.

In the first place, light literature will find no place in its pages, i. e. love tales, literary trash, &c.

Secondly, sectarianism will not be admitted into the Emporium; or, in other words, it will favor no particular sect; but it will advocate the religion of the Bible in the strongest terms, and will urge the necessity not only of a change of heart, but a virtuous and holy life, in order to be truly happy in this world and to be prepared for that which is to come. In regard to its literary character, it is designed to be of such a nature as to water the thirsty soul that is studiously endeavoring to acquire a knowledge of man in his past and present condition; also, some information in relation to the different sciences and arts, and the variety of the works of nature, with such miscellaneous reading as will invigorate the faculties of the mind, give scope to the imagination, while it shall address itself to the good sense of all who desire to be truly elevated by reading.

The Emporium is published monthly at one dollar a year. Five dollars allowed to any person obtaining fifteen paying subscribers, and at the same rate for a greater or less number. One hundred enterprising and honest Agents wanted for the Emporium and other valuable works.

All letters, orders, &c., should be addressed to

J. K. WELLMAN, Editor and Proprietor,
No 116 Nassau-st, New York.

From the W. Gazette, Md.

For your own sake, reader, subscribe for the Leitrary Emporium! It is issued monthly in New York: J. K. Wellman, 116 Nassau-st. $1 a year. This monthly is such as can be recommended to all as eminently worthy of support. No "literary trash, tales, &c.," are found in it; but it is filled with interesting articles, Religious, Literary, and Philosophical. It advocates the religion of the Bible in the strongest terms; and urges the necessity of a change of heart, and of a holy and virtuous life, in order to be happy here and hereafter; and still knows no sectarianism. Every Christian, and every one who wishes to become a Christian, ought to get this cheap and excellent publication. Each number contains two beautiful embellishments, one a splendid steel engraving, the other a nicely printed flower.

PROSPECTUS OF THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MAGAZINE.

This Magazine is edited by Seba Smith; this gentleman has been so long and favorably known to the reading public, that to mention his name is recommendation sufficient to ensure the Magazine a hearty welcome from the American people. And we are happy to announce the Rev. J. S. Abbott as among our regular contributors. And also Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith, with other of our best female writers.

It will be issued monthly, on handsome paper, and each number embellished with a steel engraving, and a flower painted from nature. The first number is now ready to deliver to subscribers. Terms one dollar per year, or 10 cents for a single number.

The above work is got up in better style than any other magazine published for youth in the United States. We challenge investigation for the proof of this assertion. Please read the introduction below.

INTRODUCTION.

The design of this work is to present a useful and interesting periodical to the youth of our country—one that while it shall amuse, shall also enlighten and instruct, and not merely instruct and enlighten, but elevate and purify. A work which shall do its share towards guiding the youth of our country in the path that will lead them to usefulness and respectability as citizens, and honor and happiness as men and Christians. With this general object in view, all suitable topics will be discussed, and the best material sought for both original and selected, wherever it may be available.—The world of fact and the world of fancy will both be explore, and their choicest treasures brought home and spread before our young readers.

Without bias in party politics, the work will present clear and condensed views of political statistics, institutions, and men of the country; and without sectarianism, it will aim to present such matter as may be acceptable to any Christian family.

Stories, Poetry, History, Biography, Science and Art, will all be made to contribute to our general design. Biographical notices of the distinguished men of our country and occasionally of other countries, both ancient and modern; American history; the history and statistics of the individual states, from Maine to Texas, and from New York to Oregon; Indian Stories and romance, with historical sketches of various tribes, from the time the Europeans first landed till the present time—these are among the prominent sources from which our pages will be filled. And although this work is designed mainly for youth, it is intended that it shall be so conducted that the youth who takes it and preserves it, shall find it a pleasant and valuable companion in middle life or in old age.

All letters, orders, &c. should be addressed to J. K. Wellman, Proprietor, 116 Nassau street, New York.

N. B. Any newspaper giving the above two or three insertions shall receive the Magazine one year.

From the Philadelphia Saturday Courier.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MAGAZINE.—It truly gratified our hearts to receive No. 1 of this new work, because it brought us tidings of our estimable friend, 'The Original Jack Downing, of Downingville, away down East.' In a word, Seba Smith, Esq. author of 'The Original Jack Downing Creations,' and who is a sweet writer, especially for the young, has started in New York City a Young People's Magazine. It will succeed. He is the man for such a Magazine—moral, elevating, amusing, instructive. Let all young people in our wide spread country take it, for we pledge our word for it that it will be the Magazine for them. It will surpass the palmy days of Parley's Magazine for the Young, we feel quite sure.

ILLUSTRATED BOTANY.

EDITED by JOHN D. NEWMAN, M. D.—Circumstances make the man, and very often, as in the present case, the book. For years there has been a steadily increasing interest felt for the vegetable kingdom. Laterly, this taste has been partially gratified by the literary magazines, which owe their popularity, in a great measure, to the beautiful flower prints that adorn them. One specimen a month, however, is not enough, nor is it required in such a connection. A work relating exclusively to the subject is wanted by the public, and this want the present enterprise is intended to supply.

Preceded by a short introduction on Physiology, and a view of the Natural and Linnæan Systems, the work will be devoted to a separate consideration of each plant. Together with our own information, we shall draw on the standard works on Chemistry, Botany and Medicine, combining every useful item of knowledge, and without lessening its value, present it in a concise and pleasing form. Obtaining our supplies from the same sources as the bee, we hope to secrete as elegant a sweet for the mind as it does for the body. The properties of each, more especially the medicinal, will be confirmed, in a great number of instances, by personal experience. To this will be added its history; its meaning in the language of flowers; and poetry, either original or selected, from the gems of the children of song.

The whole illustrated by splendid Colored Engravings, taken from nature, full size, and finished in the highest style of modern art.

This work is designed to be eminently popular in its application, and there is enough of that which is stranger than fiction about it, to render it in no ordinary degree interesting and instructive.

TERMS—This work will be published monthly, with four or six Flowers, handsomely painted, in each number. Price Three Dollars a year, or two copies to one address for Five Dollars. Furnished to seminaries, colleges and societies, in clubs, 10 copies for $20 a year.

THE ORIGINAL SABBATH UNCHANGED.

BY JAMES A. BEGG.

SECTION V. [Continued.

Shortly after this scene, [the withholding of the manna on the Sabbath,] the children of Israel departed from the wilderness of Sin; and, after three other encampments, arrived at Sinai, in the third month subsequent to their leaving the land of Egypt. "And Moses went up unto God, and the Lord called unto him out of the mountain, saying, Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob and all the children of Israel: ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagle's wings, and brought you unto myself. Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people; for all the earth is mine. And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel. And Moses came, and called for the elders of the people, and laid before their faces all these words which the Lord commanded him. And all the people answered together and said, All that the Lord hath spoken we will do. And Moses returned the words of the people unto the Lord. And the Lord said unto Moses, Lo I come unto thee in a thick cloud, that the people may hear when I speak with thee, and believe thee for ever. And Moses told the words of the people unto the Lord." Exod. xix. 1—9.

God commends himself to the faith and trust of Israel by the power he had displayed, and by the care he had already exercised in their behalf; thus proving, that in what He was about to enjoin He gave them only what was good; and that, in obeying His voice and keeping His covenant, they should not only be to Him a peculiar people, but also "a kingdom of priests," instructing other nations to love, to fear and serve the Lord. And God's reason for this open and glorious manifestation of His presence, is also one of love. Raising up His faithful servant to instruct and to govern them by laws of heavenly wisdom, "the Lord said unto Moses, Lo I come unto thee in a thick cloud, that the people may hear when I speak with thee, and believe thee for ever." The majesty of the scene, with all the overwhelming impressions produced by it, were but to deepen the sense of the vast importance of giving ear to the law of their God.

Moses addresses himself to the elders of the people, and obedience is promised by all, and their answer is returned by Moses to the Lord. Two days were appointed, in which they might sanctify themselves for the solemn occasion—external purity forming a fit emblem of that purity of heart and inward sanctification which they ought to have in coming before the Lord. "And it came to pass on the third day, in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud, so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp, to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly. And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice." Ver. 16—19.

The Lord announced His blessed will to men with overawing exhibitions of his glory, that beholding His Majesty, they might listen the more attentively and with greater reverence; and He laid upon them injunctions of external purity, that through these they might the more effectually be taught that purity of heart without which no man shall see the Lord. The display of His power also proved, and that impressively, that if they should be disobedient, He had ready instruments to execute His condemnation of their sin. Is there in all this no lesson of solemnity to the disobedient Christian?

After renewed precautions lest the people should "break through unto the Lord to gaze, and many of them perish," "God spake all these words, saying, I am the Lord thy God which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no other gods before me. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth; thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them; for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments. Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh His name in vain. Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but THE SEVENTH DAY is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day; wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it. Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. Thou shalt not kill. Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is thy neighbor's." Exod. xx. 1—17.

We have quoted out at length the whole ten commandments, with their introduction or preface, for the purpose of bringing more distinctly before the mind the place which the Sabbath bears in relation to the other duties here enjoined, both of a positive and negative nature. All of these duties, it is evident, were obligatory upon all men from the first; they remain obligatory upon all men still, and will continue so till the end. God himself appears from Heaven, enjoining by majestic utterance the law of perfect rectitude. But amid all this divine splendor, there was the revelation of God in a form fitted to commend Him to the love even of those who quaked. "I am the Lord thy God." This is the acknowledgment of a relationship, the thought of which is full of consolation. The loud voice and the display of glory, are those not of an enemy, but of a friend, their Redeemer. He had brought them out of the bondage of Egypt, not to put them under a greater bondage. It is that, by receiving and obeying His law, they may be to Him "a peculiar treasure" above all people, although all the earth is His.

The will of God had originally been written on man's heart, or was divinely revealed at Creation, but in his unfaithfulness man had allowed it to be sadly effaced. Jehovah announces Himself, therefore, as their God, intimating His mind, and having a right to demand obedience. And, instead of being satisfied with the mere outward performance of the specified duties, or abstinence from the specified sins, His desire is, that in love to Himself for what He is, His people may, in love, give willing ear and ready obedience to that which His love for them has dictated. God's law is spiritual, and reaches to the intents and thoughts of the heart, but the inward principle is cherished and finds utterance and manifestation in word and action. The promised mercy, therefore, is to those who love Him, and who, from love to Him, keep His commandments. It is that love alone which will enable any so to obey; and that love, wherever it exists in vigor, will manifest itself in a ready and cheerful obedience, at whatever sacrifice of self. Obedience without love is unacceptable to the Father of spirits, and professions of love, without concern for obedience, prove a destitution of the real principle of spiritual life.

It will be admitted, even by those who deny the continuing obligation of the seventh day as the only Sabbath of the Lord, that all the other commandments uttered by God Himself at this time, are good, and of universal obligation. Now it would surely be remarkable, if among a number of precepts designed for all and for all time, there should be embodied one, and that one bearing no mark of exception, which was yet intended only for a certain people, and even to them only for a limited time. For it is to be observed, that it is as much a part of the fourth commandment, that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God," as that we are called to "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." These are necessarily and inseparably connected,—the seventh day and the Sabbath are thus, in the commandments of the Lord, perfectly identical.

The terms here employed, as in the text we have last considered, suppose the pre-existence of the Sabbath. The entreating voice of God calls to "remember" to keep it holy. The call to remembrance in itself implies previous knowledge of its sanctity—differing not, in this respect, from all the other nine commands, as there can be no doubt that a conscience of their obligation was felt at the beginning, and regarded as the will of the Lord to all men from the Creation. While yet unwritten in characters legible to the bodily eye, they were engraven upon man's heart, and the sense of their authority and rectitude was manifested even in cases where they spoke in language of sternest reprobation. Cain, imbruing his hands in his brother's blood, was not ignorant that murder was a sin. He proved that he knew his guilt when, conscience-stricken by the heart-rending question of the all-seeing God, "Where is Abel thy brother?" he evasively replied, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Instead of openly avowing what he had done, and pleading ignorance of wrong, or justifying the deed he had committed, he sought to escape the pronunciation of the divine displeasure, which he already realized within his breast.

It is scarcely necessary for the purpose of urging the similarity which exists between all the commandments, that we should remark, that it would seem strange if any were to imagine that men might have worshiped idols with impunity, until, in this promulgation of the law from Sinai, the Lord declared himself jealous of His glory; or that theft and covetousness were till then no crime, because they also were then thus solemnly forbidden.

It was not then to institute the Sabbath,—which indeed we have lately seen was already, if it had not always, been observed by the Israelites;—nor was it to appoint, for the first time, any of the other nine commandments, that the God of Israel had thus appeared in His majesty. "Moses said unto the people, Fear not, for God is come to prove you, and that His fear may be before your face, that ye sin not." Ver. 20. Sin is an evil thing in itself, as well as in its consequences; Israel had already indulged in the transgression; and the righteous God, who has no pleasure in iniquity, and who seeks to save men from its pollution, here gives expression to His righteous will, that they should not do so henceforth. He who commands also gives power to obey, and the knowledge of what is required is designed to teach what it is for which, by prayer, we should ask strength to be. At no period, either before or since the fall, has man of himself been able to do the things which please God; but, at no time has that divine strength which comes to us through the blood of Jesus been withheld from any who felt and confessed to Him their need. Every act of faith of which we read, in patriarchs, in prophets, and in people, was the result of the recognition of what God desires, in whatever form expressed, and of the exercise of faith in the love of Him whose mind it is they were called to reflect. [To be con'd.

THE SEASONS—LIFE.

Though genial Spring's reviving power
Resuscitates the barren earth,
And Summer's balmy breath and shower
Ripen the germs of vernal birth,
Taxing the wardrobe of the skies
To make the fields of earth more fair—
Th' Eternal's storehouse for supplies,
To feed the species dwelling there;—

Yet Autumn, with its withering gale,
Divests the trees of foliage green;
Its poisonous blast sweeps hill and vale,
And there's no trace of beauty seen.
Thus shorn of strength and comeliness,
The vegetable tribes remain
In Winter's frost-bound prison-house,
Till welcome Spring return again.

So we, in spring of childhood's days,
Inspired with life and vigor, bloom;
Flourish in manhood's summer rays,
And fall in autumn to the tomb.

GORDON.

Stonington, Conn., April 17, 1846.

THE TWO NEIGHBORS RECONCILED.

Two merchants of the same city, being neighbors and jealous of each other, lived in a scandalous enmity. One of them entering into himself, submitted to the voice of religion, which condemned his sentiments; he consulted a pious person, in whom he had great confidence, and inquired of him how he should manage to bring about a reconciliation. "The best means," answered he, "is what I shall now indicate to you; whenever any person shall enter your store in order to purchase, and you have not what suits them, recommend them to go over to your neighbor." He did so. The other merchant being informed of the person by whom these purchasers came to him, was so struck with the good offers of a man whom he considered his enemy, that he repaired immediately to his house to thank him for it, begged his pardon with tears in his eyes, for the hatred he had entertained against him, and besought him to admit him amongst the number of his best friends. His prayer was heard, and religion closely united those whom self-interest and jealousy had divided.

THE YOUNG MAN'S WISH.

"I should like to have that man's knowledge in my head for about ten minutes, just to see how it would feel." Such was the rather quaint remark which dropped from a young man, a few days since, as he saw Mr. Burritt, the learned blacksmith, step into a car where he was seated. "Well," we could not help replying, "probably you could have your wish for as much as ten minutes, by going the same way to work that he did."

The young man thought a moment, and then made an evasive reply, intimating as much as that he considered that a large undertaking, for the use he would likely to have for so much learning—"just to see how it would feel."

That young man is a fair representative of thousands. They would like to see how it feels to be a learned man; but they overlook the value of scientific attainments, and so shrink from the cost. Depend upon it, however, young friends, the treasure is worth the price and the pains, and yet in no other way can it be acquired. What say you then? Would you have a head full of useful knowledge, and a heart full of good principles? If so, aim for the prize and set about its attainment. "The merchandize of it is better than the merchandize of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold." Apply yourselves—save those spare moments—give them to study—avoid those groggeries—read something worth reading about, and think about what you read. Hold it fast—treasure it up, and—"see how it feels."

HYMN.

Written for the Twelfth Anniversary of the Am. F. M. R. Soc., May 13th, 1846.

BY WILLIAM B. TAPPAN.

O THOU! in this dark world of ours,
Whose voyagers tempt a surging sea,
Where Guilt flaps wings and Passion lowers,
Who can direct and save but Thee?
For deeper rolls the gulf of Sin,
And higher still its billows climb,—
A few the port in safety win,
Survivors of the wrecks of time.

Yet here Religion sheds the light
That elevates, refines, reforms;
That burns upon the brow of Night,
A lovely star, beset with storms:
That shines along the rebel's track,
And woos the weary wanderer back,
And lifts Despair to Glory's seat.

Her presence is continual balm,
That heals beyond the power of Art;
Her words the hell of anguish calm,
Her smile is heaven within the heart.
Peace at her mandate takes the throne
Where Woe and Ruin ruled before;
And tumults die at Mercy's tone
Of, "Daughter, go and sin no more!"

That Gospel shall not all obey?
And thus deliverance bless the world
Wherever folly takes its way,
Wherever clouds of Grief are curled?
So be it, Lord! let Works and Prayer
With blossoms clothe Affliction's rod,
'Till all thy laborers mingle where
The pure and perfect see their God.

THE ARITHMETIC OF FAITH.

There are two ways of looking at the practicability of the missionary enterprise. We may approach it with the calculations of a purely secular spirit; or we may bring into the account a species of arithmetic which is wholly unknown in worldly transactions. If we go to the politician or the general, and ask his opinion as to the feasibility of introducing the blessings of Christianity into all parts of the earth, within a given period, he will take a statistical view of the question. "Here," he will say, "are so many hundreds of millions to be brought under the power of the gospel; and so many millions of Christians to engage in the work. How long a period must be allowed them to accomplish it?" Or he may inquire, "For how many years have missions been in progress? And how many thousands have already felt their benign influence? Give me these data, and I will tell you when the heathen will be thoroughly evangelized."

But if the problem of the world's salvation is to be solved in this way, it is obvious that the answer cannot be encouraging. If it is simply in "the rule of three," we may well despair of ever seeing the earth "full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." The arithmetic which is current in the ordinary business of life, will never convert the world to the Lord Jesus Christ. [Day Spring.

MISSIONS NOT A FAILURE.

Dr. Judson, in a missionary meeting, speaking through the voice of the Pastor that all might hear, observed, "I have frequently read and often heard it asserted, that modern missions are a failure." This position can be easily examined.

Thirty-three years ago there was but very little interest felt by Christians in this land for the perishing heathen. When your missionaries left your shores, very few were willing to be known as approving their enterprise. Two young men, about to go far hence to the heathen, on the morning of their departure from their native land, went to their vessel, silently and alone, yet when they threw themselves on their knees in their lonely cabin, they heard or felt a voice saying, 'You are not alone, for I am with you.' Now, when missionaries return to their native land, such is the interest taken in the cause of missions, that the largest houses of worship are crowded with multitudes anxious to see and hear them, and they are welcomed by the smiles and greetings of thousands and hundreds of thousands. Does this look as if modern missions were a failure?

When your missionaries landed in Burmah there was no part of the Word of God printed for the use of that people—not a single book or tract in circulation that gave them any portion of Divine truth. Now, after a period of thirty-three years, the language has been learned, the sacred Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testaments, translated and printed in the Burmese language, the New Testament printed in various contiguous tribes and nations, and books and religious tracts, conveying a large amount of saving truth, scattered among the people, and though a few of these productions may have been destroyed, yet they are generally treasured up as an invaluable prize. Are modern missions a failure?

Thirty-three years ago there were but few to pray for the heathen. Now the churches in this and other Christian lands are hourly praying that the heathen may be given to Jesus for his possession—thousands of converted pagans are supplicating the throne of Divine grace for the outpouring of the Divine Spirit upon their kinsmen—numerous churches have been established, and missionaries and native preachers are spreading the knowledge of salvation. Does this look as if modern missions were a failure? May we not rather expect, that when another period of thirty-three years shall have revolved, Christianity will be the prevailing religion?

MOUNT ARARAT.

Ararat is a vast mountain, of immense height, surrounded by perpetual snows, and ribbed with eternal ice. Many attempts have been made to ascend it and failed. But Prof. Parott succeeded, and engaged in the delight and glory of ascending this Ancient of Hills and looking down on the strange regions of the Caucasus. He thus speaks of it: "I passed forward round a projecting mound of snow, and behold! before my eyes now intoxicated with joy, lay the extreme cone, the highest pinnacle of Ararat. Still a last effort was required of us to ascend a tract of ice by means of steps, and that accomplished, about a quarter past three on the 9th of October, 1829, WE STOOD ON THE TOP OF ARARAT."

"What I first aimed at and enjoyed was rest; I spread out my cloak, and sat down on it. I found myself on a pretty vaulted, nearly cruciform surface of about two hundred paces in circuit, which at the margin sloped off precipitously on every side, but particularly towards the South-east and North-east. Formed of eternal ice, without rock or stone to intercept its continuity; it was the austere, silvery head of OLD ARARAT.

REVERENCE.

Reverence is always due to aged people. God, nature, and a proper education, say to the young, reverence old age. Grey hairs are a crown of glory when found in the way of righteousness.

"The dim eye,
The furrowed brow, the temples thinly clad,
The wasted page of man's infirm decline,
Awake that deep respect—not always traced
'Mid those whom science nurtures, whom the arts
Of smooth refinement polish;—and a voice
Sublime instructs, 'Honor the head that bears
The hoary crown of Age.'"

The promptings of our own kindly nature teach us to respect the aged, to rise up before the hoary head. "The dim eye, the furrowed brow, the temples thinly clad,"—who would not respect, reverence, love them?

I love the youth who reverences the aged always and whoever they are. O youth, revere thy aged friend; respect those silver locks so whitened by the toiling hardships of many long years. Carry thyself kindly and reverently toward the infirm and old tottering onward to the tomb in bereaved loveliness; and though for it thou be singular from the thousands of youths about thee badly trained on this point, God shall bless thee for it.—Morning Star.

AFFECTING NARRATIVE.

For several years I resided in a city of the South, and while there received from the American Bible Society a quantity of Bibles for distribution. I was in the habit of seeking opportunities for religious conversation with those who visited me on business, and repeatedly heard of whole families who were not only destitute of the word of God, but were unable even to read it. One case affected me very much.

A man called one fine morning with his son—a miserable sickly boy, about fourteen years old—for medical advice. The poor boy had suffered for months under a severe attack of intermittent fever. Though the disease had been "broken" by one of the violent remedies so often used in such cases at the South and West, still he was a most pitable object—pale and lived as a corpse, bloated with dropsy, and suffering constant pain from a diseased liver. His mind was almost affected as his body; and his dull, heavy eyes, and vacant stare, plainly showed that he was falling into a state of hopeless idiocy. I could give the father no hope of affording him bodily relief but I thought it possible something might even yet be done for his spiritual health I told him it was hardly possible that his son could recover, and asked,

"Do you think he is prepared to die?"

"I hope so; he has always been a good child," was the reply.

"Do you think he loves God? Does he like to read the Bible, and hear and talk about his Saviour, and do you think it would be prudent to tell him I think he must die?"

"I suppose he don't know much about them things; he can't read the Bible, and I shouldn't like to tell him he must die."

"But, my friend, if you believe he cannot live, you would be glad to have him prepared to die.—I hope you and his mother will read the Bible to him, and pray with and for him, and it may be if you cannot restore him to health, God may enable you to do a great deal better for him—prepare him for heaven."

"Yes," said he, "I should be glad to have him prepared to die; but we have no Bible to read to him."

"O well, sir," said I, "I will supply you.—You surely are not willing to be without a Bible."

"Why, as to that, I don't think a Bible would do me much good; I can't read."

"But your wife will read it to you."

"No, she can't read."

"How many children have you? Some of them can read it, and I will give them a Bible."

"I have five children, but we haven't been able to give them learning, and they can't read."

After some further conversation, I prescribed for the boy, and they left me. Some two or three weeks after this, I was walking in the grave-yard, when a funeral procession entered it from the country. I joined them at the grave; and after the body was committed to the earth, 'dust to dust,' I noticed that the chief mourner—this same unhappy father—was disposed to linger behind; and after the crowd had dispersed, I came up and entered into conversation with him. He seemed almost heart-broken; and gazing on three fresh graves before him, he said, "There are three of my poor, dear children. I have buried them all within a week. I shall never see them again. I expect to find their little sister dead when I get home, and I then shall have none left, but my poor sick boy." I could only mingle my tears with his; and, without a word, pressed his hand, and left him.

An application of this affecting narrative is hardly necessary. I trust that every child in this land of Bibles and schools, will feel how greatly he has been favored; and when he thinks of the thousands in our land, and the millions in heathen lands who have never seen a Bible, nor heard of a Saviour, that he will not only pray for them, but will feel that is a blessed privilege that he can help to give them the bread of life. —*S. The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, June 4, 1846.

THE CONDUCTORS OF BENEVOLENT OPERATIONS.

Many persons seem to regard ministers of the Gospel as the exclusive directors of the benevolent organizations of the church. If an effort is to be made to improve the condition of the neighborhood in which a church is located, they would have the minister lay the plan and do the work. If a society is to be organized for the purpose of exerting an influence abroad, they agree that the ministers ought to fill the principal offices and wield the laboring oar. In short, if any thing is to be done of a religious nature, they excuse themselves from obligation, and throw the labor wholly upon those whom they regard as officially responsible.

If we mistake not, it is in reference to somewhat such a state of things, that the apostle Paul speaks, when he represents the church as a body, and denies that the foot is any less a part of the body because it is not a hand, or the ear because it is not an eye. He teaches that each member, [illegible] out the doing of which the body itself cannot be in health. This principle applies with great pertinency to the benevolent movements of the church. There is no work to be performed which does not furnish a field for every kind of talent—for that of the layman as well as that of the minister. It is true that each may have his place, and in each class may be found persons possessed of qualifications happily adapted to certain kinds of labor. But none need be drones—none can be drones without incurring a fearful responsibility.

The influence of the notion that nothing can be done to promote benevolent objects except by ministers of the Gospel, has been hurtful in many ways.

In the first place, it has not unfrequently given undue importance to the minister, both in his own eyes and the eyes of his people. Every body knows how natural it is for men to love high stations which confer power, and how easy it is for those who have power to become self-important and self-confident. Ministers of the Gospel are no exception to this rule. They are men subject like passions with others, and they feel the influence of exaltation equally with others. Their only safety against injury from it, must be found in a deep sense of personal responsibility. The minister who duly appreciates his relation to God the judge, may perhaps feel that his obligation is increased in proportion to his exaltation; and feel this, instead of being puffed up, he may feel to abase himself on account of the importance which the people attach to him. In the case of such an individual, there is no danger; he will be sure to do his duty faithfully, and exert himself at the same time to create in his people a sense of their importance, and bring them along with him. But alas, there are many ministers whose example differs widely from this. For their safety and usefulness, it is essential that their brethren be joined with them in all organized efforts to build up the kingdom of Christ. And we may rest assured, that such a union will be welcomed most heartily by that class of ministers who seem to need it least.

Again, the notion which we oppose, effectually shuts out from important stations some of those whose influence is greatly needed. It is of but little use to organize benevolent societies unless they can secure a hold upon the confidence and feelings of the people. Upon this they depend both for contributions of money, and for what is more essential, those fervent prayers which prevail with God. But how are they to secure a hold upon the affections of the people? Not by placing them under the control of any single class of men, but by bringing all classes into the work, exciting in all an interest, and impressing upon all a sense of obligation. The church needs a new baptism of the Holy Spirit now almost as much as it did on the day of Pentecost. And we confidently believe, that if such a baptism were granted to it, the effect would be seen more distinctly in an increase of zeal among private church members than in any other form. We seem to have forgotten that we are all bought with a price—that we are none of us our own. Indeed, if this language of the apostle were now interpreted to suit the spirit of the times, and express the feelings of a large portion of the church, it would teach that ministers are bought with a price, and therefore are not their own, but that the rest of the church members may do as they please. Such a sentiment, abhorrent as it appears when expressed in plain language, might nevertheless be easily drawn from facts which occur not unfrequently in the history of benevolent operations. We believe these facts would be less frequent, if the members of churches were more generally brought into such a relation to the movements of the day as to feel their responsibility, and see no way of escaping from it.

There are in these times some noble exceptions to the foregoing remarks. Instances might be mentioned of persons but little known to the world—private church members—who by their counsels and labors are doing vastly more to advance the cause of benevolence, and make known the truth, than many of those who fill high official stations. Their examples are a reproof to the careless, and an encouragement to the aspiring. May they be multiplied a thousand fold.

ANTI-SLAVERY CONVENTION.—Last week the New-England Anti-Slavery Society held a three days' meeting in Boston. The "Liberator" represents its proceedings as having been characterized by masterly ability, stirring eloquence, and a glorious firmness of purpose. The principal topics of discussion related to the war with Mexico, and the duty of all who 'despise fraud, loathe rapine, and abhor blood,' to give it no countenance.

THE CHRISTIAN ALLIANCE WORLD'S CONVENTION.

We have already expressed our fear, that it will be difficult to organize and carry forward this Convention so as to secure harmony among the delegates of whom it will be composed. The prospect of trouble is increasing every day. Little meetings are held here and there for the purpose of suggesting subjects for the Convention to act upon; and there can scarcely be a doubt, that some of these subjects will be urged with an earnestness altogether unsuitable to their importance. Trouble will of course be the consequence. There was a meeting held in New York during the anniversary week, the object of which was to interchange views in regard to the Convention, and to unite in a representation of desirable subjects of action. At this meeting, resolutions were passed expressing the opinion that the synopsis of opinions upon which the Convention has been called should be [illegible] trine of eternal rewards and punishments;" that while preferences of ecclesiastical order are not to be compromised, the fourteenth and fifteenth chapters of the Epistle to the Romans should be specially considered by the Convention; that it should declare the right and duty of every man in the world to possess a Bible, and read and obey it for himself, under his responsibility to God; that it should give its testimony in favor of the right and duty of every man to enjoy an entire Sabbath; that it should declare the right and duty of believers in Christ to maintain his worship and ordinances in such forms as they intelligently judge to be in accordance with the will of God; that it should assert the right of every man in the world to learn to read the Bible.

THE SABBATH UNION.

Dr. Edwards was present at the recent meeting of the "American and Foreign Sabbath Union," and stated some facts respecting the operations of that Society which ought to increase the activity and zeal of those who are laboring to disseminate right views in regard to the Sabbath. There can be but little doubt, that the great obstacle to the observance of the true Sabbath is found in a false theology which teaches that one day of the week is as good as another, provided it is called a Sabbath and devoted to religious purposes. Yet such a theology runs through all the publications of the Sabbath Union, poisoning the minds of the unthinking, and encouraging them to build their hopes upon a sandy foundation. The truth of this was well illustrated in the remarks made at the meeting just referred to. Dr. Edwards stated that if the Sabbath—(meaning Sunday, of course, and conveying that impression)—was observed from one end of our country to the other according to the divine commandment, we as a nation might hope to receive greater blessings than those which God promised to his ancient people upon the same condition; and to show what those blessings were, he read from the seventeenth chapter of Jeremiah, where the Lord promised that if the people would bring no burden through the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day, but hallow the Sabbath day to do no work therein, then kings and princes should enter into Jerusalem sitting upon the throne of David, riding in chariots and on horses, and the city should remain for ever. Here then we had the oracle of the Sabbath Union claiming the blessings promised to those who keep the Sabbath, for a class of men whom he encourages to trample upon that sacred day. It is true that he exhorts them to keep holy another day in place of the Sabbath, and represents this as quite sufficient to satisfy the claims of the divine law. But with a theology which thus perverts the word of God, and then wraps up the perversion, we have no sympathy. We expect just about as much good from the labors of such theologians, as resulted from the labors of the Scribes and Pharisees of old, who compassed sea and land to make a proselyte, and left him two-fold worse than themselves. The following is the N. Y. Tribune's report of the Doctor's remarks:—

"Within four years, there have been held in our country fourteen State Conventions of the friends of the Sabbath, to unite their counsels and efforts for promoting throughout the community a due observance of the day. There has also been a National Convention, composed of more than 1,700 delegates, the largest delegated meeting, it is believed, that has ever been held on any subject in the United States. In addition to these, there have been numerous County, District and other Conventions in various parts of the land, in all of which Christian and patriotic men, of different religious and political parties, have most cordially united and resolved by example, by diffusion of information, and by kind moral influence, to encourage the universal observance of God's holy day.

"Moreover, numerous Biblical principles and providential facts, he said, had been embodied in PERMANENT SABBATH DOCUMENTS. These Documents have been stereotyped and printed in three of our principal cities, Boston, New York and Philadelphia. They have been translated into German, French and Spanish, and measures have already been taken for putting a copy of them into upward of 100,000 families.

"It is also intended, he said, from New Orleans, from Pittsburgh, from Buffalo, and from many other great thoroughfares of our country, to furnish a copy for all emigrants to the South and West, and as far as means can be obtained for every family throughout our country."

ANNIVERSARIES IN PHILADELPHIA.—There were several anniversary meetings of benevolent societies in Philadelphia last week. Among them we notice meetings of the Foreign Evangelical Society, the Central American Education Society, and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. Besides these the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States was in session during the week. The subject of slavery, as usual, was under discussion before the Assembly, as it will undoubtedly continue to be until the system is abolished or the Assembly speaks out boldly against it. There was also an Anti-Slavery Convention held on Tuesday, composed of members of the Assembly and others, the object of which was to agree upon certain principles and decide upon a course of action to rid the church of slavery.

WHO IS MOST TO BLAME?

When professors of religion "grow cold" and forsake their place in the house of worship on the Sabbath, are found visiting or lounging, "doing little works of necessity," or sleeping, I wish to ask who is most to blame? That individuals are in fault cannot be denied, and the fact is always admitted when a "time of refreshing comes from the presence of the Lord." It is then that we hear them confess the error of their ways, and see them striving for the paths of holiness. Then the teacher too is awake, and laboring day and night for the salvation of souls. And how careful lest there should be any thing to hinder or mar the utmost diffusion of the work of God which they are performing. Whilst this "outpouring of the Spirit" continues, all are life and animation. The family altar is erected. The long-neglected duties are sought out and performed. Old difficulties are adjusted, and all things apparently demonstrate that "happy is the Christian's lot." The "world" looks on and exclaims, "How these Christians love one another!"

But advance in man's mortal career a few short days, and what scenes do they disclose! The "revival" passes away. The excitement is over. The alluring things of the world creep in—(have they really been turned out of the temple?)—and engross the active faculties. The "necessities" of time make heavy demands upon their exertions. They forget their "first love." Duties are forsaken. Strifes are engendered. And the entire Christian is completely swallowed up in the absorbing cares of this busy life. They may observe some of the externals, but generally these are to be abandoned as "non-essentials." They will talk much of the principles of their religion, but they exist only in theory. They are not to be made applicable to any of the overt acts of life. These principles are laid upon the shelf to be used as shall best subserve interest or popularity, and appear never to be thought of as the rudder by which to govern the activities of life through the sea of time.

Now man is a reasoning creature, "a little lower than the angels," and reason teaches that these things should not be so. But men do not always use their reasoning powers on the subject as is their privilege, and as they ought. Is there any reason why they should not? So far from this, a wise Father has provided that teachers shall be appointed to instruct them in these very things—that they shall receive their call and commission direct from Him who is "King of kings and Lord of lords"—that they may be accompanied by His Spirit and His power. Appointed teachers by such high authority, does it not become them to teach men to reason—to "reason of righteousness, temperance, and a judgment to come?" Are these teachers any way responsible for this backsliding, when, under the high commission they claim, they have urged furiously on the chariot of excited passion during "the revival," and then left these children of ignorance—(for during the excitement they have been very careful to touch lightly the subject of men's relative activity)—to grope out their own position and standing in the world, and the relation they sustain, and the duties they owe to those around them? At the very point where they most need counsel, for the teacher to withhold and go back "into the weak and beggarly elements of the world" at the head of his flock, which the great Shepherd has directed shall "be led into green pastures and beside still waters," who is most to blame? Now with all the native instinct of the young of some animals, this same flock will look to the leader, and the position in which he is found they will at once conclude is safe for them. Is he worldly? It is safe for them. Is he avaricious? It is safe for them. Does he despise and reject SOME TRUTHS? It is safe for them. Does he compromise principle for the popular? It is safe for them. Does he take advantage in a trade? It is right for them to deceive. Does he teach "lay not up treasures where moth and rust doth corrupt," whilst he is bringing all his active powers into requisition to accumulate the goods of this world? It is right for them to "lay up against a rainy day."

Give honor to whom honor is due, and blame to whom blame is due. Get ye up and out of the way, that the car of Christ's salvation be no longer hindered by you who are to blame.

L.

Brookfield, May 23, 1846.

☞ There is no doubt a great responsibility resting upon ministers of the Gospel for the state of things described above. But if our correspondent means to say that this is any apology for others, we beg leave to differ from him. One man's neglect of duty can be no excuse for neglect on the part of another. ED. REC.

THE DESIGN OF A NEWSPAPER.—Strange notions some folks have of the design of newspapers, as is evident from the letters which are occasionally sent to editors. One man, perhaps, has emigrated to the far west, and wishing to inform his old acquaintances how he is getting along, he hastily jots down the principal facts in the case, and sends them to the editor, with a modest request that he will put them in the right shape and print them. Another man has settled in some new country, and is exceedingly anxious to have neighbors of the right stamp; he therefore writes to the editor all about his location, and how willing he is to help along any body who will come and settle near him; at the same time suggesting that the editor would greatly oblige him by making out and publishing a little article containing the substance of his long letter. A third has some other plan, which he urges with great earnestness, because he feels quite sure that his location is better than that chosen by any body else. Now if an editor should undertake to grant all such requests, and to plead the cause of their conflicting locations, he would have his hands full, and his paper too. Hence it becomes necessary for him, in most cases, to decline the labor and the honor of writing out the business notices which are required, and to confine himself to his own appropriate work. If his correspondents have facts of general interest which they wish to communicate, let them send such facts along—no matter in how bungling a form—and he will cheerfully put them in a shape for publication, and thank the writers in the bargain. But farther than this he cannot go consistently with his duty to himself and his readers.

CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS FOR THE ARMY.—A rumor has been afloat for a week or two past, that President Polk had requested Bishop Hughes of New York to visit Texas, for the purpose of encouraging the Catholic portion of our army, and at the same time exerting what influence he could to produce a better state of feeling among the Catholics of Mexico. This rumor is not confirmed. But we learn from the Catholic Herald, that "a request was communicated to the Superior of the Society of Jesus in Maryland, through two Catholic Prelates, on the part of the United States Government, that he should appoint two clergymen to go as chaplains to the Army in Texas. The request was laid before several Bishops then on a visit to Georgetown College, and the principal clergymen attached to that Institution. It was the unanimous opinion that it should be acceded to. Fathers McElroy and Rey were then proposed as proper persons to fill the office. All present approved of their nomination. On the same day, the Superior, accompanied by two Bishops, waited upon the Secretaries of War and State, and had a full understanding with them. The two gentlemen are expected to depart for the Army next week."

PRISON DISCIPLINE.—The 21st Anniversary of the Prison Discipline Society was held in Boston last week. The receipts for the past year have been $8,753, a large portion of which was in the form of a legacy from Hon. Daniel Waldo. The Report of the Board of Managers presented many interesting facts. From the New Hampshire Prison, 48 prisoners have been discharged within the past two years, not one of whom has been returned, most of them having procured employment as farmers and mechanics. In the Massachusetts Prison there are now 278 prisoners, who are provided with a library of 279 volumes. In New York a prison is now being erected by convicts from two other prisons, and they are represented as industrious and well-behaved, though unshackled. Such facts show what can be done in prisons by the right kind of discipline. They ought to encourage such as are striving to improve the condition of the prisoner.

FRIENDLY CLERICAL MEETING.—In Boston, on Wednesday of last week, while the city was thronged with persons attending the Anniversaries, about eight hundred clergyman and philanthropic laymen of different denominations came together for social intercourse and tea at the large Hall of Tremont Temple. The occasion is said to have been exceedingly interesting and profitable. A correspondent of the New York Tribune describes it as follows:—

Rev. Mr. Bliss of the Boston Tract Society, after stating that they had met as Christian brethren, acknowledging the same Lord and Saviour, and united by the only bond recognized in heaven, requested the venerable Dr. Milledoler, of New York, to invoke the blessing of their common Father on the interview.

Dr. M. in rising for this purpose, said, in his usual style of mildness and fervency of spirit, that he rejoiced in meeting such an assemblage of enlightened Christians, under such favorable circumstances for free intercourse. He thought he saw in this spirit of union, and in the religious aspects of the world, signs of the coming on of the Pentecostal season.

After proper refreshments were served, and free general conversation had been held, Rev. Dr. Sharp of Boston also made a short, appropriate address. Union, he said, should commence at home; great meetings of brethren of different names should come from little ones; minor differences should not hinder the most friendly intercourse and co-operation among all who hold the great essential truths of salvation. He had, forty years since, listened to the venerable brother from New York, and he hoped to meet a great multitude like him of different names in heaven.

CHINA AND OREGON.—A letter from China to the Rev. Spencer H. Cone of New York, says that it is not unreasonable to suppose that the emigration from China to the Oregon coast of America, will be equal to any yet known from Europe. A channel once opened, vast numbers of that over-populated country will wend their way thither.

THE TONAWANDA INDIANS.—Some of the papers in Western New York speak in terms of strong condemnation of the course of our Government toward the Tonawanda Indians. They will be speedily compelled, it is said, by the terms of a fraudulent and disgraceful treaty, to abandon their pleasant homes, and leave their cabins desolate. All their petitions and personal applications at Washington have been unavailing, and they have no alternative but to leave the homes of their youth and the graves of their sires. This is not the first time that wrong, backed by power, has achieved a triumph over the red man. We wish it might be the last, though we see no reason to hope it. The following paragraph is from the Rochester American:—

"The Tonawanda Indians are now civilized. Their Reservation shows to a good degree the effects of cultivation and husbandry. They are, many of them, industrious. They are generally inoffensive. Not a few profess and practice the religion of Jesus Christ. A goodly number of their young men and young women are enjoying the benefits of academical education. We have had the pleasure to meet with those, of the full Indian blood, who, in point of information, manners, and politeness, would be entitled to be received in any circle of civilized society. They are all attached with a love not a whit short of enthusiasm, to the soil in which their ancestors are buried. They still keep up, almost unimpaired, the forms and organization of that wonderful confederacy, in which savage life found its highest perfection on this continent, and which may be held to have prefigured the federal union of these States. The cupidity of the white man has reft from them, piecemeal, their broad domain, and fastens with remorseless grasp upon the limited portion which has hitherto been spared as a homestead, where the Indian might cultivate his corn in peace, and lay his bones with those of his fathers."

A SIDE-VIEW OF WAR.—A young man who is with our troops at San Isabel writes a letter to a friend in this city, giving an account of the late battles, from which we glean the following:

"I have this moment had my first view of war. The wounded, numbering about fifty, have just come in, in wagons. May the Almighty, in his infinite mercy, direct my future steps so that I may never more witness the wounded brought in from a battle-field! * * * About 3 o'clock on the day of the first battle, I went about three miles and a half in the direction, (which was exactly determined by the smoke arising from the prairie, which took fire from our guns,) and putting my ear close to the ground, could hear every discharge of artillery very distinctly; and even the fire of our platoons of musketry when the 5th Infantry were charged by the Mexican Lancers. * * * When in the second battle our Dragoons under Capt. May were let loose upon one of their batteries, they charged with such force that the horses ran headlong upon and over the cannon; and before the enemy could recover the shock, the 5th infantry charged furiously upon them with the bayonet and ended the conflict, the enemy flying in every direction, leaving pack, mules, &c. &c., with Gen. Vega among the prisoners."

ANOTHER VIEW OF WAR.—A correspondent of the Spirit of the Times, speaking of the battle of Palo Alto, says:—

"* * * * * Major Ringgold received a shot, while seated on his horse, that carried away the flesh on his legs, from his knees up, and passed through the withers of his beautiful thorough-bred charger, 'David Branch,' (a frequent winner on the turf.) Captain Page had his lower jaw shot off. The wounds of the men were very severe, most of them requiring amputation of some limb. The surgeons' saw was going the live-long night, and the groans of the poor sufferers were heart-rending. Too much praise cannot be given to the devotion and prompt action of our medical officers. It was a sad duty for them. . . . . I took advantage of the halt to go over the field of battle. It was a truly shocking sight. Our artillery had literally mowed them down! There were heaps of dead lying hither and yon, with the most ghastly wounds I ever saw, which made one shudder.—The number of killed could not be accurately ascertained, but of killed and wounded there must have been at least 800. . . . On the field was found a dog lying by the body of his master. No entreaties could prevail upon him to leave the body of him who in life had caressed him.

THE JEWS.—The total number of the Jews is estimated at about 6,800,000. They are distributed as follows:—in America, 75,000; in Europe, 3,900,000; in Asia, 3,000,000; in Africa, 500,000. The city of New-York has 12,000; Philadelphia, 2,500,; Baltimore, 1,800; Charleston, 1,500; London, 20,000; Constantinople, 80,000.

THE CHRISTIAN PARLOR MAGAZINE for June contains a beautiful plate of "The Good Shepherd," and an engraving of the three-colored Morning Glory. The leading article is on the life of William Wilberforce, besides which there is an article by J. T. Headly entitled "Rambles in London," the Editor's Table Talk, and much other interesting matter. Published by D. Mead, 141 Nassau street.

THE YOUTH'S CABINET for June contains a great variety of interesting articles for the young and old. Published by D. A. Woodworth, 135 Nassau-St.

THE BLACK RIVER JOURNAL, published at Watertown, N. Y., by Joel Greene, comes to us in a new dress and greatly improved. We are glad to see such an evidence of its prosperity.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.

We have read all the reports of last week's proceedings in Congress, but find very little of general interest. A joint resolution was passed, expressing thanks to General Taylor and his men for their recent movements on the Rio Grande, and sympathizing with the relations of those who fell. A joint resolution was discussed for the appointment of a committee of three from each house to visit and examine West Point and report upon the propriety and expediency of retaining or abolishing said institution. Considerable time was spent in discussing the day for adjourning Congress; but the prevailing opinion seemed to be, that in the existing state of our relations with Mexico and Great Britain it was not advisable at present to fix the time of adjournment.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

By the steamship Alabama, which arrived at New Orleans on the 22d of May, news was received of farther depredations, and the starving condition of the Mexican army.

Official news had arrived at Isabel, that Col. Wilson, with four companies of regulars, and three companies of Alabama volunteers, had taken Barita without opposition. The capture of this town is important, as it contains large quantities of provisions and ammunition of the Mexican army.

Gen. Taylor was to cross the Rio Grande for the purpose of taking Metamoras on Monday.—Having heard no cannonading at Point Isabel, it was the universal opinion that the Mexicans had evacuated the town.

Gen. Smith's command were on their way and had commenced their march on the Island of Boca Chica, to cross the Rio Grande at the mouth, and advance up the river on the Mexican side.

Capt. Winddle reports that 2,000 Mexicans were seen to march out of Matamoras, and it was said that they were almost in a state of starvation.

Additional Items.

Mexican Statement of their own loss.—Among the papers found in the captured effects of Arista, was the morning return of the Mexican force on the day of the battle, which shows the strength of the enemy to have exceeded 8,000, though it is not absolutely certain that the whole of that force was on the United States bank of the Rio Grande. Gen. Arista's Aid, while making arrangements with a distinguished officer of our army for the exchange of prisoners and the care of the wounded, stated that the Mexican loss, in killed on the field of battle and drowned, was 800. Among the latter was one of the priests in the train of the Mexican army, who perished in his flight in the waters of the Rio Grande. In this number, the wounded and prisoners of course are not included. Fifteen hundred Mexican muskets (all King's arms,) had been collected by our troops.

Governor Wright of New York has issued orders for the enrollment of volunteers in compliance with orders from the War Department. Applications are to be made to the Adjutant General before the 15th of June. If a sufficient number do not offer before that time, other measures will be taken to meet the requisition of the President for seven regiments.

Governor Diman, of Rhode Island, has issued his orders, through the Adjutant General, in compliance with orders from the War Department, calling upon such citizens as are disposed to volunteer, to report themselves forthwith to the Adjutant General, in order that the required number from that State may be obtained. If this is not done within a proper time, the drafting system will be resorted to.

Governor Briggs, of Massachusetts, has issued a proclamation calling upon the citizen soldiers of Massachusetts at once to enrol themselves in sufficient numbers to meet the request of the President of the United States for one regiment of infantry.

A correspondent of the Newark Daily Advertiser, writing from Fort Brown, May 14th, says, "I have to mention the afflicting circumstance, that our most severely wounded men are mortifying and dropping off. One reason is the excessive heat of the weather, and another is the fact that the Mexicans fired nothing but copper shot! Such a proceeding on their part has outraged the feelings of the whole army. Vengeance, vengeance is the cry, day and night, for wounded comrades dying from the poisonous shot. We were the attacked, and fired only iron and lead."

The word chapporal occurs in the news from Texas. A chapporal is a term applied to a species of evergreen thicket, composed of the musquit bush matted with vines. It generally grows about six or seven feet high. The whole country between the Nueces river and the Rio Grande, is more or less covered by this chapporal, interspersed with salt lakes. There is very little fresh water or grass to be had in any portion of the whole intermediate distance, averaging one hundred and fifty miles wide.

To illustrate the practical effects of the war with Mexico, a Southern paper says that at New Orleans, produce cannot be sold at any price, and it is almost impossible to obtain the price of freights on a cargo of agricultural articles. Lead is the only article that bears a tolerable price. The warehouses are filled, and very little shipping going on. Exchange is rendered very difficult to be obtained, and every branch of business is oppressed.

A public meeting was to have been held in New-Orleans on the evening of the 25th ultimo, at the New Commercial Exchange, for the purpose of adopting resolutions expressive of the citizens' admiration of the brilliant and heroic services rendered to our country by Gen. Taylor, the officers and soldiers under his command, in the recent victories achieved by the American Arms.

Speaking of the Mexican War, the Chronotype says, "Doubt as we may whether the united wisdom of a nation can ever transcend that of some individual wise man in it; we no longer doubt that a nation can perpetrate greater folly than it is possible for any individual fool to do. and no nation of men or monkies, was ever in a fairer way than ours to reach the infinitely foolish."

FOREIGN NEWS BY THE GREAT BRITAIN.

The steamship Great Britain arrived at New York on Friday last, in twenty days from Liverpool.

The news is not important. Cotton is a shade higher in Liverpool with fair prospects. In other American Produce, little change. Renewed hopes of the speedy termination of the Corn Law uncertainty gives a rather better feeling to the holders of Bonded Grain.

The British Parliament has made little progress since our last previous advices. Railway Bills in Committees engross the time of Members, impede the progress of legislation, and threaten another and severer Commercial Revulsion. The Times calls attention to the fact that Parliament at one session has authorized the construction of Railways estimated to cost £60,000,000, or near $300,000,000, of which at least two-thirds are morally certain to be constructed.

The tidings of the passage of the Oregon Notice by the U. S. Senate reached London by an express from Havre to The Times on the 7th inst. and was published in full by that paper. It created a profound but not unfavorable sensation.

The accounts from various parts of Ireland, as to the wants of the people, are painfully apparent. One day last week sixty people were admitted into the Poor House at Dungarvon. At Tuam the destitution is described as being fearfully on the increase. The Relief Committees in Galway are busy in meeting the evil. The people are stated to be in the most wretched condition imaginable.

There has been an insurrection in Spain, which was promptly put down. One battle was fought, in which the victors lost about 100 in killed and wounded. A letter from Corunna, dated May 1, says that the fight lasted from 9 in the morning till 6 in the evening, when, for want of ammunition, they were obliged to surrender. Some few escaped, but 64 officers were made prisoners having shut themselves up in the Convent of St. Martin in Santiago, and 12 of these unfortunate heroes were shot on Sunday, mourned by friends and foes for their gallant defense.

Weekly Steam Mails between England and America.—The English Government have entered into a farther contract with the British and North American Royal Mail Steam Company, the effect of which is to secure a weekly communication by steam between Liverpool and the United States of America. A steamer of great power and size will be dispatched direct from Liverpool to New-York every alternate Saturday during eight months of the year. These trips are to be performed as additional voyages and irrespective of the fortnight voyages to Halifax and Boston, as this latter service will continue just as at present, with the alteration of sailing from Liverpool as well as from Boston always on Saturdays, instead of a fixed day of the month, as at present. The steamers to New-York will also take their departure always on Saturday. By this arrangement there will be a steamer from Liverpool to America every Saturday, and from the American side also every Saturday, the only difference being that Boston and New-York will alternately be the ports of departure.

Divorce in High Life.—A letter from Copenhagen of the 26th ult. says: "The Prince Royal of Denmark has just made an application to be divorced from his wife the Princess Caroline of Mecklenberg Strelitz, whom he married in July, 1841, (his second wife,) and who in 1844, after a discussion with her husband, withdrew to Neustrelitz to her family, where she has still remained. The suit will be tried by a commission composed of ecclesiastics and laics, partly chosen by the King of Denmark, and partly by the Grand Duke of Mecklenberg Strelitz. The application for dissolving the marriage is founded on the ground of insurmountable aversion, (odium invincibile), which, according to the Lutheran religion, to which both parties belong, is sufficient to warrant the annullment of the marriage."

Ten Days Later.—The steamship Hibernia reached Boston at noon on Monday last, having come from Liverpool in 12½ days. The Markets remained about the same as at last advices. The Corn Bill is regarded as safe. The Oregon Question, it is stated upon high authority, is on the point of a satisfactory settlement. It is calculated that 30,000 persons will emigrate from Ireland to the United States in the present year. The seed of the potato crops is, in a majority of cases, coming up in a flourishing condition. The Mexican Government, through a financial agent, has created a storm among the bond-holders, by demanding a loan of $2,000,000, and proposing to consolidate the deferred debt at a discount of sixty per cent.

Free People of Color.—The New-Orleans Jeffersonian says: "We hear that a numerous body of free colored men of this city, propose to offer their services as soldiers. Many of our colored inhabitants are respectable and worthy people, holding considerable property, are sincerely attatched to the country; and the patriotism that dictates the proposition is worthy of all praise. It occurs to us, however, that it is entirely inadmissible. Gen. Jackson accepted their services in 1814, to repel invasion, and they proved themselves worthy of the trust. If the city was in danger, they might properly share in its defense. Even our slaves might be, with propriety, employed. But the present campaign will consist of offensive operations. We shall not only force the enemy across the Rio Grande, but in all probability, push our arms to the very heart of Mexico. In a war of invasion we cannot employ men of color. If we set such a precedent, we shall have no right to protest against the employment of a similar force against us should we become involved in a war with Great Britain. It is distinctly understood, that if the English ever land a regiment of blacks in this country, we can grant no quarter to prisoners. It will be a war of extermination, marked with blood at every step. And we must be careful how we set the precedent, when we march into the territory of another power.

Industrial Congress.—An Industrial Congress, composed of Delegates from associations of laboring men, will convene in Boston on Wednesday, 3d inst. The general objects of this Congress are thus set forth in the constitution adopted at the meeting in this city last year:

"To establish Equality, Liberty, and Brotherhood among men of every race: to provide that the rights of men, alienable and inalienable, shall be more perfectly understood and guaranteed: to redeem the Industrial Classes from the condition of inferiority which has hitherto everywhere attached to labor: to unite in one the friends of humanity: to promote Intelligence, Virtue, and Happiness.

Terrible Hail Storm and Destruction of Property.—We learn from the (Pen.) Danville Democrat, that a violent and destructive hail and thunder storm visited that section of the country on Saturday afternoon, May 23. The storm continued about one hour, destroying the standing wheat, rye, and corn, literally cutting them to shreds. Whole orchards were uprooted and large tracts of timber land completely cut down, as though mowed by the scythe. Great damage was done to the grain and garden vegetables in Rush, and the adjoining townships, amounting to not less than $30,000. Houses and barns were unroofed and some entirely destroyed, burying under their ruins a number of cattle. The thunder was very loud and the size of the hail stones enormous. It hailed for about fifteen minutes. The course of the storm seemed to have been from North-west to South-east, extending as far as Minersville and Pine-grove, in Schuylkill county.

Education in the United States.—The following scale is compiled from the census of 1840. It shows the nuumber of white persons over the age of 21 who can neither read nor write:

Connecticut, 1 in 311.
New-Hampshire, 1 in 150.
Massachusetts, 1 in 59.
Maine, 1 in 72.
Vermont, 1 in 58.
Michigan, 1 in 44.
Ohio, 1 in 28.
New-York and New-Jersey, 1 in 26.
Pennsylvania, 1 in 22.
Iowa, 1 in 17.
Louisiana, 1 in 16.
District of Columbia, 1 in 16.
Maryland and Wisconsin, 1 in 13.
Indiana and Mississippi, 1 in 10.
Florida, 1 in 8.
Illinois, Arkansas, Missouri, 1 in 7.
Delaware, South Carolina, Virginia, Alabama, and Kentucky, 1 in 6.
Georgia, 1 in 5.
North Carolina and Tennessee, 1 in 4.

SUMMARY.

A Roman Catholic priest, some time since in Germany, on entering the pulpit took a walnut into it. He told them that the shell was tasteless and valueless,—that was Calvin's Church. The skin was nauseous, disagreeable, worthless, valueless,—that was the Lutheran Church. He then said that he would show them the holy Roman Apostolic Church,—he cracked the nut, and found it rotten.

The American Farmer says, bright sheets of tin on tall poles, at proper distances, through cornfields, will keep the crows from disturbing the corn. The remedy, it is said, has been tried for years, and never without effect, as the least wind causes reflection that will prove just as frightful to them as an explosion of gunpowder, or the report of a gun.

At a recent election in Milwaukie, the following ballot was found in the box: 'Due the bearer $3.75, in meat.' This was signed by a butcher; but the voter, in mistake, dropped in the consideration instead of the ballot.

The whole number of railroad trains leaving Boston daily, is about 90, from 25 different stations. About one every 10 minutes, 17 1-2 hours per day.

There are about six hundred ships of the United States employed in the whale trade. Four hundred of these fish in the Pacific ocean.

The Convention for the purpose of revising the Constitution of the State of New York, assembled at Albany on Monday last.

A Convention is in session at the capitol of Iowa for the purpose of framing a State Constitution.

Samuel C. Scoville, of Salisbury Ct., has recently imported from Saxony four bucks and ewes, said to be by far the largest and best formed Saxon sheep in the country.

The Brooklyn Eagle says: "We observe that the various bar-rooms and other places in this city where liquors are dispensed, still continue in the prosecution of the traffic. Those who are engaged in it, we understand, are disposed to disregard the Excise Law and the Mayor's Proclamation and proceed in their accustomed avocations. A meeting of 'rum-sellers' is said to have been held at Brooklyn Garden on Tuesday evening, where a unanimous conclusion was arrived at to contest the constitutionality of the present law. A fund of $600 was raised, and promise made of $1000 more, to be supplied for the protection of those who may be prosecuted for its violation.

The slave Barney, recently convicted of murder, and who was to have been hung at Charleston, S. C., has had his sentence commuted by the Governor to four months' solitary confinement, twenty-five lashes each month, and at the termination of his imprisonment banished from the State.

Capt. Hooper of the bark Montgomery from Zanzibar, arrived last week, says, that a French war steamer had arrived at that place, and a treaty had been concluded with the Imaum of Muscat. The steamer had returned and taken a few valuable Arabian horses as a present to Louis Phillippe.

The steamer Oregon has been placed again on the line between this city and Stonington, Ct.; said to be in as good condition as ever.

The East Floridian, published at Clinton, states that Col. Pitchlin, a Chief of the Choctaw tribe of Indians, has declared his determination to raise 5000 warriers of his Nation, and offer their services to the Government, to march across Texas against Mexico. Col. P. is an educated Indian, and a man of fine talents. The same paper also learns that two large companies, one of mounted gun-men and one of infantry have been formed in the parish of St. Helena, and are awaiting orders to march.

Gov. Smith of Virginia, has not laid aside the 'green bag' since he was invested with the Executive robes. He appeared last week in a murder case, in Fauquire County, and defended the prisoner. This is the first Governor that we ever heard of, who did such a thing while he was in office.

It is thought the wheat crop in Illinois this year will be a third more than the last, which yielded a surplus of over 7,000,000 of bushels,

Fletcher Webster, Esq., has been appointed by the Board of Aldermen to pronounce the Fourth of July Oration before the authorities of the city of Boston.

The paper mill of Mr. Craig, the furnace belonging to G. W. Cleaveland, and the dwelling house of S. Bant, Esq., occupied by Mr. Craig at Fondasbush, Montgomery Co., were all consumed by fire at 3 o'clock on Saturday morning.

John Burnett has been tried and found guilty of the murder of Mr. George Sornberger, and sentenced to be hung at Schenectady on the 14th of July next.

A duel came off about a mile below Bethlehem, Ia., between a young man from Lexington named Jackson, and another from Frankfort whose name we did not learn. Tom Marshall was the second of one of the parties. They fired at each other once and quit, neither being hurt. A lady was the cause of the difficulty.

The names of Generals Arista, Ampudia, Mejia, and Canales, Colonels Carasco and Carabajal, are pronounced by Spaniards as nearly as possible as follows: A-rees-ta, Am-poo dia, Ma-hee-a, Ca*na*-les, Ca-ras-co, Cara-va-hal—the vowel a, in each instance, having the sound of that letter in the English word far. The j becomes h, the v, b.

We see it stated in a Philadelphia paper that the ranks of a new volunteer company in that city, to be composed entirely of Printers and Reporters, are fast filling up. It is also said that they intend taking with them, the moment they are called into service, as part of their arms and ammunition, a printing press and types.

The Albany train, in nearing the West Springfield Depot, ran over and killed an Irish woman who was partly on the track. The "cow catcher" struck her head and smashed it to pieces immediately. A jug of rum was found near her.

The Cashier of a large cotton house in New-Orleans lately decamped, being a defaulter in the sum of about $80,000. The principal, on ascertaining the fact, retired to a back room and shot himself.

Silas Hoyt, a venerable patriot of the revolution, died in Greenfield, Saratoga Co., on the 20th ult., aged 84 years. He died on his annual birthday.

The most serious apprehensions are entertained in regard to the ravages of the fly upon the wheat. In Bucks Co., Pa., great progress has been made by this destructive insect.

By a recent Census we learn that Lowell contains 28,841 inhabitants. The number of families is 4217, and there are in the city 5280 children between the ages of 4 and 16 years. The number of births for the year next preceeding the 1st of May, 1846, is 657, of whom 345 are females and 312 males. In 1828 Lowell contained only 3,532 inhabitants; in 1833, 12,963; in 1840, 20,980; in 1844, 25,163.

On Saturday morning, in the town of Alden, a woman named Catharine Kiefer, wife of Phillip Kiefer, a German, attempted to kill her husband by stabbing him with a shoe knife. The wounded man has been sworn by a magistrate, since the occurrence, and states that he was holding one of their three children in his arms and feeding it, when his wife came up and asked him to cut her a piece of bread, which he was in the act of doing when she drew from her bosom a sharp knife and stabbed him twice very severely in the neck.

The Charleston Courier contains a list of criminals recently sentenced by the city Court of Charleston for various crimes. Among them we notice that one man, for highway robbery, was sentenced to a few months' imprisonment and a slight fine, while another, William Smith, for negro stealing, is to be imprisoned until the first Friday in September next, and then hung by the neck until he is dead. So it seems that in South Carolina Negro stealing is a vastly greater crime than Robbery.

The Montreal Courier records an outrage that occurred the week before last at Windsor, (C. W.) Some poor fellow had become engaged in a quarrel with his wife, and a body of ruffians, under a precept from His Honor Judge Lynch, repaired to his house at night, dragged him out of bed, rode him on a rail, and otherwise so horribly maltreated him as to cause his immediate death. Three of the ruffians have been taken into custody and have been identified by two witnesses.

The editor of the Day Star, a Millerite paper published in Cincinnati, says that he has been spending nearly two weeks at the villages of White Water and Union, and that "it will be incredulous with many of the Advent friends when they hear of the Lord's marvelous works. Evidence that the resurrection of 'many of the saints' has taken place is clear, for many of them have been distinctly seen—brother C. Fitch among others. More hereafter."

There is a young gentleman living in Cincinnati, not yet twenty years of age, who reads fluently some eight or nine of the principal languages, and what is somewhat uncommon among our scholars, he reads the Hebrew without the points which generally accompany that language when written. He is not only acquainted with the structure of various languages, but is said to have an extensive knowledge of their literature.

The President's Proclamation announcing war with Mexico, it is said, is copied nearly word for word from Mr. Madison's Proclamation of June 19th 1812, announcing the declaration of war with Great Britain, according to act of Congress the day previously. The document may be found in Nile's Register for 1812.

A long list of Counsellors and Attorneys were admitted to practice by the Supreme Court in New-York. The only candidate rejected was a colored man from Utica, named Bradley. He underwent a very rigid examination.

Upwards of 12,000 females in Massachusetts are engaged in the straw plaiting and braiding business. The town of Foxboro', with a population of scarcely 2000, employs 1400 persons, and manufactures annually 266,260 bonnets, valued at $321,000.

There are cypresses in Mexico, whose ages vary from 2,390 to 4,034 years, at the minimum estimate of scientific calculation; at the maximum, from 3,480 to almost coeval with the creation.

Two men, B. W. Brundage and Charles Gueyse, were recently killed at Sandusky, Ohio, by the accidental discharge of a cannon, while they were engaged in firing a salute to welcome the arrival of the first boat under the arrangement of the Buffalo and Sandusky line.

The Government of the United States, it is said, furnishes its seamen with the liquor on which they get drunk, and with irons to confine them till they get sober.

Versailles Bonnets is the name of a new fabric for the head-gear of the ladies, composed of glass woven upon silk. They present an exceedingly chaste and lustrious appearance.

The most extraordinary feat in the way of riding, in modern times, was accomplished by a boy aged 15 years, Fred. Tyler, who brought the news of the battles of the 8th and 9th ult., from Montgomery to Mobile. The distance, one hundred and ninety miles, was accomplished in thirteen hours—and during the entire night—he caught and saddled his horses, none of which were in readiness, as he was not looked for by those having the horses in charge. He was rewarded with a contribution purse of seventy dollars.

The rumsellers of Booklyn and some other parts of our State have resolved to resist the new Excise Law and defy the recent overwhelming expression of the public will at the Ballot Boxes. The pretext for this is the failure of the United States Supreme Court to confirm the constitutionality of the License Law of Massachusetts.

A son of Mr. A. B. Green, 14 years of age, was killed in the cotton factory at Stephentown, Rensselaer Co., on the 26th ult., by getting entangled in the machinery.

MARRIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., May 24th, by Eld. Daniel Coon, Daniel Lewis, M. D., of Stonington, Ct., and Miss Ann Frances Kenyon, of Hopkinton.

DIED,

In De Ruyter, N. Y. May 17, Elias Wells, in the 85th year of his age. He embraced religion in early life, and for the last twenty-five years has been a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in De Ruyter.

In Westerly, R. I., May 7, of a sudden illness, John Edward, son of Elery and Elizabeth Maxson, aged about eighteen months.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

PICTURES PRECAUTIONARY.

I saw a Pauper in the street,
Begging from door to door,
A crust of bread, poor wretch! to eat
He seldom ask'd for more.
I said, "old man, I grieve to think
That begging's your employ;
And why," he said, "I learned to drink
When I was but a boy."

I saw a man within the stocks
And rueful was his look,
The boys were pelting him with rocks
Yet all he had to brook;
A laughing stock to all—we think
To him there was no joy,
And why? he said, "I learn'd to drink
When I was but a boy!"

I saw a man within the jail
All haggard and care worn,
His eye was sunk, his cheek was pale,
It made my spirits mourn;
And sympathy that seeks the link
Of others grief or joy
Ask'd why? He said, "I learn'd to drink
When I was but a boy!"

I saw a man within a crowd
Beneath the gallows tree,
The curses of the throng were loud
Upon the Felon—He
With look, from which the soul would shrink
So fiendlike to destroy,
Said to the mob, "I learn'd to drink
When I was but a boy!"

I saw a man down in the ditch,
I heard him groan with pain,
I gave him soon a helping hitch,
And raised him up again.
I asked him, "why below the brink!"
"Why caught in such a ploy?
He said, because "I learn'd to drink
When I was but a boy."

I saw a man, one winter's day
Befrozen, stiff, and cold.
He'd made for home, but miss'd the way,
Thus is the story told,
But whiskey was the cause, we think,
That did his life destroy:
I heard them say, he learn'd to drink,
When he was but a boy.

And, is it thus, I woful said,
Of drinking, this the end?
My very heart within me bled
I said, "now heaven defend
My own dear child from ruin's brink,
While this, at least my joy
What e'er betide, he learned to drink
Not, when he was a boy."

TWO QUESTIONS FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL SCHOLARS.

I wish to propose to Sunday School scholars two questions, earnestly entreating them to consider seriously what would be their answers if they spoke the truth.

Since you cannot then deceive God, let me beg of you not to deceive yourselves but endeavor to answer my questions with sincerity.

My first question is, Why do you go to a Sunday school?

I shall state many answers which might probably be given by different characters, were the truth really spoken, and shall then leave each of you to consider which would most resemble your own.

Answer 1. Because, when all the other children in our village go to the Sunday school, it would look very odd if I did not do the same.

2. My parents wish me to go, otherwise I should like to stay at home.

3. My brothers and sisters all went before me, and had many nice books given as rewards; so I hope I shall get some too.

4. If I attend regularly, I hope the leaders will notice me, and perhaps give me a new straw bonnet, like the one they gave to Ann Wilson.

5. I have a good memory, and can answer my teacher's questions readily; for which I get praised and expect soon to be at the head of the class; otherwise I should certainly leave off attending.

6. I like to learn to sing; and sometimes our teacher reads to us pretty stories.

7. I like to go because all the scholars are treated with an excursion, and good things to eat, on the fourth of July.

8. I like to learn all about the Bible, so as to be able to show to poor ignorant people how much I know, and to be thought good and clever.

9. I feel myself to be a poor, ignorant, sinful child, and go to learn what I must do to be saved. I am thankful to God and my teachers; and I should love the Sunday school quite as well, and attend as regularly, even if no rewards or tickets were ever given; and if I should always stand at the bottom of the class.

Question second. What good have you got by attending a Sabbath school?

Answer 1. I am much improved in my reading.

2. I have gone twice through my catechism.

3. I can say a great many hymns.

4. I have got many rewards, and my teacher tells me I am very attentive.

5. Mrs. B. gave me a new bonnet at Easter.

6. The ladies have promised to look out for a place, when I go to service.

7. I have got many tickets for remembering sermons, and can give a far better account of what I hear than any other scholar in the class.

8. I know the doctrines of the gospel, as well as the duties required of a Christian; whilst my cousin Mary, who has been the same time at school, can scarcely answer a single question.

9. I have learned that I am a sinner, and Jesus is my only Saviour; and I hope I can say that the chief desire of my heart is, to spend my short life on earth to the glory of God, and to practice what I have been taught at the Sunday school.—Sabbath School Journal.

WHO WILL BE A MISSIONARY?

A little boy who attended a missionary meeting in Paris, France, was very deeply affected by what he had heard about the condition of heathen children. His mother was a poor widow and he was a great comfort to her. She loved the Bible, and had taught him to love it too. The next morning after the meeting, the little boy collected together all the money he had in the world, (only thirty-six sous,) and took it to the minister saying, "I hope, Sir, the people will soon be converted to God." The minister told him that there was a great deal to be done and he feared it would be a long while before the work would be finished. "I hope, sir, it will be finished before I am a man." The minister expressed his fear that it would not. "Well, sir," said the boy, "I prayed to God when I went home from the missionary meeting last night, that if it was not done before I grew up, he would make me a missionary, and permit me to be useful in this way." Does not some little boy who reads this short story, desire to be a missionary, if the work is not finished before he grows to be a man?

LITTLE JANE.

A little girl who had always been remarkable for her obedience to her parents, refused one morning to go to school. Her mother expressed much surprise, and said, "My dear, why do you not wish to go? It is high time; the bell has rung, so put on your bonnet and get ready, or I fear you will be too late; and you know if you are, it will displease Miss West very much; for she like all other teachers, dislikes to have her scolars late."

"I cannot go yet."

"What is the matter, Jane? don't you feel well?" said her mother.

"Yes, mother, but I have this morning neglected to go by myself. I have not thanked my heavenly Father for the kind care he has taken of me the past night, neither have I asked him to keep me from sin during the day—I am sure I cannot think of going to school until I do."

"Why, my child," replied the mother, "as it is getting late, perhaps you had better defer it until you come home—and when you are going along, you can raise your thoughts to God and he will listen to you."

"No, mother," said little Jane, "this will not do, for I once tried it, and nothing went right with me all that day."

Her mother pressed her no longer, but bade her go and implore God's blessing to rest upon her. This dutiful child did so, and was happy and cheerful the remainder of the day.

May her example lead others to seek the Lord and trust in him.

THE LITTLE GIRL WHO LOVED MISSIONS.

There is a little girl, between five and six years old, who often thinks about the poor heathen. She talks much about Jesus Christ. "My dear Saviour," she will say; "he was so good to die for me; and now I can go to heaven." She remembers that heathen children have never heard of this Saviour; and she longs to do something to make him known to them. But here is what her mother writes about her. "Now I will speak of my little daughter. She is greatly interested for the heathen. She heard at Sunday School, of a little boy who gave up sugar and butter, for which his father paid him three pence every week. She said she was determined to do the same, if her father would pay her. I told her if she would give up butter, of which she is very fond, she should be paid. And she has done it ever since. When she gets a dollar she intends to buy Testaments and send them to the heathen. She asks little children of her acquaintance, if they do not want to do the same." Is it not better to spend money in buying Testaments for the heathen, than to give it all away for candy and toys, and such things?

TO SABBATH SCHOOL TEACHERS.

Remember that you are dealing with souls which are to live eternally; that they are now like the melted silver, capable of receiving impressions which will last forever. Then, stamp upon them the image of Christ; and though it may show but faintly now, God will bless your faithful, prayerful labor, and bring out that image to shine as a star in glory. Remember that Christ, the Great Teacher, is your pattern, and that in order to be a faithful teacher, pleasing God, you must be like him.

Like him in prayer.—The stillness of night and early morn witnessed his earnest supplications for his disciples.

Like him in teaching.—The hearts of his hearers burned within them, and their souls were quickened at his words.

Like him by the way.—Ever uttering words of comfort and kindness to all who came to him troubled.

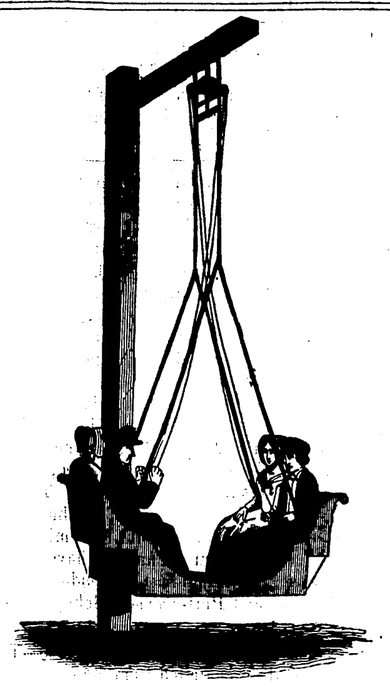
Like him at all times.—Doing the will of your Father in heaven.

Like him in knowledge.—Possessing the knowledge of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. [Congregational Visitor.

AN ARAB TALE.

In the tribe of Nedgde, there was a mare of great reputation for beauty and swiftness, which a member of another tribe, named Daher, vehemently desired to possess. Having failed to obtain her by offering all he was worth, he proceeded to effect his object by stratagem. He disguised himself like a lame beggar, and waited by the side of a road, knowing that Nabee, the owner of the mare, would soon pass. As soon as Nabee appeared, Daher cried, in a feeble voice, 'I am a poor stranger; for three days I have been unable to stir from this to get food; help me, and God will reward you." Nabee offered to carry him home; but Daher said, 'I am not able to rise; I have not strength.' Nabee then generously dismounted, brought his mare near, and helped the beggar to mount her. The moment he was mounted, Daher touched her with his heel and started, saying, 'It is I, Daher, who have got her, and am carrying her off.' Nabee called on him to stop, which Daher did. Nabee then said, 'Thou hast my mare; since it pleases God, I wish thee success; but I conjure thee, tell no one how thou hast obtained her.' 'Why not?' said Daher. 'Because some one really ill might remain without aid; you would be the cause why no one would perform an act of charity more, from the fear of being duped as I have been.' This discriminating kindness subdued Daher—he immediately dismounted and returned the mare to Nabee, and when they parted, they parted sworn friends. This tale shows forth the power of kindness in a beautiful manner—and the delight, with which the Arabs heard it told, demonstrates that they can appreciate true generosity.

Romaine in his "Walks of Faith," tells us of a lady whose room was hung round with portraits of her deceased children, and who being asked if it did not make her unhappy to be so constantly reminded of what she had lost, replied, "It is but a small matter between my Saviour and me which has them, he or I."



CHILDREN'S AMUSEMENTS.

I love to see children engaged in innocent amusements. The mind needs relaxation from study, and the body from toil. It is true that

"All play and no work makes Jack a mere toy."

and it is equally true that

"All work and no play makes him a dull boy,"

Children should have some sports, but they should be such as are healthful, innocent, and not dangerous.

The recreations of children in city and country differ somewhat in their character. In the cut, we have a representation of an amusement quite common in cities. Nearly every little boy and girl knows what "scupping" means. Scups are differently constructed, and sometimes so made as to be dangerous. I have known some very severe injuries to result from scupping. It is only a few days ago I called to see a family, the mother of which came into the parlor in great agitation, saying that one of her boys had just fallen from his scup in the garret, and had hurt his head badly. This scup was made by tying two ends of a rope over a beam, and the little girl or boy to be swung is seated in that part of it forming a loop which hangs down, while some one standing behind gives a push, nd thus keeps it in motion.

A kind-hearted man who loves to assist children in innocent amusements, has invented a scup which can be placed in the house or yard, and used at pleasure without danger. It is represented in the cut. I saw it at the last exhibition of the American Institute, with four full grown boys and girls in it, enjoying themselves very agreeably. It is set in motion by pulling a rope which is done by one in each end of the "boat," as the bottom of the scup was called. It is a perfectly safe and agreeable recreation.

Children, when at play, should treat their companions with great kindness, and be willing to favor each other in their sports. I am always pained when I see boys and girls quarreling, particularly brothers and sisters. God designed the family circle to be the abode of happiness and the kindest feelings, and his all-seeing eye looks with a frown upon that boy or girl who does any thing to lessen the harmony that ought always to be found amongst members of the same family.

"Whatever brawls disturb the street
There should be peace at home;
Where brothers dwell and sisters meet,
Quarrels should never come." F.

DON'T KILL THE BIRDS!

Little boy! don't kill the birds! At this season of the year, they are quite numerous, and how delightful to listen to their pretty songs. O, who can be so cruel as to kill the pretty little birds?

An act that caused me more pain than any other, when a boy, was the killing of a bird. It was a pretty chipping bird, and looked very much like the one represented in the above cut. The event happened in this wise: The bird had built a nest on a thorn bush that stood near the garden in front of my father's house; I used to go and look at the nest every day, and was delighted one morning to find in it a pretty little egg. In a few days, the nest contained five beautiful speckled eggs. I presume there are some of my readers that know how they looked.

One morning just before school time, I went out to take a look at the bird's nest. The bird flew chipping from the nest as I approached, and alighted upon an apple tree near by, the leaves of which hid her from my view. I took up a stone and threw it violently into the tree without the least design of doing any harm; when judge of my astonishment, as I saw the bird fall through the thick branches to the ground! I ran trembling to the bird, and took it up into my hand, just as it drew its last breath! O, how my heart ached! I wept bitterly, and would have given worlds to have restored the dear little thing to life; but I could not do it. I took it and placed it on the nest where it had sat in such apparent safety only a few minutes before, and went into the house. My mother noticed that I had been crying, and asked me what was the matter. I told her I was sick! I was sick, but it was sickness of heart! I could not go to school I felt so bad; and it would have melted any but a heart of stone to have seen the mate of the little bird come and sit on the bush and mourn the death of its companion who lay motionless upon its nest.

I know not how any boy can be so cruel as to wilfully kill a bird! You say it is sport. Ah, it is wicked sport. If I had killed that little bird purposely, I should almost have felt as if the mark of Cain was upon me. I always think of it when I go into the country, and hear their sweet warbling, though nearly thirty summers have come and gone since then. Let me entreat my young readers that whatever else they may do, they will not kill the pretty birds. F.

THE LION AND THE BULLS.

A FABLE.

Four bulls, which had entered into a very strict friendship, kept always near one another, and fed together. The lion often saw them, and so often had a mind to make one of them his prey; but, though he could have subdued any of them singly, yet he was afraid to attack the whole alliance, as knowing they would have been too hard for him, and therefore contented himself, for the present, with keeping at a distance. At last, perceiving no attempt was to be made upon them, as long as this combination held, he took occasion, by whispers and hints, to foment jealousies and raise divisions among them. This stratagem succeeded so well, that the bulls grew cool and reserved towards one another, which soon after ripened into a downright hatred and aversion, and at last ended in a total separation. The lion had now obtained his ends; and, as impossible as it was for him to hurt them, while they were united, he found no difficulty, now they were parted, to seize and devour every bull of them, one after another.

APPLICATION.

The moral of this fable is so well known and allowed, that to go about to enlighten it would be like holding a candle to the sun. "A kingdom divided against itself cannot stand;" and as undisputed a maxim as it is, was however thought necessary to be urged to the attention of mankind, by the best man that ever lived. And since friendships and alliances are of so great importance to our well being and happiness, we cannot be too often cautioned not to let them be broken by tale bearers and whisperers, or any other contrivance of our enemies. [Esop.

Mr. Dodd, an eminent minister, being solicited to play at cards, rose from his seat and uncovered his head. Being asked what he was going to do, he replied, "To crave God's blessing."—The company exclaimed, "We never ask a blessing on such an occasion." "Then," said he "I never engage in anything, but on what I can beg of God to give his blessing."

"In all thy ways acknowledge Him."

MY MISSIONARY BOX.

I would not be an Esquimaux
To dwell amid perpetual snow;
Nor would I a Siberian be,
To chase the ermine o'er the lea;
Nor would I by the Ganges rove,
An Indian child in banian grove;
Nor yet on coral islands wild.
I'm glad I am a Christian child!

They say that coral islands bright
Are radiant now with gospel light;
That to the frost-bound Esquimaux
The patient missionaries go;
That they for prayer and praise have made
A temple of the banian shade;
That chill Siberia hears a voice,
Which bids the banish'd ones rejoice.

And shall a Christian child forget
The many lands in darkness yet?
Perhaps the penny saved to-day
May help to teach a child to pray;
And though my purse is small and light,
Yet Jesus own'd the widow's mite.
Thou, who to me such love hast shown,
Oh bless the gift; accept thine own!
[Juv. Miss. Keepsake.

MISSIONARY OPERATIONS.

One of the most pleasing features in our Sunday Schools, is the interest awakened in the minds of the scholars, in behalf of the destitute. It is a rare thing indeed to meet with a scholar of any of our Sabbath Schools whose heart does not beat warmly in behalf of the heathen abroad, and the children and others of our own country who have not the means of grace. Nor does this interest show itself only in words. Many schools have organised missionary societies, almost wholly under the management of the children, in which sums of money are raised sufficient to sustain one, and sometimes two missionaries! We know of several schools in this city that sustain, in whole or in part, a missionary in the prosecution of his arduous labors.

A decided impetus has been given to this cause recently by directing the attention of the schools to the work of sustaining missionaries in the Western States, and purchasing of libraries for schools unable to obtain them. Many schools have taken hold of the subject vigorously, and are accomplishing a great work. Most of the labor is done as it should be, by the children, who collect the money from their friends and others, and pay it to their treasurer, who sends it to its place of destination. We wish we had time and room to tell our readers how much has been accomplished in this way; we mean of course how much that has come to our knowledge. Much that has been done, will not be known until revealed in the light of eternity.

We shall hereafter have something more to say about these missionary efforts. Meanwhile we want you, children, to love every son and daughter of our apostate race. They are all beings destined to the judgment seat of Christ and are entitled to your sympathies and prayers. Seek to do them all the good you can; and if you should be the instrument of their conversion in the hands of the spirit, great will be your rejoicing when Christ comes to make up his jewels.

NEWS.

Still sighs the world for something new,
For something new;
Imploring me—imploring you,
Some Will-o'-wisp to help pursue;
Ah, hapless world, what will it do?
Imploring me—imploring you,
For something new.

Each pleasure, tasted, fades away,
It fades away;
Nor you, nor I can bid it stay;
A dew-drop trembling on a spray,
A rainbow at the close of day;
Nor you, nor I can bid it stay,
It fades away.

WHY DO THE FLOWERS BLOOM?

"Why do the flowers bloom, mother?
Why do the sweet flowers bloom?
And brightest those we reared, mother,
Around my brother's tomb?"

"To fill the world with gladness,
My child, were flowers given,—
To crown the earth with beauty,
And lift our thoughts to heaven."

THE WORLD'S CONVENTION.

2 EXETER HALL, Strand, London,
May 1, 1846.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,

We are instructed by the Provincial Committee of the proposed Evangelical Alliance to open a communication with a few ministers and others of the principal bodies of Christians in the United States, and through them with the Christian public at large in that country, on the subject of the conference which—Divine Providence permitting—is intended to be held in London in August next. We therefore address you, and request that you will be kind enough to make the statement in this letter, together with the document we send with it, as generally known as you may be able, both through the public press, and in any other way which may seem desirable.

The document to which we refer, and which is entitled "A Brief Summary of Facts," contains, in the form of resolutions, a general view of the principles on which it is conceived the proposed Evangelical Alliance should be formed, the objects it may aim at, and the organisation by which it may be constituted and carry on its operations.

While we would take the liberty of commending the whole to the considerate attention of our fellow-Christians in America, as exhibiting a more accurate and connected view of the sentiments entertained on this important subject amongst us, than has yet reached them, there are two or three points to which we especially wish to draw your attention, since they are likely to direct and influence their own movements in relation to it.

It will be perceived from the first resolution, which relates to the organisation of the proposed Evangelical Alliance, that it is intended to be formed of Christians in their individual capacity, and not as representatives, or delegates of denominations or societies. Although, therefore, the friends who visit us from Ameriea should, for reasons which may govern themselves, be delegated to attend the Conference, they will distinctly understand that as individuals only they can be received at its meeting.

From the same resolution it will also be perceived that, in order to entitle an individual to a place in the Conference, he must have been previously admitted a Member or Corresponding Member of one of our four divisions of the Provisional Committee. Persons residing in foreign countries are attached as Corresponding Members to the London division. It will be necessary, therefore, that our friends in the United States, who intend to be present, should, as soon as convenient, forward their names to the office as above, or report themselves here on their arrival, in order that they may be enrolled in accordance with the regulations.

The attention of parties disposed to make such application for enrollment as Corresponding Members, and for admission as such to the Conference in August, must also be drawn to the resolution respecting Slaveholders—a resolution which was adopted after long and careful deliberation; and their attention is thus specially directed to it, in order to prevent the painful necessity of refusing admission at the time of the Conference to any person who, not having adverted to its spirit and design, might make application for the purpose.

It is likewise to be understood, that not only is an agreement in the doctrinal truths set forth in the document essential to membership, but also the intention to cultivate and exhibit the spirit of forbearance and brotherly love.

With regard to the objects contemplated in the formation of the proposed Evangelical Alliance, they will be found to be indicated with sufficient distinctness, at least for present purposes, in the series of Resolutions relating to them. All that it may be necessary to mention here, is, that the one great object to be aimed at, is the manifestation of the unity which exists among real Christians, and that the other objects enumerated are to be pursued in subservience to it.

The day fixed for the opening of the Conference is the 19th of August.

We are instructed, in conclusion, to assure our trans-Atlantic fellow Christians, that it will afford their brethren in this country unfeigned joy to receive them to the hallowed engagements of the intended Conference, and to welcome them to the hospitalities of their homes. They affectionately invite them to their family circles, as well as to the assemblies of the proposed Evangelical Alliance; and anticipate with sacred delight the opportunity of interchanging with them the holy sympathies of Christian love, and of approaching with common supplications and praises the throne of God and of the Lamb.

With assurances of personal esteem and respectful consideration,

We are Rev. and Dear Sir,
Yours affectionately,
In the uniting bonds of the Gospel,

THE JEWS IN PERSIA.

The following paragraphs are taken from the Journal of Rev. H. Stern, a missionary of the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. They give some idea of the persecution to which the Jews are exposed in all the Eastern countries.

HAMADAN, May 26.—Visited the Mullah. He had just been with the Cadi, to complain of some heavy taxes which had been laid upon the Jews in an unjust proportion. The Moslem population, consisting of 15,000 families, had been ordered to pay twenty tomauns, while the Jews, numbering only about 300 families, had been ordered to pay double that amount. Whilst we were waiting in the Mullah's house, for his return, a great number of Jews came in, to whom we preached the Gospel of peace. When the Mullah came, he gave us a hearty welcome, with the usual salutation of "Shalem aleekum," i. e., Peace be with you. He knew, and had conversed with Dr. Wolff, but had never read the New Testament. He promised to call upon us, which he soon did, accompanied by two very respectable Jews; we preached Christ crucified to them; they did not make any objection, but hung down their heads and sighed. I.—"But why do you not turn to the Lord your God?" The Mullah—"We expect that the Messias will soon come, and redeem us from the Goim, or Gentiles." I.—"How long have you been in this country?" He.—"Since the time of Cyrus." I.—"From what tribe are you descended?" He.—"From the tribe of Judah." I.—"Has your community here always remained as it is now?" He.—"No. A hundred years since there were thirteen synagogues in this place, and a very great number of Jews; but the Ishmaelites have only left us three; and one which was erected a few years since, they destroyed before it was completed." Second Mullah.—"On account of our sins we are in captivity, and on account of our sins the Goim (or Gentiles) rule over us, and on account of our sins we are exiles in this country." I.—"Yes; on account of the sin of which you are guilty, in rejecting Jesus of Nazareth, the wrath of God has come upon you to the uttermost. But believe in Jesus; his blood will cleanse you from all your sins." He.—"Give me the Gospel, and I will read it."

State of the Jews.

I will now give you some particulars relative to the state of oppression in which our Jewish brethren are kept by the Moslems, which I learned from the Mullahs.

I. They have not justice rendered unto them. Any Gentile can inflict upon them any punishment he may choose, with the greatest impunity.

II. They dare not dress themselves respectably, else they would be suspected of being rich, and would consequently be plundered.

III. If they possess any thing of value, the Moslems are sure to seize it.

IV. It is dangerous for a Jew to go out on Friday, that being one of the Moslem's sacred days.

V. When it rains, they are subject to great annoyances, if they go out, as they may splash a Moslem, and so pollute him.

VI. Whenever a Moslem charges them with crime, the whole town is sure to believe it, and they are ready to massacre them all. Last year some pilgrims from Mesjid Ali spread a report that the Jews in Bagdad, aided by the Turks, had effected some mischief. The whole town was immediately in an uproar. The Moslems cried, "The Jews are our enemies, and must be destroyed." And it was only by the payment of a large sum of money that they escaped from destruction.

Their position in Hamadan is indeed painful, and the marks of oppression are visible in every countenance. In Bagdad the Jews are fine, noble-looking men, and walk with all the gravity and independence imaginable; here, they go about with their heads bowed down, their countenances pale and emaciated; and their cringing, slavish appearance and demeanor, stamps them all with the badge of oppression. Let the skeptic and the infidel see Israel in these regions, and the scales of ignorance and delusion, one would imagine, must fall from his eyes, and he would be compelled to confess that Moses was a prophet indeed, and that the prophecies are not the productions of a speculative head, but of an inspired pen. The curses are indeed terribly fulfilled here. In Hamadan there are thirty Jewish families who came from Khorassin, where they were so fiercely persecuted a few years since that they were glad to escape on any terms; some fled to the adjacent countries, others saved themselves by professing Islamism. Such is the condition of the Jews in Persia.

HORRORS OF FANATICISM.

Flores, the vice-chief of the State of Guatimala, a Liberal, had made himself odious to the priests and friars, by laying a contribution upon the convent at Quezaltenango; and while on a visit to that place, the convent excited the populace against him, as an enemy to religion. A mob gathered before his house, with cries of "Death to the heretic!" Flores fled to the church; but as he was entering the door, a mob of women seized him, wrested a stick from his hands, beat him with it, tore off his cap, and dragged him by the hair. He escaped from these furies, and ran up into the pulpit. The alarm bell was sounded, and all the rabble of the town poured into the plaza. A few soldiers endeavored to cover the entrance to the church, but were assailed with stones and clubs; and the mob bearing down all opposition, forced its way into the church, making the roof ring, with cries of "Death to the heretic!" Rushing towards the pulpit, some tried to unhinge it, others to scale it; others struck at the unhappy vice-chief with knives tied to the ends of long poles; while a young fiend, with one foot on the mouldings of the pulpit, and the other elevated in the air, leaned over and seized him by the hair. The curate, who was in the pulpit with him, frightened at the tempest he had assisted to raise, held up the Holy of Holies, and begged the mob to spare him, promising that he should leave the city immediately. The unhappy Flores, on his knees, confirmed these promises; but the friars urged on the mob, who became so excited with religious frenzy, that after kneeling before the figure of the Saviour, exclaiming, "We adore thee, O Lord, we venerate thee," they rose up with the ferocious cry, "but for thy honor and glory this blasphemer, this heretic, must die!" They dragged him from the pulpit across the floor of the church, and in the cloisters threw him into the hands of the fanatic and furious horde, when the women, like unchained furies, with their fists, sticks and stones, beat him to death. His murderers stripped his body, leaving it disfigured and an object of horror, exposed to the insults of the populace, and then dispersed throughout the city, demanding the heads of Liberals, and crying, "Viva la Religion, y mueran les heregos del Congresso."

UNEQUAL DISTRIBUTION.

The United States have one minister of the Gospel for every fourteen hundred souls; England has one for every six hundred; Scotland has one for every twelve hundred, and the poor heathen have one to a million and a half! I am not for emptying Christendom of its ministers! but I am for distributing this immense disparity of her supplies. What should give a few favored lands a pre-eminence in this respect so much above all others? Must we despair of devising some method by which the conflicting interests of sects and denominations may be so adjusted, that this evil may at least in some measure be removed, and the number of missionaries to the heathen be augmented a hundred fold? England, if all her ministers are true men, has at this moment five or six thousand to spare for the heathen. The United States could spare fifteen hundred, and Scotland a thousand. Ten thousand ministers might, during the present year, be drawn off from Christendom and given to the heathen. What a donation to a dying world! What a present to its redeeming God and King! O that the day would dawn when all who love the Lord Jesus shall be of the same mind and judgment, when party animosities and jealousies shall die away; when apprehension and distrust at home shall no longer diminish the number of laborers abroad; and when churches of every name shall consecrate their best services and their first men to the great end of converting the world.

CHRISTIAN TOLERANCE.

From a Sermon in the National Preacher, by Rev. Wm. T. Savage.

"The soul of every man demands that he be tolerant." This is necessary to his true welfare.—Tolerance cannot be intermitted but to his injury. You are aware of that law of projectile forces, by which, in the firing of a cannon, for instance, the recoil against the back of a gun is equal to the power that propels the ball forward through the air to its destined object. There is just such a law to moral projectiles; and every intolerant act (which is more like a cannon ball than any other conceivable thing), not only produces evil, by shattering wherever it goes, but inflicts its recoil-blow upon the man from whom it originates. Against this his nature cries out; this he cannot with safety endure.

"We have been created in the image of God, endowed with reason and understanding, that we may appreciate the beings and objects around us; gifted with susceptibilities, that our hearts may enkindle with generous emotion for our Creator and our brethren; endued with executive energies, that we may accomplish benevolent results for God's glory and the welfare of our race. And how can we look upon our fellow-men, rich in the possession of a common origin and nature with ourselves, unreasonably and in disparagement of their worth, and not injure our minds? Can we shut up our hearts to them, as the objects of our sympathies, and not harden our sensibilities? Can we withhold the out-goings of our energy from promoting their happiness? We cannot. The outrage we should thus commit upon the throne of God and upon our brethren, is in no wise greater than the assault we should make upon our own souls.

"The intolerant man must be an unhappy man; there is an obliquity and dimness in his vision that deceives him. Wherever he goes he sees deformities; traits that should command his interest, lie hidden; his heart becomes cold and gloomy; he is unhappy. Under the laws of moral being, as established by the Almighty, this is the inevitable result. Have we not all sufficient experience on this point to be able to testify that it is so?

"Look now at the tolerant man. He passes among the lights and shadows of life with an eye open to all that is good and lovely around him. Error and vice thrust themselves upon his view; they excite his aversion and regret, and he endeavors to suppress them. He is assaulted, perhaps misrepresented and abused; but like his Master, he remembers that it is with men; and in behalf of humanity, that he is acting. He is forbearing, charitable, and kind, and he continues in effort still in behalf of his fellow-men, and in determined opposition to every evil. This course, we affirm, cannot fail to promote the welfare and happiness of his soul. It opens to him every object of generous thought, and sympathy, and high devotion. Above all it brings him into fellowship with that forbearing, self-sacrificing spirit, manifested in the life and death of Jesus, which is the source of all our happiness. O how little does the intolerant man understand what he does, when, in the exercise of this narrow spirit, he shuts himself out from the sweet symphonies of the human soul, casts off sympathy with the surpassing glories of nature and redemption, and locks up the divinity within him to his own contracted and confined feelings and views! Must not that divinity require enlargement and liberty? Does not the soul, in its own behalf, demand that its possessor be tolerant?"

ELOQUENT EXTRACT.

A spirit of fault-finding; an unsatisfied temper; a constant irritability; little inequalities in the look, the temper or the manner; a brow cloudy and dissatisfied—your husband or your wife cannot tell why—will more than neutralize all the good you can do, and render life anything but a blessing. It is in such gentle and quiet virtues as meekness and forbearance, that the happiness and usefulness of life consist, far more than in brilliant eloquence, in splendid talent, or illustrious deeds that shall send the name to future times.

It is the bubbling spring which flows gently; the little rivulet which glides through the meadow, and which runs along day and night by the farm-house, that is useful, rather than the swollen flood of the cataract. Niagara excites our wonder; and we stand amazed at the power and greatness of God there, as he "pours it from the hollow of his hand." But one Niagara is enough for a continent or a world; while that same world needs thousands and tens of thousands of silver fountains and gentle flowing rivulets, that shall water every farm, and every meadow, and every garden, and that shall flow on every day and every night with their gentle and quiet beauty.—So with the acts of our lives. It is not by great deeds only, like those of Howard, not by great sufferings only, like those of the martyrs—that great good is to be done; it is by the daily and quiet virtues of life—the Christian temper, the meek forbearance, the spirit of forgiveness in the husband and wife, the father, the mother, the brother, the sister, the friend, the neighbor, that good is to be done; and in this way all may be useful.

PLEASURES OF THE DOMESTIC MAN.

Some wisdom comes out of every natural and innocent action. The domestic man, who loves no music so well as his kitchen clock, and the airs which the logs sing to him as they burn on the hearth, has solace which others never dream of. The application of means to ends, ensures victory and the songs of victory not less in a farm or a shop than in the tactics of party or of war. The good husbandman finds method as efficient in the packing of fire-wood in a shed, or in the harvesting of fruits in the cellar, as in the Peninsular campaigns or the files of the departments of State. In the rainy day he builds a work-bench, or gets his tool-box set in the corner of the barn-chamber, and stored with nails, gimblet, pincers, screw driver and chisel. Herein he tastes an old joy of youth and childhood, the cat-like love of garrets, pressers, and corn-chambers, and of the conveniencies of long housekeeping. His garden or his poultry yard,—very paltry places it may be,—tell him many pleasant anecdotes. One might find arguments for optimism, in the abundant flow of this saccharine element of pleasure, in every suburb and extremity of the good world. Let a man keep the law,—any law,—and his way will be strown with satisfactions. There is more difference in the quality of our pleasures than in the amount.

[R. W. Emerson.

WHAT I WANT.

When I go to the house of God, I do not want entertainment. I want the doctrine which is according to godliness. I want to hear of the remedy against the harassings of my guilt, and the disorder of my affections. I want to be led from weariness and disappointment, to that goodness which filleth the hungry soul. I want to have light upon the mystery of providence; to be taught how the judgments of the Lord are right—how I shall be prepared for duty and trial, how I may pass the time of my sojourning here in fear, and close it in peace. Tell me of the Lord Jesus, who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree. Tell me of his intercession for the transgressors, as their advocate with the Father. Tell me of his Holy Spirit, whom they that believe on him receive, to be their preserver, sanctifier, comforter. Tell me of his chastenings, their necessity, and their use. Tell me of his presence, and sympathy, and love. Tell me of the virtues, as growing out of his cross, and nurtured by his grace. Tell me of the glory reflected upon his name by the obedience of faith. Tell me of vanquished death, of the purified grave, of a blessed resurrection, of the life everlasting, and my bosom warms. This is the Gospel—these are glad tidings to me as a sufferer, because glad to me as a sinner. They rectify my mistakes, allay my resentments, rebuke my discontent, support me under the weight of moral and natural evil. These attract the poor, steal upon the thoughtless, awe the irreverent, and throw over the service of the sanctuary a majesty, which some modes of address never fail to dissipate. Where they are habitually neglected, or lightly referred to, there is no Gospel; and those preachers have infinite reason to tremble, who are deserted by the sorrowful, and such as walk humbly with their God.

A FAMILY WITHOUT A GOD.—A little boy whose father possessed no religion, and neglected family prayer, spent some time in a pious family, where he was instructed in the simple truths of the Bible. While one day conversing about the greatness and goodness of God, he made this natural remark—"We hav'n't got any God at papa's house."

PEARLS.—"No doubt," said the late Mr. Brown, of Haddington, I have met with trifles as well as others; yet if God were to give me as many years as I have already lived in the world, I would not desire one circumstance in my lot changed, except I wish I had less sin. It might be written on my coffin, Here lies one of the cares of Providence, who early wanted both father and mother, and yet never missed them."

[From the English Baptist Magazine.]

SCENE IN A DESERT.

Over a burning Indian plain,
A missionary sped;
The noon-ray fell like fervid rain,
Down on his fainting head.

No dwelling cast a kindly gleam,
Athwart the cheerless waste;
But on beneath the melting beam,
The traveller passed in haste.

Till where a giant palm-tree shade,
Made pleasant coolness round,
A while his hurrying foot was staved—
What hath the pilgrim found?

Has a clear fountain sought the day,
With friendly smile and tone?
No: but out-stretched a Hindoo lay,
In the last strife, alone.

Alone! no mother's gentle breast
Pillowed his dying head;
No weeping household circle pressed,
With farewells round his bed!

But far, O far from heath and bower,
Where erst his smile gave light;
How shall he meet the Strong One's power,
In such unequal fight?

Alone! where shall the spot be found
Where mercy is not dealt?
Beside him, on the fervid ground,
The son of England knelt;

And whispered in the sufferer's ear,
With accents kind and low,
"Thou'rt passing brother from our sphere;
What is thy comfort now?"

Quick at the words his glazing eye,
Forth from its dewy brow,
Seemed with the wonted ecstacy
Of health and youth to glow.

And while the life-tide seemed to run
Fresh through each withering vein,
He shouted, "Christ, the Father's Son,
Has washed me from my stain."

No more: nature her strength had riven,
While Faith renewed his tongue;
Swift soared the ransomed soul to heav'n,
To join the blood-washed throng.

And bending o'er the senseless dust,
That cold and stone-like lay;
Did not that man of God gain trust,
To triumph on his way?

MARIE.

BARTIMEUS L. PUAAIKI, THE BLIND NATIVE PREACHER OF WAILUKU, SANDWICH ISLANDS.

We have before us a brief memoir of this wonderful man, one of the first Sandwich Island converts, some points of which we feel constrained to lay before our readers, assured that they cannot fail of being read with interest and profit.

Puaaiki had a mother who would have murdered him in his cradle if others had not interfered to prevent it; was a wicked and ungoverned child; became addicted very early to the use of the awa, an intoxicating root; was filthy and vicious in his habits; became blind in consequence of exposing his head and eyes naked to a tropical sun in connection with his intemperate and wretched habits; was in short a poor miserable, degraded heathen. In a speech made at Wailuku in 1837, long after his conversion, he sketched his own history thus: "I have been twice educated. In the time of dark hearts, I learned the hula—a native dance, accompanied with shocking licentiousness—and the lua—(the art of murder and robbery)—and the kake (a language unintelligible to any but those initiated in its mysteries.) I learnt mischief in those days." To this poor, degraded, wretched, filthy being was the grace of God manifested. When the first missionaries arrived in 1820, he was in the retinue of the chiefs, as a low buffoon. When the missionaries first came into court, this blind dancing buffoon was in their train. About this time he was taken with a severe fit of sickness, shut up in darkness by disease of the eyes, almost forgotten by his race, and in danger of perishing. God's messenger of mercy to his soul was Honolii, a native youth educated at Cornwall, Conn. "Honolii seeing Puaaiki lying in this pitable situation, was touched with Christian compassion, and spoke to him of the great and good Physician who alone could heal his maladies, and restore his sight. Puaaiki seemed to rouse up on hearing of so unwonted a character, and he eagerly inquired 'what is that?' On being again directed to the Physician of souls, the Lord Jesus Christ, he said at once he would go and hear of him. Accordingly as soon as he was able to crawl out of the house, he accompanied Honolii to the place of worship, and for the first time he listened to the glad tidings of great joy which, the heavenly messenger declared should be "to all people." There he heard of Him who came "to seek and save that which was lost;" who "though rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might become rich;" "who bare our sins in His own body on the tree; that we, being dead to sin, might live unto righteousness, by whose stripes we are healed." Nor did he listen in vain. The Lord opened the heart of this poor, blind, degraded heathen to receive the truth; and it is believed he became at once a monument of grace. In Christ Jesus, he became "a new creature; old things passed away; behold all things became new." The change wrought in this man by the Spirit of God, was soon known. His connexion with the chiefs, was a means of making public his change of views and of pursuit. Soon after the time of this hopeful conversion, the chiefs, having a drunken carousal, sent for Puaaiki to practice his art, and as formerly to hula for their diversion. But they sent in vain. He returned answer "That he had done with the service of sin and Satan, and that henceforth he should serve the King of heaven."

Henceforward Puaaiki is known only as an active, meek, energetic, indefatigable Christian. In Nov. 1824 Mr. Stewart, speaking of a meeting for prayer, writes thus: "We called on Puaaiki to address the throne of grace. We had never heard him pray; but his petitions were made with a pathos of feeling, a fervency of spirit, a fluency and propriety of diction, and above all, a humility of soul, that plainly told that he was no stranger there. His bending posture, his clasped hands, his elevated but sightless countenance, the peculiar emphasis with which he uttered the exclamation, "O Jehovah," his tenderness, his importunity, made us feel that he was praying to a God not far off but to one who was nigh, even in the midst of us. His was a prayer not to be forgotten; it touched our very souls, and we believe would have touched the soul of any one not a stranger to the meltings of a pious spirit. One such hour, one such testimony to the efficacy of truth to open the eyes of the blind, to turn from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God, repays us ten fold for all our sacrifices, and makes us more than willing renewedly to endure the toil, the privation, the care, the hundred known and unknown trials that sap the spirits and the constitution of a missionary in a pagan land."

The enthusiasm with which he applied his almost ruined eyes to learn to read is charming. By the most painful, self-crucifying efforts—"by literally digging, for he was so dim of sight that he used to bury his face in a book—he became able to make out a verse in the Bible." After making some considerable improvement however, his eyes became suddenly worse and he was forced to abandon his reading forever.

But his memory was wonderful. "Every text and nearly every sermon which he heard was indelibly fixed in his mind. The portions of scripture which were then being printed in his native language were made fast in the same way. By hearing them read a few times they were fixed word for word, chapter and verse."

Interwoven with this memoir is an interesting sketch of the revival at the Islands in 1837 and '38.

"Near the close of 1837, it became evident to us who were watching the signs of the times, and who had long been praying "O Lord, revive thy work" in the midst of the years, that the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit were about to descend upon the congregation at Wailuku. The members of the church, at that time few—awoke to a sense of their deficiencies of Christian character. They humbly besought God to pardon their sins for Christ's sake. They implored the gracious agency of the Holy Spirit, that, created wholly anew, they might henceforth live devoted to God. With many tears they confessed their faults one to another, and prayed the prayer of his people, graciously pardoned them and granted them the joy of his salvation. Among the members of the church, no one seemed more deeply penitent than Bartimeus; no one more importunate in seeking for mercy on his own behalf, and on behalf of his brethren. He too with some others of the church awoke to a deeper concern than before for the impenitent. They wrestled in prayer with God in behalf of sinners, blind to a sense of their guilt and danger, and deaf alike to the calls of mercy, and the thunders of the law—"dead in trespasses and sins"—and sinking rapidly to perdition. They became more active also in efforts for the salvation of these dying men. And when during most of the year 1838, the Spirit of God moved upon the mass of the population; and caused multitudes to bow to the sceptre of the Son of God, the heart of the good old man seemed to overflow with joy, and he poured out the emotions of his soul in language not easily described. None but those who saw him during some of those interesting scenes can conceive the appearance of Bartimeus. No painter can do justice to the heaven-illumined countenance of our friend. And yet no one that saw that glow—that index of unearthly joy, can cease to retain an affecting impression of it. Often have I thought when seeing him seemingly laboring under the weight of his holy emotion, of good old Simeon when he exclaimed, "Lord now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation"

Having spent several years as a native helper, he was in 1843 ordained as a native preacher. Of his eloquence and power in public speaking, the missionaries speak in the strongest terms. "Often, say they, while listening with exquisite delight to his eloquent strains have we thought of Wirt's description of the celebrated blind preacher of Virginia."

A page about his labors in the Sabbath School may be useful by way of example.

"In the Sabbath School, Bartimeus appeared to great advantage. Here he seemed to be peculiarly in his element. Others might prefer to hear him address the public assembly, as the public assembly afforded a broader arena for the exhibition of his commanding eloquence. He seemed more at home, however, in the Sabbath School, as he was unaffectedly humble, and he had there full scope for his colloquial talents, which were of a high order. In this sphere of labor, second only to the labors of the pulpit, I witnessed, with a gratification which I cannot describe, his untiring efforts—literally untiring, for he continued them with unabated activity till his last sickness—to benefit all who attended upon this method of instruction. His efforts were not confined to any particular class, though in the spirit of his beloved Master who "came to seek and save that which was lost"—Bartimeus devoted special attention to the aged and to the most ignorant. He was accustomed to traverse the house, going from group to group, and affording instruction where most needed. Now you might hear him addressing a class of children, pointing them to Christ, who when on earth, said, while embracing them, "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for such is the kingdom of heaven." Again you might hear him inquire of an adult, who was reading the word of God, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" adding perhaps a brief explanation, and a word of affectionate counsel. At another time you might see him in the midst of a circle of aged persons instructing them in the catechism, a small but valuable tract early prepared by the mission, and committed to memory by many of the aged. With this little tract Bartimeus was perfectly familiar, and he was very skilful in explaining and enforcing its statements.

In conversing with the aged, he would frequently kindle and glow with surpassing eloquence, till the group would seem electrified, and hang upon his lips with admiration.

He would frequently address an individual, a youth, an adult, or an aged but impenitent person; and most admirable were the exhibitions which he gave of his skill in probing the heart, and pressing the conscience. Rarely indeed have I seen his equal in this department of Christian effort. For untiring activity; skill in adapting truth to different minds; tact in illustration; faithfulness in dealing with the impenitent, and for ability in making eloquent appeals to men of all classes;

"We ne'er shall look upon his like again."

One more extract we quote for the pertinence of its appeals to the case of some perhaps of our readers who are parents. Blind Bartimeus is speaking at the funeral of a child. He first addresses children.

"He then addressed parents, and most solemnly did he administer reproof for their criminal indifference to the spiritual welfare of their children. On other subjects they were wakeful; on this fatally asleep, unmoved by the admonitions of the word and providence of God tho' breaking upon their ears in a voice of thunder. Said he, "If one of you, parents, lose a handkerchief, or any trifling article worth perhaps a shilling, how prompt and eager are you in the pursuit. You run to one and another, exclaiming, "I have lost my handkerchief! Have you seen anything of my handkerchief? Alas, alas! my property is gone;" nor do you rest satisfied till you have obtained the article. But how is it with you when your children are out of sight? Why for a long time hour after hour you are as easy, as unconcerned as though they were under your own eye—do not make a single inquiry;—When at length you miss them, and inquire of some one, "Have you seen my child to-day?" receive for answer, "Yea I saw him or her, among some idle, vicious companion—I saw them bathing in the sea or I saw them rambling in the fields!" Your anxiety is at an end, and you resume your labor, merely saying, "O very well." Yes, parents, so amazingly dark hearted are you, so sottish, worse than brutish—for does not the brute care for her young?—that the danger of your child, of more worth than ten thousand worlds—your child will outlive the sun and the stars, and be an angel or a fiend when every thing you now behold shall be consumed in the final conflagration,—I say that the danger that your child will be corrupted by wicked companions, and ruined for time and eternity, is a matter of less concern to you than the loss of a paltry handkerchief, worth a single real! How is this parent? Is it not even so? Why some of you parents I have seen leading your little child scarcely able to walk, by the hand, while you have been carrying your dog in your bosom, or have had him swung upon your back, thus showing the preference you feel for a brute to the child, which God has given you. Cease thus to cast contempt on the image of God. Awake, I beseech you, to a sense of the value of the soul. Cry mightily to God on behalf of your offspring—"bone of your bone, and flesh of your flesh," Walk before them uprightly. Teach them to fear God, to hate and avoid sin, to go to Christ for pardon and eternal life. Do all you can to save them from perdition, lest God require their blood at your hand."

Our limits will not allow us to make more extracts. His life and character in detail are a cheering specimen of what divine grace can do in lifting up the blasted wreck of a man from the deepest degradation, and then in washing, moulding, and adorning his whole being—body, intellect and heart, to the image of a lovely, finished Christian. It shows that the Lord can raise up native helpers of a most efficient stamp. Let the churches pray for this. We are sure that if this brief memoir were published and extensively circulated among our churches, it would draw forth many a tear of gratitude for such grace of God, and would show what God can do in raising up sons of thunder and of consolation out of the forlorn and crushed children of Pagan darkness.

New York, June 11, 1846.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY convened for its Third Anniversary at Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., on fifth-day, June 4, 1846. Brother Lucius Crandall, President of the Society, not being present, the first Vice President took the chair. The exercises commenced by a Hymn, the reading of select portions of Scripture, and prayer by Eld. Wm. Satterlee.

Soon after the session was opened, a question arose in regard to membership. It seems that in order for Auxiliary Societies or churches to enjoy the privilege of sending delegates, it is necessary for them to report annually to the Board of Managers. Some societies having neglected to comply with this wholesome regulation, were of course not strictly entitled to send delegates. The matter was disposed of by inviting such delegates to a seat as represented Churches or Societies which had expressed a desire to stand as members, with which their desire had not been formally communicated to the Board.

The Treasurer's Report was read by Paul Stillman. It showed that the receipts since last report, added to the money at that time in the Treasury, were $545,57—a sum which, although small in comparison with what might have been profitably expended, was yet sufficient to show that the tract cause has a hold upon the hearts of the people.

The Annual Report of the Board of Directors was read by Thomas B. Brown. From this we learn that the Society has had four Agents in its employ during portions of the year, whose business it has been, besides collecting funds for the Society, to preach from place to place upon the subject of the Sabbath, and distribute tracts. Eld. Samuel Davison has labored in this way in New Jersey; Eld. Alexander Campbell in Rhode Island and Connecticut; Eld. Varnum Hull in New York, and Dea. L. M. Dean in Pennsylvania. The reports of these Agents present many facts serving to show how extensive and happy have been the effects of tract distribution. No one can read the extracts which the Board have incorporated in their report, without being convinced, that the blessing of God accompanies the efforts of the Society, and crowns them with abundant success. In the publishing department, the Report states that during the year new editions have been issued of Tracts Nos. 3, 5, 6, and 7, and of the Sabbath Vindicator No. 1. There has also been issued a new tract, entitled, "The True Sabbath Embraced and Observed," being a narration of the exercises of mind through which one who had been educated to observe the first day became a Sabbath-keeper. The old work of George Carlow is now being stereotyped, and the old work of Edward Stennett, it is intended to publish just as soon as certain deficiencies in the copy now in possession of the Board can be supplied from a perfect copy in London. Besides these, it is in contemplation to publish, as soon as circumstances will allow, a tract on the subject of Sabbath Legislation, showing its natural tendencies and effects.

The reading of the Annual Report was listened to with interest, and was followed by a resolution that it be published under the supervision of the Board of Directors.

Eld. WM. B. MAXSON spoke in favor of the resolution. He regarded the Report, especially that part of it which contained the extracts from the journals of missionaries, as a faithful exhibition of the way in which truth affects the mind. Some might think it caricatured the objections of our opponents. But it is not so. Their arguments are almost as conflicting and numerous as the persons who present them. This truth is here shown by facts which cannot be gainsayed, and which ought therefore to be made known. It is here seen, also, how easy it is to awaken thoughts and convictions of duty which have been smothered for years. A single tract has sometimes done it, fastening the truth upon the mind so as to make it impossible to shake it off. What is said of one of old, who though dead yet speaketh, may be said with equal propriety of these tracts, some of which, though long ago distributed, are now bringing forth a rich harvest.

Eld. W. B. GILLETT was in favor of publishing the Report, because in the first place it answers the question so often asked, "What have you accomplished?" It shows that we have accomplished a great work by leading a very large number of persons to acknowledge the soundness of our positions, and not a few to heartily embrace them. In the second place, by presenting the objections raised by different persons, and the manner of answering them, it furnishes all the arguments necessary to meet the boldest and most skillful opponent of our views. Hence he would have it published and extensively circulated.

Eld. DAVISON and others spoke in the same strain of approval of the Report; and all seemed to regard the facts which it contained in regard to the effects of distributing Sabbath Tracts as in a high degree encouraging.

Whereas, the advocates for a stricter religious observance of the first day of the week are making strenuous efforts to secure that object by the enactment of laws against laboring on the first day, therefore,

Resolved, That it is incumbent upon the American Sabbath Tract Society to give special attention to this subject, and to provide publications showing that such legislation is unchristian in its spirit, anti-republican in its tendencies, and oppressive in its practical workings.

The above resolution was introduced by Eld. SAMUEL DAVISON, who supported it by somewhat lengthy remarks. For many hundred years, he said, there have been statute laws to secure the religious observance of the first day of the week. At first it was regarded only as a festival day, and these laws had reference to its observance in no higher character. In later times, however, men have begun to legislate upon it as a Sabbath, thus adding to the veneration of the people for it. To do this in respect to a day for which there is no Scriptural authority, is antichristian—it is countenancing the great apostacy. Many persons, it is true, think that to deny the sacredness of the first day is as bad as to deny all religion. So have men thought in regard to other religious observances which are now obsolete and exploded. It will be so with this. Indeed, if there could be a vote taken by the mass of the people upon the simple question of the comparative claims of the first day and the seventh day, a very large portion would speak out for the seventh. Notwithstanding this, it is difficult to get legislators to take any steps in respect to the matter. They acknowledge that our claims are just, yet hesitate about identifying themselves with them. We need a treatise on the subject of Sabbath Legislation to present them. It is needed especially at the present time, when so much effort is being made to secure legislation in favor of the first day.

Bro. PAUL STILLMAN said that it was only a few years since this subject was first broached. Then we were looking to the legislature for laws in our favor. These they have refused to grant us. We have thus been shown how difficult it is to secure laws for the protection of a minority, and how necessary it is to leave religious questions where the great Lawgiver has left them. He would go for abolishing all the laws in favor of Sunday. Indeed, the advocates for these laws seem to feel that they are unjust. Hence they do not carry them out. If the law is not to be enforced, it ought to be abolished. Almost the only cases in which it is enforced are cases where it is most unjust. The Jews, for instance, are sometimes singled out and punished, while those who do not openly profess to disregard the first day are permitted to do what they please. What a miserable picture of Christianity do the Sunday laws present to the Jews!

Eld. MAXSON was in favor of the resolution, and opposed to the Sunday laws. Such laws take the business of the divine legislator out his hands. They oppress us, whose rights ought to be as sacred as the rights of any body else. They are unconstitutional, and no State has a right to restrict us from labor on a day which conscience and the Bible approve us for using. But we are told that it disturbs others. If this is true, why are they not disturbed by the noise of those who profess to keep the first day? If they would enforce the law against such, whenever they disturb the "sacred stillness" of Sunday, they might obtain fines enough to pay the county taxes. But this does not answer. Spleen must be vented upon a class of persons who differ from them in theory as well as in practice.

Resolved, That in view of the ignorance of the public in regard to the real object and primary design of the Sabbatic institution, it is important that a tract devoted to this particular point be issued and put in circulation by the Board as early as possible.

This resolution was moved by Eld. T. B. BROWN, who said, It is a common argument among modern advocates for the first day, that the Sabbath is simply a day for religious worship, and hence it is wicked to take it from the poor. These objects are no doubt very important, but they are only collateral, not primary. If they were the primary objects, then one day would be as good as another. Indeed, many persons seem to think so, and are therefore very ready to receive the doctrine. But this notion overlooks the great design of the institution as commemorative. It is in this character that it stands as a testimony against Atheism and Idolatry—teaching that there is a God who created the world, and that he did it without the aid of any pagan deities. To overlook this, is to blot out the primary design of the Sabbath, which is something more than a mere rest day. We are told, perhaps, that redemption is so much greater than creation that it is not important to celebrate the latter work. But remember that all religion rests upon the doctrine of creation and a Creator, and if you blot out that doctrine, there is no need of redemption.

Eld. VARNUM HULL followed in some interesting remarks. He spoke of the practical evils which have resulted from a misconception of the real design of the Sabbath. It has weakened one of the best evidences of the truth of the religion of the Bible. It has prevented our deriving from the institution that aid in the work of sanctification which it was designed to afford. In the transition which some minds are now making from a reverence for the first day to the adoption of the true Sabbath, there will be danger of taking false views. Hence it is important that we provide the means of learning the truth.

Resolved, That we regard all efforts to evangelize the world, which do not make a just presentation of the law of God in its relation to the Gospel, as in a great measure fruitless; and that the system of theology which overlooks the relation of one to the other, is erroneous, and cannot exert that converting power ascribed to that which is declared to be the power of God and the wisdom of God.

Eld. WHEELER, of Salem, N. J., who has recently embraced the Sabbath, accompanied this resolution with interesting remarks. It is the law of God which makes a man feel himself a sinner, and in need of Christ. It prepares the way, therefore, for his being evangelized. The mere salvation of the soul is not all for which we are to aim. There are other things to be prized and sought. We are to be conformed to the divine will, without which all professions of evangelization are empty and meaningless.

The discussion of the foregoing resolutions was followed by a discourse from Eld. Thomas B. Brown, on the duty of laboring to disseminate right views respecting the Sabbath.

The Tract Society, after having held two interesting and harmonious sessions, adjourned on fifth-day evening, to meet for its next anniversary at such time and place as shall hereafter be determined upon and notified by the Executive Board.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association held its Fourth Anniversary at Berlin on sixth day, May 5. The Introductory Discourse was preached by Eld. Geo. B. Utter, after which a collection was taken amounting to $14 58.

Before entering upon business, Eld. Thomas B. Brown made some remarks in regard to the position and duty of the Association. He regarded the present as a critical period. As a denomination, we have too long been satisfied with peace and union among ourselves, while we have forgotten those dark portions of the earth where Christ is not known. For a time past, however, we have been thinking of our duty in this respect, until we begin to feel its weight. Now a crisis has come, and the question is to be decided whether we shall go forward or backward. Let us feel our responsibility and act accordingly.

Prayer was offered by Eld. Alex. Campbell.

The Treasurer's Report was read by A. D. Titsworth. From it we learn that the receipts during the year have been $1645 26, of which sum $294 33 was for Home Missions, and $1350 93 for the Foreign Mission.

The Annual Report of the Board of Directors was read by Eld. Samuel Davison. The Report commences by alluding to the growing sense of responsibility among the members of the Board, which has led to a very prompt attendance of the meetings which have been held quarterly. Soon after the last Anniversary, it was resolved to commence a Foreign Mission, and to issue proposals for one or more missionaries. Eld. Solomon Carpenter and wife expressed a willingness to engage in the work, and were accordingly appointed. They spent the past winter in the New-York City, where Brother Carpenter attended a course of medical lectures, and pursued such other studies as seemed adapted to prepare him for the labor in which he is to engage. The Board recommend Eastern Africa as the most promising location for the mission. That field surpasses all others in the aggregate population among whom the Gospel was never preached; the country was early settled, and it is not known that a single missionary is now laboring in it, which can be said of no other equally extensive and populous portion of the globe. Besides this, the circumstance that the people pay a regard to the seventh day, makes the field particularly inviting to us. Commerce is rapidly extending in that direction, and not less than twenty American vessels annually visit Zanzibar, a fertile and populous island adjacent to the eastern coast of Africa. The Board therefore recommend, that Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter, after completing their preparation for the work, proceed to Aden, and then embrace the first favorable opportunity to penetrate the kingdom of Shoa until they find a suitable station for the mission. Should they find it impossible to locate in Shoa, and find also that Aden does not furnish a field of missionary labor, they should be instructed to proceed to Zanzibar.——In regard to home missionary labor, the report states that at the last meeting, Brethren Lucius Crandall, Thomas B. Babcock, Richard C. Bond, and Azor Estee, were in the employ of the Board. But they have either fulfilled the time for which they were appointed, or been called to other stations. Besides these, Brethren Samuel Davison, Alex. Campbell, and Varnum Hull, have labored for the collection of funds and preaching the Gospel during portions of the year. The Board are anxious to increase the amount of labor in the home field, particularly in the West, where they desire to have missionaries who shall reside among the people and itinerate in the vicinity of their location.

After the adoption of the Report, an abstract of which we have given above, several resolutions were introduced, and discussed with a good deal of interest and spirit. We wish we could present the substance of the remarks upon them. But our notes are imperfect, and our time has been so much taken up otherwise, as to render a complete report impossible.

Eld. Alex. Campbell introduced the following resolution, which he supported with appropriate remarks. It was also advocated by Eld. Wm. B. Maxson and Varnum Hull.

Resolved, That the action of the several Churches and Associations to whom the subject has been presented, together with the Providence of God, is such that we feel encouraged to go forward in the establishment of a Foreign Mission.

All the speakers upon this resolution felt confident that we were able to engage in the work recommended. Besides, they saw such indications that the hand of the Lord was in it, that they dare not hesitate. Years ago, when the subject was brought up, it was said we that had no men to engage in the work. Now one has offered himself who is peculiarly qualified for it. It is no small thing for a man to become willing to separate himself from his kindred and all early associations, and devote himself to a life of toil among the heathen. And in this circumstance, that one stands ready, is seen the Providence of God going before us.

The following resolution was introduced by Paul Stillman, who spoke in favor of it with much warmth and feeling.

Resolved, That when a suitable person shall offer himself to accompany our present approved missionaries, the Board will be justified in accepting and sending such a brother with them.

Bro. Wm. Maxson urged the passage of the resolution, because he was sure that such an addition to the mission would greatly increase its strength. The only objection which any body can raise, is on the ground of inability to sustain more than two. But if the Israelites of old could contribute one-third of their income (as many suppose they did) to religious purposes, and yet be none the poorer, we may certainly do a great deal more than we have yet done.

Eld. Satterlee was in favor of the resolution. The subject of sending out a missionary to a foreign land was discussed when the conference was first formed. But it was said that we had not the men. Now we have them. Let us not send out one alone, but follow the example set us by the Holy Ghost in sending forth Paul and Silas together.

Resolved, That we approve of the recommendation of the Board to make Eastern Africa the field of our first foreign missionary effort, and that we will to the utmost of our power sustain the Board in sending our present approved missionaries to such a station as they shall judge best as soon as they are prepared to go.

The above resolution was advocated by Eld. Campbell and others, who spoke of the solemnity and sacredness of the pledge which it contained. Somebody must take responsibility in this matter. Let it be divided among us by the hearty adoption of this resolution on the part of each member of our churches, and there will be no danger.

The two following resolutions were adopted unanimously.

Resolved, That the importance and magnitude of the enterprize on which this Association has entered, is such as to call for the most ardent prayers and the most liberal contributions of all our churches and every individual friend of the cause of God and truth.

Resolved, That the employment of a suitable missionary agency to collect funds is indispensable to the successful support of our missionary operations.

Elder S. Carpenter reported that thirteen dollars and twenty-five cents had been put into his hands for the foreign mission, most of which was received during the session of the Eastern Association at Marlborough, N. J.; that he should not easily forget the impression made on his miud, when a sister, belonging to the Church in Shiloh, having brought up her offering to the House of God, and having sought an opportunity during the intermission to ask him afresh if he still expected to go on the foreign mission, and receiving an affirmative reply, placed in his hand ten dollars to aid in that work. Brother C. said that he had no wish, neither was he at liberty, to give the name of the individual; but that in whatever land of darkness he might be permitted to preach this gospel of the kingdom, there he should feel it his duty to tell of this that this woman has done for a memorial of her. And he doubted not that others, who had presented smaller sums, had come as near throwing into the treasury all their living as the sister referred to.

The Missionary Asssociation adjourned near evening on sixth-day, to meet again at such time and place as shall be agreed upon by the Executive Board.

"YE ARE THE SALT OF THE EARTH."

Not by noisy bustle or pageant show, does this symbol of Christian influence exert its preserving power, but by a silent unseen operation, while in contact with the subjects of its saving power. So it is not the loud harangue, the melting appeal, the piling climax, or logical deduction, that turns back from man the tide of death. Neither is it the display of pompous ceremony, or the sanctimonious phiz of Pharisaic austerity, or the dry speculations of Orthodoxy, that move the moral world and bring man into the image and service of his Maker. No—under God it is the still, the unseen, the uncounted influence, of warm, honest, heartfelt, and lifewrought piety, running through all the channels of intercourse, mingling, diffusing, and pervading, and becoming part and substance with the mass. Unregenerate men are affected less by the direct appeals of Christianity, than by the demonstrations of principle involved in the daily intercourse, the traffic, the spirit, and the controling motives of the professedly pious. The best way to spread religion is to exemplify it. J. R. I.

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—Soon after the establishment of the Free Church of Scotland, several leading ministers of that Church visited this country to collect funds for the erection of meeting-houses. They received large sums of money, a portion of which was contributed by slave-holders. This created considerable excitement among certain members of the church, who would have no fellowship with slave-holders—not even to receive the money which they contributed. Recently the United Associate Synod of Scotland passed resolutions condemnatory of slavery, and lamenting and condemning the conduct of the Free Church in accepting money for the slave States in America. These resolutions involve a condemnation of Drs. Chalmers, Cunningham, and other divines of the Free Church. The Synod which passed these resolutions consisted of 400 Ministers.

TEMPERANCE HOUSES.—The revolution in regard to granting licenses for the sale of intoxicating drinks will lead to a revolution in the character of houses for the entertainment of travelers. In times past, temperance houses have often put the fidelity of temperance men to a severe test. They have been desirous, like other men, to be well entertained while abroad, but in many places they have found it difficult to secure good entertainment without giving their patronage to houses where liquor was sold. It need not be so any longer. Hereafter there will be no apology for miserable temperance houses, and no necessity to abandon them for others. At Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, Albany, and other places, there are houses conducted strictly upon the temperance plan, where every comfort can be obtained. Recently one has been opened at Syracuse, N. Y., which is said to rival anything in that section of country. It is four stories high, has halls 350 feet long, a dining room 90 by 40 feet, contains 140 rooms, and was furnished at a cost of $20,000.

ANNIVERSARIES IN LONDON.—The month of May is a great time for the anniversaries of the principal benevolent societies in London. From the accounts brought by the last steamer, it seems that they were already in session when she sailed. London was thronged with persons from every part of the united kingdom, who had come up for the purpose of attending them. In due time we shall give some account of their doings.

THE WAY TO DO IT.—Some people are everlastingly talking about what ought to be done, and what they would like to do, yet for some reason they make no progress. If the following paragraph should meet the eye of any such, it may teach them a lesson:—

"The Rev. Dr. Yates, missionary to India, who accomplished an almost incredible amount of labor, in preaching, translating, and other missionary work, being asked by a friend what plan he adopted to enable him to accomplish so much, replied, in his own quiet, unassuming manner, I have no particular plan, only when I have any thing to do, I GO AND DO IT, that is all!"

THE PRESIDENTESS.—We copy the following sketch of Mrs. Polk, from the Boston Traveler. The Correspondent of this paper speaks from personal knowledge. He says:

"The 'White House' has been almost uninterruptedly for fifteen years without the wife of the President presiding. Soon we were joined by the porter, and were conducted to Mrs. Polk's room. The reception-room of the President's lady was every way worthy of the mansion. It was superbly furnished, the whole furniture being new, and the style unique and elegant. The arrangement was in elegant taste, showing at once that the presiding influence there was refined and elevated. I had heard much of Mrs. Polk; much of her elegance of manners and superior beauty. Soon Mrs. Polk entered the room, and with an ease and grace bade us welcome to the mansion. She is truly an elegant lady. No report of her appearance or manners that I have ever seen, has done her justice. She is tall, finely-formed, dark hair, dark eyes, and of great personal beauty. Her manners are easy, yet dignified. No one can see her and not feel that she is a fit representative of the beauty, intelligence and refinement, of our American ladies. Mrs. Polk is decidedly religious. She does not hesitate to acknowledge her dependence upon God. Yet is her piety not obtrusive, nor her regard for religious things made offensively prominent."

PEACE DOCUMENTS.—Among the Peace Documents which we have announced as having been forwarded to Elihu Burritt, by the Britannia, we notice one from the citizens of Edinburgh, Scotland, to the citizens of Washington, D. C. It is signed by Adam Black, Lord Provost and Chief Magistrate of Edinburgh, and also by the Magistrates, Councillors, Professors in the University, Teachers in the Schools, Literary Men, and by most of the Clergy in the city. Upon the list we find the name of Dr. Chalmers, as also the names of many others who rank among the first men of the age.

We notice also two addresses from Exeter, England; one to the citizens of Cincinnati, and signed by 1548 men; the other is to the women of Philadelphia, and is drawn up and signed by 1623 women of Exeter, who were incited to the act by disappointment in not being invited to enroll their names upon the Cincinnati Address. We wish the ladies of America would catch the spirit that animates their own sex on the other side of the Atlantic.

Trinity Church was open last Sunday for Divine worship, and will be regularly open every Sunday hereafter. Service will be performed every day throughout the year at 9 and 3 o'clock. The seats on week days are free.

Died, in London on the 12th day of May last, after an illness of four weeks, GANSEVOORT MELVILLE, Esq. of this city, late Secretary of Legation of the United States at the Court of St. James, in the 31st year of his age.

General Intelligence.

DOINGS IN CONGERSS.

There is but little doing in Congress, and yet the members seem to think they must continue in session lest the chances of war should require their attention. Good judges express the opinion that they will not adjourn until near the first of August.

The Senate has spent a little time upon the Post Office Appropriation Bill. The general opinion was, that there would be no increase upon the letter postage, but that a reduction might be needed. A memorial was presented from New-York for a special mission on the Eastern Continent with a view of increasing our commerce with those countries.

The House spent several days in discussing the Bill for appointing two Major Generals, and four Brigader Generals.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

The news received since our last publication, confirms the report that General Taylor has taken Metamoras, and that the Mexican army is retreating in a state of discouragement, a large number having deserted the standard. The clerk of the steamship Telegraph, which arrived at New Orleans from Point Isabel, brought the confirmation of previous advices.

He reports that on the 17th instant a detachment of 300 regulars and 350 volunteers proceeded to Barita and took possession of it, and established a military depot.

On the night of the 19th, an express arrived from Gen. Taylor stating that he had crossed the Rio Grande, and taken the city of Matamoras without opposition—the Mexicans having fled the city—and deserted from their ranks in battallions.

The Delta says the Mexican army left a large quantity of ammunition after them for which Gen. Taylor will find use. Commodore Connor, with most of his squadron have gone to Pensacola to refit and reinforce before, as report has it, making an attack on Vera Cruz. The fleet on its return will be reinforced by two or three line-of-battle ships.

The Mexican army retreated to Camargo, about 200 miles from Metamoras, it is supposed for reinforcements.

The following incidents connected with the army movements show some of the natural fruits of war.

The escape of Capt. Thornton, at the time his company was so badly cut up, is almost incredible. After carrying him safely over a high ledge, into which he had been decoyed, his horse brought him safely over fences and deep ravines, swimming the Rio Grande above Metamoras. Then passing down below the town on the opposite side, in attempting to leap a broad ditch, he missed his footing, when both horse and rider were thrown by the fall. The Captain was so stunned that he was soon after taken up by the Mexicans perfectly unconscious of what had happened. After the battle of the 8th, he was exchanged and restored to our army.

Capt. Auld thinks the whole number of our killed and wounded must amount to more than 300. Besides the wounded taken to St. Joseph's, there are now 40 at Point Isabel too badly wounded to be removed. All but three it is thought will recover. There are three Mexican prisoners having but one leg between them all.

After being shot in the arm, Col. McIntosh received a bayonet wound in the mouth; it passed through one side of his head; there are hopes of his recovery.

The condition of the brave and esteemed Capt. Page is melancholy indeed; the whole of his lower jaw, with part of his tongue and palate, was shot away by a grape shot. He however, survived, though entirely incapable of speech, only communicating his thoughts by writing on a slate, and receiving the necessary nutriment for the support of life with much difficulty.

He does not desire to live, but converses with cheerfulness and exultation upon the success of our Army.

All our accounts represent the Mexicans as having fought on the 8th and 9th with the courage and desperation which would have reflected credit upon the troops of any nation.

They were nearly in a state of starvation, and had been promised the ample supplies of the American camp in case they would secure the victory.

They met the charge of our troops manfully, and stood the destructive fire that was pouring in upon them without giving way, until the works were encumbered with the dead and wounded.

LATER.—The New Orleans Delta of May 31 contains somewhat later intelligence, the sum of which is found in the following paragraphs:—

The Mississippi and Falmouth had blockaded the port of Vera Cruz. Orders had been received from the City of Mexico, directing all Americans to leave Vera Cruz by the 24th inst. Mr. Dimond, Consul, was preparing to go on board one of the U. S. vessels of war. It was generally thought that the American vessels left in port, the bark Louisiana and the brig Ellen McLeod, would be seized by the Mexicans.

The contractor of supplies for the American squadron had been forbidden by the Vera Cruz authorities to furnish them.

A circular has been issued by the Government, stating that all the American Consuls cease immediately from being recognized, and ordering all American citizens to embark for the interior within eight days. The steamer Mississippi yesterday ordered off a vessel from port, but she came in during the night, thus proving the port blockaded, at least to national vessels; a step which has generally compromised the American vessels in the harbor.

The Government is making every effort to carry on the War with success, and has replenished the Treasury by carrying through some very strong measures. The Castle of St. Juan D'Ulloa, and the city, are in a brilliant state of defence, and would require a very strong force for a successful attack.

The Apache Indians have attacked the town of Aputo, where they killed 32 Mexicans, stealing every thing they could lay their hands upon. These Apaches are uniformed in a broadcloth frock, covered with red facings, and pantaloons of the same stuff, with caps, and they are fitted with rifles. The whole Department is in a dreadful state of misery and consternation. Several robberies on a large scale have been committed in the city of Mexico and its neighborhood.

STILL LATER.—New-Orleans papers of June 2d, received in New-York on Tuesday night, contain later intelligence from the army. The only item of much importance relates to the capture and escape of Mr. Rogers, who was supposed to have been killed. It is as follows:

Mr. Rogers accompanied by 15 men, two women and a child, started from Corpus Christi for Point Isabel on the 2d or 3d of May. They arrived at the Little Colerado a day or two before the battle of the 8th, where they were surprised by the company of tancheros, and being overcome with their numbers they were compelled to surrender on a promise of being well treated. As soon, however, as they delivered up their arms they were tied four together, stripped of their clothing and robbed of all their money of which they had considerable amount. Having been closely bound, without resistance, their throats were then cut with a large knife by a person appointed for the purpose—the womes having suffered dishonor. In this manner Rogers saw his father and brother butchered before his own turn came. As the wound upon his throat was not fatal, he had the presence of mind to feign himself dead, and was, with all the balance, thrown into the Colorado, where he managed to escape unseen and swim to the upper side of the river. There he subsequently made his way to the Rio Grande, was taken prisoner and was sent to the hospital at Metamoros, where he was exchanged.

TERRIBLE MASSACRE IN TEXAS.—A letter from San Antonio de Bexar, gives deplorable accounts of murders and robberies committed upon the people inhabiting the Western frontier of Texas by the Camanches and Lipans. Most of the able bodied men of the colonies of New Braunfels, Castroville and Lake Quahi, having joined the army of General Taylor, the savages, profiting by their absence, threw themselves upon the old men, women and children, burnt the houses, the crops of corn, mutilated the dead bodies, violated the women, and carried off a number of children into slavery. The Commercial Association of German Princes, who undertook toc olonize the mountains of San Saba, have not been successful in their plans. They directed a convoy of one hundred wagons, on the route toward the colony, which was attacked by the savages. The German emigrants, after fighting desperately, were overwhelmed by numbers and obliged .o retreat, leaving behind them a great number of killed and wounded in the hands of the savages. The wagons contained the whole fortunes of the emigrants. The people say that two companies ought to be dispatched without delay in pursuit of these savages if the exigencies of the service will permit the absence of such a force from the main army. When the troops make their appearance, the savages will fly before them—but will afterward return and commit new ravages. A strong body of soldiers should be permanently stationed near the settlements to restrain those Indians.—The improvidence of the leaders of these colonies has become proverbial. They are generally land speculators, who, since the slave trade is abolished, have made a commerce in the whites. Generally, the emigrants are brought over in bad ships, and are made to pay a high price for their passage—they have no medical treatment when sick, and on board ship many of them die, and when they land they are again cheated in the transportation of their baggage. We trust the Government will take these unfortunate emigrants under their protection—as they were the first to fly to arms at the call of their adopted country. It is to be hoped that some method will be devised of arresting the oppressive conduct of the speculating leaders of the colonies.

[N. O. Cour. May 20.

WAR VESSELS FOR MEXICO.—The three schooners recently purchased by our Government, which had been built for Mexico, are named Bonito, Petrel, and Reefer. They are to be commanded by Lts. Shaw, Sterret and Purviance. They will be delivered at the Navy Yard at Brooklyn, and immediately armed and dispatched. The two steamers, built also for the Mexican Government, which we mentioned as under negotiation the other day, have been purchased, and will be ready for delivery in about a month, when, if the war continues, they will be also immediately armed and dispatched to the Gulf. These reinforcements will make about forty vessels of war of all sorts on that station. The fleet in the Pacific, twenty or more.

THE VOMITO.—The Yellow Fever, or Vomito, which is the name it is generally known by in Mexico, is said to be prevalent during the whole of the year, all along the Atlantic coast of Mexico; but it rages with the greatest violence about two-thirds of this time.

In the rear of Vera Cruz there are a large number of swamps which make this city so unhealthy. But the Vomito is not the only, nor is it considered the most fatal of the diseases which prevail there; for in some years there are a great number of deaths from other diseases, while in other years much the greater number die of the Vomito. This is supposed to be owing in a great degree to the greater or less number of soldiers sent down there during the most sickly months. Strangers only are subject to this disease, and such a thing as a person born in Vera Crus being attacked with this disease is unheard of.

A FIGHTING PREACHER.—Some of our Western exchanges speak of a "noble example that has just been set by Rev. Richard A. Stewart." It appears that his pugnacious reverence—who is a Methodist Parson—has arrived at New Orleans at the head of one hundred volunteers from East Baton Rouge and Iberville. A correspondent of the Fredericksburg Recorder represents him as being endowed with a great taste for fighting, and says that it is a habit with him, when he feels a call to thrash any one, to ask a temporary dismissal from the Church, and when he has finished the job he asks to be re-admitted. The writer adds, "He has obtained a dismissal for six months, in order to lick the Mexicans."

In R. I. licenses are granted to taverns to sell spirits only in two towns, Foster and West-Greenwich, and in Providence six stores are licensed to sell by quart, not to be drunk on the premises.

OREGON—IMPORTANT.—The Journal of Commerce says: "We learn from very good authority, that Mr. Packenham has received instructions from his Government by the Hibernia, to make a final overture for the amicable adjustment of the Oregon question. He is to offer, substantially, the proposition suggested some time since by Mr. McLane, our minister in London, to Lord Aberdeen, viz: lat. 49 as the basis, leaving to Great Britain the whole of Van Couver's Island, and the free navigation of the Columbia.

"Our London correspondent, whose letter we will endeavor to publish in our next, says, under date of the 18th ult.:

'It is generally believed that the present steamer carries out the definite views of the British Cabinet. The Times has, no doubt, received some intimation of the same—hence the peculiar tone of their late leaders.'"

A letter from Mr. BUCHANAN is said to be in town, stating that the Oregon matter is virtually settled, and that the details will be made public this week.

NEW MATERIAL FOR PAPER.—A discovery has been made by the citizens of Worcester, that promises to be of considerable utility in the art of paper making. The Worcester Spy says, On the borders of Bell-pond, whence the new aqueduct for supplying this village with water is now being constructed, is a tract of some three or four acres, which has usually exhibited the appearance of a meadow on the level of the water of the pond, and slightly covered with vegetation. If walked upon, it would shake for some distance round, as if it were a mere accumulation of vegetable matter, floating on the surface. The pond, having been drawn down several feet, by an excavation on the outlet, for the purpose of cleaning it out, preparatory to the construction of the aqueduct, this tract, of which we have been speaking, is found to consist of a fibrous vegetable matter, extending many feet deep. When cut and taken out, it is of a light grey color, and very much resembles a sponge when saturated with water. After being dried it appears like hair, or perhaps more like tow matted together. It has been tried and found to make excellent wrapping paper. Tens of thousands of cart-loads of it may be readily obtained. This material is undoubtedly the fibrous part of water mosses which have been growing at the surface, and gradually sinking and accumulating for ages.

The Washington Union understands upon inquiry at the State Department that the amount reimbursed by the late arrangement of the British Government in favor of American merchants is between $400,000 and $500,000.

The Owego Gazette has the following particulars of a strange suicide: Edward Baldwin, of Nichols, shot himself on Tuesday last. He had been out hunting, and on his return met a couple of girls, and while engaged in conversation with them, asked if they would like to see him shoot himself. They answered yes. At this he put the muzzle of the gun into his mouth, and placing his feet on the trigger, blew out his brains!

The Rochester Democrat of June 2d, says that the weather is oppressively warm and vegetation more luxuriant than at the same season for many years past. The Thermometer during the week past, has been up to 89 degrees. The want of rain is much felt in some parts of the country. From every quarter we hear encouraging reports of the crops. The wheat fields are unusually forward, and the stalk, in many places, are already headed.

The Mobile Herald of May 28, says that a colored man named ——, the Capt. Shally of the "Talladega Boys," accompanies his master to Mexico. The faithful old fellow has done good service; he was the servant of an officer in the Revolution, was present at tbe surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, was at New-Orleans, and most of the battles of the last war. He also served in the Seminole and Creek wars in Florida and Alabama, in 1846-7. He is as anxious to arrive at the seat of war as any young blood who has preceded him.

We learn that the seventeen year locusts, have made their appearance in Washington County, Pennsylvania, and at Akron, in Ohio. Their last appearance was in 1829, at which time it is said that they extended from beyond the shores of the Mississippi to the heads of the Ohio, and covering the moody regions of Missouri, Illinois, Indiana and Ohio, and some part sof Western Pennsylvania.

We learn from the New-Orleans papers that the steamer Queen City, while lying at Natchez, on Wednesday, 27th ult., burst her steam-pipe, killing seven persons, and badly scalding thirty-eight, five of whom have since died; the others were sent to the Hospital, most of whom were German emigrants.

The Warren Chronicle, Extra, of June 2d, gives the particulars of a fire which destroyed a large part of the flourishing village of Warren, Ohio, on the night of the 1st. The amount of loss is estimated at about $135,000. The town had no efficient fire-engine, or else much of the loss might have been prevented.

The Picayune states that the Legislature of Louisiana passed by acclamation an appropriation of $500, on the 26th, for the purchase of a sword, to be presented to Gen. Taylor in behalf of the State as a token of the universal admiration with which the people of that State view his indomitable courage, bearing and skill.

Three men named David Morgan, Thomas Murphey and John Calohan, were killed in a coal mine, at New-Philadelphia, near Pottsville, Pa., on Tuesday 20th ult. A car containing six men and a boy, with a horse attached, in passing into the drift, ran off the track and against the props used to support the roof of the drift; the props fell, and with it the slate and earth above came down, burying the unfortunate men beneath its weight.

Mr. Ashley in some remarks lately in the Senate in relation to the reports of the Commissioner of Patents, said that the Agricultural statistics prepared by the Patent Office were of the greatest importance to all who were interested in agricultural pursuits, who constituted 85 per cent of the entire community. The expense of preparing these statistics were paid out of the Patent Office fund. The Patent Office, so far from being an expense to the public, was the only department which supported itself.

The Journal of the Am. Temp. Union gives returns from 632 out of 856 towns in this State. Of these 528 voted 'no license' and 104 'license.' Of the former, voting no license, 382 gave majorities of 48,101, and of the 104 voting license, 63 gave majorities of 2633. Excess of no license majorities in 445 towns 45 478.

The best beets we have ever seen, says a writer in the Farmer's Cabinet, were raised in alternate rows with corn—the corn a full crop. We have frequently seen carrots and ruta baga turnips grown in this way, and without any apparent injury to the grain; and we apprehend that beets and parsnips may be introduced in the same way and with equal success.

LICENSED? TO DO WHAT?

Licensed to make the strong man weak,
Licensed to lay the wise man low,
Licensed a wife's fond heart to break,
And make her children's tears to flow.

Licensed to do thy neighbor harm,
Licensed to kindle hate and strife,
Licensed to nerve the robber's arm,
Licensed to whet the murderer's knife.

Licensed thy neighbor's purse to drain,
And rob him of his very last,
Licensed to heat his feverish brain
Till madness crown thy work at last.

Licensed, like spider for a fly,
To spread thy nets for man, thy prey;
To mock his struggles—suck him dry—
Then cast the worthless hulk away.

Licensed, where peace and quiet dwell,
To bring disease and want and we—
Licensed to make this world a hell,
And fit man for a hell below.

HYMN,

Written for the A. F. M. R. Society, May 13, 1846.

BY F. C. WOODWORTH.

1. I hear a plaint of grief and woe;
O listen to that cry!
'Tis Virtue's wail—for Virtue's foe
Hath laid his bleeding victim low,
To weep, and faint, and die.

2. Alas! there is nor will nor power
To soothe her spirit's pain;
If Virtue fall, like some fair flower,
Crushed when the angry tempests lower,
She ne'er can rise again.

3. Not so! shall we her wrongs be told,
And our support deny?
Not so! as we her grief behold,
We count it richer far than gold,
To point her to the sky.

4. What though the task with shame be rife,
We can endure it all;
And we will arm us for the strife,
Nor yield until we yield our life
At our great Leader's call.

5. We come in our dear Master's name,
To strive for purity.
The shame we glory in the shame,
With Israel's God we rest our fame,
And firm our trust shall be.

6. And now, O God of holiness,
Regard our humble prayer!
Thy cause maintain—our labors bless;
And while our lips thy love confess,
Teach us thy cross to bear!

SLAVERY AMONG THE NEW SCHOOL PRESBYTERIANS.

The following report of a portion of the proceedings of the General Assembly recently convened in the city of Philadelphia, is taken from the New York Evangelist. It is amusing and instructive.

Rev. SELDEN R. HAYNES moved a special committee on the subject of slavery.

Mr. GIDDINGS inquired, What was the usual course in the case of memorials? and on learning that they were put into the hands of the Committee on Bills and Overtures, expressed his willingness that the said committee should receive and refer them to the Assembly as heretofore. It was merely necessary to state the general contents, and read passages here and there.

Memorials on slavery were received from the Synod of Indiana, the Synod of Cincinnati, and the Synod of Peoria. Also, from the Presbyteries of Utica, Geneva, Genesee, Onondaga, Cayuga, Cortland, Buffalo, Montrose, Erie, Meadville, Grand River, Maumee, Cleveland, Monroe, Marshall, Scioto, Washtenaw, Athens, Salem, Indianapolis, Peoria, Ottawa, Knox, Galena and Portage.

Rev. WILLIAM A. MCLAIN submitted a memorial in the case of Rev. Wm. Graham, of Cincinnati, signed by Thornton A. Mills, which he requested permission to read.

Mr. Graham is the man who was suspended from the ministry for teaching that slavery is right, by the Cincinnati Presbytery. The memorial is a very, able document against the action by which Mr. Graham was suspended. The following presents the issue.

The whole issue turns upon the question ARE OPINIONS ON THE SUBJECT OF SLAVERY DISCIPLINABLE IN THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH?

This question divided itself into two.

1. What is the standard in our church by which heresy or error is to be judicially determined?

2. Does this standard make opinions on the subject of slavery disciplinable?

In answering the first question, he maintained that the standard of judicial action was the constitution of our church alone.

The points were argued in the document with clearness and force.

Mr. GIDDINGS moved that the paper be referred to the Committee on Synod of Cincinnati, with instructions to report against it. Mr. Giddings frankly stated that his object was to reach in the most direct way the merits of the case. He believed the subject of slavery must be discussed, before much progress was made in their proceedings. The strongest argument that could possibly be offered on the other side had just been heard, and it was better to take it up now than again.

Mr. MCAFEE denied that such a motion brought up the merits of the case.

The Moderator decided that it did not bring up the merits of the case; when an appeal was taken by Mr. McLain, which was sustained by the house, and Mr. Giddings took the floor.

Mr. G. then proceeded to state the candid and Christian feelings with which he came to a consideration of this exciting subject, and hoped that what he said might be effectual for the purpose that he intended it. He had no wish to use epithets, or any disposition to call hard names. The simple question before the Assembly was, whether it was the doctrine of the Presbyterian church, that God himself has authorized the relation of master and slave, and given one man the right of property in his fellow-man, as was asserted in Mr. Graham's pamphlet? This he denied. At his creation God had given man dominion over the creatures, and made the earth his possession, but never gave such dominion, such property in his fellow-man. Men were inalienably endowed with liberty—and made FREE.

Here Mr. G. detailed the case of Mr. Graham, as already set forth in the memorial. He then proceeded to trace the testimony already given by the Assembly in times past, claiming that they had always spoken against slavery. First, he cited their action in 1787; then, in 1795; then, in 1815; and in 1818.

In illustration of the fact that the right of self-defence was taken away from the slave, he cited the case of a young woman of which he had been informed by letter a year ago last winter. An attempt being made upon her chastity, she was so fortunate as to kill her white assailant. She was tried and condemned, but her owner obtained her respite and eventually her liberation.

The definition of slavery, when truly given, decided the matter at once. The shortest definition that he could give was a history. By an extraordinary coincidence, the same year, 1620, in which our fathers landed at Plymouth Rock, a Dutch ship landed a cargo of slaves at Jamestown, Virginia. Previous to that there were no slave laws in that State. But the slaves ran away. The legislature passed laws against their locomotion, and the constables were ordered to seize and whip those who were found out of the limits assigned to them. More stringent regulations became necessary from time to time, until at length the right was given to the master to shoot his slave if he continued to run when he ordered him to stop. Slavery in this country was thus introduced and established by statutory provision, and not by the Bible.

Mr. G. then read and commented at length upon Judge Ruffin's famous decision in one of the courts of North Carolina, which he considered to be the best description and definition of the system that ever had been given.

Will Mr. Graham say that a system which Judge Ruffin has thus described as "dooming the slave in his person and in his posterity to live without knowledge, or any capacity to make anything his own, to labor but to have another eat the fruits of it," &c. &c. was originally established, and is still authorized by a God of mercy and justice?

Here this discussion appears to have ended. At a subsequent session the following transpired.

Dr. ELY, as one of the Committee on Bills and Overtures, stated that four of the committee had agreed to report, that two would bring in a minority report, and that Dr. Duffield, the chairman, had originally prepared a report which differed from both. Dr. Ely's report was as follows:

The Committee of Bills and Overtures, to whom have been referred sundry memorials, petitions and resolutions on the subject of slavery, respectfully report, that in their judgment the General Assembly has no right to prescribe any new test by which the churches under their care shall be guided in the reception or rejection of communicants; that every session, in receiving persons to the full communion of the church, should judge of the credibility of their profession of saving faith according to the Bible, and our acknowledged standards of doctrine, and discipline, and that every person who sustains the legal relation of a slaveholder, is amenable for his whole conduct in relation to slavery, to the session, Presbytery, and Synod, to which he has voluntarily subjected himself in the Lord.

That to steal a man and enslave him is a heinous sin, is conceded by all. That to buy and sell slaves, making merchandize of them, from the sordid desire of gain, is a sin, most slaveholders themselves allow.

But that it is sinful in all cases, and under all circumstances, for a man to possess and retain slaves, is not granted by a large portion of the Presbyterian church. The Committee would therefore recommend that they be discharged from further consideration of this subject; and that the action of the last Assembly in relation to this matter, be and hereby is confirmed.

The report was accepted.

Rev. Mr. BEECHER presented a report from the minority, in which, after defining slavery to be holding and owning man as property, and citing various laws of different States in proof of this position, and an illustration of the general character of the system, the Committee recommended the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That we tenderly sympathize with our brethren in Southern churches who are suffering in connection with the evils of slavery, and who are conscientiously desirous of its removal.

2. Resolved, That while we regard the feelings and rights of Southern churches and Presbyteries, we are constrained from an imperious sense of duty and necessity, to declare that the system of American slavery is a sinful system, contrary to the word of God and the rights of man.

3. Resolved, That slavery or slaveholding (as defined by "the holding of men as property") is a grievous sin against God, and the inalienable rights of man, which should be at once repented of and forsaken.

4. Resolved, That it be enjoined upon all the lower judicatories to take such action on this subject as in every case may appear to be demanded by the facts and the word of God.

5. Resolved, That an overture be sent down to the Presbyteries, requiring them to decide whether slaveholding shall be inserted in the Larger Catechism as one of the sins forbidden by the 8th Commandment.

W. A. BEECHER.
S. C. STEVENS.

This report was accepted, and it was moved by Mr. H. A. Rowland, that it be referred to a special committee.

Mr. LATHROP concurred in Mr. R.'s motion, and thought out of the two reports another might be made, that would much better meet the wishes of the Assembly than either.

Mr. STEELE thought we had better go into the discussion at once, as it was only lost time to refer to another committee.

Mr. BRAXTON stated that the Chairman of the Committee on Bills and Overtures had drawn up a report as well calculated to unite the sentiments of the Assembly as any one that could be drawn. Referring it to another committee would only waste time.

Mr. MCLAIN, of Washington, D. C. to bring the subject clearly before the house, moved that it was inexpedient for the Assembly to take any action on the subject.

Mr. BEECHER protested against smothering discussion on the slavery question, as had been done in time past.

Mr. HALE moved that the Assembly go into something like the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and that an interlocutory meeting be held in which every one might have an opportunity to speak in their place.

Mr. WELLS thought it best before doing so to hear Dr. Duffield report.

Dr. DUFFIELD returned the memorials, and stated that his report, as originally offered, had been so much amended, that he refused any longer to acknowledge its paternity.

Dr. ELY thought the subject should be discussed without further preamble.

Mr. MC LAIN, of Washington, D. C. thought the time had come for us to march straight up to a final decision. He was in favor of calling the roll, and having a full, free and unembarrassed discussion.

Mr. ROBERT C. LEARNED was in favor of an interlocutory meeting, that the sentiments of every Presbytery might be fully expressed.

Dr. ELY moved that the roll be called.

Rev. Mr. CLARK moved as an amendment, that the roll be called alternately from the top and the bottom, that the North might reply to the South, and the South to the North.

On motion, Dr. DUFFIELD read his original report, after which the roll was called, and the discussion fairly commenced, Messrs. Mattocks, Holly, Kellogg and Kidder, each speaking in his place.

This troublesome subject was finally disposed of by the adoption of the following statement presented by the Rev. Dr. Duffield:—

1. The system of slavery as it exists in these United States, viewed either in the laws of the several States which sanction it, or in its actual operation and results in society, is intrinsically unrighteous and oppressive, and is opposed to the proscriptions of the law of God, to the spirit and precepts of the Gospel, and to the best interests of humanity.

2. The testimony of the General Assembly, from A. D. 1787, to A. D. 1818, inclusive, has condemned it, and it remains still the recorded testimony of the Presbyterian Church of these United States against it, from which we do not recede.

3. We cannot, therefore withhold the expression of our deep regret that Slavery should be continued and countenanced by any of the members of our Churches; and we do earnestly exhort both them and the Churches among whom it exists, to use all means in their power to put it away from them. Its perpetuation among them cannot fail to be regarded by multitudes influenced by their example as sanctioning the system portrayed in, and maintained by, the statutes of the several Slave-holding States wherein they dwell. Nor can any mere mitigation of its severity, prompted by the humanity and Christian feeling of any who continue to keep their fellow men in such bondage, be regarded either as a testimony against the system, or as in the least degree changing its essential character.

4. But while we believe that many evils incident to the system, render it important and obligatory to bear testimony against it, yet would we not undertake to determine the degree of moral turpitude on the part of individuals involved by it. This will doubtless be found to vary in the sight of God, according to the degree of light and other circumstances pertaining to each. In view of all the embarassments and obstacles in the way of emancipation interposed by the statutes of the Slave-holding States, and by the social influence affecting the views and conduct of those involved in it, we cannot pronounce a judgment of general and promiscuous condemnation, implying that destitution of Christian principle and feeling which should exclude them from the table of the Lord, all who should stand in the legal relation of masters to slaves, or justify us in withholding our ecclesiastical and Christian fellowship with them. We rather sympathize with and would seek to succor them in their embarassments, believing that separation and secession among the churches and their members, are not the methods God approves and sanctions for the reformation of his church.

5. While, therefore, we feel bound to bear our testimony against Slavery, and to exhort our beloved brethren to remove it from them as speedily as possible, by all appropriate and available means, we do at the same time condemn all divisive and schismatical measures tending to destroy the unity and disturb the peace of our Church, and deprecate the spirit of denunciation and inflicting severities, which would cast from the fold those whom we are rather bound, by the spirit of the Gospel, and the obligations of our covenant, to instruct, to counsel, to exhort, and thus to lead in the ways of God; and toward whom even though they may err, to exercise forbearance and brotherly love.

6. As a court of our Lord Jesus Christ, we possess no legislative authority; and as the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, we possess no judiciary authority. We have no right to institute and prescribe tests of Christian character and Church membership, not recognized and sanctioned in the sacred Scriptures, and in our standards by which we have agreed to walk. We must therefore leave this matter with the Sessions, Presbyteries and Synods—the judicatories to whom pertains the right of judgment to act in the administration of discipline, as they may judge it to be their duty, constitutionally, subject to the General Assembly only in the way of general review and control.

ANTI-SLAVERY CONVENTION IN PHILADELPHIA.

In compliance with a call issued by the Synod of Indiana, a Convention composed of delegates to the General Assembly, and of others assembled in Dr. Wylie's church. Rev. J. M. Dickey, of Indiana, was chosen President, and Dr. Thos. Lafon, Secretary. The following resolutions were discussed and adopted with great unanimity.

Resolved, That American Slavery,—the holding or treating of human beings as property, is a great sin against God, deeply injurious to the social and moral well-being of the oppressor, and a flagrant violation of all the National and moral rights of the oppressed.

Resolved, That the holding of men in slavery is strong presumptive evidence against christian character.

Resolved, That the enslaving human beings or holding them as slaves, ought to be treated as a disciplinable offence in the Christian Church, and that no person persisting in this offence after due instruction and admonition, ought to be received or retained within its fellowship.

Resolved, That the arguments of late adduced from social evils and organic sins to screen those who are guilty of their practice from church censure, are dangerous in their tendency, being calculated to quiet the conscience of the sinner, and that those who are guilty of those sins will, without repentance, certainly meet the retribution of heaven.

Resolved, That a provisional committee of Messrs. Dickey, Phelps, Caleb, Clark, Cleveland, Stevens and Fitch, be appointed, with discretionary power to enlarge their number, whose duty it shall be to correspond with friends of the slave of the Presbyterian and Congregational denominations in different parts of the country, to make such communications to the churches and public, and to call such meetings and adopt such other measures for effecting the exclusion of all slaveholders from the fellowship of the churches as may hereafter be deemed wise and best.

FATHER CRAVENS.

The Rev. Wm. Cravens was among the early Methodists of Rockingham co. Va. He owned a number of slaves when he embraced religion; but he let the oppressed go free. Subsequently so constant was his testimony against the abominations of slavery, and intemperance, that it became a common saying among the people that Father Cravens could not preach a sermon without having a negro and a bottle of whiskey in it.

He had a wealthy and respectable neighbor by the name of Miller, who was a professed Deist. Miller died with a consumption. Some short time before his death he sent for Father Cravens. The old servant of God went immediately, and when he came into Mr. M.'s room said to him,

"Well, Harry, (the name Mr. M. was familiarly called in the neighborhood,) did you send for me?"

He answered, "I did, Mr. Cravens."

"And what do you want with me, Harry?"

"I find, Mr. Cravens, that I must soon leave this world, and I find I am not prepared to die. I want you to pray for me, and give me some instructions how I may prepare to stand before the Savior whom I have so long slighted."

Mr. C. replied, "I thought it would come to this," alluding to Mr. M.'s profession of Deism; "but what have you done with your negroes?"

Mr. M. informed him that he had made his will, and settled his all worldly business; that he had divided his slaves among his heirs.

To which the preacher replied, "I can't pray for you, Harry. I would as soon pray for the devil, as to pray for you; you are about to rivet the chains of bondage on your fellow man with your dying breath—to take from those unfortunate creatures, and their unborn posterity, the right which their God and your God, and the God who is no respecter of persons, gave them. It is not possible that God can have mercy upon you. If you expect mercy of a righteous God, you must at least do justice to your fellow man, and this you cannot do unless you let the oppressed go free. Good day, Harry," and thus left the sick man.

It was not long before the preacher was again sent for, when he asked again, "What have you done with your negroes?"

But a very different answer was given. Miller informed him that he had seriously considered what the preacher had said at their first interview—that he had seen the injustice of slavery, and made a new will, and set all his slaves free.

Brother C. exclaimed, "I will pray for you now, Harry, and I am sure God will have mercy on you, too."

He prayed, and conversed with the sick man frequently, visited him often, and as far as it can be known in the world, the Lord was entreated. Mr. M. obtained mercy, and died in peace.

THE MISSIONARY KNIBB.

HOW SLAVERY WAS ABOLISHED IN THE WEST INDIES.

The question of slavery had long been discussed in England, both in Parliament and among the people; still the slaves groaned in their bondage. At last the Missionaries of the Islands, who for years had witnessed the tears and blood of their brethren, solemnly resolved, in the strength of God, that their fetters should be stricken off, and they gave themselves no rest till the triumph was achieved.

In our country there are less than three hundred thousand slaveholders, and there are of course over one million of men women and children directly interested in this system.—This leaves a large proportion of the Southern population without personal interest in slavery. Many of these non-slaveholders earnestly hate the system, for it oppresses them with a severity only second to that of which the slaves are made the victims.

Now let missionaries be established among them, who shall gather churches composed of this class and those penitent slaveholders whom the faithful presentation of the Gospel has led to set their slaves free, and the good accomplished would be immense. These missionaries must be men possessing the "wisdom that is from above, (which) is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits." Having this character, they would command the sympathy of the children of God every where, and thus sustained by Christian prayers and the grace of the Lord, the more violent spirits of the South would fear to molest them, or if they should drive them from the ground—we anticipate nothing more serious—like the disciples of old, when they were persecuted in one city they could flee to another, and the great work would go on gloriously.

KNIBB was born at Kettering, in the year 1803, and made himself conspicuous, whilst serving his apprenticeship to a Printer in Bristol, by suggesting the hazardous measure of preaching in Bristol Fair, (a place of the utmost infamy,) and by placing himself by the side of the minister who officiated. In the year 1824, he went out to the West Indies as a school teacher, after having qualified himself for such an office by instructions in the Normal Institution of the British and Foreign School Society. He soon became a preacher as well as a school instructor—and ere long the pastor of a church—in which position he was so successful that, though at the period of his settlement at Falmouth, Jamaica, the church consisted of but 750 members, under his care it not only increased but multiplied so, that at the time of his death it had given origin to five additional churches—the number in which, and the parent one, now amount to about 4000. Had his course been only that of a missionary, WILLIAN KNIBB would have stood among the most devoted, the most generous, and the most successful of his class; events occurred in Jamaica, however, which forced him into the arena of public life.

Would that I held the nervous and powerful pen of that most vigorous (at least so I think) of American poets—John Greenleaf Whittier—in order that I might fitly speak of the labors, of the gigantic labors of Knibb, in his efforts to procure freedom for the poor West Indian slave. But I am compelled to wield a humbler instrument in chronicling the deeds of this devoted man. It had been, from the first, the policy of the Baptist Missionary Society, in common with all Missionary Societies which employed agents in the British Slave Colonies, to take no part against slavery—but to do all that non-interference with the unrighteous and oppressive system could do, to engage the favor of the planters. But, as Christianity extended among the slaves, they found that it was incompatible with slavery. The planters resolved, accordingly, by some means or other, to expel the missionaries from the Island.

An opportunity of attempting this soon offered. Just before Christmas, 1831, the slaves broke out in insurrection. Martial law was proclaimed, and the utmost license of that lawless condition was taken to harass and insult the missionaries at large, and WM. KNIBB especially. A charge of conspiracy and criminal privity, was, without a shadow of foundation, and contrary, indeed, to conclusive evidence, got up against him; and upon this charge he was arrested, torn away from his home, and kept in custody part of two days, at the point of bayonets held by insolent militia men, who took no pains to conceal that they were thirsting for his blood. He was afterwards prosecuted upon the same charge; but the Attorney General of the Island had not the hardihood to proceed upon so baseless an indictment.

Foiled in their attempt, the maddened planters did not abandon their design. Under the cloak of zeal for the church, they formed the Colonial Church Union—the avowed intention of which was to destroy the chapels, and banish the missionaries. Then began that series of lawless and malignant outrages, of which, twelve years ago, the world heard so much; and then was formed the sentiment and the resolution in the hearts of the missionaries, to which British Colonial Slavery owes its downfall. Knibb and his coadjutors came to an agreement with the planters, that Slavery and Christianity could not exist together, and then they parted. The planters said, "We will exterminate Christianity;" the missionaries rejoined, "We will abolish slavery."

After this, Mr. Knibb visited England. I need not—I cannot, here go into the detail, or make more than a passing reference to the irrepressible boldness, and the undaunted courage with which Knibb pursued his object—first in the Committee, then on the platform of Exeter Hall, and afterwards at meetings through the country, often face to face with the unabashed defenders of slavery, and finally in protracted examinations before Committees of the two Houses of Parliament. Nor need I here enlarge on the result. I will only say that it was humanity's purest and noblest triumph, won, as was fit, by the purest and noblest means. Knibb's part in this achievement will place him in history by the side of Buxton, Wilberforce and Clarkson. [Boston Atlas.

PRESBYTERIAN OLD SCHOOL GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

The following is the manner in which the question of slavery came up in the above named body, and the action had thereon so far as has yet transpired.

A letter from the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, transmitting resolutions upon the subject of slavery, was, after being read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Correspondence.

A second letter, from the Church Synod of Canada, of a similar tenor, but unlike the former, couched in dictorial and uncourteous language, was partly read by the Clerk, when Dr. Musgrave moved to arrest the reading and refer the letter to the Committee on Foreign Correspondence. Other members moved that it be laid upon the table. This, however was opposed, on the ground that it would have the effect of rupturing the correspondence with the Canada Synod. A lengthy debate ensued, during which it was urged that some such measure was necessary to prevent the offence from being repeated by that and other bodies. Dr. Musgrave characterized the accusation in the letter as untrue and slanderous. The debate was further continued, after which Dr. M. withdrew his motion, and the reading was continued by the Clerk. The resolutions, after depicting the evils attendant upon slavery, accuse the General Assembly of a sinful apathy in regard to the institution of slavery.

Dr. Musgrave moved that the letter be laid upon the table. On a division this motion was lost. A motion was then made to refer the letter to the Committee on Foreign Correspondence with directions to submit their reply to the house, which finally prevailed. Pending this motion, however, other propositions were made to break off the correspondence with the Canada Synod, to return the offensive letter, &c.

A similar document from the General Assocfation of Connecticut, was referred to the same committee, without being read.

THE LIFE CLOCK

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

There is a little mystic clock,
No human eye hath seen;
That beateth on—and beateth on,
From morning until e'en.

And when the soul is wrapped in sleep,
And heareth not a sound,
It ticks and ticks the livelong night,
And never runneth down.

O wondrous is that work of art
Which knells the passing hour,
But art ne'er formed, nor mind conceived,
The life-clock's magic power.

Nor set in gold, nor decked with gems,
By wealth and pride possessed;
But rich and poor, or high and low,
Each bears it in his breast.

When life's deep stream, 'mid beds of flowers,
All still and softly glides,
Like the wavelet's step, with a gentle beat,
It warns of passing tides.

When threat'ning darkness gathers o'er,
And hope's bright vision's flee,
Like the sullen stroke of the muffled oar,
It beateth heavily.

When passion nerves the warrior's arm
For deeds of hate and wrong,
Though heeded not the fearful sound,
The knell is deep and strong.

When eyes to eyes are gazing soft,
And tender words are spoken,
Then fast and wild it rattles on,
As if with love 'twere broken.

Such is the clock that measures life,
Of flesh and spirit blended;
And thus 'twill run within the breast,
Till that strange life is ended.

INTERESTING ANECDOTE---MORAVIAN MISSIONS.

Count Ploss, a Dutch nobleman asked, the Moravian missionaries, who were going to Greenland, how they intended to maintain themselves, unacquainted, as they were with the situation and climate of the country? The Missionaries answered, "By the labor of our hands, and God's blessing;" adding, that they would "build a house, and cultivate a piece of land, that they might not be burdensome to any." He objected that there was no timber fit for building in that country. "If that be the case," said the brethren, "then we will dig a hole in the earth, and lodge there." Astonished at their ardor in the cause in which they had embarked, the count replied, "No, you shall not be driven to that extremity; take the timber with you, and build a house, and accept these fifty dollars for that purpose."

The labors of these devoted servants of the Lord Jesus Christ were rendered very useful in that field, and numbers of the natives of that cold and inhospitable clime were happily converted to God. [Teacher's Offering.

PROSPECTUS OF THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MAGAZINE.

This Magazine is edited by Seba Smith; this gentleman has been so long and favorably known to the reading public, that to mention his name is recommendation sufficient to ensure the Magazine a hearty welcome from the American people. And we are happy to announce the Rev. J. S. Abbott as among our regular contributors. And also Mrs. Elizabeth Oakes Smith, with other of our best female writers.

It will be issued monthly, on handsome paper, and each number embellished with a steel engraving, and a flower painted from nature. The first number is now ready to deliver to subscribers. Terms one dollar per year, or 10 cents for a single number.

The above work is got up in better style than any other magazine published for youth in the United States. We challenge investigation for the proof of this assertion. Please read the introduction below.

INTRODUCTION.

The design of this work is to present a useful and interesting periodical to the youth of our country—one that while it shall amuse, shall also enlighten and instruct, and not merely instruct and enlighten, but elevate and purify. A work which shall do its share towards guiding the youth of our country in the path that will lead them to usefulness and respectability as citizens, and honor and happiness as men and Christians. With this general object in view, all suitable topics will be discussed, and the best material sought for both original and selected, wherever it may be available.—The world of fact and the world of fancy will both be explore, and their choicest treasures brought home and spread before our young readers.

Without bias in party politics, the work will present clear and condensed views of political statistics, institutions, and men of the country; and without sectarianism, it will aim to present such matter as may be acceptable to any Christian family.

Stories, Poetry, History, Biography, Science and Art, will all be made to contribute to our general design. Biographical notices of the distinguished men of our country and occasionally of other countries, both ancient and modern; American history; the history and statistics of the individual states, from Maine to Texas, and from New York to Oregon; Indian Stories and romance, with historical sketches of various tribes, from the time the Europeans first landed till the present time—these are among the prominent sources from which our pages will be filled. And although this work is designed mainly for youth, it is intended that it shall be so conducted that the youth who takes it and preserves it, shall find it a pleasant and valuable companion in middle life or in old age.

All letters, orders, &c. should be addressed to J. K. Wellman, Proprietor, 116 Nassau street, New York.

N. B. Any newspaper giving the above two or three insertions shall receive the Magazine one year.

From the Philadelphia Saturday Courier.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MAGAZINE.—It truly gratified our hearts to receive No. 1 of this new work, because it brought us tidings of our estimable friend, 'The Original Jack Downing, of Downingville, away down East.' In a word, Seba Smith, Esq. author of 'The Original Jack Downing Creations,' and who is a sweet writer, especially for the young, has started in New York City a Young People's Magazine. It will succeed. He is the man for such a Magazine—moral, elevating, amusing, instructive. Let all young people in our wide spread country take it, for we pledge our word for it that it will be the Magazine for them. It will surpass the palmy days of Parley's Magazine for the Young, we feel quite sure.

WAR.

Again this terrible scourge has begun its ravages, and the hostile cannon's roar announces the bloody strife. Our soil has drank the blood of hundreds, whose dying groans, mingled with the clash of arms, have gone up to the ear of Him who once came to preach peace on earth and good will to men. Homes have been made desolate, and fields laid waste. The hopes of years have been crushed, and widowed hearts have sought their loved among the slain, amid garments rolled in blood. War may be justly considered the worst calamity that can befall a nation; but among its attendant evils, the loss of life and destruction of property are not the greatest. Its baneful effects on morality, and destructive influence on Christianity, are the consequences most deeply to be deprecated. Go to the field of battle, and see the combattants mingle in deadly strife. See the citizen of a Christian nation, himself perhaps a professor of religion, aim the deadly shot, or draw the pointed sword reeking with blood from a brother's heart, whom he has sent unprepared into the presence of his Maker, and then fall himself and expire with his fellow's blood mingling with his own, and the guilt of murder on both their souls. What a strife! Demons may blush and stand ashamed, while men and Christians devour each other. Oh! how opposed to the meek and forgiving principles of that peaceable religion which our Saviour taught, when on earth he endured the abuse and revilings of wicked men, without a murmuring word or a retalliating act.

But if war, with all its dreadful and demoralizing consequences, can be consistent with that precept of the divine law, "Thou shalt not kill," or with the words of our Saviour, "Thou shalt not resist evil, but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right check turn to him the other also," it can only be under circumstances of the most aggravating nature, as a last resort, when the oppressor's heel bears heavy beyond endurance, or the unprovoked intruder invades our sacred altars to cleave down our God-given rights. A people can never be justified in waging war for trifling offences, and sacrificing their lives, their prosperity and morality, to satiate a vain ambition, or avenge trifling injuries.

As the alarm of war again sounds in our ears, and the summons has gone forth to join in the strife, it becomes every Christian to know his duty and do it. Is the war in which this nation has involved itself a war of necessity? Do sufficient causes exist to justify it? Is it such a strife as Christians can pray for success to crown? To persons acquainted with the doings of our government for a few years the cause of our present difficulty is no mystery. For sixty years has it waged a deadly war upon the dearest rights of a portion of its citizens, thus subverting the design of its institutions, and converting itself into an instrument for the destruction, instead of the protection of men's rights. Nothing has been left undone to strengthen and perpetuate slavery. To the long list of acts for that end, is added the annexation of Texas to this Union, as a dernier resort to resuscitate the dying monster by enlarging the borders and strengthening the tottering walls of slavety. That the annexation of Texas was an act to perpetuate slavery, is a disgraceful fact in our history. To sustain that act, we have declared war against Mexico, and called for 50,000 men and ten million dollars to prosecute it. Yes, the nation boasting of an unequalled freedom, and the largest republicanism, has at length drawn the sword in behalf of slavery. With Liberty inscribed upon her banners, she fights for the extension of its great antagonist.

When Mexico, awakened to a humiliating sense of her wickedness in binding the fetters on her subjects, at length broke those chains and set the captive free, Texas, settled principally by men from the southern portion of the United States, and impregnated with the principles peculiar to those States, raised the standard of rebellion, choosing to yield her existence rather than her slavery, and, aided by adventurers from the Southern States, succeeded in gaining a temporary advantage, and the black flag of slavery waved its hateful folds in insulting triumph over the blood-stained fields of San Jacinto. Although the United States for thirty years had refused to acknowledge the independence of liberated Hayti, because she was free, she hastened to acknowledge Texan independence, while the invader's foot-print was yet fresh upon its soil, and, in violation of plighted faith with Mexico, added her to the States—then sent an army to the Rio Grande to provoke aggressive acts on the part of the insulted Mexicans, and now raises the patriotic war-cry, "To arms, and punish presumptious Mexico!" When she has sufficiently chastized that feeble nation, who can tell the consummation of the work? It has already been hinted, that the conquest of Mexico is not among things unthought of.

Has the Almighty an attribute that will take sides with us in this contest? Will religion approve it, and the lovers of religious liberty cling around it? If the tri-colored flag is torn from the walls of Mexico, and the star-spangled banner planted there, will the cause of freedom gain anything? Where the merry herdsman watches his grazing flock in unobtruded freedom, the fainting slave will clank the galling chain. Christians! Lovers of Liberty! Can you give your sanction to this war? With the groans of the crushed slave ascending to the ears of God, can you pray Him to give success to this effort to tighten the cruel chain which binds him there? D. E. M.

Westerly, R. I., May 31, 1846.

TO OFFEND IN ONE POINT IS TO BE GUILTY OF ALL.

From an Essay on Moral Integrity, by C. S. Henry, D. D., Professor of Philosophy in the University of N. Y.

Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. As all the virtues are marked by one common quality of obligation, and as they are all enjoined by the same authority, the man whose ruling principle of action is a sense of duty, will for that reason be led to the practice of them all. No man can be virtuous who does not act from an habitual regard to the authority of conscience and of God; and as the same authority which enjoins one duty, enjoins all the duties, he who reverences this authority in one case will habitually reverence it in another case, and in all cases. The idea of a sincere reverence for the will of God in one case, and an habitual disregard of it in another case, is scarcely conceivable. It is rather to be presumed, when a person lives in a course of uniform or habitual violation of the will of God in one part of his duty, that in those other cases where the outward form of his conduct coincides with what the will of God prescribes, it is owing merely to an accidental agreement between his sense of duty and his inclination, or even that his actions are determined in those cases to the outward form of virtue by motives of which the sense of duty forms no part. The motive of action which renders our outward conduct truly virtuous and acceptable in the view of reason and of God, is a pure regard to duty. How can a person, who truly regards the authority and command of God as the rule of his actions, live in the habitual neglect of any thing which that authority commands or in the habitual commission of any thing that it forbids? If it be sincerely taken as the rule of conduct at all, must it not be taken in its full extent? He, therefore, who lives in the habitual violation of any article of his known duty, shows such a disregard of the sacred authority of conscience and of God, as to prove that he cannot have a real and proper regard to that authority in other parts of his duty. He proves that, in those respects in which the form of his outward conduct corresponds with the rule of duty, he is not determined by the inward principle which alone can constitute his conduct virtuous. He forfeits his claim in the eye of reason to the title of a virtuous man. Habitual and allowed violation of known duty proves that the radical principle of virtue is wanting. By constantly violating the command of conscience and of God in one respect, he proves that the essential spirit of true obedience is wanting in him—that if it should equally suit his inclinations or his interest, he might equally violate all the other commands—and that the reason why he does not, is something else than a supreme reverence for the divine authority of conscience and of God; in short, in the eye of Reason, and of that God "who looketh on the heart," he cannot be rgaaded as rendering a true obedience in any part of his conduct. In principle he throws off his allegiance to the Supreme Law, by a constant violation of it in one respect, as effectually as by a violation of it in all respects. In this sense, I take it, we are to understand the declaration of the sacred writer; Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all.

Remarks.

The seventh day of the week in enjoined upon men by the Law as a day of rest and sacred observance. This is one point which some decline to recognize as a part of their duty; and though they acquiesce in the claims of the law in regard to rest and worship, yet they "offend" against that most unequivocal and positive declaration of the law, "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH." Will Dr. Henry offend in this point and yet pretend to be consistent? Does he not "in principle throw off his allegiance to the supreme law, by a constant violation of it in one respect, as effectually as by a violation of it in all respects?"

Perhaps he will consult his feelings, and determine that he is not guilty; and not feeling a sense guilt, perhaps through the hardness of his heart, he will proceed to construe God's meaning into something else than what is declared in the law to be the divine will. There are Protestants who pretend their inability to comprehend the want of moral sense among Papists in regard to the worship of images, yet who themselves as effectually demolish the fourth commandment as Papists do the second. Are they not equally guilty of all? Let the law and the testimony of conscience decide. There is light in them. LUTHER.

Fight hard against a hasty temper. Anger will come, but resist it stoutly. A spark may set a house on fire. A fit of passsion may give you cause to mourn all the days of your life. Never revenge an injury.

He that revenges knows no rest;
The meek possess a peaceful breast.

BUY THE TRUTH.

Go thou in life's fair morning,
Go, in thy bloom of youth,
And buy, for thy adorning,
The precious pearl of truth.
Secure this heavenly treasure,
And bind it on thy heart,
And let no worldly pleasure
E'er cause it to depart.

Go, while the day star shineth,
Go, while thy heart is light,
Go, ere thy strength declineth,
While every sense is bright.
Sell all thou hast and buy it,
'Tis worth all earthly things—
Rubies, and gold, and diamonds,
Sceptres, and crowns of kings.

Go, ere the cloud of sorrow,
Steal o'er the bloom of youth:
Defer not till to-morrow,
Go now, and buy the Truth,
Go, seek thy great Creator,
Learn early to be wise:
Go, place upon the altar,
A morning sacrifice!

HOW TO MAKE A GOOD PASTOR.

1. Give your pastor your confidence and affections. Let him always feel that he is among friends that will guard his reputation, and be willing to cover with the mantle of charity any little deficiencies.

2. Consult him freely, and show that you respect his judgment in all important matters pertaining to all the moral and spiritual interests of the parish. Remember that he is the spiritual watchman placed on the walls of Zion in your place, and feels a deep interest in all that pertains to the best good of society.

3. Speak kindly to others of your pastor, and let them see that you respect him, and value his ministrations among you in the Lord.

4. Protect the reputation and good name of your pastor. His character is his capital. Should you ever see the envenomed shafts of calumny pointed at him, let your hearts, like so many encompassing shields, receive them, and your hands extract and break them at your feet. When he is compelled to speak with plainness, and rebuke with all long-suffering, or to vindicate unpopular doctrines, or inculcate unwelcome truths, and you discover in others a disposition to repel them; then stand by him; hold him up with the strength of prayer and the energy of faith—then, instead of falling discomforted before his foes, truth shall accomplish glorious victories.

5. Never interfere with the private or family arrangements of your minister. He has the same rights and responsibilities in reference to his family that other men have. And the people that would pry into his domestic arrangements, or attempt to thwart him in any endeavors to render his situation in this respect more eligible, pleasant, or economical, show two grand defects at least: 1st. A want of good breeding; and 2dly, A narrowness of spirit, which will be apt to render uncomfortable all who have intercourse with them.

6. Be punctual with your minister, and pay him his salary without asking. If any class of men earn the scanty pittance which is generally given to them, it is the ministers of the Gospel, and the salary should be punctually paid. Some contrive to turn off upon the minister, the lame, the halt, and the blind. This discourages and paralyzes his efforts, and dishonors God.

"JUST THE BOOK."

The Word of God is the golden lamp hung out of heaven, to enlighten the nations that sit in darkness, and to show them the path that leads from the confines of hell to the gates of Paradise. The Bible, in the original tongues, comprises all the revelation now extant, which God has given to the world. It is, in all its contents, and parts, and appendages, just the book, the one book, which Infinite Wisdom saw best adapted to answer the end of a written revelation. It may not be reducible to the rules of human philosophy, or logic, for it transcends them all. It is just as clear and obscure, just as copious and as scanty, has just as many beauties and blemishes, is replete with just as many difficulties and apparent contradictions, as Infinite wisdom saw necessary, in order to make it, like all the works of God, perfect and unique. This one perfect book is the sacred deposit in the hands of the Church. It has been deposited with the injunction, "Freely ye have received, freely give." Wo be to that man who withholds the treasure from his neighbor. Wo be to him who attempts to obscure the light of the lamp of heaven. It is the peculiar glory of the last half century, that the Christian world has awakened to the duty and importance of giving the sacred Word "to all lands." Praised be God for Bible and Missionary Societies, the peculiar institutions of modern times. May their efforts be continued and enlarged an hundred fold, until their work is consummated—until the Bible is translated and published in every language under heaven, and a copy of the Sacred Volume deposited in every palace, and house, and hut inhabited by man. FRUITS OF RELIGIOUS READING.

We lately met with a farmer reading the May number of the Missionary Herald; he remarked that he had taken the Herald for thirty-three years, and read every page of every number except the one he held in his hand. What has been the result? He himself is intimately acquainted with the moral condition of the world, and the operations of the great benevolent societies of Christendom; he has raised up an intelligent family; he pays $40 a year to support the Gospel in the town where he lives; and says he will pay $100 if it shall be necessary, without grudging; we counted six certificates of Life Membership in our great benevolent societies; we have been told, not by himself, that he gives at least $100 a year to various religious charities; and the most of his children are hopefully pious. Such are some of the fruits of religious reading. Yet this same farmer is one of the most laborious of men; his fields are so hard and stony, as almost to bid defiance to the plow: and so broken and steep as to claim relationship to the Alps; lately his horse failing him on a hard day's ride, he concluded to finish the journey by traveling twenty miles on foot, which was easily done, though he is between sixty and seventy years of age. Truly for health, happiness, and success, nothing is equal to a good conscience and particiity. [Cong. Journal.

THE DEATH OF A MOTHER.

Aside from that of a wife, the death of a mother is something more touching than any other event; it bursts a tie which no other affliction can possibly dissolve. For when such an event does happen, we look back upon the days of our infancy and childhood, when a fond mother watched over our "outgoings and incomings," when the dull hours of night were marked by her wakenings.

We think we have done our duty, when we have laid her in the gloomy grave, wetting it with our tears, and raised a stone over her dust, and chanted a hymn to her memory. But there is a duty which maternal affection has imposed upon us, and which nothing but stern conformity to precept can perform. It is to follow her precepts and examples, to take home to our hearts the solemn warnings which heaven-born love dictates—to practice those virtues which ornament life, and to cherish fondly the memory of her to whom we are indebted for life, for happiness, and, I might almost say, for heaven. If we fail to perform these, we prove ourselves traitors to our nature, to our consciences, and to our God.

One moment of my history has been marked as with a pen of iron, the remembrance of which I shall carry with me to the grave. I had just taken my paper and cigar, to enjoy what I deemed a great luxury. I had anticipated a season of great happiness, when sudden as a peal of thunder, I was informed my mother was dead. At first I was disposed to smile, but when the thought came to my mind that it was a sad reality, then human nature gave way, and the truth of the saying, "extremes meet," was verified.

The following lines from Cowper express the feelings of a bereaved one:—

"My mother! when I learn'd that you was dead,
Say, wast thou conscious of the tears I shed?
Hover'd thy spirit o'er thy sorrowing son,
Wretch even then, life's journey thus begun?
I heard the bell toll'd on thy burial day,
I saw the hearse that bore thee slow away,
And turning from my nurs'ry window, drew
A long, long sigh, and wept a last adieu."

THE MOUNTAIN STREAM.

Far away in the mountains of Switzerland the springs and melting snows have formed a little river, which glides on, constantly becoming larger, till at length it goes dashing and foaming over the rocks, as if its channel was too small, and it was chafed by confinement. Then it leaves the mountains, and with them its noisy mirth, and peacefully the Rhine pursues its way along the more level country, the very personification of contentment.

Presently it flows into a deep Valley surrounded by high hills, and having no way of escape, it collects and forms a small placid lake, whose waters are so clear you can see the fishes sporting in them.

But our busy river cannot be held here in bondage, and away across the valley it finds an outlet, and goes on its way rejoicing.

What little earth and stones were mingled with it, when it entered the valley, are left there, and its clear blue waters sparkle in the sunshine, and seem so glad they have broken away from the hills which hemmed them in. And on it goes, hoping that, without farther hindrance, it may be able to go down through the rich valleys and vineyards of France, and offer itself pure to the broad ocean. But how vain are it hopes—soon it is met by a stream coming in another direction, from the mountains, and bearing upon its surface evidence of its unfitness to mingle with the blue waters; for it is muddy, and filled with fragments of rock, and branches of trees which it had brought from the highlands.

But this dissimilarity does not prevent its pouring its contents uninvited, into the quiet Rhine, which must thenceforth accompany it; but though in the same channel, they do not unite; the waters seem trying to keep their own side of the channel; the muddy waters flow apart, while the clear are by themselves, but presently the channel becomes narrow, and they form one deep polluted stream, and can be no more separated till they reach the ocean.

Is not this history of the Rhine emblematic of many youths in our land, who come from their father's homes, alive to every sentiment of virtue, and firmly resolved to resist all temptations in their way. But how soon are they met in their onward course by some deep current of worldliness and sin, which they for a time resolutely resist, but too soon they are overcome by it, all restraints are broken over, and they are hurried away to plunge into the ocean of endless despair. Let their resolutions be founded on strength from above, and drawing life from the Fountain of living waters, they shall not thus be led from the paths of rectitude.

PLEASANT SIGHTS.—These things are comely and pleasant, and worthy of honor from the beholder, says Bishop Hall:—A young saint; an old martyr; a religious soldier; a conscientious statesman; a great man courteous; a learned man humble; a child that understands the eye of its parents; a cheerful companion without vanity; a friend not changed with honors; a sick man happy; a soul departing with comfort and assurance.

"MY FATHER DOES NOT PRAY."

Parents who are ignorant of the power of godliness, and are living in the neglect of prayer, must be exerting a baneful influence upon the souls of their children. Such parents, if they are moral, and show some respect for religion, flatter themselves often that they are training up their offspring in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. It is a great mistake. They are infusing into these young minds the poison of unbelief and enmity against God.

children to pray. Every evening when they were tired to rest, and every morning when they arose, they were accustomed, according to their mother's instructions, to bow their knees in prayer. One night, as James, a boy about five years old was making preparations to retire, he came to his mother, and said, "Mother, I don't want to pray any more." The mother was surprised and grieved. She had fondly hoped that her children had learned something of the value of prayer. She had so often, so feelingly, and so devoutly, represented them the benefit of private devotion, and the guilt and danger of neglecting it, that she flattered herself they loved to pray. She burst into tears as little James uttered this language, "My dear child," said she, "I am sorry to hear you say so. I have said a great deal to you about praying, and I thought you a good boy, and loved to mind your parents, and loved to pray. Now you tell me, you 'don't want to pray any more.' What does this mean, James? Why do you wish to leave off prayer?" "My mother," said he, with all the simplicity and artlessness of a child, "my father does not pray."

Such is the influence on the young and tender mind, of ungodly prayerless parents. While they are living without God, their children are watching them, and imitating their example. It is not strange. It would be remarkable, if it were otherwise. Reader! are you the head of a family, and yet have you no family altar?

TRAINING UP CHILDREN.

It is a matter of fact business to live in this world, any way you can fix it. The wants of the body make imperative demands on the efforts and labors of somebody to supply its indispensable necessities. No one, whatever may be his birth, his condition, or his wealth in this world, has a native right to claim exemption from some degree of toil and effort to supply his own wants. It is a law of the Creator that man shall toil and earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. And parents do their children an incalculable wrong, both to body and soul, when they train them up in idleness and inaction. They will be almost certain, one day, to reap the fruit of such wrong training. It is very far better, both for the body and the soul of any healthy child, to train it up to habits of industry and economy.

There is no greater defect in educating children than neglecting to accustom them to work. It is an evil that attaches mostly to large towns and cities. Children suffer much from it. The parent never considers whether the child's work is necessary or not to the child. Nothing is more uncertain than their future independence and comfort very much depends on being accustomed to work—accustomed to provide for the thousand constantly recurring wants that nature entails on us.

If this were not so, still it preserves them from bad habits; it secures their health; it strengthens both mind and body; enables them better to bear the confinement of the pent-up school-room; and it tends more than anything else to give them just and proper views of life.

It is too often the case that children, provided they spend a half a dozen hours of the day at school, are permitted to spend the rest as they please. Thus they grow up in the world, without any knowledge of its toils and cares; they view it through a false medium; they cannot appreciate the favors you bestow, as they do not know the toils they cost; their bodies and minds are enervated, and they are exposed to whatever vicious associations are within their reach.

The daughter probably, becomes that pitiable, helpless object, a novel-reading girl. The son, if he surmounts the consequence of your neglect, does it probably after his plans and station for life is fixed, and when knowledge, for one of its important objects, comes alas! too late.

No man or woman is fully educated if not accustomed to useful labor. Whatever accomplishments they possess, whatever their mental training, a deduction must be made for ignorance of that important chapter of the world's great book.

PRAYER CHECKED MY ANGER, AND ANGER CHECKED MY PRAYER."—These words are found in the correspondence of Martin Luther during the diet of Augsburgh. In the severe and complicated trials of the Reformers, during the conferences of the diet, Luther, who was not allowed to be present at it, but was yet near enough to know its progress, and to be consulted respecting its affairs, was several days without receiving a letter from his friends. This troubled and perplexed him; his resort was prayer. But his disappointment, heightened to impatience, followed him to his closet. And here his soul was held for a time in a balance. Prayer checked his anger; anger checked his prayer. Faith triumphed; grace reigned, through righteousness and in righteousness. His soul was strengthened, and he knew the cause of the reformed religion was safe, for it was in the hands of God. "I would not have it in our hands," he said to Jonas, "and it would not be desirable that it were so. I have had many things in my hands, and I have lost them all; but whatever I have been able to place in God's hands, I still possess."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, June 18, 1846.

OUR BENEVOLENT ORGANIZATIONS.

The reports which were presented at the recent meetings of the Missionary Association and the Sabbath Tract Society, can hardly fail to suggest subjects for profitable reflection. Those two societies are the principal mediums through which our people express, in the form of contributions, their anxiety to preach the Gospel to the destitute and to make known the true doctrine in regard to the Sabbath. Of course their reports give us some clue to the interest which is felt in these objects. If that interest is deep and general, it is natural to conclude that the contribution will be liberal and from all sections. But if the contributions are stinted, and confined to certain geographical limits, the conclusion is equally natural, that the interest is not deep and general. It is true, that there are some causes operating to render the application of this rule to some extent uncertain and unsatisfactory. In certain sections of the denomination there are other societies organized to accomplish specific objects, which, while they help along the work, do not, can be embodied in the reports of these general societies. This is one reason why the rule which we have laid down is not always true in its application. Another reason is, that in some sections of the denomination there has been no effective agency employed to awaken interest and secure contributions for benevolent objects, which renders it difficult to judge what those sections would do if the subject was fairly and fully brought before them. Nevertheless, we cannot help regarding the reports of these two societies as a pretty faithful index of what is doing. Hence we think that the reflections which they naturally suggest are important, and should be made profitable.

In listening to the reports, particularly those before the Missionary Association, we were struck with the great disparity between the contributions of different churches under equally favorable circumstances for knowing and doing what is needed. Some instances were mentioned in which churches had contributed with a liberality deserving of the highest praise—a liberality, indeed, hardly excelled by any of the churches of any other denomination. By a little inquiry as to what the same churches had done in times past, it was found that they had always been prompt to meet the calls made upon them. They had commenced upon the plan of giving according as God prospered them, and instead of finding themselves impoverished by this course, they had found their ability and disposition to do gradually increasing. No one who reads his Bible believingly can doubt that such will be the experience of every church which acts upon such a plan. It is important that this truth be understood. Neither the missionary cause, nor any other good cause, can be successfully carried forward without it. It is not by great contributions made one year under the influence of some high excitement, followed the next year by comparatively small contributions, that the work is to be carried forward; but it is by the uniform liberality of those who feel that they are stewards of God, and bound to dispense what he places in their hands according as he prospers them. It was exceedingly encouraging, therefore, to hear of these instances of Christian liberality. But when they were contrasted with the course of some churches in which but little had been done, who could help feeling pained? We rejoice, however, in the belief, that the time is not far distant, when there will be no occasion for this complaint of inequality, but when all will be ready to do their part in the great work before us. We believe that our churches and people, as a general thing, are not wanting either in ability or disposition to take hold of the missionary work. That they have not heretofore done it, as all agree that they might and ought to have done, is owing in a great measure to the want of a definite plan of missionary operations, and of system in collecting and disbursing the funds necessary to carry out such plan. This want no longer exists, and we sincerely and confidently hope that the same may soon be said of the apparent lack of interest which has been lamented.

Again, in listening to the reports and statements, we were impressed with the importance of a thorough agency to present the claims and plans of our benevolent organizations and to collect funds. Many persons have been opposed to such agencies. They are expensive, it is said, and can only do the work which the churches ought to do. No doubt if the churches would do the work some expense might be saved, and a good influence exerted upon their members by bringing them into actual service. But past experience has shown that it will not do to rely wholly upon such means. There is a necessity for some one to pass from place to place, correct erroneous impressions where they exist, impart information where it is needed, and by the presentation of facts and arguments, to awaken interest and draw forth corresponding action. The agent who undertakes to do this, will find that he has undertaken a great work; but if he prove true to his trust, he will be sure to confer a rich blessing upon the churches and lay a substantial foundation for future operations. He will be a missionary as truly as he could be on the western prairies or in a foreign land. He will need the spirit of a missionary, and ought to be received as a missionary. Nobody who rightly estimates it will regard the post as an easy one; and whoever understandingly accepts it, ought to be regarded with favor and encouraged in every reasonable way.

CHRISTIAN UNION.

The last number of the Christian Watchman contains a letter from Dr. Justin Edwards in answer to the question, "What can the Christians who are to assemble at ——, do to promote Christian Union?" Among other things, the Doctor says:—

"They can announce to the world 'the right and the duty' of every man to confine his secular business and cares to six days in a week; to take the Sabbath for rest; for the worship of God; the hearing of the gospel; the searching of the Scriptures, and the promotion of the spiritual good of man; and by example, the diffusion of information, and kind moral influence, endeavor to persuade all men thus to 'remember the Sabbath day, and keep it holy."

No doubt it would be a very easy thing, and perfectly consistent with Christian Union, to announce the foregoing proposition to the world, and "persuade all men thus to remember the Sabbath day, and keep it holy." But suppose some one should rise up in the assembly and [illegible] might understand which is the Sabbath day—whether it is the first, the fifth, or the seventh day of the week—what then? Why, if Dr. Edwards was permitted to reply—as he was in similar circumstances at the Saratoga Sabbath Convention two years ago—he would probably say, that such a question was foreign to the objects of the meeting, and the person who could ask it ought not to be allowed to "disturb us in the enjoyment of our day." Here then we should have an exhibition of the kind of Christian Union which the Doctor would like—a union in announcing certain abstract propositions, any one of which would explode like a pop-gun the moment it should be brought to the test of free inquiry. Away with such a union!

DO CHRISTIANS INTELLIGENTLY KEEP SUNDAY?

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder.

It is a common thing for the advocates of Sunday-keeping, in conversation with Sabbath-keepers, to appeal to the multitudes who keep Sunday, and especially to the learned, as evidence that the day, is intelligently and rightly observed. Yet there are but few even of the learned, who have so examined the evidence by which it is sustained, as to be able to give an intelligent reason for its observance; and no person having intercourse with them, and making the Sabbath question a matter of examination, can arrive at any other conclusion. If any were disposed to doubt this, I would venture my reputation, that an examination of ten or one hundred ministers taken promiscuously as they may stand in the catalogues of their ecclesiastical organizations, would abundantly confirm it. How unsafe then is such a rule to guide us in matters where eternal things are at stake.

I send you the following relation of an interview between one of our tract distributors and a Baptist minister in Western New-York, in confirmation of what I have said, only remarking that similar interviews may be multiplied indefinitely. It is most respectfully dedicated to the conscience-keepers of our Baptist brethren, who affect to despise our humble efforts to address them. P. S.

Extract from the Report of a Tract Distributor.

Passing to the next village, I called upon and staid over night with a Baptist minister. He appeared pleased with the interview, and as soon as supper was over he made some apology and began to inquire why we kept Saturday for Sunday? As may be supposed, I was ready to excuse him, and to "instruct him in the way of the Lord more perfectly," particularly in reference to the character of Saturday and Sunday. I was somewhat amused, as well as surprised, to see and hear his varied movements and remarks as we passed in conversation from point to point. When we commenced, he seemed pleased, and anxious to shed light upon my mind; but soon failing in his attempt to show that the Sabbath was Jewish in its character, he seemed at a loss what to say. At one time a cloud of mystery and doubt seemed to hang over him, and then he was more than half inclined to yield; now venturing an effort that was as likely to land him in the fire as in the pan, and then listening to the result, evidently fearing its consequences; now positive, then doubtful; now anxious, then indifferent; now curious, then grave; now pleased, then almost vexed; now wondering, and almost as frequently changing his position, first talking of a change, then of an entire abolition of the Sabbath law; now of a transfer, then of no difference; then do as you like, keep one day or another, only keep it to the Lord; now half admitting that no change had taken place, and wondering how this state of things had been brought about; and so, in this state of mind, about 12 o'clock he proposed, amidst the darkness and fog of the night, to cast anchor, hold over until daylight, and then take an observation and get our latitude. This proposition was very acceptable to me, as I had traveled a considerable distance that afternoon on foot through the mud and storms. In the morning we arose in time to breakfast with the family. He expressed much satisfaction at the privilege he had enjoyed, appeared anxious to know and obey the truth, and insisted on my calling upon him again if ever I chanced to pass by him.

TEMPERANCE JUBILEE.—There was a grand Jubilee of the Sons of Temperance in New York on Tuesday of last week. Delegates were in attendance from nearly every part of the country, showing that there is still vitality and energy in the temperance organizations. The New York Tribune says it was truly one of the most glorious scenes—we use the word in its very best sense—that we ever witnessed, and has infused new life and energy into the heart of every friend of the noble Temperance Reform. It was indeed gratifying beyond expression to see such a right royal turn-out of the soldiers of Temperance—soldiers who war only against the common enemy of Man, and whose gay trappings are not to be soiled in blood on the battle-field—whose business it is, instead of killing men's bodies, to save both souls and bodies, and to shower down blessings upon the self-accursed throughout the world. Not all the gauds of war, the pomp of triumphal display, the glory of the victor's fame, purchased with the blood of his fellow creatures, can at all compare with the calm, sober, solemn renown, that of right belongs to every Son and Daughter of Temperance—the great practical reform of the present age, and the forerunner of all good and beautiful improvements in the condition of society.

THE NESTORIAN MISSION.—At the meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, held in Boston on the 28th ult., Dr. Anderson stated in the course of some remarks, that it was a striking fact that a remarkable religious interest commenced at the Nestorian mission, especially in the two seminaries, on the first Monday in the year—the day devoted by our churches to prayer for the conversion of the world. In these seminaries, there were in [illegible] hopeful conversions, and the influence was silently extending through the region. Mar Yohannan, the Bishop who visited this country with Dr. Perkins, was taking a very active part.

CIRCULAR.

To the members of the Seventh-day Baptist Churches throughout the United States:

DEAR BRETHREN,—At a meeting of the Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, held in Berlin just after our Annual Meeting, the undersigned were appointed to address you. Permit us to say in reference to the anniversary, that it was a very interesting season; the Lord was with us to warm our hearts, and to make us feel that it is good to be engaged in his service. We regret that we were not cheered with the presence and encouraged by the counsels of more of our western brethren. The responsibility resting upon us in view of the final decision as to the particular location of the Foreign Mission, which had been referred by the Executive Board to the Association, made it important that we should have the advice of experienced brethren from all parts of the denomination. There were also other reasons rendering it desirable that our meeting should be sustained by a large representation. Our disappointment in this matter, however, is not attended with any doubts of the sincerity of our brethren in the cause of missions, nor with any diminution of zeal on our own part. We look forward to another anniversary in the expectation of seeing all parts of the denomination fully represented.

It has been suggested to the Board, that some hesitation about contributing to its funds has been manifested by some of our brethren, lest the projected foreign mission should be abandoned. It gives us pleasure to say, that it will not be abandoned. It will be prosecuted with the utmost vigor. If any thing could induce the Board to abandon the enterprise, it would be this very hesitation on the part of some to come forward with their offerings. But we are resolved to go forward. The covenant, by which all Christians are pledged to live for Jesus Christ, binds them to "show forth his praise." God has opened our eyes to see that this is our duty, and we are afraid to look back. THE FOREIGN MISSION MUST BE PROSECUTED. Brother Carpenter and wife, our accepted missionaries, will sail for Eastern Africa as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. For the purpose of expediting this object, we wish you to forward the amount of your subscriptions to brother A. D. Titsworth, Metouchin, New-Jersey, our Treasurer, or pay them to our agents, as soon as possible. Brother S. Davison is our agent for the churches in New-Jersey and New-York city; brother Alexander Campbell for the churches east of the Hudson river; and brother V. Hull for the rest of the denomination. They will call upon you soon, not only for what you have already subscribed, but to solicit further subscriptions, and your continued patronage and prayers. We hope they may be welcomed for the work's sake in which they are engaged.

We cannot specify the exact time when brother and sister Carpenter will sail for Africa; but it will be soon. Three or four short months may find them on their passage. But little else besides a sufficiency of funds is now wanting in order to prepare them for their departure. We are confident that you will not be backward in furnishing them.

In conclusion, we would say that it is the intention of the Board to manage all their operations in this matter in the best manner in their power. But as we are but new beginners in the work of foreign missions, we may in the outset commit errors, which future experience will guard against. Perhaps already in our incipient operations we have been faulty. If so, it has not been intentional, but the result of ignorance. We affectionately entreat you to bear with our faults, to forgive our past mistakes if you have discovered any, and in brotherly love to counsel with us in regard to our future movements.

May the God of missions breath new life into our entire denomination.

By order of the Board,

THOS. B. BROWN, President.
S. DAVISON, Cor. Secretary.

Berlin, N. Y., June 7, 1846.

"CLOSE COMMUNION."—While the two General Assemblies of the Presbyterian Church were in session in Philadelphia, week before last, the New School Assembly passed a vote inviting their brethren of the Old School to join with them in the celebration of the Lord's Supper. A lengthy discussion grew out of the subject, which occupied a portion of three days. Some of the members of the Old School Assembly contended that it would be a flagrant breach of consistency, after having separated from the New School on the ground of their holding heretical doctrines, now to join with them in the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The matter was finally disposed of by adopting a Minute which recognizes the New School Assembly "as a branch of the church of our common Lord," but declines its invitation on the plea that it is "inexpedient to institute a new usage at this time." After such a demonstration, it striks us that we ought to hear no more from the Presbyterian church about the close communion principles of the Baptists.

THE CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.—By a business letter from Bro. Luke P. Babcock, we learn that the Central Seventh-day Baptist Association met at Scott, N. Y. on the fourth day of last week. Varnum Hull was chosen Moderator; James Bailey and Jason B. Wells, Secretaries. The attendance was good, and the deliberations were harmonious. Three churches were received into the Association, one of which was the church recently organized at Dianna, Lewis Co., N. Y. Farther particulars we hope to receive soon.

FREEWILL BAPTIST FOREIGN MISSION.—The Freewill Baptists have a mission among the heathen in Orissa, India. Three persons are now connected with it, and the fourth, a female teacher, is expected to sail in a few weeks to join those already in the field. Besides these, there is a young man now pursuing his collegiate studies, who expresses a willingness to engage in the work. The expense of sustaining those now on the ground, together with their schools, is stated to be about $3,500 per year.

PERSIA.—Recent intelligence received by the American Board gives a cheering account of their mission in Persia. In the seminaries under the care of the mission, there is such a deep religious interest as has not been known in the Nestorian churches for ages; and the spirit of inquiry is widely extending.

From Turkey, accounts have also been received, from which it appears that the persecution at Constantinople continues, but that the Armenian converts endure it with unexpected heroism and constancy.

RETURN OF MISSIONARIES.—It is stated that the Baptist missionaries from the East, who have been visiting this country for a few months past, are about to return to their respective fields of labor, and will sail in three different companies during the month of June. One company is to consist of Messrs. Judson, Beecher, and Harris, with their wives, and Miss Lillybridge. Mr. Dean is to sail in another vessel, and Mr. Cook and his associates in a third.

GOOD NEWS FROM BURMAH.—Zion's Advocate says that letters have been received within a few days, bringing the gratifying intelligence that more than six hundred Karens have been baptized during the past year in Burmah Proper, in addition to those previously reported.

MARRIAGE OF MR. JUDSON.—Adoniram Judson, D. D., Missionary, of Maulmain, Burmah, was married at Hamilton, Madison Co., N. Y., on the 2d inst., to Miss Emily Chubbuck, so well and favorably known to the literary world as "Fanny Forrester."

RESISTING THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE.—Great efforts are making in some parts of the State of New York to evade the License Law. In Brooklyn the Grand Jury have found bills of indictment against several persons for violating it. A very large meeting of persons engaged in distilling, brewing, tavern-keeping, &c., was recently held in that city, and a considerable sum of money was subscribed for the purpose of creating a fund with which to contend against the law.

BAPTISTS IN CONNECTICUT.—The Connecticut Baptist Convention held its twenty-third annual meeting in Hartford last week. From the Report of the Treasurer, it appeared that about $10,000 had been raised in the State during the year for the Missionary and Bible causes.

THE OREGON BOUNDARY SETTLED.—It will be seen by reference to the proceedings in Congress, that this troublesome matter has at length been disposed of. There has seldom been occasion to announce news so important and so generally welcome. Although the best judges have not regarded a war with England as very probable, all have felt anxious for the settlement of the only existing difficulty which could possibly lead to such a result. The effect of the settlement is said to be already most favorable upon the financial and business operations of the country.

☞ ELD. JAMES H. COCHRAN is residing for the present at Clarence, Erie Co., N. Y., and wishes his correspondents to address him accordingly.

☞ We have received two numbers of a neat little daily paper published at Watertown, N. Y., by Joel Greene, called "The Daily Journal." Terms $4 a year.

MEMOIR OF REV. DANIEL HOLBROOK GILLETTE, of Mobile, Alabama. By his brothers, Rev. W. B. Gillette, of Piscataway, and Rev. A. D. Gillette, of Philadelphia. Philadelphia, J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1846.

Such is the title of a neat little volume which has been placed on our table. It professes to be simply a narrative of the labors and sufferings of one who, notwithstanding much bodily affliction, toiled on with great faithfulness and success in the work of preaching the Gospel, until he found an early grave. The volume is said to owe its origin to the affection of the three churches over which he presided. To them, we doubt not, it will be a very welcome gift.

THE FREE PEOPLE OF JAMAICA.—It is common to hear persons who know nothing about the matter from actual observation, represent the free colored people of Jamaica as lazy and degraded. The Rev. Mr. Pennington has spent two months in Jamaica making particular inquiries upon this question. Hear what he says:—

"I have seen these people on the cane field,—men, women, and children; I have seen them on the road, going to market; I have seen them working on their own little estates; I have gone into the coffee field; and into the sugar works; and I am quite prepared to say, that they are by no means a lazy people. The women and children do more work than any class of men in America. I do not except the Irish laborers on the public works. I have also visited the colored people in their own cottages, in their own shops, in their schools and in their chapels, on Sunday at even, and on work days. The people are very happy and cheerful, and withal very peaceable. In all this, I do not mean to say, that every vestige of the slave system has been destroyed. No sensible man would credit me if I should say so. But those which remain are not to be charged to the people who have been freed, but to the authors and supporters of slavery."

THE WEST AFRICAN MISSION.

A barbarous war has been carried on for some time past in that portion of West Africa where the missionaries sent out from this country in company with the Mendians are stationed. The whole country has been ravaged, some of the towns burnt, and many of the inhabitants killed or made slaves. Fears have been entertained for the safety of the mission. But the following extract of a letter written by Mr. Raymond, under date of March, 1846, shows that the mission is safe, and that the Gospel has a mysterious but resistless power on even the savages and cannibals of Africa:—

"Although we have been surrounded by savage war-men, sometimes several hundred of them have been here at once, yet they have never taken a pin from us without permission, while every town near us has been plundered. It may be asked how have we been protected? I answer, by our God. The native chiefs have not been able to protect us: for most of them have been driven from their homes, and their towns have been burnt by their enemies from the interior, some of whom are cannibals. The head war-men, almost without exception, have tried rather to obtain my favor, than to injure me. The cannibals are among my best friends. You may ask why is all this? One of the head war-men was here the other day and thus explained it. He said he was bad enough, but he could not trouble us, and if any one should do so, let him go where he would, he never could be any better, meaning that some curse would follow him. He gave us as a reason, that 'we had no business with the war, that we no cheat any body, that we no do any body bad, that we were God people.'

"This mission is a living witness, that the Gospel can be introduced among a savage and barbarous people without the protection of civilized governments. It is the opinion of many that the cannon must go first and the Gospel follow after. Let the Gospel go first and then there will be no necessity for the cannon.

"The chiefs are impatient for the establishment of schools. One of the Mendian war-chiefs from the interior seems determinad that I shall return with him and establish a school among his people."

MR. JUDSON THE MISSIONARY.

The following memoranda, which we copy from the Baptist Memorial, will answer correctly many inquiries which are frequently made.

Adoniram Judson was born at Malden, Mass., 9th August, 1798. Graduated at Brown University, 1807, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1810. Visited England with reference to Missionary engagements, early in 1811, and in September of that year was accepted as a missionary, by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which had been called into existence by an appeal written by himself, and signed by him and three other young men, one year before. Married to Miss Ann Hasseltine, of Mass., 5th February, 1812. Ordained at Salem, Mass., the following day, and thence sailed for Calcutta on the 19th of that month. Arrived, 18th of June.

Mr. and Mrs. Judson were baptized on a profession of their faith in Calcutta, September, 1812. Sailed for the Isle of France in December. Thence via Madras, they reached Rangoon in July, 1813. The first baptism in the Burman Empire, was by the hands of Dr. Judson, 27th June, 1819. In the years 1824–5–6, a grievous imprisonment of near twenty months was experienced by him. Sometimes for months together, he wore five pair of fetters at a time. The 24th of October, 1826, Mrs. Ann H. Judson died at Amherst, in British Burmah.

The printing of the first New Testament in Burmese was completed in 1832. The translation of the entire Bible in Burmese, was completed by Dr. J. 21st of January, 1834.

In April of the same year, he was married to Mrs. Sarah Hall Boardman, at Tavoy. She died on her way to America, at St. Helena, and was buried there, September, 1845. Mr. Judson with three motherless children, arrived at Boston in October, having been absent from his native land more than one-third of a century, and witnessed as well as participated in the most glorious achievment of modern Missions.

DOINGS IN CONGERSS.

In the House of Representatives a bill was passed directing the sale of mineral lands at $2,50 per acre for one year, after which those remaining unsold are to be offered at $1,25 per acre. A joint resolution was submitted, but not acted upon, authorizing a silver medal to be struck for each of the non-commissioned officers, musicians and privates who were in Gen. Taylor's army at the battles on the 8th and 9th of May.

The Senate spent much time last week in secret sessions, considering the Oregon Question. It is understood that the British Government, through its representative Mr. Packenham, proposed the conditions of a final settlement of that vexed question. This proposition was communicated by the President to the Senate, who, after much discussion and delay, advised the President to compromise the controversy on the basis submitted. The vote is said to have been, ayes 28, nays 10, one member refusing to vote, and six being absent. The terms of the proposition made by Mr. Packenham are substantially as follows:—

"The general basis of the proposition is to make the forty-ninth parallel of latitude the boundary between the territories of the two countries, from the point on that parallel where the present boundary now terminates, to the middle of the sound or channel which divides Vancouver's Island from the continent, and thence along the middle of that channel, and so Southwardly and Westwardly through the Straits of Fuca to the Pacific; the navigation of this sound or bay to be open to both parties; and the navigation of the Columbia river, up to the main stream and up its North branch, to the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, to be free to the Hudson's Bay Company and British subjects trading with that Company."

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

The news received from the seat of war since our last has not been important. The Mexican forces seem to have retired before our army, leaving no opportunity for those exploits which gratify lovers of excitement. It is said that the Mexican plan of warfare is to avoid all pitched battles, but to hang about our troops, cutting them off where there is an opportunity, and leaving the rest of the work to be done by the climate. If this plan is carried out, the war may yet be long and expensive, although the result is certain.

TEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Great Western arrived at New York on Monday last, bringing English news to the 30th ult., ten days later than previous advices.

Cotton was firm and advancing under the influence of the war with Mexico.

The Money Market was dull, and the Corn Trade had not improved.

Queen Victoria gave birth to a Princess—her fifth child—on the 25th ult.

The Corn Importation Bill passed its second reading in the House of Lords by a majority of 47. All uncertainty as to its final passage had been removed.

The news of the War with Mexico created intense excitement in London and Liverpool.

The accounts of the Potato Crop in Ireland are on the whole encouraging.

The remains of Gansevoort Melville, late U. S. Secretary of Legation at the Court of St James, have been sent home to his friends.

Prince Louis Bonaparte has escaped from prison in the disguise of a workman.

It is whispered that the Royal family of France, anxious to cement a close alliance with the royal family of England, propose to pay a visit to Windsor or to Buckingham Palace in the course of the summer.

In Ireland the hay harvest is unusually forward, In some parts of the country cutting has already commenced.

A youth, aged 17 years, died recently in the hospital of Navan, of glanders which he had contracted from a horse which he attended. The infection was received by the boy through a slight cut on one of his fingers. Horses, it appears, can be cured of this frightful disease, but a remedy for the human subject has hitherto been beyond the reach of medecine.

The Mersey, near Liverpool, was recently the scene of a melancholy accident. Off the magazines, the Rambler, from Sligo, with 250 passengers, and a great number of cattle on board, came in collision with the Sea Nymph, leaving Liverpool for Newry. The result was the loss of twenty-one lives, and the wounding of a score more. Some of the Rambler's passengers were killed on the spot, and others were drowned in the stream. The vessel was subsequently run on shore. The night was not dark. The affair is undergoing investigation.

"THE LAND STEALER."—The Houston Star tells the following story:—A small party of Wacoes were met near the Trinity a few days ago, by some traders, and the Indians exhibited a a gold watch, a surveyor's compass which they called a land stealer. The traders endeavored to learn from them where they obtained these articles, but in vain. The Chief of the Wacoes said that none of them had shed the blood of white men for many months. It is supposed that these articles where captured at the deserted camp of Col. Wallace, who with a party of eight men was met by a party of Indians high up on the Guadaloupe, about two months ago, compelled to desert his camp and flee to the settlements. One of the Indians had taken off the dial of the watch, and stuck it in his hair as an ornament. They expressed great abhorrence for the land stealer, and seemed to attribute to it many most mischievous qualities. The Indians on our frontier seem to regard the surveyor's compass as a kind of talisman, that is invariably attended by an evil genius. A few years since, a party of Indians that had captured a compass near Gonzales, broke it to pieces, and then as if they feared that its fragments might still do them an injury, they sunk it in the Guadaloupe.

HORRORS OF WAR.—The following is an extract of a private letter from an officer in the Army, dated Matamoras, May 23.

"I went over the field after the battle of Resaca de la Palma, and the sight which met my eyes was one which imagination can scarcely depict. Bodies of Mexican soldiers were lying about in every direction—some with their heads entirely or partly shot off—others without legs or arms—others with their entrails torn out. One man, a fine looking fellow, was lying on the ground with a cartridge in his fingers, having evidently been killed while in the act of priming his musket. I crept about on my hands and knees through the chapparal, and at every few paces I would come across dead bodies; and at one spot I discovered the body of a beautiful Mexican girl staked through the heart. It is impossible to conceive who could have been guilty of this inhuman act. It is hardly necessary to say it is impossible that any American could have done it."

LICENSE LAW.—DUTY OF TOWN AND COUNTY CLERKS.—The 3d section of the act, chapter 14, of the laws of 1846, requires the several town clerks, or other officers by whom the proceedings of the town meetings and charter elections in cities are usually entered, within ten days after the vote for or against the granting of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be taken, to transmit to the clerks of their respective counties a statement of the number of votes for and against license in their several towns and cities, and the county clerks are also required within ten days after receiving such returns, to transmit a statement thereof to the Secretary of State. The Albany Argus states that, although more than twenty days have elapsed since the election was held, the returns from only fifteen counties have been received at the Secretary's office up to this time. This induces a belief that the attention of the local officers has not been drawn to the above provisions, and we unite with the Argus in calling public attention to this very interesting subject.

CONVENTION AGAINSE THE LICENSE LAW.—A Mass Convention of those opposed to the present Excise Law, was held at Batavia on the 6th. The Le Roy Gazette says the meeting was thinly attended. L. Seward of Alexandria, presided. Speeches were made which, in the language of the report, "demonstrated to every reflecting mind present, that the No License law was unjust, oppressive, and at war with the interests of society." The resolutions adopted declared that the law was unconstitutional and had been passed through the "efforts of demagogues, office-holders, office-seekers and blind fanatics, desirous of furthering their own ends," and that the result of the recent election under the law is attributable to the apathy of the friends of liberal principles "and the buffoonery and blackguardism of strolling temperance lecturers and blind fanatics." Truly, such language is worthy of the cause in which it is employed and the men who use it.

PAINFUL RESULT OF THREATENED PUNISHMENT.—A succession of misfortunes, which seem to be peculiarly French, are related in the Courrier des Etats Unis, as having occurred lately at Belleville, near Paris. A washerwoman, mother of a little girl, and boy still younger, had gone to her employment, leaving the smaller child under the care of the elder. On departing, she had charged the little boy to be good under penalty of those violent and stupid threats which are never meant to be executed. Upon her return she had forgotten her silly threatening, but scarcely had she entered, when the little girl running up to her, announced that her brother, not having been good, she had herself inflicted the punishment. The wretched mother ran to the cradle and found the little thing so horribly mutilated, that it had but a few moments more to live. In her frenzy, the mother, raising the washing-bat, which she still held in her hand, struck the little girl lifeless at her feet. She ten threw herself from the window and soon expired. The case had left a deep impression on the whole village, the woman having been much liked by the neighborhood, and regarded as an excellent mother.

The settlement of the vexed Oregon Question has given a general impulse to business, and there is an improved market for many descriptions of produce.

The steamboats Oregon and Traveler ran side by side, on the Sound, twenty-five miles in fifty-seven minutes!

SUMMARY.

The fortune of the Rothschilds, the great English Bankers, is said to amount to the comfortable little sum of 735 millions of frances; or 29,400,000 pounds sterling. The profits of their house at Paris last year were 135,000,000f's.; and their extensive banking establishment at London, Vienna, Frankfort, Naples, &c., also produces enormous profits.

Prince Esterhazy, a Hungarian lord, is the richest man in the world. His estate contains 130 villages, 40 towns, and 34 castles. One of his four country seats contains 360 rooms. The number of his sheep must be enormous, as he has 2500 shepherds. It will be seen what power he can exert, when, in addition to his wealth, it is recollected that he is a feudal lord, and holds the power of life and death over his vassals.

We would state for the benefit of those afflicted with lockjaw, that a common cent, or a piece of copper bound firmly upon the wounded part, and in actual contact with it, will cause almost immediate and entire relief and cause the wound to speedily heal, whether it be made by rusty nail, steel instrument, splinter, or any other cause, either in the foot, hand, or other part of the body.

An English paper says that a case of preserved meat, taken from the wreck of the Fury, which was lost in the Frozen Ocean in Capt. Parry's first voyage, about twenty years since, was opened by a gentleman at Brentford, when it was found to be as fresh as the day it was packed, and when cooked it was excellent.

The neatest way to separate beeswax from the comb, is to tie it in a piece of linen or woollen cloth or bag, with a pebble or two to keep it from floating; place it in a kettle of cold water, which is hung over the fire; as the water heats, the wax melts and rises to the surface, while all the impurities remain in the bag.

Louis Phillippe has sent three hundred francs to the firm of Meade & Brothers, in return for a set of their Daguerreotype views of Niagara Falls and the surrounding scenery. The same firm, so says the Albany Citizen, contemplates sending sets of the views of Niagara to the Queen of England, and the 'Autocrat of all the Russias.'

The amount of wool to be clipped in the United States in 1846, is estimated at 140,000,000 lbs. The home demand at 110,000,000 lbs., leaving a surplus for export of 30,000,000 lbs. Its average value, if based on half blood merino, is about 25 cents per lb., or $35,666,666 at the present ruling prices.

The Senate of Connecticut have passed a bill repealing the license law of the last year, and substituting a law which, while it does not prohibit selling, prohibits drinking, and selling to drink, except at taverns. Taverns are by former laws obliged to obtain licenses, and the authorities who grant those licenses, can do it on such terms as they think proper.

A child eighteen months of age, daughter of Addison Hill, of New-York, fell from a window of an attic story of the house on the South-western corner of Franklin and Elm sts. Although the child fell a distance of thirty feet, striking on the pavement below, yet strange to say, no bones were broken, and the patient, under the treatment of a skilful physician, is doing well.

John Dull, a youth of 17, was put on trial at Baltimore for the murder of John W. Ledmun in a low brothel of that city about a month since. The testimony established that the two had been in the brothel most of the preceding afternoon, when a playful scuffle commenced in which a girl named Susan Elmore was pushed into a settee on which Ledmun was lying; he put his arm around her waist, and at the same moment Dull took hold of her to pull her away, when the two let go of her and scuffled, still rather good-naturedly, until Dull, being overpowered, drew a knife and stabbed Ledmun so that he died of the wound. The defence contends that the act was one of excusable homicide.

This year is distinguished in the vicinity of Memphis, Tennessee, by the appearance of countless millions of Locusts, which have been visible for some days, making a tremendous noise in the forests, like the continuous roll of thousands of drums. How large a district of country they now infest in this vicinity it is impossible to tell; we have heard, however, that they extend at least from the upper counties of Mississippi to Jackson county, Tenn., North of this—an area of nearly fifty miles.

On the night of the 24th ult., the steamer Diadem, on her upward passage, came in contact, near Hawsville, Ky., with the little steamer Pink, bound from Pittsburgh to the mouth of the Wabash, by which collision the Pink was instantly sunk, and every person on board except the Captain, drowned. There were seven passengers, and the officers and crew numbered some fifteen persons. The Captain escaped by jumping overboard in his night clothes, and swimming to the shore.

Rev. Leonard Bacon has accepted an invitation to deliver a Discourse on Civil and Religious Liberty, in New-Haven, on the 4th of July. The object of the celebration, of which his address will be the principal feature, is to redeem the 'rum-smoked, powder-smoked,' anniversary from the riot and dissipation which have so generally characterized it in times past.

On the 7th ult., the very day in which the dreadful tornado of 1840 destroyed a part of Natchez, one nearly equal to it laid the town of Grenada, Mississippi, in desolation and ruin, taking away the lives of many valuable citizens, and seriously wounding many others who encountered its fury.

Professor Mitchell, of the Cincinnati Observatory, has issued the prospectus of a Monthly Journal, to be devoted to Astronomical Science, and particularly intended to record the results of the researches of the new telescope at Cincinnati, which is the second telescope in size in the world.

There are three furnaces, now in successful operation, at the lead mines in Hardin county, in the Southern section of Illinois. The lead produced is of the best quality, and the ore inexhaustible. But a little time will elapse, says the Alton Telegraph, before Southern Illinois will compete successfully with the North in the production and sale of this article of commerce.

Fourteen of the departments at Mexico, have notified their government, that if the scheme of establishing a monarchial government were enforced upon them, they would be compelled, in self-defence, to ask for admission into the Union of the United States of America.

The King of Ashantee, Africa, has 3,300 wives; and the prosperity of his kingdom is supposed to depend on his keeping the number full. The King of Yarriba boasted to Clapperton that his wives, linked hand in hand, would reach entirely across his dominions.

Mr. James Simpson, of Baltimore, has received a judgment of $14,250 and costs in the U. S. Circuit Court of Pennsylvania, against the city of Philadelphia, for laying down and using a railroad curve invented by him.

May 14,'14, the English House of Commons voted to Wellington the nice sum of £400,000; at another time the additional sum of £4,000 a year for three lives, adding to this, by way of donative, £3,400,000, with a salary of $20,000 per annum for his services in India. Is it wonderful that the immense pauper classes of the country complain?

The Frankfort (Ky.) Commonwealth says: Judge Kinkead, of the 19th district, has performed a very handsome, and we are happy to hear, a very acceptable act, by the appointment of Mrs. Trimble, the accomplished and estimable lady of the late John Trimble, as clerk of the Charter circuit, in the place of her diseased husband.

The editor of the Cherokee Advocate asserts that, in proportion to the population, there are fewer men among the Cherokees who cannot read and write, either Cherokee or English, than are to be found in any State in the Union.

A bill passed the Legislature of Connecticut, for the protection of the Telegraph posts and wires. Any injury maliciously done to them, subjects the perpetrator to a fine of $100 and imprisonment for six months in the common jail. Let men and boys take warning.

The number of flouring mills in Oswego is ten, with 53 runs of stone, capable of turning out 4000 barrels of flour per day.

The Postmaster General is very indignant, because important news is carried by express between Montgomery and Mobile, so as to gain 24 hours of the mail. He has written a letter to Hon. D. H. Lewis, proposing that the express be put down by severe legal penalties, or else by the establishment of a telegraphic communication between the points alluded to.

We have accounts from many sections of the State that the present crops of grain and grass were never known to be finer at this season of the year than they are at present. In many part Indian corn has already sprouted to the heights of two feet. Wheat and other small grain is far advanced, and looks as though we were to have a great surplus.

A correspondent of the Merchants' Exchange writes, under date of April 25, that a brig was lying at anchor at St. Helena, with "James Wilson, New-York" on her stern. She was taken possession of by H. B. M. ship Acteon, as a prize, having been found lying at anchor at Kabenda, on the west coast of Africa, abandoned, and without crew, flag, or papers on board. She was fitted out for slaves. The vessel would be condemned in the admiralty court. The James Wilson was sold at Rio Janeiro, a short time since, to a Brazilian.

The American brig Malaga, of Beverly, under command of Lieut. Thomas G. Hunter, arrived at Beverly in 55 days from Kabenda, Africa, as a prize to the U. S. brig Boxer. The Malaga was seized under suspicion of aiding and abetting the slave trade.

LAW OF NEWSPAPERS.—1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary, are considered as wishing to continue their subscription.

2. If subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publisher may continue to send them till all arrearages are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their papers from the offices where they are directed, they are held responsible till they have settled their bill, or ordered their paper discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publisher, and the paper is sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The courts have decided, that refusing to take a paper or a periodical from the office, or removing and leaving it uncalled for, is "prima facie" evidence of intentional fraud.

THE OTHER SIDE.—The Picayune says, "the Mexican papers claim positively that the number of killed and wounded on the part of the Americans was more considerable than that of the Mexicans. General Arista sets down the force of the Mexicans in the action of the 8th, at 3,000 men and twelve pieces of artillery; our numbers are stated to have been 3,000 men, more or less, with great superiority in artillery. The destruction by our artillery is represented to have been severe. Over three thousand shots are said to have been fired at the Mexicans by our artillery, between 2 o'clock P. M. and 7 in the evening, when the battle closed. The Mexicans in the same time, discharged seven hundred and fifty shots from their artillery. The Mexican loss on the 8th is set down at 352 killed, wounded and missing—and they claim to have retained possession of the field of battle.

READING SERMONS.—A correspondent of the Alabama Baptist discourseth in this wise on the subject of reading sermons:—

"Let not him that readeth a sermon, despise him that readeth not; and let not him which readeth not, judge him that readeth; for God hath received him. Who art thou that judgeth another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth."

MARRIED,

DIED,

At his residence in Hopkinton, R. I., on the 5th inst., Mr. SILAS GREENMAN, in the 77th year of his age. He buried his wife about two months ago, and has been fast declining ever since, until he fell asleep in Jesus, to reunite, we trust, with his departed companion, where the grief of separation is known no more. His sickness was attended with severe pain at times, but he bore it with Christian submission and resignation to the providence of God. D. C.

THE POOR-HOUSE HEARSE.

"Though a pauper, he's one whom his MAKER yet owns."

Reader, have you ever seen the vehicle thus designated? Has its sombre appearance ever given you a melancholy sensation, as you have followed it in imagination to the pauper's grave-yard, and seen its load deposited in the yawning trench, excavated to hide the poor bodies a little while from view, and then (as mentioned in a presentation of a former Grand Jury,) exhibit them again with all the loathsome and appalling concomitants of partial or entire exhumation?

Years ago, as I have seen it driving through our streets, I would shudderingly think, to how many a heart beneath the Alms House roof, the roll of its wheels must daily communicate a chill of horror, as among so many, frequent burials would require its constant service; and it was not until a young creature in whom I had been interested died at Bellevue, that I knew it was mainly dispensed with there. In a conversation held with the convict nurse, a few days after Jane's death, I asked among other questions, whether any funeral service was held, or any person followed her corpse to the grave, adding how extremely I regretted that I had not been present. "Ah, ma'am," she replied, "if you think the crather had a decent buryin' you're much mistaken, and mayhap it's well you wasn't here. I'm Irish, and a prisoner at that; but God knows it would be worse than dying to go to my grave, and that so long a one, be taken on a wheelbarrow."

"What," said I, "was she carried thus, and not a prayer, not a hearse?"

"Troth and it's the truth I've been telling ye—not a soul followed to give the creen."

"Why do they have a hearse then attached to the institution if they do not use it?"

"Why, ma'am, sometimes the pauper folks are buried decently, and prisoners too, if their friends look after them, and then they need it. We have grand buryings sometimes here I tell you; I have seen twenty carriages in a row inside the walls before now, to put a poor crather under ground with, that wasn't worth a ha' pence! And ye see, ma'am, they send the hearse to bring the old and the sick out here, who can't get here any other way. It's the Corporation's private carriage, ma'am!"

Since then, the hearse has never passed me without eliciting deep feeling. Two years since, it stood within a stone's cast of my door, and in it were a number of individuals seated on the straw that I was told a kind grocer had thrown in for their accommodation. It had stopped in my neighborhood, to convey a poor Irish woman who had been sick a long while (and thus exhausted her little store) out to Bellevue. The screams and lamentations of the poor soul, as she saw the vehicle drive up, and gazed in upon the squalid group, were fearful to hear; at length she seated herself on the pavement, with her arms encircling her knees, and looking upward raised the "howl" in the utter abandonment of despair. As she spoke in Irish, her gestures and tone interpreted far more than I cared to know of her deep misery. Unable to interfere efficiently, I could but retire from the scene, but how often has it risen up before me. I was told that finally she was thrust in by force, the door closed upon her, and driven almost to madness, she continued sometimes plaintively, sometimes furiously, to chant her national death song. I thought then how little cause had we to boast over heathen India in reference to the sick poor in our midst, and to the healthy poor I feel that many of our "tender mercies are cruel." * * *

To see the sick, as I have seen them, helped to soup of a strength sufficient to make a hearty meal for a laboring man, and this in a tin pan, and chunks of meat and bread with potatoes, handed out likewise in a service of tin; and to be eaten without the aid of knife, fork or spoon, from the strong box of the city, as was the case in the ward where Jane died—ah me! the mud forced in the mouth of the dying heathen by the river side, must come as near the requisition of the law of love, as such fare for the sick and dying. We certainly ought to have physicians in such establishments, but is it not necessary also to have cooks? To provide the same fare for all, may be economical, but it is certainly far from right.

An incident of a different character, in connection with my subject just strikes me, and I will give it, hoping if it meet the eye of any in authority, they may take a little pains to prevent the like again.

Last winter, when the small pox prevailed so extensively in our city, a poor man, who had no friends, died with the disease. He had kept a little shop in H—— st., but when taken ill, his customers forsook him, and the other tenants in the house took great care not to come in contact with him. He lingered for awhile and then died. The dispensary physician reported it as a case of the most malignant character. The proper authorities sent the Poor House hearse to convey away the corpse, doubtless supposing those sent for the dead would take proper precaution. But that was far from being the case. They placed the body in its pine coffin, secured it in the hearse—went back and took the bed, together with some of the clothes, and throwing them in a pile in the street, set fire to them. After this was done they drove off about a block, and then leaving the hearse standing in the street, quietly went into a grog shop to refresh themselves after their toil, and remained there until the boys raised quite a mob about the pestilent remains.

Sometimes I have seen the Corporation's private carriage, as the nurse called it, standing before the door of moral lazar-houses, in disreputable parts of our city, waiting to convey the dead to the pauper's grave—and while waiting thus have seen it surrounded with those who have lost all resemblance to woman except the form, and have shuddered to hear the brutal jest bandied from lip to lip, of those who bore in their countenances the sure indications of a premature death, and a pauper's burial. I have seen it, too, waiting at the corner of two streets, to take in a poor sick servant girl, whose employer's pride would not suffer it to stop at their door, nor their generosity give the enfeebled creature an extra shilling to enable her to depart for Bellevue by any other conveyance. To see poor girls thus situated dragging themselves along to the hearse, with a little bundle in their hands, (for if they have clothes, they don't take but a change or so, lest they should be stolen from them while they live, or in the event of their death kept from those whose claims preferred both by necessities and blood, makes it duty for them to leave all behind except the poorest they have;) to see them thus, and to know that where they had been toiling there was bread enough, and room enough, and had the heart corresponded to the means, they might possibly have recovered, has often caused tears to flow. The sick poor! the sick poor! What a world of aggravated misery those three words designate! * * * *

While writing on this topic, suffer me through your columns to ask who of our present city fathers will propose in either Board to provide Bellevue with a substantial decent hearse, (not a baggage cart)—one that if sent to the abodes of the poor, to take away the dead resting in one of the city's white pine coffins, might not shock the feelings of friends and relations, with the reflection, "All will know now that I could not bury my dead—all who pass can say, There is a pauper's funeral!" To how many is the bitterness of death enhanced by this reflection. Will not some one of those who vote with the majority on the subject of an appropriation to celebrate the Fourth of July, bear this in mind, and let not a month pass until it is accomplished. (Adv. Moral Reform.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE BOY'S LAST BEQUEST.

Half raised upon the dying couch, his hand
Drooped on his mother's bosom, like a bud
Which, broken from its parent stalk, adheres
By some attenuate fibre. His thin hand
From 'neath the downy pillow drew a book,
And slowly pressed it to his bloodless lips,
—"Mother, dear mother, see your birth-day gift,
Fresh and unsoiled. Yet have I kept your word,
And ere I slept each night, and every morn,
Did read its pages, with my simple prayer,
Until this sickness came."

He paused, for breath
Came scantily, and with toilsome strife.
—"Brother or sister have I none, or else
I'd lay this Bible on their heart, and say,
Come read it on my grave, among the flowers.
So you who gave must take it back again,
And love it for my sake."

"My son! My son!"
Whispered the mourner in that tender tone
Which woman in her sternest agony,
Commands to soothe the pang of those she loves.
"The soul! The soul! to whose charge yield you that!"
"To God who gave it."—So that gentle soul,
With a slight shudder, and a seraph smile,
Left the pale clay, for its Creator's arms.

THE CRUEL BOY PUNISHED.

When I was young, many years ago, for I am now old and my head is white, I knew a boy by the name of Peter Johnson, who was a very bad boy, and caused himself and others much trouble. He was a very bright boy, but had a bad disposition. He did not like his school, and would not mind his parents. One day he found a hornet's nest in the edge of the woods which skirted the pasture lands of a Mr. Williams. Perhaps you never saw a hornet's nest; they are made round and hang on the limb of a tree or bush, with a hole at the bottom through which the hornets pass in and out. They have powerful stings, and will swarm like bees when their nest is disturbed, and fight dreadfully. This wicked boy plagued the hornets from day to day, until he had got them very cross, and then he got some salt and called all Mr. Williams' horses and cattle in the field, and fed them salt under and round the little tree on which the hornet's nest hung. As soon as they were well engaged licking the salt, he sent a club against the nest, and out came the hornets, and poured upon the horses and cattle and stung them dreadfully. They ran and snorted and kicked as though they would kill themselves. This was dreadful cruel, and yet it was sport for this wicked boy.

But he got punished, as I will tell you. He was so wonderfully pleased to see the poor horses jump and writhe in agony, that he forgot himself and leaped out from his concealment, hopped up and down, slapped his hands, and laughed and shouted at a great rate. Had he been still behind the bunch of bushes, where he hid after throwing the club at the nest, nothing would have harmed him; but rushing out as he did, a portion of the hornets were attracted by him, and in the midst of his shouts at the misery he had caused, he felt a dreadful sting strike him in his face, and before he could fly he was stung several times. Next day his face was so swollen that he could not see out of his eyes. All the boys who saw him laughed at him, for they all heard how it happened. Though this was more than sixty years ago, I can remember just how ashamed he looked. I hope none of the children to whom I write will be so cruel. If I shall find myself able, I will tell you more about this wicked boy. GRANDFATHER.

THE THREE FRIENDS.

Two sisters, named Amy and Anna, were once sitting together upon a grassy bank, when a large dog came between them, and thrusting his nose familiarly into their hands, snugged down, as if desirous of making one of the party. The two girls caressed him fondly, and called him "good Dash" and "pretty Dash"—and many other titles of affection they bestowed upon him. At length the younger of the girls said, "Amy, I have heard that Dash once saved my life: will you tell me how it happened?" "With pleasure," said Amy; and accordingly she proceeded as follows:

"About five years ago, Anna, when you were not more than two years old, we were living in Vermont, near one of the streams that empties into Connecticut river. The snow was very deep that winter, and when it came to go away in the spring, it made a great freshet. The melted snow came down the hills and mountains, and filled the rivers, which overflowed their banks, and overspread the valleys and swept everything before them.

"The little river near our house suddenly rose above its borders, and came thundering along, tearing away trees and bridges and mills and houses. At last it seemed to threaten our dwelling, and father and mother began to prepare to leave it and fly to the neighboring hills for security. In the preparation for flight, you was put into a large basket with some clothes stuffed round you, and set down upon a little bridge of planks near the house, while our parents and myself were gathering together a few things to take with us. As father put you on the bridge, he noticed that Dash seemed to look on with interest and anxiety, for the waters made a terrible roaring all around us; and he observed also, on looking back, that Dash had taken his seat on the bridge by your side.

"You had not been left more than ten minutes, when we heard a frightful noise, and going to the door, we saw, with terror and amazement, that the water had suddenly risen and surrounded the house. Nothing could save us but instant flight. Father took me in his arms, and with mother clinging to him, he started for the bridge where you had been placed; but he soon perceived that the bridge had been carried away by the rush of the waters, and neither you nor Dash was to be seen. It was no time for delay or search, for the waves were rising rapidly, and it was with the utmost difficulty that father was able to take mother and me to the hill. There at length we arrived, and leaving us to take care of ourselves, father went in search of you. He was absent nearly four hours—and I never shall forget the anxiety with which we waited his return. We were without shelter; the earth was damp and the air chill; but we were so absorbed in fear for you that we thought not of our own sufferings. At last we saw father coming, at a considerable distance. He had you in his arms, and Dash was leaping and frolicking at his side. I was never so happy; I shall never, never be so happy again, as I was when I saw father coming, and saw that you was safe!

"At length father reached us; though it was a matter of some difficulty, on account of the water, which had choked up the valley. I need not tell how heartily mother and myself kissed you when we got hold of you. We shed a great many tears, but you only laughed, and seemed to think it all a pleasant frolic. When we could compose our feelings, father told us the story of your escape. It seems that the waters rose suddenly while we were in the house, and lifting the planks of the bridge, carried you and Dash and the basket upon them, down the stream. The current was very swift, and you must have sailed along at a terrible rate; but faithful Dash kept his place at your side. You had gone about two miles, when the dog and basket were seen by some people standing on the shore.—Dash saw them at the same moment, and he set up a very piteous howl, but they did not understand him. When he saw that there was no relief to be had from them, he leaped into the water, and seizing one end of the planks in his mouth, began to swim with all his might, and push the planks toward the land. He was so powerful and so skilful, that he very soon gave them a direction toward a little island, which was not distant, and in a few moments they struck against the shore, and were held fast by running between some small trees.—The dog again set up a howl, and the people before mentioned, now thinking something was the matter, entered a boat and went to the island, where they found you fast asleep in the basket, and dry as a biscuit!"

When Amy had reached this point of her story, Anna put her arms around the dog's neck, and, with her eyes swimming in tears, kissed him over and over again. She said nothing, however, for her heart was too full. Her sister then went on to tell the rest of the story—but, as the reader will easily guess it all, I need not repeat it here. If any of my young readers are curious to know all about it, I shall be at their service whenever they will give me a call.

WHERE IS GOD?

I once asked that question in a Sabath School. A little boy answered, "In heaven." Children are apt to think that God is a very great way off, and thinking so they do not come to their Heavenly Father as they would to an earthly parent to ask for blessings which he has promised to bestow upon such as ask him. They cannot recognize God by any one of their senses, and because they cannot, they imagine him to be at a great distance from them, and forget that he numbers the hairs of their heads, and notices all their actions and thoughts. A bishop once said to the young de Chateunoef, "If you will tell me where God is I will give you an orange." "If you will tell me where he is not, I will give you two," was the child's answer. The poet beautifully answers the question, "Where is God?"

"In the sun, the moon, the sky;
On the mountain, wild and high;
In the thunder, in the rain,
In the grove, the wood, the plain;
In the little birds that sing;
God is seen in every thing."

If we are always impressed with the omnipresence of God, we shall frequently be restrained from wrong doing. Says the Psalmist, "If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost part of the earth even there will thy hand lead me and thy right hand uphold me."

B.

JUVENILE SIMPLICITY.

The editor of an exchange paper has been much amused by what he terms juvenility of a little boy of his acquaintance. He was about going to bed and was kneeling at his mother's feet, with his hands clasped between her's as she recited to him the Lord's prayer, which he repeated after her—'Our Father which art in Heaven'—'Our Father which art in Heaven'—'Hallowed be thy name'—'Hallowed be thy name'—'Give us this day our daily bread'—'Oh, mamma, let's ask for cakes.'

This reminds us of a bright-eyed little acquaintance of our own—the son of a friend. With a simplicity equal to that mentioned above, the little fellow, repeating the prayer after his nurse, when the latter said, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' quickly added, 'and a piece of cheese to eat with it.' The nurse, less reverent than the child, smiled at his prayer—but it was the prayer of faith, nevertheless. [Charter Oak.

A NOBLE LITTLE TEMPERANCE GIRL.

We were highly pleased with an incident, a friend related to us, about his little girl. He had taken his wife and little daughter to the exhibition of the New-York Institute. While there, one of the officers of the Institute, noticing the little girl, and being pleased with her lively and social turn, took pains to accompany her about the fair, and to point out to her objects that might interest her. He left for a short time, and visited another part of the building. When he returned, he went immediately to the little girl, and offered her his hand, to lead her about the hall again. But no, she would not go with him. "Why," said he, "you have not seen half the pretty things yet. Come, and I will show them to you." Still she refused, and clung as if affrighted to her mother. Surprised at such conduct, her mother remonstrated, and bade her be polite to the kind gentleman. "Mother," said the little girl, drawing down her mother's ears, "Mother, he smells of rum!" And nothing could induce her to go near him again. Was she to be blamed, children?

A CREDIBLE WITNESS.

Two claimants for one dog lately appeared before a justice of the peace, in a town near Boston. Several witnesses swore positively to the ownership of each litigant, when the sagacious magistrate directed the plaintiff to take his place on his right and the defendant to occupy a corresponding position on his left; the dog in dispute being remanded to a distant part of the room. The parties were then commanded to whistle when the animal made for the defendant. "Mr. ——," said the justice to the clerk, "record the decision for the defendant, the dog is the only credible witness in the case."

Children should not think that there is no reason for the commands of their parents or teachers because they see none.

GATHERING ORANGES.

Who of my little readers has not seen oranges? I presume all of you have, and I have little doubt that most of you have eaten them. They are a most delicious fruit, but not so valuable as the apple. They do not last as long as the apple, and when first picked from the tree, for sending abroad, they are of a very green color, not being perfectly ripe. I have seen oranges in New-York of a green color, they having just come out of the boxes in which they were brought to market.

Oranges grow in warm climates. They are very plenty in Spain, Italy, the Southern part of France, the West India Islands, and the Southern portion of the United States. The orange tree is not large, and the bark is of a greenish color. We have heard persons describe groves of oranges as presenting a most beautiful appearance when the fruit was ripe. I have often seen orange trees that have been reared in houses, but they did not exhibit the natural beauty of the tree.

Oranges are often used in sickness. They are quite a rich fruit, and their flavor is of the most delicious sweetness. I read a story not long since of a father who went to town, and brought home three oranges, which he gave to his three little boys. The next day, finding that all the boys had disposed of their fruit, he asked what they had done with them. The first said that he had eaten his; the second, that he had sold it for money enough to buy two more; and the third, that he had carried it to a very poor woman who lived some distance off, to give to her little sick boy who lay upon his bed, wasting away with a burning fever. Will my readers tell me who made the best use of his orange?

How kind God is to give us so many good things to promote our comfort and happiness. Who can look abroad upon the face of nature, and see so many evidences of his regard for us, and not feel his heart expand with love and gratitude?

SPRINGFIELD ARMORY.

I went with a friend to a beautiful part of Springfield, called "the Hill." Presently we came to a large level piece of ground, laid out beautifully with trees and walks, and surrounded with buildings. On the south side were three large buildings called arsenals, where they keep the guns after they are finished. On the east side were workshops, where the finishing part is done, and offices for the clerks, also a building which was formerly used as a chapel, in which Divine service was held on Sundays. The principal part of the work on the guns, is done in large shops on a beautiful little stream called Mill River, a mile or two east of "the Hill." Near one of the shops on this river, is a pleasant little village called the "Upper Water Shops," there is also the "Middle Shop," and the "Lower Shop." I once had a beautiful sail on a large pond in Mill River, just above the Upper Shop, with a young lady who has written a piece about it in Parley's Magazine; perhaps some of my young readers have seen it. There were quite a party of girls and boys, with their teachers, they went in two boats. When they came near the shop, they struck up "Swiftly Glides the Bonny Boat," &c. Their clear rich voices, aided by the excitement of the scene, produced a fine effect. We gathered pond lilies, and had various adventures, but I am digressing. I was writing about the armory. On the west side of the square, were the offices, houses, good looking buildings, all alike, painted yellow. On the north side, were various other buildings belonging to the public ground, and rented to the workmen. Here I must stop to describe the scenery. Behind the houses on the north side, was a ravine and woods, wherein grew innumerable herbs and roots, suited to the cure of all manner of diseases, many rare flowers, and beyond the ravine, hills and dales, in never-ending succession. A few years after this visit, I went there, and could not find the beautiful ravine, I suppose it is all built up with houses now. Most of the work is done at the Water Shops. I have been into the "Upper Shop" a great many times. There are large wheels with machinery, some of it is said to be the most curious of any in the United States. I was told some of the most curious and useful parts were invented by workmen, some of whom were then in the shops. It was winter when I visited it, and the windows were full of the most rare and beautiful plants in pots, belonging to the wives and daughters of the armorers. They were put there to be kept from freezing during the cold weather, it being very warm in the shop. But you would not see them there now if you should go there. In the lower and middle shops the forging and wedling is done, the largest gun barrels are made, and all the coarser work. The nicer parts were done at the Upper Shop. Every part is made separately, and then it is all put together. More than three hundred workmen are constantly employed, and not more than three or four are doing the same work. In all the shops they keep a watch at night, whose duty it is to go round all the premises, every half hour, and see that all is safe. At nine o'clock the watch calls out, "past nine o'clock and all's well," and so on at the end of each hour. I told you there were three arsenals on "the Hill;" I only visited the middle one, in the others there was nothing to see but large boxes, in which guns were packed ready to be sent away. The United States, "Uncle Sam," as the armorers call it, has in different parts of the country large buildings, called garrisons, where these guns are sent. I will some time tell you about a visit I once made to the garrison in Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

The middle arsenal is a very large building. It is three stories high, each story in one large room, in which the guns are stacked in rows. Each room is filled with the guns, excepting a walk or passage round the building next to the walls. The guns are in the middle of the room which is very large and high. The guns are in rows one above another. They are so regularly arranged, that I could look through the whole length of the building six different ways, between the rows of guns. I was told there were ninety-four thousand guns in the whole building. The guns were as bright as they could be. One man was employed constantly in oiling them and keeping them free from rust. From the third story windows, we had a most beautiful view of the town and river.

It made me feel sad to see all these guns, and think that they were made to kill people with, and I asked one of the men who professed to be a Christian, what they were making all these guns for, if they believed the time was coming when guns should be beaten into ploughshares, and spears into pruning hooks; he answered, they were making them in order to have them all ready to be beaten up. This shows he had no good answer to give me. In a little corner of the stairway under a window, many people had written their names, with the date of their visit. We wrote our names there, and under mine, I wrote, "Peace on earth, and good will to man."

Since I visited the place, there has been a great change in the regulations of the Armory. There has been appointed a military superintendant instead of a citizen as before. The armorers did not like the change at all, especially at first, but if they dared to say anything they were discharged, so they don't say anything now. I don't know but they like it better, for I have nothing at all to do with the Armory, but I don't believe they do, for many of the regulations are arbitrary and tyrannical, as all military discipline must be. I hate to see laboring men oppressed, as I take their part, but I wish in my heart that all the works were stopped, for I think it very wicked to have war, or to make guns ready for war. I would join with my little friend Mary, and hold up both hands for no more war.

UP AND AWAY.

Up and away with the rosy light,
With a song of joy, with plumage bright.
Screaming farewell to the misty night,
The lark is up and away:
Nor the lark alone, the tribes of song,
Sporting the Sylvan bowers among,
Join in the chorus loud and long,
At earliest peep of day.

Through the forest wilds with noiseless tread,
Shaking the dew drops from his head,
Up and away from his leafy bed,
The squirrel is up and away;
While springing up from slumber sweet,
First flashing of the dawn to meet,
The tenants of the grove replete,
With joy, the call obey.

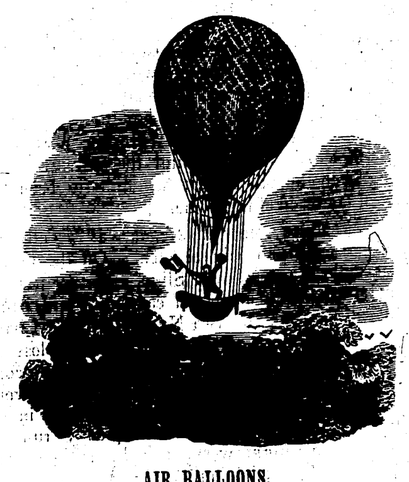
Up and away at a rapid pace,
With a bounding heart and merry face,
The happiest beings of our race,
Children up and away.
Away and over the murmuring brook,
Across the plain through the forest nook,
With dinner, satchel, and with book,
Children up and away.

THE STUDIOUS SCHOLAR.

On the plains of Mansfield, in Germany, a great many years ago, there lived a poor wood-cutter and his family. He worked hard that he might support them. The wife often carried the wood on her back. Martin, their son, while a small boy, made up and brought his little faggot with theirs to be sold in the market. And with all their industry they could little more than supply their daily wants.

Though poverty was their lot, still the parents could not think of bringing up their son without education. They endeavored to teach him the knowledge of God, to train him in His fear, and form him to the practice of Christian virtue, while they forgot not his early domestic education. In a few years more he was sent away to school. This was a severe trial to young Martin. Cast upon the world without friends or protectors, he trembled in presence of his masters. In his extreme poverty, he was forced at play hours to beg his bread. He was seen on a cold Christmas morning going through a neighbouring village, from house to house, singing the usual carols on the Saviour, The Babe born in Bethlehem, and begging a little food to supply his wants. And often instead of bread he received harsh words and cruel treatment. Sometimes, overcome with sorrow, he wept bitterly in secret; he wished to store his mind with useful knowledge, but how was he to attain it? He could not look forward with hopes of success.

One day, after being driven from several houses, he was about to return supperless to his lodgings, and as he was thinking of his sad condition, he said, "Alas! must I for want of bread give up my studies, leave the school, go home to my parents and remain in ignorance?" Suddenly a door opened, and a sweet voice invited him to enter. She who called had seen the cruelty with which the poor discouraged scholar had been treated. She pitied him, for she had often noticed him in his rambles. She saw him weeping before her door, had come to his assistance, and to supply his urgent wants. Here the persevering Martin found a welcome home among kind hearted Christian friends. He was no longer forced to beg, and no longer feared he should be obliged to return to Mansfield, and bury the talents that God had committed to his trust. By this event he learned to trust in the providence of God. He applied his mind with greater energy to his daily task, made rapid progress in his studies, and soon got far in advance of his class-mates.



AIR BALLOONS.

"Oh, mother, mother, come here quick, quick!" said little Mary Smith, a country girl, one day as she stood in the garden, half terrified with fear, and saw a balloon floating through the air several miles distant. Mary had never seen nor heard of a balloon, and so strange a sight might well strike terror in the mind of one unaccustomed to such a scene.

Mary's mother had once been to the city, and had seen a balloon ascend from Castle Garden, several years before the event here spoken of, and had a sufficient knowledge of the manner of "sailing in a balloon," to give her little daughter a very intelligible idea of it, and thus allay her fears.

Should any of the readers of the Monitor ever see an object floating through the air, resembling the cut, they will know that it is an air balloon, and that no danger to them is to be apprehended from it. Sailing in a balloon, however, is dangerous business for those engaged in it, and sometimes leads to dreadful disasters. A few years ago, a French lady ascended from Paris in one, on a pleasant evening. When the balloon had reached an altitude of about a hundred feet, a rocket was discharged from the concourse of people in the street, which passing through it, immediately set fire to the gas with which it was inflated, and the unfortunate lady instantly fell on the pavements beneath, dashing her to pieces, to the horror and grief of the vast multitude! Several accidents of a very serious nature, have occurred in the United States, from ascending in balloons, but we have not time to narrate them.
